Sobbing incoherently, Judson Connors fired. He pumped six slugs into the little man's body as he stood laughing before him. The body fell, life squeezing out of it with the last echo of the laughter.

Judson Connors stared down at the little man, stared down at the riddled form, of his enemy. His eyes noted incongruous details. Like the tiny drops of red on the shiny patent-leather shoes. Why did he wear those things? Patent-leather shoes weren't in style—

Murder wasn’t in style, either.

It took Judson Connors thirty seconds before the red haze cleared; thirty seconds to realize what he had done.

Then he started mumbling to himself, “But he made me do it—he taunted me to my face—he made me. Another thirty seconds and the whining subsided.

“What’ll I do? Must do something. Get rid of it—the furnace. Nobody saw him come in. Nobody knows. The furnace.”

The gaunt old man stooped. His hands hooked themselves into the collar of the suit. He dragged the body across the floor, wheezing more from panic than exertion. The little man’s body slid out of the room, patent-leather shoes last.

And then, from the corner, the living little man stepped forth. He rocked with silent merriment.

“Perfect! Absolutely perfect!” he chuckled.

He’d seen the whole thing. It had hurt a moment when the slugs bit home. Then that blackness. And all at once, it a second’s time, he was standing on his feet across the room, near the drapes. Behind the drapes he’d watched the comedy. Watched Connors fear-crazed face. Going down to burn the body in the furnace, was he? Good. It would never be confused with the body of “Dr. Faust” in the hotel, now. And while he was downstairs, there was perfect safety here.

Safety to search the desk, look for the keys, open the safe. Judson Connors had a quarter of a million in negotiable securities locked up in the house, the old miser. Sylvia had told him. Dear Sylvia! Lucky he’d had the sense to make love to his employer’s wife.

The little man smiled. Yes, it was all so simple, now that he couldn’t be killed. Goad Connors into one of his famous rages, get him to shoot, and search the house while the fool disposed of the body.

It was too simple. The key, now. The little man found it almost at once. It was in the top drawer, right next to where the gun had rested.

And the safe? In the library, of course. Right across the hall. Connors was downstairs. Clever, choosing a time when he knew the servants would be out. No interference at all.

Using the keys, pocketing the bulky packets within the safe, relocking, and putting the keys back in the desk—three minutes did the job.

Somewhere in the basement the fear-stricken cuckold was trying to start the furnace. Ha! He must be in a fine state of nerves. And when he returned and found he had been robbed—

Oh, it was perfect! No suspects, no pursuit. You don't suspect the man you've murdered.

Yes, life was looking up.

The little man opened the door, walked down the driveway of the Connors estate, climbed into his car and whizzed downtown. He bought a ticket to New York at the depot.

"Train leaves in ten minutes," the clerk told him.

The little man smiled, walked past the booths, and entered the barber shop near the train shed. He climbed into a chair in the corner, beckoned to a Negro attendant.

"Shine, please," he requested.

Staring at his patent-leather shoes, the little man whistled gayly.

The little man lay in his Pullman as the train did Reginald Gardiner imitations over the tracks.

He couldn't sleep, but it didn't bother him. Why sleep when he could dream with his eyes open? Dream dreams that would come true?

It didn't matter what the world looked like to anyone else. To him it was just an oyster. His oyster.

From now on he could have anything. Anything at all.

He smiled happily in the darkness. A quarter million! Not a bad start—but only a start. He was going places, fast. This trick now, of forcing somebody to murder you. That was pretty neat. It could be worked again, with variations.

Yes, and there were other gambits. A man who couldn't be killed was valuable. Espionage, for one thing. There were governments in the market for an operator whom the enemy could not destroy. Yes, indeed. Millions. And perhaps, one could aspire to rule—

The little man thought of a cartoon strip. Hyperman. Why not? Fantastic? A quarter million in his valise reassured him.

Nothing was fantastic any more.

They used to laugh at him for a crackpot down at the bank. Say he was a "screwball." Thought he wasted his time on "occultism or some crazy religion." Well, he'd bided his time. Waited. Studied. Learned. Learned? Why, he'd cheated the devil himself with this shoe deal. Patent-leather shoes. The man with the patent-leather shoes. The millionaire with the patent-leather shoes. "The Leader has only one eccentricity. Whatever his attire, he persist in wearing his patent-leather shoes, even on State occasions —"

The little man smiled at his own fancies. Smiled because they were soon to become realities. And stay that way. Never die. No weapon could kill him. Rich. Patent-leather shoes. Never get his soul. Patent-leather—

"I tell you, it's the guy from the hotel."

The words were more than an alarm clock. They echoed and re-echoed through the little man's consciousness like the knell of doom.

His eyes blinked open. That voice—whispering! From a berth nearby, of course.

It was morning already. The little man sat up, ears straining.

"You're crazy. You say yourself the guy cut his throat."

"I know, I know! Dr. Faust, or somebody. But if this ain't the same guy, it's his twin brother. I ain't been a hotel dick for twenty years without bein' able to spot a face. Minute I seen him climb on the train I says—"

"All right," chuckled the second voice. "All right. But you're on a vacation now, Steve. You don't wanna—"

"All the same," came the loud whisper of the first man. "When we have breakfast I'm gonna step up to His Nibs and ask a few questions. Ain't gonna hurt to ask a few questions. Yeah."

The little man's heart beat a staccato rhythm. It was a fitting accompaniment to the speed with which he dressed.

"Got to get out of here," he murmured. He edged out of the berth cautiously, brushed his way down the sleeping-car corridor. At the far end he caught a porter.

"Listen, George," he rasped. "When's the next stop?"

"Why, we gonna stop in about two hours, suh."

"Oh. Thanks."

Two hours? Too long. The detective would spot him by that time. Hide in the berth? Not safe. Other cars? The snooper would probably nose around. Ask questions of other passengers, the porter. Get him spotted. Damn! No way out.

Why, there was always a way out!

If he were to hide in his berth, he'd be searched for—unless he were seen somewhere else. Seen dead, for example.

That was it.

Grasping his shaving kit, the little man walked stealthily down the aisle toward the men's room.

He stood, swaying slightly before the mirror, and opened the razor. He grinned. "Second time in three days," he whispered. "But they can't stop me.

No, they couldn't stop him. Nobody could. God, man, nor the devil. He was going to climb, he was going to be master, he had the power, the bargain to protect him.

A recurrent vision of his splendor came to him, and he smiled again. Then he lifted the razor, laid the keen, cold edge against his bare neck with a practiced hand.

The porter opened the door.

"Say, mistah—"

Then the porter saw what was lying on the floor—lying horribly still, except for the loosely rolling head, which moved with a deeper horror of its own.

The porter stared at the wide grin on the dead face, and the wider opening at the throat. His eyes rested on the lolling arms, the legs, the feet.

Something about the feet seemed to inspire the porter with professional interest, even now.

“Dead,” he whispered. “Dead. An’ here I was just going to tell him about the mistake I made this mawnin’—when I got his shoes mixed up with the fella in the other berth.”

Scratching his head, the porter continued to stare at the body of the little man with the tan shoes.

THE END.

Hell On Earth

Modern day Fausts raise bell among the skyscrapers of Manhattan—and conjure up daemons in the heart of downtown New York!

1. Devil's Brew

"LET me ask you a question," said my visitor. "Would you go—to hell for ten thousand dollars?"

"Brother, just show me the money and tell me when the next train leaves," I told him.

"I'm serious."

I sat back and did my goldfish imitation—staring with my mouth open. I'm pretty good at it.

But Professor Keith was pretty good at looking serious. Too good. After a minute I closed my mouth and just stared.

"Wait a minute," I said. "You haven't got a cloven hoof. You didn't appear out of a cloud of smoke. You're not crazy, and you don't take drugs. You're Professor Phillips Keith, Associate Director of Rocklynn Institute. And you're offering me ten thousand dollars to go to hell."

The pudgy little man with the graying hair adjusted his spectacles and smiled. He looked for all the world like a kindly bishop as he answered, "I'd rather see you go to hell for me than anyone else."

"That's very flattering of you, I'm sure. But, Professor—perhaps you could explain yourself a little more fully before I decide. A man doesn't get an offer like this every day."

Plump fingers held out a newspaper clipping. "Read this."

SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTE TO BECOME WITCHCRAFT DEN

The world-famous Rocklynn Institute will be transformed into a rendezvous for goblins and demons, according to the plans of Thomas M. Considine, wealthy philanthropist.

Considine has authorized a donation of $50,000 to be used in what he describes as a "scientific study of sorcery and Black Magic."

Professor Phillips Keith today announced that Rocklynn Institute is "seriously contemplating" the possibilities of the project. Scientific basis for ancient magic is by no means improbable, Keith declared, and such a study may yield valuable results.

Vendors of black cats, dried toads, and love-philtres might find it worth their while to apply at the Rocklynn Institute in the near future.

"Lousy piece of writing," I commented, handing the clipping back to Keith. "Now, what's the real story?"

Keith rose.

"Why not come along with me and find out for yourself?" he asked.

"Don't mind if I do." I grabbed my hat and followed Keith down to the waiting car. We weaved into traffic before I broke the silence again.

"So it's no gag, then," I mused. "Not just a publicity stunt. You're really going through with something like this?"

The eyes behind the spectacles were penetrating in their gray intensity. "I've never been more serious about anything in my life," declared Keith.

"It was I who badgered Thomas Considine into donating that money. For years it has been my ambition to conduct experiments along this line. Too bad the papers got hold of the story—but from now on there will be no publicity. No one must know that Rocklynn Institute is attempting to raise the dead and conjure up daemons in the heart of downtown New York."

Now if there is one thing I have learned in this Vale of Tears, it's this—you don't tell a man he's crazy when he has fifty thousand dollars to spend. Particularly if he has just offered you ten thousand of that fifty.

So all I said was, "That's fine. But where do I fit into this picture?"

Keith smiled, as he swung the car towards a parking lot.

"Simple. Your name was given to me as a writer of so-called horror-fiction. As such I expect you to be more or less conversant with demonology and witchcraft lore."

"Right. But I certainly don't believe such bunk."

"Exactly! That's my point—while you are in a position to understand what we're attempting, you still don't believe. In other words, you are an average, skeptical representative of John Public. That's why you were chosen to act as official eye-witness and historian of our endeavors. You know what's going on, but you don't believe in it. You will be shown. In other words, you're being hired as a witness."

"You mean ten thousand dollars for standing around and watching you play witch? Ten grand to see you ride a broomstick?"

Keith laughed. "You're almost too skeptical. Come on. I think you need an immediate example."

We entered the skyscraper, purred upwards in the private elevator, stepped briskly across the business-like outer lobby of Rocklynn Institute's spacious quarters on the penthouse floor. Keith led me along the hall to a door marked Private.

He pushed it open, beckoned.

Usually I hate such doors. I hate the smugness of their curt warning. Private!

But if ever a door deserved such a marking, this one did. For it barred madness.

BLACK madness, in a velvet draped room. Red madness, in the flickering braziers winking demonic eyes from shadowy niches.

We stood in a dark chamber, hidden in the topmost recesses of a modern skyscraper—a dark chamber, reeking of blood, musk, hashish, and the tomb.

It was a room tom from the Fifteenth Century, a room torn from ancient dreams.

True, the tables and shelvings were modern, but they groaned with the impedimenta of forgotten nightmares. I looked down at the first ledge beside me, and a casual glance convinced.

A rack of test-tubes reared from the surface. Modern Pyrex, but labeled with inscriptions old as wizardry. “Bat’s blood.”

“Mandrake root.”

“Deadly nightshade.”

“Mummy dust.”

“Corpse fat.” And worse. Much worse.

There were shiny new refrigerators in one corner, but they bulged with unnamable carcasses. There were queerly bubbling vats near a small open fire. One long shelf held alchemic instruments. Jars of herbs stood amidst vials of powdered bones. The floor was crisscrossed with pentagons and zodiacal designs drawn in blue chalk, phosphorescent paint, and some substance that yielded a dull, rusty red.

One wall held books—books I didn’t like. The light gleamed on musty tomes once hugged to the withered bosoms of witches, once grasped by the bony, trembling talons of long-dead necromancers.

For just an instant I stood at Professor Keith’s side, as the iron door closed behind us. For just an instant my eyes ran their spidery pattern across the red glare and black shadow of that room.

And then something rose out of the farther gloom, something wheeled and scuttled from the darkness, something moved in shroud-white silence across the floor.

I jumped two feet.

"Meet Doctor Ross," said Keith.

"Ulp!" I commented.

Doctor Ross's oval face moved toward me. A slim hand darted out. "Charmed," said Doctor Ross.

"Ulp!" I declared again.

"Can't you say anything but 'Ulp' ?" inquired Doctor Ross, with some curiosity.

"Well, you'd 'Ulp' too if you were dragged into a chamber of horrors and had a zombie come at you and the zombie turned out to be a pretty girl with —"

I stopped. But it had slipped out, and I wasn't too sorry. Because Doctor Ross was a remarkably attractive young lady. Her blond hair was not marred by any medical severity of coiffure, and her piquant features were very adequately rouged and decorated. Even the white surgical gown did not wholly conceal features which would make Will Hays foam at the mouth if he saw her in a sweater.

"Thank you," said Doctor Ross, without embarrassment. "And welcome to Rocklynn Institute. I presume you are interested in witchcraft?"

"If all witches are like you—" I began, but Keith cut me off.

"Lily Ross isn't Circe, you know," he remarked, but his eyes twinkled. "And you aren't being hired to pass out compliments. There's work to do. We've got a demon to raise this afternoon."

Right then and there it stopped being funny.

Here I was, yanked into a weird chamber atop a skyscraper, in the hands of two lunatics whose avowed purpose was to experiment in Black Magic, and ordered to stand by and watch them evoke a demon. It was confusing, to say the least. In my agitation I stepped back a foot and bumped into something that clicked. I turned around, stared into the grinning visage of a dangling skeleton, and uttered my familiar "Ulp!"

I got my voice back at once. "Now look here—are you really serious about all this?"

Keith took a sheaf of papers from his pocket and placed them on a table near an inverted crucifix bearing the impaled body of a dried bat, hanging head downwards. He produced a fountain pen, waved me over.

"Sign," he ordered.

"Sign what?"

"The contract. Calling for your services as eye-witness for three months. Ten thousand dollars. Five now, five at the conclusion of our experiments. Serious enough for you?"

"Very." My fingers trembled as I scribbled a signature on both sets of contracts. They fairly shook with palsy as Professor Keith extended his check. Five thousand dollars right now! It was quite serious, no doubt about that.

"Well, then." Keith pocketed the papers. "Are we all ready to proceed, Lily?"

"Everything is in order, Professor," said the girl.

"Then draw the Pentagram," purred Keith. "You'll find the blood in the refrigerator still fresh enough. Recite the chant and light the fires, my dear. And don't worry—I'll keep you covered with the revolvers. If anything goes wrong I'll shoot to kill."

With a bland smile, Phillips Keith drew two guns from his vest holster and leveled them into the darkness of the curtained room.

2. Up Pops—

"SILVER bullets in here," explained Professor Keith. "Very good against vampires, werewolves, vrykolas, or ghouls. Don't know how effective they are against a draconibus, though."

"What?"

"A draconibus. Flying cacodemon of the night. Sort of an incubus. If Abbot Richalmus is correct. We're using his spell from "Liber Revelationum de Insidia et Versutiis Daemonum Adversus Homines." He says the things are black and scaly, quite human in appearance except for the wings and fangs, but on a low order of intelligence. Something like the elementals. If the bullets don't work, there's always the Pentagram. You know what it is; a five-pointed star, two angles ascendant and one pointed down. It represents Satan, Goat of the Sabbath."

"Are you crazy?" I had to say it.

"See here." Keith's face was stem in the red glare. "We might as well understand each other once and for all. I don't mind your skepticism in the least, but please don't cast doubts on my sanity or sincerity."

"But it all seems too absurd—mingling science and sorcery."

"Why?" Keith snapped. "Yesterday's magic is today's scientific fact. Voodoo witch doctors and medieval savants tried to cast out demons. Today psychiatrists attempt to cure insanity by hypnosis, suggestion, and shock treatments, in almost the same way.

"Once alchemists attempted to transmute base metals into gold. Today that effort constitutes the basis of scientific research along identical lines.

"Are not scientists attempting to find the Elixir of Youth in their laboratories, using animal and human blood in their experiments like the mages of old?

"Don't scientists concern themselves with the vital problems of Life and Death—and keep chicken hearts and dog heads alive when severed from the dead bodies?

"Men died for that at the stake in ages past. They died for dealing with the very mysteries we scientists now openly attempt to probe. Science is sorcery, I tell you—except that in some cases, the ancient wizards might have been more successful "You mean that you believe thaumaturgists once actually did revive the dead and call upon elementals?"

"I mean they tried to do it and may well have succeeded. I mean there was nothing wrong with their theories, but their methods were at fault. And I mean that modern science can take those same theories, apply the proper methods, and meet with complete success. That's what we're going to do."

"But—"

“Watch.”

I watched. The slim figure of Lily Ross weaved a white pattern across the far side of the black chamber. Flame blossomed in her fingers as she bent over the braziers in the niches and re-kindled their dying fires. From a pouch at her waist she scattered fine dust upon the embers.

The fires flared upward—not red now, but green and blue and purple. A kaleidoscope of diabolic luminance flooded the vast room.

Red tongues rose from candle tips and lapped at the darkness. Thick, bloated candles, like the puffy fingers of a gigantically swollen corpse—thick, bloated candles, fed by a slim white priestess.

White witch!

SHE stooped over and drew a silvery design upon the floor, and its five luminous points were bathed with a crimson fluid poured from a canister.

“Blood,” whispered Keith. “Type B blood.”

“Type B?”

“Naturally. Didn’t I tell you we were using modern scientific methods in witchcraft?

“Let’s get down to cases. Sorcery in the Middle Ages was almost a racket. The average goetist was a charlatan. Some wizards hung around the courts of small nobles or petty princes, dabbling in astrology and palmistry, and fawning on their patrons like court jesters. They were arrant fakes.

“Others were like modern confidence men, forever asking money to perfect wild plans of transmuting lead to gold, completing an Elizir of Youth, or finding the Philosopher’s stone. Just grafters.

“A third class were quack doctors—boys who took little shops in the side streets and sold phony love philtres, promised to put curses on enemies for a small fee, and attempted to cure everything from epilepsy to the French disease.

“Mixed in with these impostors were the psycopathic cases. Demonomaniacs and diaboleptics who pranced naked on the hilltops during Walpurgis Eve, claimed to ride broomsticks to the moon, or converse with the dead, and have infernal lovers. Inverted religious mania.

“But always there were serious students of the mantic arts. From their records—their spells and incantations—we are working here.”

Keith pointed toward the bookshelves. “It took me years to gather this collection. Manuscripts, parchments, fragments from treatises, secret documents from every country and every age. Much of it is locked away in those files. In cunabula. Cost a small fortune, but worth it.”

“But aren’t they filled with the same fake gibberish as all the rest?” I objected. “I’ve read some of that stuff, and it’s usually pretty silly.”

“True. But there are kernels of truth. It’s easy to discern. Some of the spells are known frauds; others are genuine.”

“You mean if you read a spell aloud that it might conjure up a ghoul or a ghost?”

“If you read it correctly,” answered Keith. “There’s the whole point. That’s where science steps in.

“In many cases the spell has not been set down completely, due to fear. In other instances, the incantation has certain word changes, due to imperfect translations, or incorrect interpretation of the medieval Latin or Greek. The Church burned as much of the genuine stuff as could be found over centuries of time. We’ve had to spend months of preparation—weeding the genuine from the spurious, piecing together fragments, studying contemporary sources. It’s been a lengthy job for Doctor Ross and myself, but we’re now assured of one thing—we have on hand nearly one hundred actual, authentic incantations for the evocation of supernatural forces. If spoken correctly, the proper vibrations will be set up as in ordinary prayer, and responses will be made.

“Also, some of these incantations require ceremonies, such as this one. We’ve spent a goodly sum acquiring the necessary instruments and materials for our experiments. It’s hard to buy a Hand of Glory, or baboon’s blood; hard to secure enough cadavers. Grisly, too—but important.”

I shrugged. “But Class B blood?”

“Merely an illustration of our thoroughness. We’re going to attack the supernatural with modern aid. Consider the reasons for the failure of ancient sorcerers.

“For one thing, as I pointed out, many were admitted fakes. And serious students often got hold of the wrong translations, as I have demonstrated. Naturally, they didn’t succeed.

“Again, they were balked by lack of proper materials. If the spell called for baboon’s blood, they might have had to use the blood of a rhesus monkey, for example. It spoiled the mixture, by simple chemistry. We’re experimenting, when we use human blood, with all blood types—because it might well be that a spell only works with a specific chemical compound. That’s something the ancients didn’t know.

“Similarly, they often were taken in by frauds. Perhaps they attempted brewing a philtre calling for ‘powdered unicorn’s horn.’ Naturally, when we see such a recipe, we know it’s a fake and throw it out. They weren’t so fortunate, and again they failed.

“So there you are. It may look like hocus-pocus to you, but it’s the result of applied scientific reasoning. We’ve sifted our spells, we’ve checked our formulae, we’ve gathered together only the most authentic ingredients, we’re working by trial and error and modern logic.

“Under such conditions we cannot fail, if there is any truth in the supernatural lore which has dominated all nations and all religion since the dawn of Time.

“SURELY there is a basis of truth underlying this tremendous mass of legend and theory that is older than any other form of worship. Science has recognized today the pathological existence of the vampire and werewolf and ghoul in mental cases. Science has recognized today many practises which were once called witchcraft. Now we shall take the further step and discover whether the ancients were wiser than we knew. We shall reconstruct—correctly—the enchantments of the magicians and evocators.

"Today, using Class B blood, we are performing the Richalmus rune to evoke a draconibus. Doctor Ross has drawn the Pentagram. She has placed the five candles at the points, and fed the fires with the Three Colors.

"Now she will read the invocation in the original Latin. If the conditions are reproduced correctly, we shall soon see the veritable flying daemon of the night which the good Abbot describes so graphically. Mayhap we shall capture it and offer our living proof to the world."

"You'll capture it?" I murmured.

Keith smiled. "Why not? That's the kind of evidence we need to confound the smug skeptics, the pompous figures who delight in shaming poor old women at seances and ridiculing sincere students of the occult. Why, when Tom Considine put up the money for all this, he laughed at me! I wonder what he'd say if I sent a draconibus into the office in a packing-case."

Keith chuckled as he pointed at the ceiling.

"Of course, if the thing does appear, and is dangerous, I've got the silver bullets to stop it. But I'd much prefer to take my apparitions alive. There's the scientific means."

I followed his directing finger. Suspended by chains in the shadowy heights above was a square sheet of transparent glass.

It hung directly over the spot where the Pentagram gleamed upon the floor.

"Notice the lever at the door," Keith said. "Turn that, and the glass cage drops down. Fits over whatever appears in the circle, fits like a cage."

"But your demon would surely break out of it at once," I said, half-ashamed at even using the word.

"Not from that," Keith assured me. "There are repelling crosses ground into the glass itself—including the crux ansantor. Tubes of holy water in the paneling along the sides. Besides, it's the modem 'unbreakable' glass, for added precaution, and there's a little tubing at the top which extends inside. It admits air—and it can also admit enough monoxide to turn that glass cage into a lethal chamber within thirty seconds. So if anything appears, just you pull that lever."

So there it was. I stood in the dark chamber as the white witch wove her spell, and heard the wizard instruct me on the fine art of demon-catching. If it hadn't been for that five thousand dollar check in my pocket, I'd have quit there.

Not because it was silly.

Because it was serious. Too serious. Keith had spoken wildly, but he had spoken with conviction. He was Professor Phillips Keith, associate director of a recognized scientific institute. He was a known scholar and savant, not a crackpot eccentric.

Lily Ross was nobody's fool, I felt—and she wasn't giggling behind her hand, either. She was going about her preparations like a trained scientific assistant. Or a witch.

Witchcraft! The Black Arts of legend, the hideous whisperings creeping throughout history and leering madly through all barriers of reasons. Satanism, the Black Mass, trafficking with the dead and the masters of the dead.

Here in this room, the reek of the grave. The corpse-fat candles, and the flames that burned with a blue light, a green lividity, a purple pallor. Blood trickling across an ancient symbol on the floor. Silence and darkness, and now a rustling, a Lily Ross took the yellow parchment in her hand and stepped toward the light of the blue brazier.

She stood there, poised and statuesque, a blond handmaiden of Evil. Her oval face was dedicated to darkness as her red lips shaped the first syllables that broke the utter silence.

Keith's face was pudgy and prosaic in the glare, but his eyes shone with the fanatic zeal of a Puritan warlock.

Sweat beaded my forehead.

"Would you go to hell for ten thousand dollars?"

Here, in this skyscraper tower, I was nearer to hell than I would be in the bowels of the earth.

Here stood the magic circle, the witch, the wizard. Here was the source, the linkage between Man and Mystery.

Lily Ross spoke the first sentences of the incantation.

I thought that her mouth was a scarlet flower, emanating corruption. I thought that her lips were heaven, but her voice was hell. I saw a beautiful young girl, and I heard the withered croaking of a crone.

It can’t be explained. There was nothing wrong with her tone. It was what she said.

The words were Latin, but they didn’t seem to be words as much as sounds, and not so much sounds as vibrations.

Not college Latin. Not words with meaning in themselves. Not words spoken as sentences. Just sounds, constructed for a purpose. An evil purpose.

I knew that. I knew it as strongly as I knew my own existence.

Lily Ross was reciting an incantation, and for the first time I realized what an incantation meant.

It was a call to a demon.

It was the use of human tongue in a peculiar way, to set up certain vibrations, certain forces that touched, or impinged upon, other worlds. Sound-waves, reaching across planes and angles of existence, commanding and guiding. Sound-waves shatter glasses in modern laboratories. Sound-waves shatter buildings, if properly pitched in volume and intensity. And sound-waves, over and above radio frequency vibrations, can pluck the harps that sound in hell. Can knock upon the gates of the Pit and call forth Presences.

Her voice was but an instrument. The meaningless drone was rising, almost uncontrollably.

Now I knew what truth there was in the power of the word. The word used in prayer, and the word used in black summons.

The drone blended with the blackness. The blackness mingled oddly with the green, the violet, the blue fires.

The Pentagram became a wriggling, phosphorescent serpent, swaying amidst green, purple, and blue words of flame. The shadows droned. The girl burned and flickered.

Suddenly the pulsing began.

It shook the walls. It rose with the words the girl recited, blended with them, then emerged stronger, triumphant. Smoke spiralled up in a sudden jet from the braziers, as a great wind filled the chamber.

I shook before the icy blast that was not air—shook as though a dental drill buzzed through my nerves.

I looked through water at a shimmering, slim figure, a slithering silver line on the floor, a wiggling spiral of colored fires. And then the light came up, the roar came up, the voice came up to a single, sustained note.

“Wake up!”

“Somebody was shaking me. It was Keith. Slowly the roaring died away.

“You’re out on your feet, man!”

I looked around. There was no shimmering. No wind. No noise. Lily Ross—a girl, not a witch—stood silent and dejected.

Keith scowled at me. “We’ve failed.”

“But I felt something—something—”

“Pure self-hypnosis. It didn’t work.”

Lily Ross stepped over.

“Let me see this copy of the incantation,” Keith demanded, wearily. He took the paper from her hand.

“Damnation!”

Lily’s eyes widened to a deeper blue. “What’s the matter?”

“Matter? Here’s a perfect example of what I was trying to explain. You’ve made a mistake here. This isn’t the proper invocation at all. This isn’t the Richalmus ritual. It’s that other one almost like it—Gorgioso’s Invocation of the Devil!”

“How did that happen?” asked the girl. “I could have sworn—”

"I'll do the swearing," snapped Keith. "You've recited the Invocation of the Devil by mistake. No wonder nothing happened!"

He turned to me, but didn't say anything. There was no chance to speak.

For the roaring started again, and this time there was no question of self-hypnosis involved.

The rumbling shook the room as though the building was clawed by an earthquake. Lily and Professor Keith stood swaying beside me as the wind rose, the flame flared, the thunderous crescendo swept through our bodies, tore at our brains.

Gleaming with lambent fire, the Pentagram writhed at our feet. Within it a black shadow—a black shadow, coalescing, blurring into an outline—an outline in the Pentagram of Satan, Black Goat of the Sabbath!

Out of the corner of my eye I saw Lily Ross's trembling hands move out, saw the crumpled scrap of paper fall from her fingers. It was the parchment from which she had read the incantation—the wrong incantation. The one that summoned up the Devil.

And now—a figure stood in the Pentagram!

3. Speaks of the Devil

WE STARED, all of us. Lily Ross gave a tiny gasp, lost amidst the crackling of the braziers. Keith was numb. I found myself trembling, unable to lift my hands and shield my eyes from a vision that seared and burned with a flame from the Pit.

The Presence crouched there in the Pentagram, its black goat-face gleaming in the glare of the fires. The shaggy, tousled head with the stumps of goat-horns, the fiendishly familiar visage, the cloaked body—I saw them all, merging into a sharper focus of actuality.

The Presence gathered itself as I gazed, as though revelling in the actuality of its new physical existence. Like a child being born and realizing it.

But this was no child. There was nothing youthful in the ancient smirk of relish on that ageless face. The fires in those slitted eyes burned long before the gases which created Earth.

It was a tableau born in a daemonic dream. And like a dream, it dissolved into sudden, terrible action.

The goat-body moved, black arms extended. Claws, talons, call them what you will, emerged swiftly from the cloak. They reached across the Pentagram.

One foot moved out. Black, misshapen. Hooflike. Cloven!

My own feet moved then. Moved in desperate swiftness. As the Presence lumbered forward I raced for the doorway. My outstretched arms tugged frantically at the lever Keith had shown me. I wrenched it down.

From the ceiling the iron chains grated. There was a thunderous crash, and then the great glass cage dropped down squarely over the black body of Satan, Prince of Darkness.

The creature in the cage beat black claws against the glass and suddenly recoiled.

“Good Lord!” These, the first words spoken, were Keith’s contribution. They sounded most appropriate.

I began to laugh. I couldn’t help it.

“What’s that for?” Lily Ross whispered.

“I was just thinking,” I gasped weakly. “I’ve—I’ve matched wits against Satan himself, the Arch-Enemy. And won!”

Lily calmly reached out with one slim hand and slapped my face. Hard.

I sobered. “Thanks,” I whispered. “I couldn’t control it.”

“No hysteria,” she said. “If you’d kept that up one minute more, I’d have started to scream myself. It’s too much—we’ve got Satan locked up in a skyscraper!”

“Are you still skeptical?” Keith asked. “Skeptics don’t sweat,” I answered, dabbing my forehead. “But if I’m not skeptical, I’m practical. What do we do now?”

“Turn on the lights, for one thing.” Keith pressed the rheostat. The room blazed up into prosaic outline. Fluorescence turned the darkness to daylight, and we stood in the draped chamber—ordinary figures once more, in an ordinary room.

Except for that glass cage, and the horror it held.

It was bad enough in the firelight, but now the nightmare quality of our captive was accentuated ten-fold.

The black figure stood proudly in the center of the glass enclosure—stood proud as Lucifer. Unbidden, the three of us drew closer.

Under the lights I saw every detail. Too much detail. The monster was shaggy, a goat-headed Aegypan figure with human eyes and mouth. The skin was jet-black, but dull. I stared intently at one gnarled talon—horrified at its microscopic detail and the total absence of visible pores in the skin.

Lily’s blue eyes, Keith’s gray ones, followed mine.

“It’s incredible,” muttered the pudgy professor. “Just like the mental image I’d formed. “The beard, the mustache, the monocle. And the red skin.”

“Red skin?” I snapped. “It’s black!”

“Scaly!” insisted Lily.

“No scales,” I said. “What are you talking about? And what do you mean, monocle? Why, he’s like a black goat.”

“Are you crazy?” Keith said. “Why anyone can see that he’s a man in evening dress with a red face and a monocle.”

“What about that forked tail?” asked Lily. “That’s the worst.”

“No tail at all,” I retorted. “You two aren’t seeing straight.”

Keith stepped back.

“Wait a minute,” he protested. “Let’s consider this.” He cocked his head my way. “You claim you see a sort of black goat, with human features, wearing a cloak?”

NODDED.

I

“And you, Lily?”

“A scaly creature with a forked tail. More like a gray lizard.”

“And I see a red fiend in evening dress,” Keith announced. “Well, we’re all correct.”

“I don’t get it.”

“Don’t you understand? No one really knows what the Devil looks like. Each of us has his own mental picture, drawn from imaginative illustrations in books. Throughout known history, Satan has been pictured in several ways by his worshipers and enemies. To some he appeared as the Goat of the Sabbath, the primitive fiend of the oriental nomads, the Father of Lies known to the Bible.

“To others he is essentially the incarnation of the Tempter, the Serpent. To moderns, he is the red gentleman. We three each visualize him in our own way, and the focal thought of millions throughout the ages materializes him in whichever aspect seems most natural to the beholder.

“We’re all looking at the same figure. We all see different concepts. What he really looks like, we cannot say. He may be gas, or light, or simply a flame. But our thoughts give him the material body.”

“You may be right,” Lily hazarded. “Why not? I don’t want to blaspheme, but does anyone know what Christ really looked like? No—all we have to go by is the standard concept, which was invented by medieval painters. And yet, He is always pictured in one way, and we have come to think of Him in that way. We couldn’t see Him in any other form. So it is with the Enemy.”

“That’s all very interesting,” I interrupted. “But what do we do now—phone for the papers?”

“Are you joking? Do you know what would happen if the world learned that we had—him captive in this room? Can’t you see the panic, the madness that would be loosed on earth?

“Besides, we must experiment. Yes, this is our opportunity. Providence must have guided us when we made that mistake!”

“Are you sure it was Providence?” asked Lily, quietly. “This gift did not come from Heaven.”

“Don’t quibble. My girl, just realize what we have here in our midst! Why, it’s the greatest thing that’s happened since—”

“The capture of Gargantua, the gorilla,” I finished for him. But I didn’t smile when I said it. “Keith, this is dangerous. I don’t like it. We’ve apparently got our visitor bottled up under glass, but if he ever gets loose—”

“He won’t get loose,” Keith barked. “Are you a coward, man? Can’t you see that here, in this very room, we hold a proof of witchcraft, a proof of the existence of the supernatural, of evil?”

“I agree with you about evil,” I answered. “And I’m afraid. He who sups with the devil must have a long spoon.”

“You talk like—”

“A priest,” I finished again. “And perhaps they are wiser than you scientists think. They have been fighting this creature here for long centuries, and their wisdom should be heeded.”

“Why, you said yourself that you matched wits with the Devil and beat him,” Keith protested. “We, with the weapons of scientific research at our command, are going to study our guest. Why, we’ll give him a blood test, we’ll examine the skin, we’ll isolate cells under the microscope, we’ll use X-ray, we’ll—”

I turned away. It was madness. I sought sanity in Lily Ross’s blue eyes. But she was babbling too. The scientific spirit.

“Maybe the creature can speak. What about an intelligence test? We’ll get our dope from the staff. Take pictures.”

“You’d think it was some new sort of guinea-pig. But I didn’t. Not when I saw the black body crouching there, huddled up away from the cross-etched glass, but with flaming evil in its eyes. They had the Devil in a cage, and they wanted his fingerprints!

“Success!” Keith trumpeted. “Success beyond the wildest dreams of man. We’ll conduct a scientific study of all evil—of incarnate evil. The nature and principle of evil. The evil men have known of, feared throughout the ages since Creation. It's there. We all see it differently through our own eyes. All men do, but it exists. Like electricity. A force."

He stood beside the glass enclosure, gesturing like a circus barker.

"Behold the Great God Pan! Yes, and behold the Serpent, the Tempter, the Fallen Angel! Behold Satan, Lucifer, Beelzebub, Azriel, Asmodeus, Sammael, Zamiel, Prince of Darkness and Father of Lies! Gaze on the Black Goat of the Sabbath, gaze on fabled Ahriman, on Set, Typhon, Malik Tawis, Abaddon, Yama, Primal Nodens, the archetype of evil, known to all men by all names!"

Once again I felt the urge of hysterical laughter. This was too much. Only the girl saved me.

"Let's get out of here," she suggested. "At once. We've had a shock. Tomorrow we can sit down and reason this thing out clearly, if we're not crazy already. We can make plans sensibly then. Let's rest."

"You're right. I'm sure that—he—will be safe behind the glass. And this room is locked, sealed. No one must suspect."

Keith moved toward the door and we followed. He snapped out the light as the door opened, plunged the room into Stygian night.

We went out. I looked back once. There was nothing but blackness, and two red coals burning. Eyes. Eyes in the darkness. The eyes of Satan. The eyes that saw Faust.

4. Hell Breaks Loose

"THAT'S my story," I concluded.

"Now, what's yours?"

Lily Ross raised her glass, tinkling the ice in rhythm to the music from the orchestra.

"Just a little astro-physics and bio-chemistry," she smiled. "A job at Rocklynn as Keith's assistant."

"Don't kid me. You're a blonde in a green evening dress, the prettiest come-on girl in this supper club. And you're going to dance with me, because you never heard of chemistry or physics, but you can La Conga all night."

She could, too. One whirl around the floor convinced me. Clinched me, in fact. That noise like a ton of bricks was me falling. But I didn't care. I had the Devil by the tail and Lily Ross in my arms, and I was sitting on top of the world tonight.

But when we got back to our table, Lily sobered for a moment.

"I say," she said. "I'm worried about Professor Keith. That excitement today, our experiment, unnerved him. Hope he's going to be all right tomorrow. He went home in a taxi and went to bed."

"Calm yourself, Lily," I said. "If he isn't all right tomorrow, he'll merely be suffering from a hangover."

"What do you mean?"

"Take a squint at that table near the orchestra," I grinned. "If Keith got in a taxi he wasn't going home."

Lily took her squint, and then her eyes went wide. "Why, he's here—and he's with a woman!"

"That's putting it mildly," I told her. "He's got a woman and a half there. It's Eve Vernon, the singer in On the Beam. Never thought he was such a man-about-town."

"He isn't!" Lily gasped. "Why, he never goes anywhere at all. I've never heard of him escorting a woman. And that's champagne on his table, too. Why—"

"Live and learn," I said. "He's just relaxing, that's all. Shall we join him?"

"Certainly not. It might embarrass him. Besides, there's something strange about this—"

I shrugged, but subsequent events bore me out. Keith was relaxing to a point where it was necessary to bear him out. He danced. He drank two quarts of champagne, solo. He laughed. He reddened. He tried to dance with the girls in the floor show. When Lily and I slipped out he was singing drunkenly at the top of his lungs, to the delight of the surrounding tables.

"Disgusting," Lily commented.

"Forget it," I advised.

I forgot it in her good-night kiss. I forgot everything. All I knew was that tomorrow, at ten o'clock, she would be waiting down at Rocklynn.

She was. I entered the outer lobby and took her arm.

"Where's the Professor?" I asked.

"He didn't show up."

"He must have a hangover, then! Did you call him?"

"Certainly. His housekeeper says he hasn't been in all night."

"Strange. What shall we do?"

"Let's go into the laboratory and wait. We must inspect our—specimen."

Lily led the way down the hall, to the barred doorway. She fumbled with a key. "Why—it's open!"

We entered.

The room was dark, and only a single brazier burned. A single brazier, and the red eyes in the glass cage.

A figure huddled before the cage. "Keith!"

I shook him. He struggled to his feet. "Oh—I must have dozed off. Been here almost all night. Watching to see what he would do—"

Keith's face was haggard, his clothing rumpled. He spoke thickly, as though half-asleep.

"Better get home and get some rest," Lily suggested. "We'll stay here. If you feel up to it this afternoon, we can make our plans then."

SUDDENLY the Professor drew himself up. He seemed to visibly shake off his fatigue.

"Nonsense! I'm all right. Feel splendid, perfectly splendid. But no time for a conference, my dear. I've got to find Considine. Need more money from him, at once.

"Got a great idea, a great idea. Tell you all about it. Must find Considine, though. You stay here, keep your eyes open. See you tonight at the Test Tube Ball. I'll arrange to meet Considine there, and some of his friends."

He was gone. Lily's mouth was a red oval of astonishment.

"Test Tube Ball?" I repeated.

"Yes. Society masquerade. Patrons of Rocklynn Institute hold it every year. Collect funds there, you know. But what does Keith want at such a gathering? He never dances or goes in for social affairs."

"You forget last night."

"That's just the point—I can't forget last night. That Professor isn't well, I'm sure of it. Something has happened."

"He isn't the only one who isn't well," I said softly. "Look into the glass."

Lily turned and we surveyed the cage together.

Satan squatted, half-slumping, on the floor. The red eyes flickered, but they were suddenly fainter in their fire.

"Sick?" Lily murmured.

"No air—or no food. What does His Majesty eat?" I began. But something about the aspect of the creature cut me short.

"I wish Keith were here," said Lily. "We ought to do something."

We peered into the glass.

Suddenly Satan opened his eyes. He sat up and stared back. All at once he rose to his feet, stepped forward. His upraised claws almost touched the glass, but not quite. The gesture was one of appeal. And in those eyes I read not hate, but—recognition!

Lips curled, disclosing yellowed fangs. They moved silently behind the glass.

"He's trying to talk to us!" Lily gasped. "I'm sure of it!"

"Watch!"

The black fiend was gesturing wildly. Its eyes rested first on Lily's face and then my own.

"If we could only find out—"

“No use.”

Evidently it was true. His Unholiness suddenly slumped to rest once again on the floor, head buried in the long black arms.

We stared at one another for a long moment.

Once more there was activity within the cage. The creature had bent down on its knees over the floor. One claw held a tiny sliver. With a start, I recognized it. It was chalk—the phosphorescent stuff used to draw the Pentagram with. And the Devil was writing!

From time to time eyes rested on our faces in a strange appeal. The bony fingers continued to move: slowly, painfully.

Letters traced upon the floor. Words. Sentences. And then it was done.

“Turn out the flame of the brazier,” Lily whispered. “Then we can read it.”

I clicked it off, plunged the room into utter darkness. I advanced through that darkness to her side, stared into the dim glow on the floor. A glow that brightened.

Letters. Letters of fire. Silver fire on the floor. I read the words.

“Quickly! Stop him before it’s too late. He got into me this morning and I know what he means to do.”

That’s when I gasped.

I gasped again at the sight of the two words beneath the message. They were a signature.

“Phillips Keith,” I read. Letters of silver fire in my brain.

Lily was shaking at my side. I pulled her to her feet.

“Come on,” I said.

“Where?”

“After the Professor, of course. We’re going to the Test Tube Ball.”

5. The Devil Dances

THE Lone Ranger never had a mission like mine. Nor a costume like mine, either. Lily's hunting outfit was more appropriate. We were out to get our man—if man he was.

There was no dancing in mind for us tonight. Not if what we suspected were true. It might have been cunning on the thing's part—the cunning of a fiend. But anything was possible in a world gone mad. We had the Devil in a cage. Who in this room would believe that? Yet it was true. And these dancing, babbling digits of the Four Hundred hadn't the faintest suspicion.

I smiled grimly at the thought. Suppose His Hellishness should walk suddenly into this very ballroom?

I imagined the screaming, the dismay, the horror. They'd dance to a different tune if that happened!

But—it did.

Lily and I stood by the door waiting. We'd been there for ten minutes, ever since our arrival, eyes scanning the dancers for a glimpse of Keith. He was on his way, the housekeeper had said, when our frantic call had come through. He should be here now, any minute. So we stood there, and Satan walked in.

It was Keith, of course, in a Mephistocles disguise. Red suit, false beard and mustache. But he'd added a grisly touch. Red chalk on face and hands. His concept of Satan.

I HAD never realized he was so tall.

Tall and slender. He looked the part, looked it too well.

We weren't the only ones to notice it. The orchestra had just finished a number, and the crowded hall was a perfect setting for his entrance. He came down three stairs, and all at once the conversation seemed to die away. Women stopped talking in mid-screech, and the fat paws of business men tightened about their cigars in astonishment as Phillips Keith walked into the room.

My mind shuttled back in memory to a similar scene. Red Death! That was it—Lon Chaney as Red Death in The Phantom of the Opera! It terrified me as a child, and now my spine tingled anew. Phillips Keith as Satan, Master of Evil.

"What a disguise!"

"Perfect!"

"Even the club foot!"

I could have choked the thin matron who said that. She would have to call that to my attention. The tingling in my spine became a pulsation of dread.

For Phillips Keith limped.

"Dropped something on his foot," Lily whispered. "He must have—"

Club foot. Or cloven hoof?

The red figure of Mephistocles stalked through the parted lane. Proudly he walked, despite the limp. Proud as Lucifer.

I saw him beckon to a stout man in pirate costume.

"Considine," said Lily, dully. "That's Thomas Considine."

Keith said a few words. Considine appeared to be laughing, commenting on the disguise. He walked at the Professor's side, then beckoned to a companion. The party moved toward a side door.

At that moment the orchestra struck up. Dancing started once more, conversation rose suddenly, and the red-clad Mephisto and his two companions disappeared from the floor.

I grabbed Lily's wrist and jostled through the crowd.

"Hurry," I commanded. "Something's up!"

WE REACHED the door just as the red cloak whisked into the elevator. The door closed, the car moved down. "Stairs!"

Three flights down in nothing, flat. The red cloak flicked tantalizingly out of the lobby.

We reached the street just as the black car rolled away.

Heaven sent a taxi around the corner.

I pushed Lily inside, to nurse her black and blue wrist.

“Follow that car—” I began. Then, “To blazes with that! Just take us to Rocklynn Foundation. I know where they’re going.”

Lily knew, too. We didn’t say anything, just stared at each other, and I’m afraid my eyes were as frightened as hers.

Hurtling down the black, gaping mouths of midnight streets, riding the wind behind the red cloak of Satan—this wasn’t New York, but ancient Prague.

Then, climbing the dark tower of the skyscraper, up toward the hidden chamber—this wasn’t the twentieth century, but a scene set in medieval nightmare.

As we paused before the door marked Private, we heard a voice. It too was filtered through a black dream. Keith’s voice—partly.

I don’t like to admit that it was only partly Keith’s voice, but what else can one say? It was a voice coming from his throat, using his larynx, but there was a deep, burring overtone that was altogether unnatural in any human throat.

It might have been imagination. As we stood before that door, I hoped it was imagination.

Maybe Keith had a cold. That’s why he sounded that way. But cold or no cold, I couldn’t help hearing what he said. That was by far the worst of all.

Whispering huskily from that black room—

“So now you see what I have accomplished, gentlemen. You, Considine, and you, Mr. Wintergreen, can no longer doubt the evidence of your own senses.”

“But it’s monstrous!” Considine boomed. “The Devil in a cage!”

“Monstrous, you say? Glorious! Don’t you see the possibilities here?”

“I suppose it’s all very interesting scientifically, but what do you intend to do—exhibit this creature to the public or something of the sort?”

Keith laughed. Or rather, that voice laughed.

"Considine, you talk like a fool. Can't you realize we have something here that can become the most powerful force on earth?"

"Powerful?" interrupted the nasal tones of Wintergreen.

"Yes, all-powerful. Consider, gentlemen, for a moment, what our captive can mean to us. Have you ever heard of the Black Mass, of the worship of Satan?

"For centuries men have gathered to pay homage to the Devil. Believing that the Kingdom of Heaven is ruled by God, they claim that earth is ruled by Satan, and choose to worship him. If he grants them happiness here on earth, they are willing to forsake celestial joys."

"What utter rot!"

THE voice droned on, contemptuous of the interruption. "They meet in hidden places—the cellars of ancient houses or ruined churches—on Walpurgis Eve and other unhallowed nights. Candles, fashioned from the corpse-fat of unbaptized infants, light their devotions to the Prince of Darkness. An unfrocked priest presides over the altar; the altar which is the naked, living flesh of a woman. All boast of their sins, and confess penitently their good deeds.

"Then, as the Lord's Prayer is recited in reverse, a parody of the Mass is held. The Mass of St. Secaire, the unholy ritual of Gilles de Retz and the Marquis de Sade. A sacrifice is given to Satan, and celebrants drink of a red wine which is truly human blood. All do homage to the Father of Evil, who grants them then their dark desires."

"Don't talk like that," Wintergreen begged, in nervous protest. "We're not children, to be frightened by bogey-men."

"Neither are the thousands of secret Satanists who carry on these rites. They believe. Many of them are the victims of charlatans, frauds who prey on the neurotic rich.

"And I'm not offering you a bogey-man. I'm offering you the actual physical entity of the Fallen Angel, the Master of the Great Black Lodge.

"That's why I brought you here and showed you our captive. Your money enabled me to summon him. It is only fitting now that you be given the opportunity to profit thereby."

The droning voice held cunning. Devilish cunning. Lily grasped my wrist, but I shrugged her into silence again as we crouched, listening.

"We have here the opportunity for power. For undreamt of wealth. We, and we alone, are the masters of Satan. Let me tell you my plan.

"I shall become the High Priest of the Satanists. You, Considine, and you, Wintergreen, shall go out among your friends and proselyte. Bring the rich old women, the eccentric old men into the fold. Bring them to the Black Mass, spread the word that a new day is at hand for those who would pay the price to the Powers of Darkness. Tell them that there are ways to obtain eternal youth, ways to obtain more wealth, ways to wreak revenge.

"Can't you see? We'll build an empire out of what was once only an old wive's tale! We can control nations, master the earth!"

"Have you gone crazy, Keith?" Considine's deep voice trembled. "Are you utterly mad? First you show up in a Mephisto costume, then you bring us to look at this freak, this animal hybrid of yours, and now you babble insanities."

"Yes," Wintergreen amended, weakly. "I'm getting out of here."

"No you don't. You know the secret, and it's too much. Neither of you leaves this room until you've agreed."

I don't know what I intended to do. I only realized that there would never be a better cue for my entrance.

I flung the door open and marched in, Lily Ross at my side.

Considine and Wintergreen stared with open mouths. In the glass cage beyond, the black figure gestured frantically in the red glow of the braziers.

I ignored them all. I had eyes only for Keith—for the man in the red cloak, the man with the red face and the spade beard.

As he turned to face me, I read his eyes, read the blazing message there. His hands swooped up, claw-like, as I charged.

Sheer instinct drove me on; the same instinct that guides a man to crush a wriggling serpent, even though he knows it is about to strike.

Lily screamed as my hands closed about Keith's scarlet throat, rose to rake his face. I almost screamed as I felt that face.

I was tearing at his disguise, at his false beard. Tearing and tearing—and it wouldn't come off.

For Professor Phillips Keith was not disguised at all. He was Satan in red flesh!

The dragging club-foot, the cloven hoof moved up, butting my thighs. The claws razored my chest. The deep growling from the creature's throat welled horribly. I punched out at the fiendish visage, and my hands hammered against iron.

Considine and Wintergreen, Lily and the creature in the cage whirled crazily by. Red arms encircled me, and began to crush.

To crush and break. Pudgy little arms bent me back until I felt my spine bending like a white-hot wire of pain. Pudgy little arms—but they held strength. The strength of a demon.

Demon arms crushing. Demon breath searing my face. Demon face glaring into my own. My senses ebbed, and a chuckling rose from the grinning thing that crushed me like a rag-doll, crushed me down into darkness and a swirling mist of pain.

I tore my left hand free, somehow; got it up to my pocket. I wrenched the flask out, ripped the cork with frantic fingers. The creature grabbed for my arm, twisted it, but the flask was open. I jerked it up.

A white stream spurted against the red face. With a howl of agony, the thing's arms flew up to shield its head. Breaking free, I spattered more of the fluid on the head and shoulders. Rocking on its feet a moment, the creature staggered, fell to its knees. A hideous stench arose. Smoke seemed to pour from the redskin.

As the thing fell, I was upon it. I tore the hands from the ravaged face, for there was no strength in those red talons now. I jammed the flask up against the pain-contorted mouth, tilted it. The liquid gushed forth, gurgled down the crimson maw.

In a moment it was over. I rose and faced the three at my side. Lily sobbed.

"I—I thought it would kill you," she gasped. "Until you threw the acid in its face."

"Acid?" I echoed. "Acid, hell—that was holy water!"

6. Getting Behind Satan

"YES, the holy water did the trick." It was Professor Phillips Keith who spoke—spoke weakly, through ashen lips—but spoke, and in a voice unmistakably his own. Considine and Wintergreen knelt at his side, propping up his gray head.

It had taken ten minutes to bring him around. At first we had thought the red thing dead—and it was Lily who noticed the change, and pointed it out with a murmur of astonishment.

The redness of the skin faded out, slowly. The contours of the body altered subtly, almost before our eyes. It was like the Jekyll-Hyde transformation accomplished by a movie camera, but the reality was ghastly.

When we saw Professor Phillips Keith lying on the floor in an incongruous red cloak, when we saw his eyelids flutter weakly, some measure of composure returned. By the time the familiar, "What happened?" came faintly from his lips, we were prepared to answer. I told him the story.

"Yes, it was the holy water, all right," he repeated. "Pure inspiration on your part to think of it."

"Pure desperation," I corrected.

"I must have been pretty bad."

"You were—evil," Lily interjected slowly. "Utterly evil."

“But what does it all mean?” Considine asked.

“It means that I was possessed of the devil.”

“Do you really believe—”

“You saw me,” Keith continued. “It was a clear case of what the ancients called demoniac possession. From Bible times down, literature and history is filled with recorded instances of men and women who were ’possessed.’ Such a condition overtook me.

“I don’t know how it started. When we evoked that thing in the cage, I suppose. The shock of our success weakened my mental resistance. The barriers went down in a wave of enthusiasm. You remember my harangue before the glass, don’t you?” Keith turned to me.

I nodded.

“That night I came back. I wanted another look at our captive. I got it—guess I got too much. The creature hypnotized me. I didn’t know. I looked at it and I became elated. I felt exhilarated, half-intoxicated. What religious maniacs describe, and what the old priests of Pan used to call—ecstasy.

“That was it. You and Lily saw the effect it had on me. I went out that night, can’t even remember how. Another will than my own seemed to command me, drive me. Working through my senses, the creature broke down my volition. Satan knows the flesh.

“After that night I came back. I came back at dawn, under a compulsion born of intoxication and the inner urge upon me. I came back to stare at the creature in the cage, stare at the red eyes in the darkness which glistened like two distant whirling worlds of evil. Two distant worlds that came closer, merged and blended with our own world, blended with my own brain. You and Lily found me asleep beside the cage this morning. The change had occurred.

“I don’t remember much of today. It must have worked very fast. I have only two distinct memories—one, of looking into a mirror late this afternoon and seeing my skin assume a reddish tint, as though I had been deeply sunburned. The other memory is vaguer still. It concerns writing something with a piece of chalk in a dream.”

I told Keith about our experience with the strangely cowed creature in the cage.

"Part of me must have entered into it when it took my body," he said gravely. His face clouded again in recollection. "My body! By nightfall it wasn't my body any more. The leg dragged. I seemed to know what was happening, but I didn't care. I had this ecstasy, this force, driving me. I went to the ball, and you know the rest."

There was silence. Somehow Considine's muttered "Incredible!" sounded mawkish and inappropriate.

"Professor, you should get some rest," said Lily. "The shock—I think it would be best if you spent a few days in the hospital until—"

A white hand waved.

"I can't, my dear. I can't. Don't you see? We have him to deal with."

The hand leveled toward the glass cage. Our eyes followed.

THE slumping figure behind the glass was gone. In its place once more was Satan, Lord of the Sabbath. Black, erect, and menacing, with the yellow, rotted fangs sneering in malignant fury. There was no mistaking the hate, the thwarted desire in those burning eyes. Considine and Wintergreen saw it for the first time. They breathed through their mouths hoarsely.

Yes, Satan was back. Satan waited again, waited to spring.

"We thought we had him trapped, but you see—we haven't," Keith whispered. "He has found the way to get out. He can take possession of the human body and walk the earth as a man. For a day or so, anyway. Then the human body changes and the man becomes outwardly, as well as inwardly, the image of Evil. We must get rid of him once and for all. We must!"

"Take it easy," I said. "We understand."

"But you don't understand, you can't. Not until you've been through what I've been through. God!" Keith shuddered. "I'll never rest until we've found a way to send him back to Hell."

"You'll rest. Lily and I will get to work, I promise you." The girl nodded agreement.

"Send him back," Keith whispered. "You can't kill him, there is no way. Send him back before—"

The gray head slumped.

"He's passed out," Wintergreen said.

"Good! Phone for an ambulance. We'll carry him out to the lobby. Say it's collapse from overwork or something. Our word is good. He needs hospital attention."

We carried Keith out, carried the plan out.

Lily and I faced the two industrialists.

"Not a word of this now, to anyone," I cautioned. "We alone share the secret, and we alone must solve it. Keith was right. We must find a way to send this creature back."

"I still can't believe it," Wintergreen said. Considine scowled in perplexity.

"Neither do I, but I can feel it, all right. I don't pretend to understand all you've told me, but I know that you're right. It's a mistake to pry into these things. Send that thing back to wherever it came from, use any method you want, and charge the bill to me."

"You'll keep silence?" I reiterated.

"We will." Considine walked heavily toward the door. Suddenly the big man turned. His beefy face worked with unwonted emotion. "And may God help you in the task," he said softly.

The two went out. I faced Lily.

"There's a job to do," I said grimly. "Are you game?"

"You know I am."

"After what happened to Keith, I'm almost afraid to let you help," I murmured.

"You'll have to. I'm the only one who knows the formulae."

"We'll be playing with fire," I persisted.

"Hell fire," added the girl. "But we won't be burned."

7. Devil May Care

"ANY luck?" I asked dully.

"No," sighed the girl. She rose from the desk, one slim hand brushing back the golden cascade of her hair. "I'm afraid it's no use. There are no formulae here to get rid of him."

"But there has to be one," I insisted. "There must be a way to send him back."

"Not by incantation." Her hopeless glance met mine, melted. For a moment we stood together—then turned, by common impulse, to the glass cage in the center of the room.

Black, brooding, baleful, the Goat of the Sabbath crouched on the floor. The leering, beady eyes rested scornfully on our own. Yellowed fangs menaced in a derisive grin.

Lily shivered. "Can he hear us?" she asked.

"It doesn't matter. He knows. He's waiting, too."

"That's what I'm afraid of. Darling, we can't go on like this forever. It's been two days already. We can't Jfeep on hiding it always—and if anyone should suspect—"

"There must be a way out!" I scowled, my eyes restlessly searching the room.

"Wait a minute. I've got it!"

"What?"

"Didn't Professor Keith say something about tubing in the glass cage? Something about lethal gas?"

"You're right!" Lily's smile became animated. "That tank over there under the table—it's got the tubing attached. We just plug into the panel at the side, and the gas is released. Hand-pump. Come on, I'll show you."

We did the job. It wasn't easy to brave the ghoulish stare of the creature in the cage as my hands fumbled with the nozzle of the hose and screwed it into place.

It was easier to feel the reassuring firmness of the efficient hand-pump handle, once things were in readiness.

“I hope it works,” Lily whispered.

“It must work. We have to kill this thing somehow,” I answered. “Here goes.”

I pumped.

There was a hissing, the inflated tube writhed like a serpent. I watched the nozzle in the panel.

A cloudy vapor poured into the glass enclosure.

I pumped harder, as the black figure vanished suddenly in a whirl of poisonous fog.

“It’s working!” exclaimed the girl. “Keep it up—nothing can survive this stuff.”

Billows of whitish smoke writhed in miniature Inferno behind the glass. Inferno for a demon.

The pump sighed emptily.

Together we advanced toward the clouded glass pane.

“See anything?” I asked.

“No. Not yet.” Lily pressed her forehead against the glass of the cage, wrinkled it, in straining scrutiny. “No—wait a minute. The smoke is clearing.”

“Clearing? There’s nowhere for it to go!”

“But it is!”

And it was. Even as we watched, the white vapor thinned into spirals, shreds, cumulae.

Behind it crouched the black, goatish body.

Crouched, not slumped.

Satan was alive! And yet the gases cleared—because he was inhaling them!

“Good Lord, he’s absorbing the stuff into his system! He breathes poison!” I murmured.

Malignant, triumphant, the black goat pranced. Its eyes shone with evil merriment, with a sort of added animation.

“He thrives on the stuff,” Lily sighed. “Now what?”

“Water,” I said.

The details don’t matter. We used the same tubing, and a new pump. Filled the glass enclosure to the brim. Enough water to drown anything inside.

He absorbed it, of course.

I was afraid to try an arc-welder.

“You can’t kill the Devil with fire,” Lily told me.

That was that. Bombs were out—anything was out which entailed the risk of releasing His Satanic Majesty.

We were back to where we started.

“Give me another day,” Lily said. “I’ll find an incantation. There must be something here. Some variant on a spell for casting out demons, perhaps. Just put a twist on it. We must get one.”

“I must get some sleep,” I added. And meant it. Devil-killing is hard work.

“Go home,” commanded the girl.

“And leave you here alone with that? Not on your life! Remember what happened to Keith.”

“Well, go into the private office down the hall and take a nap. There’s a couch there. I’ll keep on working.”

“I don’t know,” I said, slowly.

“I’ll be all right. I won’t even look at our friend here. Besides, you know what Keith said. He was almost out on his feet, his mental barriers were down. I’m no pushover. Go ahead now, run along and get your rest. I’ll promise to get out of here in an hour or so.”

“Promise me that?”

“Of course, darling.”

“And you won’t look at him?”

"Not when I can look at you." She stood very close. I put my arms around her, held her. Over my shoulder the fiend grinned. But her smile warmed.

"All right. But I'm coming back within an hour. And if I catch you flirting with Old Nick here, you'll be sorry."

Abruptly I sobered. "You really think there's a chance of finding a way?"

"I do. We must. Now, off with you." I left the room. Lily Ross sat down, ran her hands through her golden hair, and opened the black book on the desk. In the dancing light of the braziers she looked as she had when I first saw her—like a white witch.

She was a white witch in my dreams.

8. Hell Hath No Fury—

SHE was only a girl when she awakened me.

I grinned sheepishly through a shroud of sleep. "Sorry. Guess I broke my promise and overslept. Didn't know I was so tired."

"You were tired, darling. Know how long you've been sleeping?"

"No."

"Three hours."

"Really?"

"Uh huh. Feel better now?"

"Certainly. I'm ready for anything. What about you?"

"Still bright." She looked it, too. Her eyes sparkled with gaiety.

"You. look as though you had some luck. Find anything?" I asked.

"Well—yes and no. There's a chant in the Prinn Saracenic Rituals relating to djin and efreet that could be used, I think. But the German translation is bad. I'm going to check it against the Latin."

"Now?"

"No, silly. Tomorrow. Now I'm going to relax. And you're going to relax with me. Let's go out and take in the town tonight; forget all about this crazy business.”

“But what about—”

“Quit scowling, dear. It’s all right. We need a vacation. The strain is too much, sometimes, when you think about what we’re doing, what’s in that room.”

“Don’t you think you’d be better off if you went home and rested, Lily?”

“No.” Her eyes met mine. “It’s dark, and I don’t like the dark. It makes me think too much. It makes me dream about—him. Don’t you see? I want light, people, something to make me forget.”

She was shaking underneath her smile. Hysteria, nearly.

“All right. Did you—lock up?”

“Certainly. Stop fretting. The room is barred.”

I rose to my feet.

“We’d better stop in at the hospital and see how Professor Keith is resting,” I suggested.

“Please—not now. I’m all on edge. I just want to forget everything connected with this, for tonight. Let’s not think about anything except us.”

The suggestion was pleasant. Alluring. Alluring, as Lily was. She did sparkle. Her golden hair, the scarlet of her lips, the turquoise of her eyes—all seemed accentuated by inner fire. She slipped one arm in mine, possessively. I felt a tingling as her bare flesh met my wrist. We swept into the outer lobby of Rocklynn. I almost laughed.

Here was a crowd of bustling, officious clerks and directors. White-coated chemists stepped briskly in and out of the long series of offices along the further corridors. Well-dressed visitors and patrons—giggling stenographers—bearded doctors who might have advertised laxatives in the popular magazines—a typical Kildare atmosphere about the place.

They didn’t suspect what was going on in the private chamber down the hall. They didn’t suspect that the golden girl on my arm was a white witch.

Again that white witch thought had crossed my mind. White witch. Why did I think of Lily that way? Was it because here in the afternoon sunlight she positively glittered? Her hair was so golden, her skin had such a milky texture. Ah, she was a pretty girl—nothing more.

“Supper?” I said. She nodded.

We glided down to the lobby, stepped into a cab. She snuggled close. I liked it.

But when I looked at her again, the semi-darkness of the cab’s interior had wrought another change.

She wasn’t a white witch any more. Her hair seemed darker. The golden tint was gone. The locks were almost brunette; brown with darker tones. The scarlet of her lips had turned to rose. A trick of late afternoon light.

“What are you staring at?” she giggled.

I got personal for a while. A good while, as we were tied up in traffic. By the time we neared the chosen destination it was almost twilight.

WAS twilight in the taxi.

And Lily’s hair was gray. Not gray, exactly, and not platinum. There was a bluish tint. Her lips were purple.

Her lips were purple—or I was crazy.

Seeing things. A girl who changed in light and shadow. What was that? White witch—black witch—blue witch. What did they call it? Adaptation. Chamelon.

But the term in sorcery. Glamour. Sympathetic magic. The ability to conform with surroundings. The attribute of a sorceress.

Circe had that power.

But Lily Ross?

Here she was, laughing away, affectionate and alluring. And I was picturing her as an enchantress. Ridiculous.

Well, it was best forgot. I did forget as we entered the supper club. But when we sat down under the red drapes I saw her titian locks flame forth in evil glory, saw her tawny skin glow, saw the crimson depths of her eyes.

Red witch, now!

I had a drink. Several drinks. In between I blinked. She talked, but I hardly listened.

“Let’s dance.”

I held the red witch in my arms, held a living flame close. Held her closer than I had ever held her, and felt her respond. Her response was flame. Fire kindling, feeding.

That fire engulfed me. I was tired of thinking, tired of toying with the incredible. The wine helped, and her beauty was a greater intoxication. I went down into the warmth—the warmth of her glowing hair, the warmth of her eyes, the red glow of her mouth.

Why deny it? When she suggested her apartment I didn’t hesitate. This wasn’t the Lily Ross I knew, but the realization no longer bothered me.

She clung to me in the cab, on the stairs. “We’ve been working too hard, darling,” she whispered, over and over again, as though it were a formula. Her words no longer mattered. I was consumed by the flame of her nearness. The red, swift flame, coursing through my blood and being.

She opened the door. I stepped in. We embraced in the darkness for a long moment.

Then, “I’ve waited for this,” she murmured. “You and I, together. We’re going to do wonderful things, aren’t we?”

“You mean down at Rocklynn?” I asked lazily.

“Oh—that!” she laughed. “Of course not, silly! That’s child’s play. Don’t you think so? It has no real meaning at all.”

“Well—”

“You and I were meant for greater destinies.” Her voice, vibrant in velvet darkness, had a new quality of its own. A dark quality. Peculiarly, I wondered what she looked like here. What color was her hair? And those lips, that now burned mine?

Lips that burned away my questions and left only a desire.

“Greater destinies,” she whispered. “You’ve the brains. I have the beauty.

“You know, I’ve never felt this way before. Today I saw the futility of it—cooped up in a stuffy little laboratory when we might be playing for bigger stakes.”

Did you ever have a woman make love to you with lips and arms while she talked like a bank director? It's an unnerving experience.

"Yes, we'll go a long way together. Keith's out of it, of course. We have the power now. The power to learn. The power to command. With those spells and incantations there are no heights we cannot achieve.

"I could be a queen—"

Well, it was enough. Lips or no lips, I knew. The shudder that ran through me could not. be repressed. The voice was Lily's but the thoughts were Keith's. Not Keith's—but Keith's when he was possessed of the Devil.

I knew what I held in my arms now. The girl that had worked alone in the black chamber, under the glowing eyes of the monster in the cage. The girl that changed in light and darkness. The girl who desired power, who lured like the priestess of a Mystery.

I knew, and as I shuddered, she knew. Her arms pressed closer, her body moulded to mine, her warmth sought to drown my dread, and I felt her mouth seek mine, seek mine with a promise of ecstasy.

I pushed her back. She sensed it, but suddenly embraced me. Again her mouth neared. I felt it graze my lips and then—Lily Ross bent in the darkness, and with the fury of a tigress, locked her teeth in my throat!

9. Devil's Bargain

AS THE tiny, pointed fangs met, I shook her free.

A feline growl rose in her throat. Her panting breath rasped as her hands raked my face.

"You fool!"

Again her mouth sought my neck. I lifted one arm and let go. I had to do it.

Just a short uppercut to the chin and she slumped to the floor. I stepped over, switched on the lights, and carried her limp body to the sofa.

She lay there, eyes closed, a golden witch under lamplight. From her bruised mouth ran a tiny crimson trickle.

The sleeping sorceress—

I got cold water, a towel, brandy. It took three minutes before her eyes fluttered open. By that time I'd been in her bedroom and found what I was seeking. So when her eyes did open, they focussed directly on the bronze crucifix held before them.

A look of pain seared her face. She writhed.

"No—take it away—please—"

I held her twisting body taut.

"Look!" I commanded.

"No—fool—let me go—I can't—"

The crucifix pressed closer. I placed the cool metal against her forehead.

She screamed.

I drew it off and stared at the livid welt—the imprint of the cross burned into her white flesh.

Perspiration beaded my brow, but I didn't desist. I knew what had to be done. Exorcism. The casting out of demons.

First Keith, and now Lily. She had to be freed.

Her moanings ceased. I waved the crucifix before her and whispered.

"Lily, darling. Look at the cross. Look at it. I know it hurts, but you must look. You must. Just gaze from under your eyelids. I won't burn you with it. Just look. Look and sleep. Try to sleep, Lily. You're tired, so very tired. So tired. Sleep. And look at the cross. Sleep."

Science and witchcraft, eh? Well, let's see what a little modern hypnotism will do.

Psychic trauma or possession by a fiend, call it what you will. I waved the crucifix and commanded her to sleep. The light glittered on the weaving outline. Her eyes followed it, her ears heard my murmurs.

Lily slept.

MY SHIRT was wet clear through. I was trembling. But she slept. And I kept whispering. “Lily, come back! Lily fight it. Come back. Lily, come back.” The tremors came then. Convulsions. I saw her writhe in agony and still I didn’t stop. Didn’t dare stop.

She moaned, and it wasn’t her voice. Her hands darted like talons to her temples, as though to tear away the scar. Her face was the worst—changing from pallor to deep flush.

But my voice was winning. I felt that. Her whimpers grew weaker. She slept under the cross, accepted the vision.

The force within her waned, then blazed in a final access of fury. That’s when my hand trembled so that I nearly dropped the crucifix. When her face began to look like other faces.

They bubbled up from beneath her flesh, those malignant expressions of hate and rage. The expressions seen on the faces of the schizophrenic, the demented. The faces of madness—and what was madness in olden days but demoniac possession?

They came now, grinning their defiance. And the voice and the cross fought them, fought them down, fought them from her being.

At the end she slept, and I slumped beside her. The crucifix rested against her bare arm, but it no longer burned. I had won. She had won. I knew that Satan had returned to his body in the glass cage.

In the morning’s awakening we made our decision. I told her what she didn’t know—and she told me what I had guessed; about the “dizzy spells” she had experienced while working alone in the chamber.

“I’m going back there,” I insisted. “You need rest. I’ll carry on alone, and I’m forewarned as well as forearmed by what you and Keith have gone through. I won’t succumb, I promise you—not until I’ve found a way to get rid of His Satanic Majesty once and for all.”

“Be careful, darling—”

I smiled grimly. “You’re telling me? But it has to be done. That menace must be removed, quickly. If you or Keith had been allowed to continue it might spread like a plague. There's no choice in the matter. Either we get rid of Satan or he gets rid of us. That's the bargain."

"You'll call me regularly?"

"Of course. And in a day or two both you and Keith can come down again to help. But now—I'm going back to hell." Lily smiled. "May God be with you," she whispered.

10. Powers of Darkness

THAT night we worked alone, The Devil and I.

The Devil and I, in that black tower. The red braziers burned as a beacon, but the red glare from his eyes blazed a still stronger warning.

All alone in the dark room, behind locked doors. A crouching fiend in a cage. A crouching man at a table.

From time to time the ebon monstrosity reared ponderously to pad back and forth behind the barrier. From time to time I rose and paced the floor with equal restlessness.

Frequently a malignant scowl convulsed the black and bony face. Often, I too, scowled.

I turned the yellowed pages of a dozen bulky books. I scanned the notes written in Lily's precise handwriting. But learning the mantic arts is a grim business. No wonder wizards grew gray!

Here was White Magic—the nine steps in the evocation of angels. The command of the Seven Stewards of Heaven; Arathron, Bethor, Phaleg, Och, Hazith, Ophiel, and Phul. White Magic, and a jumble of theosophical arcanum which would be of no use here. Wrong lead.

Black Magic—ashes of hosts and dried toads—unguents of grease and blood of corpses heated over human bones—burning crucifixes—gibberish.

Red Magic? The highest esoteric art was never written or told. Nothing here.

Try divination.

I tried divination for hours. Long hours in the black room.

Long hours under hell-spawned eyes. Eyes that watched me as I studied. Eyes that seemed to pierce the glass cage, to peer over my shoulder as I read, peer and mock.

The file on divination was huge. Could I evoke an omen, a clue? Divination—

There was aeromancy, alectryomancy, aleuromancy, alphitomancy—but I had neither wind nor rooster, flour nor hard dough.

Amniomancy? Use the caul of a newborn child? No. And the horrid anthropomancy—prophecy by use of human entrails—no, again.

Arithomancy, Astragalomancy. Both mathematical tricks, long since discredited. Axinomancy and Belomancy were relics of the old "trial by ordeal" of Saxon days.

Capnomancy? Divination by smoke-wreaths from a drug-sprinkled fire? Hashish visions. A fake.

Cephalonomancy, Dactyliomancy, Gastromancy, Geomancy, Gyromancy. I had no donkey's head to sprinkle with live coals, no finger ring, no gift at ventriloquism, nor was I a sand-diviner. I might try Gyromancy as a last resort—walking in a circle until I grew dizzy and fell. The direction of the fall had significance.

Oh, sure. Sorcery is so fascinating, until you analyze it.

Hippomancy, the Celtic trick with white horses. Out.

Hydromancy, Ichthyomancy, Lampodomancy, Lithomancy, Margaritomancy, Myomancy, Onomancy, Onychomancy, Oomancy, Parthenomancy.

Fine stuff! All superstitious nonsense, though the last—divination by employing a virgin—might prove entertaining.

Well, Pyromancy, Rhabdomancy, Sciamancy.

Sciamancy. Evocation of the dead. Was there a proven formulae here in Lily's list? There wasn't. I was singularly grateful. To command the dead sorcerously—dangerous ground.

Spondonomancy, Sycomancy, Theomancy.

That was the end of divination.

And still Satan stared. I was becoming more and more conscious of that stare. Satan grinned. The grin burned through me. I'd find a way! I had to.

There was no sleep for me that day, and it was almost midnight when I blundered back into the notebooks and hit the section on Elementals.

Elementals. The primitive spirits.

Hie gnomes inherent in earth own the kingdom of the North, and they exert the melancholic influence over the temperament of man. Their sign is the Bull, and they are commanded by the Magic Sword. Their sovereign is Gob.

NONSENSE!

The sylphs are of the air, their kingdom is the East, and their influence bilious. Under the sign of the Eagle, they are controlled by the holy pentacles, as is their sovereign, Paralda.

Well?

Salamanders are spirits of fire, and their kingdom lies South. Sanguine in their influence, under the sign of the Lion, and the command of the trident, their sovereign is Djin—yes, the prototype of all djinn.

And the undines of the West, those who evoke the phlegmatic aspect of men, are governed under the sign of Aquarius, commanded by the cup of libations, and under the sovereignty of Necksa.

Gnomes, sylphs, salamanders, undines. Earth, air, fire and water. Astrology and oriental legend, and mysticism.

Except that—there were spells.

Spells for the evocation of elementals. Elementals, known to our theology as fiends. Fiends of the Pit.

Spells to command them, written in Lily Ross's handwriting. Taken from the tomes. Precise directions for mixing incense, and drawing figures, and reciting commands.

“There are nearly a hundred proven spells and incantations. Genuine.” That’s what Keith had said.

Genuine spells. Recipes to raise daemons. “A pinch of salt and a tablespoon-full of butter. Bake well under low flame.”

Not exactly. These recipes might affect the stomach, but only with a nausea of dread. “A pinch of ground bone, and a cup of blood. Place under the fires of Hell.”

I was light-headed. Light-headed enough to try.

After all, I had to experiment, didn’t I? Find a way to evoke, familiarize myself with rituals? Why shouldn’t I take this perfectly absurd routine about the gnomes, for instance, and see what happened?

Lily’s marginal notes said, “Sword in cupboard, lower shelf. Important—use no other. Steel sword. Steel alone guards and commands gnomes.”

I had the silly-looking old blade in my hand before I knew what I was doing. I had the blue chalk, too, as directed, and I was kneeling down facing North. The gnome kingdom.

Grimm’s fairy tales? Why not find out?

Draw the mathematical design, as directed. Draw the sign of the bull—the peculiarly Egyptian sign, so indicative of ancient stylization. The bull of Apis, of astrology, of ancient days. A blue bull. Make it big. The gnome materializes on that sign and cannot leave it until you command. Draw it big and play safe.

Play safe? With this nonsense?

But there was a black bulk in a glass cage grinning out at me and this wasn’t nonsense.

I waved the sword. I realized what a ridiculous figure I cut in that dark room, waving a “magic sword” before a lot of chalk drawings scribbled schoolboy-fashion on the floor. But there was nobody to watch me—except the glaring eyes of Satan in his prison.

Slowly I mumbled the incantation. Lily had accented it and phoneticized carefully. No mistakes. Now to recite it aloud. The sword pointed north—thus. My feet touched the tip of the outer blue circle. At the syllable breaks I must point the sword at the horns of the Bull. Sychronize. So.

"Oh Gob—" I began.

It sounded foolish. Self-conscious.

Grimm's fairy tales. But I persisted. It didn't take long, after all.

No. It didn't take long before I felt the cold wind strike my face. Felt the sword tingle in my hand as I pointed, felt an electric surge sweep up my arm. Heard the syllables blaze out, saw the flame of the braziers bend before the words.

And then, in the Sign of the Bull, the tiny, crouching figure. It coiled into shape, into substance. The little swarthy creature with the mouse-like face, the rodent body, and the beady, glittering eyes. Standing there, bowing. The gnome.

Grim fairy tales!

The gnome. The little man who was there. The little man that hid in the woods. The little dwarf man who tempted maidens in die forest. The little man who guarded the mines and the gold of earth, the little man who haunted the dark mountaintops of the north countries and dug the burrows beneath the hills.

One of the ancient Pictish, Celtic little people. The tiny race of troglydites that lived on earth before men came, retreated to the dark depths like the serpent. The figure known to all legends and all times. The dwarf. The troll. The kobold. The Brownie. The leprechaun.

"Master?"

Oh, that piping little voice! That shocking, detestable little voice, so hateful in its reality!

And it was real.

I dropped the sword.

Then I picked it up. This was the sword of command. Of command. The thought hit me then. I could—command.

I COULD command this creature out of myth, command it to do anything I desired. Anything. To—kill. To burrow under a building and send it toppling to ruins, as he and his fellows toiled like rats. The way they used to burrow under castles, in ancient legend. Like a warlock, I could send it on errands of death. It was my servant, my familiar now. I could have it and its fellows. Yes, thousands of them. Merely by command. Command with the steel of the sword.

The thought burned. Burned like Satan's eyes. Burned like fire.

Fire.

The salamander!

I won't describe the next hour. The wave of elation that swept over me is too much a part of hysteria. I drew the Lion, kindled the flame, waved the trident. The yellow blaze revealed the lizard figure that grew out of flame, absorbed it. Fiend, imp, archetype of hell's legions, the salamander of evil. And the hissing inflection in the word, "Master?"

Here were spells that worked. Here were orisons arid litanies that brought results. I couldn't send Satan back, but I could conjure up his hosts.

Conjure up his hosts! Why not? Imagine this tower room filled with waiting monstrosities from myth. Imagine rooms filled with them. A horde, a vast and limitless horde, all calling me—"Master!"

Master of demons. Master of evil. Lord of a power greater than any known.

For the first time I began to realize the feeling inherent in that word. Power. Power to rule. Power over wind and water and fire and air. Over earth. Power to rule earth.

Now I knew how Keith must have felt. He'd dreamed of something like this. Men laughed at evil, did they? All the better, they would not burn him at the stake for sorcery but permit him to evoke evil unmolested. He'd been a fool, Keith had. Trying to interest millionaires. Why did he need any allies? One man to rule them all, that was the way.

And Lily. Silly child! Personal vanity was her downfall. She wanted to be a Cleopatra, did she? Sheer melodrama. Juvenile. She might have been a queen—greater than a Circe. Queen of evil. But I'd stopped that. Her mistake was to rely on me for help.

I wouldn't make that mistake. I'd rely on no one. I and I alone would evoke and rule. I had the power, didn't I? I had Satan in a cage. He was no longer Prince of Darkness. I could take his place.

The King is dead. Long live the King!

Why not?

A week ago, if anyone had foretold my future I should have scoffed. Like everyone else, I suppose. But now it was real, I had this opportunity. The goal of witch and wizard through the ages. The powers of darkness mine to command. Why hesitate?

Why not evoke? Use the rituals, use all of them. Fill the room with a legion of nightmare shapes. Revenants. Ghouls and efrits, Vrykolas, hippocampi, amphisbartae, striges. An army, a black army. An army to conquer the world.

Keep them ringed in the magic figures, until the word of release was given. Keep them ringed, and then—

But what about Satan? What about the spell to send him back? Back to where—to hell? But we could have hell here on earth!

And why not?

An earth filled with man-made war and misery. An earth filled with grasping, cheating, lying, stealing, raping, murdering, crazy humans. Filled with pestilence, disease, idiocy. Let the Lord of Evil come into his own!

Sweep away humanity. Sweep away the earth. Black gifts the creatures might grant you for the power. Eternal life, eternal ecstasy. Lips might whisper secrets. Primal forces to invoke and control.

Why send Satan back at all?

I glanced at the listless black figure in the cage. Glanced and smiled. Smiled and laughed suddenly.

Was this—this thing—the fabled Lucifer? This mangy, decrepit, listless bag of bones with the sick eyes and whining sneer? Was this whimpering mongrel really the Arch-Enemy?

I felt stronger than he did. I was stronger than he. I had stripped him of his power and taken it for my own.

I was the Master of Satan!

Plans, plans, plans. Dreams swirling in the blackness. The salamander staring, the gnome crouching in the chalk-dust. Yes, and I, standing in darkness, chanting out invocations. Chanting for endless hours, gripped by an inner elation and compulsion.

The room, surging with power. Pulsing with vibrations. And filled with shapes.

Until I stood there, amidst a crowded maze of circles and designs, each filled with a figure. A bowing figure that croaked, "Master!"

I stood there and made a Hell on earth.

11. Hell on Earth

"SLOWLY now—it's a surprise."

I guided Lily and Keith toward the door marked Private. Keith leaned feebly on my arms, but he pressed forward eagerly.

"Surprise?" gurgled Lily. "You mean—you've sent him back?"

I smiled. "You'll see," I told her.

She and Keith gave me a long look. I didn't like it. They seemed too conspiratorial. Eying me. I'd open their eyes for them in a minute.

I pushed open the door. "Come into my parlor," I said.

Keith kept staring at me. So did Lily.

"Ladies first," I said. Lily suddenly shrugged and stepped in. Keith followed her. I went in and shut the door. Locked it.

Then I faced them.

They faced the room.

They didn't say a word. They couldn't. It was too overpowering.

I'd taken the drapes off, swept the room clear of tables and cupboards. Needed more space. The place reeked with mingled incense odors, but even the braziers were gone to provide more floor area.

Floor area for visitors.

They stood there and gazed at Hell. My Hell. The Hell I had created by incantation, by invocation. Around the glass cage housing Satan the legions swarmed. One of each. A Noah's Ark, in a way, of horrors.

Hell's sample-display showroom. Take your pick. Plenty more where these, came from.

The thoughts made me laugh. I did laugh, too. The noise grated against the silence, and there was a vast answering response. "Master!"

"What have you done?" Keith's eyes blazed anger.

"Merely played sorcerer's apprentice," I told him. "How do you like it?"

"These—monsters," Keith spluttered. "Do you realize what would happen if you lost control?"

"Certainly." I smiled.

"It's insane," he muttered.

"It's science," I answered. "Isn't this your dream come true? Your dream of proving the validity of sorcery?"

"It's a nightmare. I want no part of this. Send these creatures back—there's directions for that. Send them back at once."

"Change of heart, eh? Well, recognize another change at the same time. You're not giving me orders any more, Keith. I'm in charge here."

Keith paled. He faced me with an intent stare.

Lily stepped between us.

"You must send them back," she whispered. "You were going to get rid of Satan, remember?"

"What do you mean—remember? Do you think I'm a child? Of course I remember that foolishness. But it's no good. Think of the power I possess. Think of what we could do with these creatures."

"Creatures!" Lily quavered the word.

She stood like a golden goddess, surrounded by the bobbing, weaving, crouching shapes of darkness. The tiny men with the malignant faces, the snake-like figures that shimmered in air, the canine visages of ghouls, the monstrous bulk of squatting incubae, the leprous-white crawlers. An aquarium, a menagerie, a gallery of fiends. They filled the room, each in his tiny island of chalk. Behind was the cage with the figure of Satan slumped on the floor. Had he no interest in this gathering? Where was his burning desire to escape? No matter.

"Creatures," Lily quavered, and her glance rested on me in strange appeal. "Darling—for my sake—send them back. You're not well, you've overworked, you can't think what you're doing—"

"Enough." I stepped closer to her. "I'm not crazy, if that's what you mean. Three days in this room hasn't made a wreck out of me. I've learned more about the essence and nature of evil than you both know. And I'm going to use that knowledge and that power."

"The Devil is through, in other words," Keith commented, dryly. "You're taking over."

For a moment the bald statement seemed to paralyze me. As if through a fog I caught his meaning. Then I chuckled.

"That's just about the size of it. From now on, I'm in command. These creatures are my minions. At the signal they will be released."

I lowered my voice.

"I've got a plan. It's all thought out. I've done a lot of thinking here these past days. I know just what to do—how to use these things. Rule, I tell you! And you two will share the power with me, if you like."

"Send them back," Lily begged. "You don't know what's happening to you."

"Happening to me? I'm waking up, that's all. I feel more alive at this moment than I ever have. I'm strong, and he's weak. I'm going to do what no man has ever dared. I'll open the gates! Lucifer will again rule earth. Why shouldn't he—I mean I—he—I—"

THEN I realized.

Realized what I was saying.

I thought, “Satan,” and I said, “I.”

I. Satan.

I looked at Keith and the girl. Their eyes were fixed in fascination on my face.

My face!

Lily’s hand was holding something out.

A mirror.

I took it.

Took the silver glass and stared at my face in the mirror. Stared at the black, goatish countenance, at the growing beard on the chin, stared—transfixed—at the darkened temples from which the two horns were beginning to protrude!

What had happened to Keith and Lily had happened to me. Three days in a room with the black man, three days in a room while his will gnawed at my soul in darkness, burrowed in.

The change had taken place. I was Satan!

The mirror fell and shattered. I stood there, looking at the dark skin on the back of my hands. The dark skin on the back of my—claws.

Turning, turning; body and mind and soul. Cloud of darkness pouring out of the cage and into my brain.

I was Satan and I had evoked demons and I would rule earth.

Madness!

But why not?

Nobody was dashing holy water in my face. Nobody was waving any crucifixes. Nobody was shooting any.—

I saw it out of the corner of my eye. Keith’s holster, with the two guns, lying on the little table near the door. Saw it as he saw it and made a dash. I got there first.

I pulled the guns out and pointed them very carefully. Keith stopped in his tracks.

“No you don’t,” I chuckled. “No one is shooting me, if you please. Lily—the door is locked. Very tightly.” She’d made a dash, too. “We are all alone now. With our—servitors.” I chuckled again. It was beginning to feel very pleasant.

“Stand still, both of you,” I directed.

“Madman,” Keith shouted. “Put down those revolvers!”

“Please—” Lily whispered.

I slipped one weapon into my pocket, held the other high in my right hand. My blackening right hand. I could feel it change. I pulsed. Every nerve tingling, as the change completed.

One claw held the revolver. The other rose.

“Now, you two. When I lower my left hand, our little playmates will be released. I don’t need my right hand for anything but keeping you covered. So remember. Stand and watch.”

“Satan!” Keith mumbled. “Satan incarnate!”

“Please, darling,” Lily whispered. “Oh, please, darling—”

I laughed. The grinning throng waited behind me. Waited, and ravened. I could feel their pulsations mingling with my own. How they lusted to be free! To walk the earth once more; to walk and creep and crawl and lope and fly and—kill! They waited and they crouched for my command. My command would free them. From the black tower they’d swarm out over the world of night and the shriek of earth in torment would mock the walls of heaven.

The strength welling in me. . . .

I lifted my left hand high. One gesture now—

Then Lily moved.

“Back or I’ll shoot!” I screamed.

She came forward. Her eyes held no hate and no fear, only a pleading that burned and burned. I had to get rid of that burning. Kill her, kill her and release them. Free the hordes of Hell!

My left hand swooped. My right hand moved out. The hand of Satan. I flicked my wrist, pressed the trigger—and sent a bullet crashing into my brain.

12. Fall of Lucifer

"EASY," I said. "Easy."

"Must probe," grunted Keith. "Get it out. Silver bullet or no, there might be infection."

"Easy," I repeated. Then, "Are you sure it's gone?"

Lily smiled down at me.

"Of course, darling. They're all gone. And the cage is empty. The instant you fired the gun they disappeared. Not in a cloud of brimstone, either. They just—weren't there."

I smiled. It wasn't so hard, because Keith had the little silver pellet out.

"Lucky shot," he commented. "Just missed grazing the parietal lobe."

"I still can't understand it," I said. "Can't understand what made me shoot myself and why Satan disappeared."

"The oldest story in the world," answered Keith. "Virtue triumphant. It fought the evil in you and won, even though you weren't conscious of it. When Lily came toward you the battle was resolved. You and the Devil fought it out in your own soul, and you won.

"And that was the secret of getting rid of Satan. The human soul pitted itself naked against his will and denied him."

I shook my head as Keith continued.

"Evil preys on inner weakness. In my case, Satan focussed his forces on my dominant quality of ambition. That ambition, directed sanely, caused me to embark on scientific research. Perverted just a little, Satan made my ambition become a lust for power at any price.

"In Lily's possession, her natural feminine vanity was accentuated to the point where she desired utter adoration. Again the psychology of evil came into play. And when the Devil invaded you, he worked through your love of learning, turning your scholarly inclinations into the field of sorcery."

"It's hard to believe now," I said. "Maybe it was all a mass hallucination. Those old wive's tales—"

Keith chuckled.

“Perhaps what we saw and called Satan wasn’t physically real. We each saw a different figure in the glass cage, and Considine and Wintergreen might have had their own concepts. Even these creatures you materialized might be merely focal imaginative visions.

“But this I know. Whether we choose to personify it as Satan, or the Devil, or the Powers of Darkness—evil exists as a force in this world of ours. Describe it in terms of witchcraft or psychiatry as you will—evil is real.”

Lily laid her head on my shoulder. “Let’s forget it all now,” she suggested.

“Suits me. Got any methods to suggest?”

“Well, if you’re not too sick—”

“Too sick? I feel swell.”

“Well, if you’re not too sick, I suggest we celebrate.”

“Fine idea,” I responded.

“Sure,” said Keith. “Let’s go out and raise hell! Why—what’s the matter?”

“Nothing at all,” I replied; and promptly fainted.

Time Wounds All Heels

Jeep had a reputation for being a liar, but there was something about his story that was convincing; and besides there was his appetite—and those pills!

I DROPPED into Jack's place the other night for a slice of tongue—some of it in a sandwich and some from between Jack's lips. The place was pretty crowded, but I managed to find a booth as Jack glided over to take my order.

"What'll it be?" he asked. Then—"Well I'll be damned!" said Jack. "Probably," I observed.

But Jack didn't hear me. He was staring at the tall thin man who elbowed his way toward the booth.

I stared, too. There was nothing remarkable about the gentleman's thin, somewhat dour face, but his suit was enough to attract anyone's attention.

It isn't often that you see a horse-blanket walking.

"See that guy?" Jack whispered, hurriedly. "He's a number for you. Used to be an upper bracket in the rackets."

"He looks it," I confided. "Is he dangerous?"

"No. Reformed, completely reformed. Ever since he divorced his third wife he's led a simple life, playing the races. But I never expected to see him in here—he hasn't been around for months. Wait—I'll see if I can steer him into your booth. You'll enjoy it—he's the biggest liar in seven states."

"What seven?" I asked, in some curiosity. But Jack was signalling the glum-faced man in the checkered suit.

"Hello, Lefty! Where in blazes have you been?"

"Everywhere, and up to my neck," said the stranger. "But make with the menu because at the moment I arrive by express from hunger."

"Sit here," Jack suggested, indicating my booth. This guy is a friend of mine."

Lefty favored me with a long look. "Is he a righto or a wrongo?" he asked.

"He's a writer," said Jack. "Bob, I want you to meet a friend of mine—Lefty Feep."

"A pleasure," I said.

Lefty sat down without a word and grabbed the menu from Jack's hands.

"Shoot the steak to me Jack," he said. "Also I will have bean soup, clam chowder, a double order mashed potatoes, peas, carrots, roast chicken, a ham on rye, baked beans, an order of waffles, asparagus, pork tenderloin, scrambled eggs, coffee, apple pie, ice cream, and watermelon."

"You kidding?"

"No—eating. Now bring it here, but fast. My stomach is empty so long I think it's haunted."

Jack shrugged and moved away, muttering the incredible order under his breath.

Lefty Feep turned to me suddenly with a scowl.

"Vitamins!" he grated. "Vitamins!"

"You need them?" I asked.

"I hate vitamins," said Lefty. "Give me food any time."

"What's the matter, been on a diet?"

"You speak a mean truth, all right. For a week now I partake of nothing but vitamins. I am going pill-wacky." Lefty sighed heavily. "B'-bugs," he mumbled. "D-dizzy."

"Doctor's orders?" I inquired.

“No. Restaurant orders. It’s all I can get. Will you live in a burg where nobody nibbles anything but pills?”

“What town is this you’re speaking of?”

“New York.”

“But there’s plenty of food in New York—” I began.

“There is and there isn’t,” said Lefty, darkly brooding. “There is now but there will be ain’t.”

“I don’t get it.”

“I figure you don’t. Nobody will. I can make with the explanations but it is not such a thing as anyone will believe and I do not wish to get the reputation of a guy who sniffs snow.”

“You’re no drug addict,” I said. “Come on, spill it.”

Lefty Feep looked at me again with a wry smile. He shrugged.

“You asked for it,” he said. “It is a story that will make your hair curdle and your blood stand on end.”

“Shoot,” I urged.

He shot.

* * *

“LAST week I am coming back from Buffalo where I wager a few pennies on the bow-wows. My pooch comes in and I make collections, so I drive back very happy. It is the first time I make money by going to the dogs.”

“More and over, I know I have five rancho grandos waiting for me in Manhattan, where I place another bet with a personality name of Gorilla Gabface.

“This Gorilla Gabface is a number I dearly love to hate. He is a big noise in the rackets, and I do not care to have dealings with such riff and raff. Our association is just sentimental, because he and I once work our way through reform school together selling alky.

“But while I get reformed, Gorilla merely gets more and more unscrupulous in his business deals, until he is left with not one single scruple at all.

I do all right, but he is always poking from fun at me, saying the only gold I will ever see will be in a halo, while he has enough gold for a complete set of teeth.

“So I am very hepped over winning this little wager, like I say, and I start driving back thinking about how I will hand him the old razz and he will hand me the old cash and it will be a very fair exchange.

“Along about noon a.m. I find myself in the mountain country, and I am so happy I start to yodel while I drive. In fact, I even open the car window a trifle to sniff some air, which is unusual for me, because I have a theory that air is not so healthy on guys if it is too fresh.

“But the hills are very pretty, and the road has more curves than a Minsky stripper, and the sun is shining, and the birds are singing, and it is just one great big popular song if you know what I mean. I feel like a character on the Alka-Seltzer Barn Dance.

“I am too happy to notice where I’m going, so it is no wonder at all that I snap out of it to find myself off on a side road going up a hill.

“I figure on turning around when I reach the top, so I keep driving up and over. But the hill does not seem to have any top to it—I just keep on twisting and turning, and all the time the road is getting dustier and smaller, and the woods on each side are as thick as a House of David beard.

“It is so uncivilized I do not even spot a gas station. For that matter, I no longer see any farm houses or catalogue cabins. I wonder about this more than slightly, but keep on driving.

The air is blue up there, and so am I, because I figure I am lost for sure unless I get a chance to turn around.

“THEN all at once I come to a level grade that goes off for quite a space into a little valley between the hills. I am just ready to wheel around when I notice the sign.

"It is on the side of the road just ahead, standing on a stick between some rocks. I am curious to see what kind of advertising goes over here in the provinces, so I pull up and read it. It says:

PICNIC TODAY
DIMINUTIVE SOCIETY OF THE CATSKILL MOUNTAINS

FREE ENTERTAINMENT AND REFRESHMENTS.
STRANGERS WELCOME

"I suddenly realize I am panging from hunger, not having taken in groceries yet today. And here is free refreshments, so what can I lose? I never hear of the Diminutive Society of the Catskill Mountains before, but I figure they never hear of me either, so it's even.

"Before you can say Jack Dempsey, I make up my mind to drive on in, which I do. The road is just a little trail now, but I can make it if I go slow between the rocks.

"All at once I look up at the sky, because I hear thunder. The sky is still blue, and the sun is shining, so I figure I make a mistake. But no, I get a little further, and the thunder is louder.

"Then I round the last bend in the road and come out on an open space, and I see what is making with the thunder. There is an outdoor bowling alley, so help me, and the noise is from the balls rolling along the rocks.

"But that is not what makes me turn off the ignition and sit there like somebody stuffed a watermelon in my mouth. I am staring at the bowlers.

"Now I am a personality who gets around considerable for many's the year. I have the pleasure of placing my peepers on a lot of screwy spectacles, including pink elephants. But never do I see a wormier looking sight than this.

“Because the bowlers at this picnic are a bunch of dwarfs. So help me, there are a couple dozen of them, little shorty guys in nightcaps and ski suits, all running around like fugitives from Walt Disney.

“This baffles me but plenty. Because the sign says this is a picnic for the Diminutive Society, and instead of seeing Diminutives, there are these dwarfs.

“FINALLY I figure it is some kind of circus brawl or publicity stunt, though I don’t notice any Pathe newsreel cameras. What I do notice is the nice collection of beer kegs off on one side.

“I sit there and watch the pint-size Hank Marinos knock off the tenpins for some minutes. And then, all of a sudden, I hear a scratching at the side of the car. ‘Aha, termites!’ I say to myself.

“But when I open the door I do not see any termite. Instead, the smallest guy in the world is standing on the running board, trying to reach the door handle.

“He has a long gray beard on his face and a short beer in his hand. ‘Welcome, stranger,’ he pipes up, in no voice at all. ‘Welcome to the Diminutive Society of the Catskills.’ I do not altogether understand this, but what he says next shows me his heart is in the right place. ‘Have a drink’ he says.

“So I climb out and take the mug from him. The beer is plenty good, and has more kick than a chorus girl with her costume on fire. ‘Little man, what now?’ I ask.

“He grins through his chin-spinach. ‘What gives out here?’ I inquire. ‘Make with the explanations.’

“He shrugs. ‘We do not entertain visitors very often, I fear’ he pipes. ‘I fear I fail to comprehend your meaning.’

“By this time a whole crowd of shorty guys are standing around watching and poking each other. I begin to feel like I was back in school the time I was 16 and in the Third Grade. Most of these babies couldn't pick my pocket without using a stepladder.

"So I turn around to the head squeaker again and try to make him understand, because I can see from what he says that he can't be any too bright.

" 'Listen, quaint-face,' I say, politely. 'Where's Snow-White?'

"This does not go over. Evidently these jerks cannot even understand English.

" 'I mean, what's the score? Which one of you is Dopey? What is this—a convention of Midget Auto Racers?'

"The head little guy smiles again. 'You don't seem to understand at all' he tells me. 'This is the annual picnic of the Diminutive Society of the Catskill Mountains. It is the one occasion each year when we venture forth from our homes to celebrate our ownership of these hills. We bowl, we drink, we make merry from sunup to sundown. It has been a long time, as I say, since the last stranger's arrival. May we welcome you?'

"I don't get it at all. There is something awfully queer about this whole setup. The way these little guys dress, and talk, and giggle. But what have I got to lose? They are too small to hurt me, and I don't see any equalizers in the mob. They are kind of drunk and out for a good time so why shouldn't I stick around for a few drinks and a few laughs? Maybe it is the mountain air that does it, or maybe it is the first beer on an empty stomach. Anyhow, I shake hands with the head midget and say, 'Thanks, Shorty. How's for a little bowling?'

"SO then it begins. I take a turn at the alleys and I take a turn at the beers. These small fry have special bowling balls made up to fit their hands—about the size of tennis balls and not much heavier. I fling them two at a time, to be fair.

"These small fry also have special beer mugs made up to fit their mouths. So I drink three or four at a time, also to be fair.

“Pretty soon I turn out to be not only fair but also quite stinkaroo. These local yokels brew a mean beer, and before I notice it I am quite dizzy. The dwarfs do not seem to notice, either, but keep right on setting up the pins and the drinks, and I keep right on knocking them down.

“I am a nasty hand at the old strike-and-spare, even though the ground is rough, and they stand around cheering me on while I polish off one bowler after another, also one beer after another.

“Perhaps I am telling this kind of confused—but that’s the way I get, all right.

“It only seems like minutes, but it must be hours, when I glance over my shoulder and see the old sun is going down. I have killed the whole afternoon at this picnic.

“The dwarfs also seem to keep track of the time, because all of a sudden they quiet down and get ready to take a last drink. Nothing will do but for me to drink with them. And on account of there being two dozen of them, I have a lot of drinking to do.

“The head shorty keeps staring at me and nudging his pals while he watches me inhale the brew. ‘Verily, he has a greater capacity than Master Van Winkle,’ he giggles.

“The name seems to penetrate the speckled fog in my noggin for a minute. ‘What’s this about Van Winkle?’ I ask.

“But the sun is very low and red, and it is dark all around, and I see the dwarfs suddenly start running across the bowling lawn and into the shadows. The head shortly runs after them. ‘We must leave you, stranger,’ he calls over his shoulder. ‘Pleasant dreams.’

“I start to run after him, but all at once I stumble on the grass and everything starts going round and round—ten little red suns juggle themselves in my head, and the ground comes up and I am out.

“Just before I close my eyes I manage to holler after the last little runt again. ‘Who is this Van Winkle?’ I gasp.

“I can not be sure, because I am going down for the third time, but I think I hear his voice come from far away. ‘Why, Master Rip Van Winkle, of course,' whispers the dwarf.

"I open my mouth to say something, but the only thing coming out is a snore.

"WHEN I open my beautiful baby blue eyes again, it is daylight. At first I do not remember where I am, but then it all comes back in a hurry and I realize I pass out and probably sleep the night here.

"I raise up on one elbow to see if my little friends are around, but there are no signs. In fact, to make it funny, there is not even any bowling lawn, or tenpins, or tennis-size bowling balls. To make it not so funny, there is no beer keg, either—and I have a thirst, but strong.

"Maybe it is all a dream, I figure. Then I turn my head and I begin to pray it is a dream.

"Because I am now staring at the car, parked off to one side. And what I see is not altogether a sight for sore eyes like mine.

"Yesterday I leave a nice new coupe standing there. Today I find a jallopy you couldn't trade in on a pair of roller skates. It is covered with rust an inch thick; the tires are down, and the windows are out.

"I get up in a hurry because it is all clear to me now. These dwarfs I drink with are nothing but a gang of car thieves. They slip me a Mickey Finn and steal my coupe, leaving me this broken down wheelbarrow just to be quaint. No wonder they treat me so well—they are nothing but a bunch of Dead End Kids in whiskers!

"I run over to the wreck and wrench open the door. It not only opens but comes off in my hand.

"Then I reach inside, and all at once something flies out and hits me in the face. A couple of bats—so help me!

"I stare down at the cobwebs on the seat. Then I go around in front and stare again. This time I nearly fall down.

"Because I see my license plates on this jallopy!

“There is something wrong here. This is my car, all right—but . . . But? I reach up to scratch my chin. My hand never gets there. It tangles up in something soft, like a fur coat.

“My hand is tangled in a beard. A white beard. My beard! At least it is growing on me, so it must be my beard, though I do not want such a thing. No, I do not want such a thing as this beard at all, because it is all tangled up with burrs and thistles.

“I look down at my clothes and that is the last straw. You could even say that is the last shred. Because there isn’t much left of my clothes except shreds. My trousers have got French cuffs made of rags. The moths have been holding a convention on my knees. My coat and vest look like something a goat would eat for dessert.

“I AM not sitting in the hot seat at the moment, but I am still plenty shocked.

“Here I am, lost in the mountains, with an old car and a new beard. It is enough to make a guy holler—so I do. I kind of lose my head and run around yelling for the dwarfs to come out and make with the explanations. I guess I am off the beam for several moments, just screeching there, when I hear a sound.

“It is a buzzing sound, and it gets louder. All at once I look up and see a plane. The plane circles around, comes lower, and taxis down right in the open space where the bowling green should be.

“I just gawk. It is a new model plane, very small; all silvery and shining. What makes me gawk is the fact that it lands in just about a minute, and it only taxis maybe a hundred feet.

“I do not have much time to gawk, because a guy climbs out of the door and steps over to me. ‘Anything wrong?’ he asks me.

“ ‘Yeah,’ I reply. ‘You are.’ And he is.

“He is wearing a pretty funny getup himself—a pair of overalls with long sleeves and lapels on top. Instead of a hat he has a kind of basin on his head that looks like a helmet with antennae sticking up.

" 'Who are you?' I say, kind of sad. 'And if you tell me you're Flash Gordon, you can lock me up.'

"He just grins. 'My name is Grant,' he says. 'Special investigator for the government. What might your name be?'

" 'It might be Old Man Mose, from the looks of things,' I tell him. 'But it isn't. I'm on my way to New York, but I run into a little difficulty.'

" 'You mean to say an old man like you intends to walk all the way to New York?' he says. 'No wonder you are yelling. Would you like a lift?—I'll be hitting New York in about half an hour.'

" 'I'm with you, brother,' I say. So we hop in the plane. I do not look back at the car again, and for some reason I do not wish to look down at myself, either. Still and all I have to make a crack. 'Who are you calling an old man?' I yap.

"He grins again. 'Why you, of course. You're every bit of 60, aren't you? And with a beard, too—I haven't seen one of those things in years.'

"This shuts me up as we take off. 'You are quite a hot sketch yourself,' I tell him. 'What are you doing with that thunder mug on your head?'

"Grant looks at me like I am stir-simple. 'Why that's the radio control helmet for the plane, of course. Don't you know planes are operated by radio adjustment?' he asks, turning the antennae on top of the basin and making the plane rise. 'Say, how far in the backwoods do you come from?'

" 'Brother, I wish I knew,' I answer. " 'You know, there's something funny about you,' he goes on. 'Those clothes you're wearing—they aren't exactly 1962 cut.'

" '1962?' I yell.

"Grant gives me a long look. 'Of, course. Don't tell me you don't know what date it is?'

" 'Why, April 30th, 1942,' I snap back.

"HE BEGINS to laugh. Somehow I do not like to hear him laugh because I am not on the Bob Hope program at the time. 'This is April 28th, 1962,' he tells me. 'You are just 20 years and 363 days off. Or maybe you're further off than that.'

" 'I think so myself,' I say. 'Because I lay me down to sleep just last night, and if it is not 1942 at the time, I am robbed when I buy a newspaper.'

" 'Are you kidding me?' asks this Grant.

" 'Somebody is kidding somebody,' I tell him. 'All I know is I hoist a few beers with a gang of dwarfs on a picnic and fall asleep. When I wake up my car is rusty, my suit is a ragpicker's delight, and I have long white whiskers. Which is hard to figure out, because I am really a young guy with a sporty car and a nifty checkered suit. And if I'm not the guy who has the beard, then who the hell am I?'

" 'You sound like Rip Van Winkle to me,' laughs Grant.

"I pick up my ears. 'Rip Van Winkle!' I yell. 'That's the bozo the head dwarf mentions to me just before I hit the hay. Who is he?'

"So this Grant guy tells me a story about some jerk who lives way back when and gets lost in the mountains like I do. He meets up with a troupe of Singer's Midgets or somebody and starts bowling and drinking. They slip him some knockout drops and he goes out for the count. In fact he has such a hangover he sleeps for twenty years. At least that is the line he hands his wife when he gets back home.

" 'That sounds like me, all right,' I decide. 'So I do a twenty-year stretch on the grass. Well, there are worse places. But I see where I am plenty behind on current events. What do you hear from the mob?'

"This Grant guy doesn't know whether to take me serious or not. 'You actually claim an experience like Rip Van Winkle's?'

" 'I do not make up such a line just to explain to my wife,' I say. 'Because at the moment I do not have a wife, only alimony expenses. And after twenty years I wager I do not even have to pay alimony. But make with the news broadcast, buddy. What goes on in the world? Who wings the Series last year? Are they still running the nags at Saratoga and wherever? Is Joe Louis still champion? Give out with important stuff like that.'

"Grant's face falls about a foot. 'I'm afraid the world isn't in such good shape,' he tells me.

" 'You mean the New Deal hasn't cleaned things up yet?" I ask.

" 'No, not exactly. Things are a lot better now, nationally and internationally, I suppose. You'll find plenty of new customs and fashions current, and a lot of inventions and improvements over your time. But one problem still remains. And it's a problem that's baffling me in my work right now.'

"I ASK him what it is.

" 'Crime,' he tells me. 'Bootlegging. Right now I'm investigating the biggest bootlegging racket this country has ever seen.'

" 'What's the matter, is Prohibition in again?' I ask.

" 'Prohibition? Oh—no, it's not liquor that's being bootlegged. It's vitamins.'

" 'Vitamins? You mean that alphabet stuff—like A, B, C, D? I never go for such articles personally. Give me a beefsteak rare any time.'

" 'You don't understand at all,' Grant tells me. 'Vitamins are food now. Today we eat only vitamin pills. Scientific research has perfected vitamin sources of energy and nourishment during the past years, largely as a result of crop shortages and famine following the second world war. Now everyone takes a daily ration of vitamins. It's improving the stamina of the world's population. But lately large stores of synthetic vitamin capsules are being stolen—hijacked, you'd call it—from the government warehouses. Women and children are starving again in a world where we have no place for hunger and want any more. Some organized group of vandals is stealing capsules and bootlegging them to merchants. And since all vitamin production is centered at New York, and most of the capsules are stored there before distribution, the situation is grave. For weeks now, millions of capsules disappear daily. And people go hungry.

" 'I am on my way back to New York from Cleveland. My clues there prove to be false leads. But unless I can crack this mess soon, it's all up with me.' Grant admits this sourly.

" 'I am an old alky runner myself,' I tell him. 'Maybe when I get into town I will look up some of the old mob and see if there are any leads. If so, I will give you a buzz. How about the phone number?'

" 'Use the private shortwave system,' he says. 'You'll find sending sets wherever you go. But you're not leaving me—I want to hear more about this Rip Van Winkle yarn.'

'I got business in the city. But urgent. I will contact you later,' I promise.

"He doesn't answer. He is fiddling with his headpiece again, making a landing. Because before I realize it, we are already over New York. I look out. The burg is not much changed. The buildings look a little taller, but I still see the Empire State and Radio City, and I think I spot Minsky's as we circle down.

"We land just outside Flushing, in another little field. The air around us is filled with little silver specks—more planes. In fact we come down in a place that says:

PLANES PARKED—50c
OVERNIGHT HANGARS—75c
MOTOR TUNEUP—$1.00

"And a guy comes running out to wipe off the windshield. I duck out of the seat in a hurry, and head for the gate. There is a subway entrance about a block away.

" 'Hey, wait for me!' yells this Grant guy. 'I want to talk to you.'

" 'See you later,' I call back. 'I may be a little slow getting there, but I still got a five grand bet to collect from Gorilla Gabface.'

"THERE is a lot I could tell. About the rocket subway they put in instead of the old one—all new improvements, except that I still have to stand up. About the screwy way they dress, in these overalls with the lapels, and about the new type cars I see downtown that operate with these radio controls but still try to get every pedestrian who steps off the sidewalk. I notice television movie houses, too, and I kind of get to wondering what happens to the oldfashioned strip-tease, but I do not have time to find out.

"Because, like I tell this Grant, I am on my way to see Gorilla Gabface. In 1942 he hangs out behind a pool hall on Second Avenue, and I figure it is an even chance he is still there, because Gorilla is not the kind of character who gets around much. In fact he is very lazy and hardly ever moves from his chair except to kick his wife.

"So I get off the subway and start walking. The streets look no better; in fact twenty years age them the way they age me.

"On the subway persons look at me kind of peculiar and I am undoubtedly a sight, but here on Second Avenue I look quite natural—because the street is full of broken down bums.

"I get to thinking about that. I am a broken down old bum myself, now, and I hardly know what to do. But I figure once I get my hands on that five grand I will shave and dress and look around for some odds on the dogs or nags, and get back on my feet.

"Still and all it is not pleasant to hike along. Because there are a lot of sad-looking people on the street, sitting in front of their houses. Kids crying, and women with shawls around their heads, and guys sitting with their heads in their hands.

"Pretty soon I come to a long line of guys standing in front of a store. They are mumbling and double-talking under their breath. Up at the head of the line they are pushing and rattling the door to the joint, which is locked.

"All at once a guy sticks his head out of the window upstairs. 'Go away,' he says. 'Go away, all of you. Government orders. We can't sell any capsules today—vitamin shortage.'

“Guys in the line let out a groan. ‘What about my family?’ one yells. ‘My old lady and the baby have nothing to eat for three days now, except a few capsules of C and half an ounce of E.’

“ ‘I’m sorry,’ says the guy in the window. ‘You know how it is. I’m not responsible.’

“ ‘We got to eat,’ says the fellow in the line. ‘It’s those damned hijackers! Why don’t they catch them?’

“MOST of the men turn away. I walk on. All at on once I notice a little rat-face personality sneaking up to one of the guys in the line.

“ ‘You want some capsules, buddy?’ he whispers. ‘I got some here—nice fresh’ stuff. A to Z, anything you want, if you’ll keep your mouth shut.’

“The guy looks at rat-face kind of funny, but he says, ‘I suppose I have to. My folks are hungry. How much for a two-day supply of general rations?’

“Rat-face smiles. ‘Ten bucks,’ he says.

“ ‘Ten bucks? Why that’s robbery—these capsules are only 80c at a regular store!’ says the guy.

“Rat-face smiles again. ‘Regular store hasn’t got any,’ he whispers. ‘You know that. Ten bucks, buddy. You’re lucky to get it.’

“The guy hands him the money and gets a little tube. I don’t wait to see any more, but I know rat-face is going down the line now.

“I understand what this guy Grant tells me on the plane, about the vitamin shortage. It’s just like bootlegging—only with a difference. Because, you see, these people need food. They must have it. And to hi-jack this stuff and then sell it—well, I don’t go for it, that’s all. Maybe I am getting soft in my old age.

“Anyhow, I do not think about it any more, because I arrive at Gorilla’s pool hall and walk in. The joint looks just the same, and it is just as empty out front. There is only one guy sitting there—a new guy to me. He has a red face with a lot of warts growing on it, and there is a dead cigarette butt in his mouth. A collar ad boy.

" 'Hello, character,' I greet him. 'Is Gorilla around?'

"Warty gives me a slow look. 'He might be. Who's looking for him?'

" 'Tell him Lefty Feep wants to see him. It's about five grand.'

" 'You got five grand?'

" 'I'm going to get five grand from him,' I correct.

"He gives me the old leer and sneer. But I stare right back, and finally he climbs off the stool and goes into the rear room. He returns in a couple minutes.

" 'Go right in,' he says.

"So I toddle back and open the door.

" 'Well, pappy?' says a voice.

"I see a big fat guy sitting at a table. He has a bald noggin and a couple spare chins, but mostly he is all jaw from the neck up and all arms from the neck down. He looks like King Kong with a bad shave.

" 'Pardon me, curly,' I state. 'Where could I find Gorilla Gabface?'

" 'In hell,' says the fat guy at the table. 'He's been dead for eighteen years. Come to think of it you don't look far from dead yourself, pappy.'

" 'Don't call me pappy! ' I snap. 'Or I will let the air out of your chins, you overgrown walrus.'

"THEN the fat guy gets up from the table and I see he is about ten feet tall, or maybe six and a half anyhow. Part of him is muscle and the rest is meanness, so when he laughs I am not fooled, and when he sticks out his mitt I do not clasp it in any fraternity grip.

" 'Who are you and what do you want?' he says, moving around toward me.

" 'I am Lefty Feep, and Gorilla Gabface owes me five Gs on the dog-races,' I repeat, stubborn. Only my feet are not stubborn, because they back me to the door.

“ ‘Well I am Gorilla’s nephew and I am running this show now for many’s the year. I do not ever hear my uncle mention your name, and he certainly never mentions owing anyone five pennies, let alone five grand. So my advice to you, Feep, is to get out of here before I strangle you in your whiskers, you old sponge!’

“ ‘I take it you do not wish to pay me?’ I inquire, just to make sure.

“The fat guy reaches out across the floor with one hand, which wraps around my neck. ‘No,’ he says, lifting me off the floor and shaking me like a used bar-rag. ‘Though I can see you have a good use for five thousand dollars, if only to pay hospital expenses after I get through beating you up.’

“This is not exactly good news to me, and it is even less good when he smacks me one on the side of the head. I am just hanging there helpless while the fat guy draws back for another clout, when all at once he drops me to the floor.

“Another guy comes in behind me, and he attracts the fat guy’s attention. I lie there on the floor looking up and I see the newcomer is none other than Rat-face, the slug that was selling bootleg vitamin capsules to the citizens in front of the market.

“He is so excited he does not even notice me, and nearly steps on my face while I am lying there. ‘It’s going great, Boss!’ he yells to the fat guy. ‘I sell three hundred bucks of pills in the last hour. The rest of the mob is covering the district. We are running out of stock.’

“RAT-FACE is still talking when Wart-face comes in from the front room. He has an acetylene torch in one hand. ‘The boys are ready to tunnel through to the Government warehouse again this evening,’ he says. ‘Shall I send the trucks over?’

“Fat guy looks at the two of them kind of funny. ‘You birds talk too much,’ he says. ‘Here,’ he says to Ratface. ‘Go back out and tell the mob to stop selling for today. We don’t want to flood the market all at once.’ Then he turns to Wart-face. ‘Get down to the warehouse. The boys are tunneling through from the building alongside. But leave this torch with me. I think I got to use it. Now—powder!'

"The two guys back out of the room without even noticing me. I am lying on the floor listening to the birdies from that crack on the head, but I am also thinking. If these guys are the ones Grant is after, they have been running this bootleg vitamin racket from this place. One gang must be tunneling through to steal Government supplies, and the other gang goes out and sells the pills. And this fat guy is the brain.

"So there I am, locked in a room with Gorilla's nephew. I am sixty years old, I have no equalizer, and he is a pretty tough customer.

"What he has to say to me is not encouraging, either. He stands over me and looks down with a very nasty grin. 'I am sorry about you, pappy,' he says. 'I only intend to beat you up and send you to a hospital. But now you hear a little too much, so I think your next stop is the morgue.'

"I think in high gear. 'Have a heart,' I tell him. 'I am an oldtimer myself. I know your late uncle, in fact I am associated with him, you might say. I just do a twenty-year stretch, but I am an uptown boy. I can help you plenty.'

"Fat guy stands right over me and laughs some more. 'No use, pappy,' he says. 'You old-fashioned gangsters are all through. We don't use rods and rattlers any more. This is big business. I am bucking the Federal Government myself, and winning. Why, we got eighty million vitamin food capsules stored away under this joint, and we're tunneling through tonight for another thirty million. I got a hundred guys out organized to cover bootleg territories. It's big business. We got a dozen cities at our mercy. Do you think I am some cheesy little punk in back of a poolroom like my late uncle? Not for a minute—this is big time stuff and you has-beens are no good.

" 'But give me a chance—I know a few tricks,' I plead.

"He turns on the laugh again. 'Not on your life,' he chuckles. 'And speaking of your life, here goes.'

"So he reaches down for the acetylene torch and the interview is over.

"FIFTEEN minutes later, after I locate this guy Grant by shortwave from a cigar store on the corner, he arrives and claps the cuffs on the fat guy. Also his men surround the pool hall and snag Rat-face and his pals when they drift in from time to time.

"They also capture, I hear later, all the mob down at the tunnel job, and they find the stores of capsules in a big cellar warehouse hidden downstairs.

"So all in all it turns out to be a good thing for this guy Grant. And also for me, when I learn the Government is paying a five grand reward for turning up the vitamin racketeers.

"Two days later the money comes through. Meanwhile I pal around with Grant and eat vitamins in restaurants. That is why I get so sick of them.

"In fact, on the third day I am sitting in a hamburger stand making faces while I gulp down my third order of the dizzy beef pills with a ketchup drop on the side. Grant is with me, and he says, 'Well, what are you going to do with the reward—go into business for yourself?'

"That is when I get mad. 'No,' I tell him. 'I am not cut out for this day and age, I see that. I am too old to start in again, I do not like the class of people that run the rackets nowadays, and besides I do not see any strip shows in progress at all. More and over, these vitamin pills ruin my digestion and I have not even got an excuse to carry a toothpick. I think maybe I am better off back in 1942.'

" 'Too bad,' Grant tells me. 'Those days are gone forever.'

"But I do not hear him. I am staring at a calendar on the wall. 'April 29th!' I holler. 'Listen, do you or do you not tell me I sleep for 20 years and 360 days? And do I or do I not spend 4 more days here? That makes tomorrow April 30th again!'

" 'So what?' Grant asks.

" 'So that means tomorrow is the annual picnic of the Diminutive Society of the Catskill Mountains. Hop into that plane of yours—we're going to see those dwarfs and give them a little proposition.'

"WHICH is just what we do. Grant lets me off near the top of the mountains the next morning. I go up and find the dwarfs bowling as usual. They are surprised to see me, and kind of embarrassed, till I get the head shorty off.

"I ask him if he has got anything to drink that will send me back to where I was. He plays smart and says no. Then I tell him that fun is fun, and a gag is a gag, but I want to go back and am ready to pay for the trip.

"This gets him interested, and he asks what the deal is. I tell him. He gets excited and calls a conference. Well, to make a long story short, they get together with me and the head shorty goes off and mixes up a fresh drink. Not beer, but something else. I promise not to mention it. Then I take care of my end of the bargain and drink the stuff.

"It puts me out right away. And when I wake up everything is O.K. It is morning and when I hike down the mountain I find out that it is May 1st, 1942.

"I wire ahead for some funds, and rush into town. The first place I head for is here, because after eating nothing but vitamins for four days, I am plenty hungry."

* * *

LEFTY FEEP concluded his story with a profound sigh. It was followed by a snort from over my shoulder.

Jack stood there with the tray of food.

"What did I tell you?" he asked me. "Did you ever hear such a line in your life?"

Feep bridled. "What is wrong with my story, I would like to know?" he asked.

Jack snorted again. "Everything. But even if I believed it—which I don't—there are just a few things that puzzle me. To begin with, I thought you were at the mercy of that fat guy in the back room of the pool hall. He was going to kill you with an acetylene torch, wasn't he? In fact you were lying there on the floor and he was standing over you. And yet you say that fifteen minutes later you walked out free and left him there to be captured.”

“Oh, that?” said Lefty Feep. “That is very simple. Like I say, this guy thinks he is so smart, and that old-timers do not know any clever tricks. But I have one trick up my sleeve he does not know. It is a very ordinary trick today and much used in the rackets—but I suppose he never hears of it in 1962, I am lying there on the floor, he reaches down for the torch, but I grab it first. He shoves his foot down on my arm, but then I pull this old-fashioned trick on him, like I say. I merely turn on the torch and give him the hot-foot. And if you do not think a hot-foot with a torch is effective, you are crazy.”

Jack turned crimson. “All right, I give up,” he sighed. “But just one thing more. About that deal you made with the dwarfs.”

“What about it?”

“Well, certainly you didn’t just offer them money. They have no use for money.”

Feep smiled. “Of course not. But I use the money to make the deal. I buy something the dwarfs will really go for. That is what I tell the head shorty to make him go through with it. I tell him I will give his little pals something they can use at their picnics from now on.”

“And what is that?”

“A modern bowling alley. Sure—I tell him I contract to build a bowling alley right on top of the mountain, so they can organize a league and get into the tournaments. In fact, next year I am going back there again and play them myself. Maybe you would like to get on the team?”

“Come on,” said Jack to me. “Let’s you and I get out of here.”

We left the table, but Feep didn’t see us go. He was tearing apart the roast chicken with the famished look of a man who has eaten nothing but pills for four days.

Black Bargain

Maybe you've heard it said of someone, "he's scared of his own shadow." Well, here's the story of a man who had a damned good reason to be!

IT WAS getting late when I switched off the neon and got busy behind the fountain with my silver polish. The fruit syrup came off easily, but the chocolate stuck and the hot fudge was greasy. I wish to the devil they wouldn't order hot fudge.

I began to get irritated as I scrubbed away. Five hours on my feet, every night, and what did I have to show for it? Varicose veins. Varicose veins, and the memory of a thousand foolish faces. The veins were easier to bear than the memories. They were so depressing, those customers of mine. I knew them all by heart.

In early evening all I got was "cokes." I could spot the "cokes" a mile away. Giggling high-school girls, with long shocks of uncombed brown hair, with their shapeless tan "fingertip" coats and the repulsively thick legs bulging over furry red ankle socks. They were all "cokes." For forty-five minutes they'd monopolize a booth, messing up the tile table-top with cigarette ashes, crushed napkins daubed in lipstick, and little puddles of spilled water. Whenever a high-school girl came in, I automatically reached for the cola pump.

A little later in the evening I got the "gimme two packs" crowd. Sports-shirts hanging limply over hairy arms meant the popular brands. Blue work-shirts with rolled sleeves disclosing tattooing meant the two-for-a-quarter cigarettes.

Once in awhile I got a fat boy. He was always a “cigar.” If he wore glasses he was a ten-center. If not, I merely had to indicate the box on the counter. Five cents straight. Mild Havana—all long filler.

“Oh, it was monotonous. The “notions” family, who invariably departed with aspirin, Ex-Lax, candy bars, and a pint of icecream. The “public library” crowd—tall, skinny youths bending the pages of magazines on the rack and never buying. The “soda-waters” with their trousers wrinkled by the sofa of a one-room apartment, the “hairpins,” always looking furtively toward the baby buggy outside. And around ten, the “pineapple sundaes”—fat women Bingo-players. Followed by the “chocolate sodas” when the show let out. More booth-parties, giggling girls and red-necked young men in sloppy play-suits.

In and out, all day long. The rushing “telephones,” the doddering old “three-cent stamps,” the bachelor “toothpastes” and “razor-blades.”

I could spot them all at a glance. Night after night they dragged up to the counter.

I don’t know why they even bothered to tell me what they wanted. One look was all I needed to anticipate their slightest wishes. I could have given them what they needed without their asking.

Or, rather, I suppose I couldn’t. Because what most of them really needed was a good long drink of arsenic, as far as I was concerned.

Arsenic! Good Lord, how long had it been since I’d been called upon to fill out a prescription! None of these stupid idiots wanted drugs from a drug-store. Why had I bothered to study pharmacy? All I really needed was a two-week course in pouring chocolate syrup over melting icecream, and a month’s study of how to set up cardboard figures in the window so as to emphasize their enormous busts.

Well—

He came in then. I heard the slow footsteps without bothering to look up. For amusement I tried to guess before I glanced. A “gimme two packs” ? A “toothpaste” ? Well, the hell with him. I was closing up.

The male footsteps had shuffled up to the counter before I raised my head. They halted, timidly. I still refused to give any recognition of his presence. Then came a hesitant cough. That did it.

I found myself staring at Caspar Milquetoast, and nearly rags. A middle-aged, thin little fellow with sandy hair and rimless glasses perched on a snub nose. The crease of his froggish mouth underlined the despair of his face.

He wore a frayed $16.50 suit, a wrinkled white shirt, and a string tie—but humility was his real garment. It covered him completely, that aura of hopeless resignation.

“TO HELL with psycho-analysis! I’m not the drug-store Dale Carnegie. What I saw added up to only one thing in my mind. A moocher.

“I beg your pardon, please, but have you any tincture of aconite?”

Well, miracles do happen. I was going to get a chance to sell drugs after all. Or was I? When despair walks in and asks for aconite, it means suicide.

I shrugged. “Aconite?” I echoed. “I don’t know.”

He smiled, a little. Or rather, that crease wrinkled back in a poor imitation of amusement. But on his face a smile had no more mirth in it than the grin you see on a skull.

“I know what you’re thinking,” he mumbled. “But you’re wrong. I’m—I’m a chemist. I’m doing some experiments, and I must have four ounces of aconite at once. And some belladonna. Yes, and—wait a minute.”

Then he dragged the book out of his pocket.

I craned my neck, and it was worth it.

The book had rusty metal covers, and was obviously very old. When the thick yellow pages fluttered open under his trembling thumb I saw flecks of dust rise from the binding. The heavy black-lettered type was German, but I couldn’t read anything at that distance.

“Let me see now,” he murmured. “Aconite—belladonna—yes, and I have this—the cat, of course—nightshade—um hum—oh, yes, I’ll need some phosphorus of course—have you any blue chalk?—good—and I guess that’s all.”

I was beginning to catch on. But what the devil did it matter to me? A screwball more or less was nothing new in my life. All I wanted to do was get out of here and soak my feet.

I went bade and got the stuff for him, quickly. I peered through the slot above the prescription counter, but he wasn’t doing anything—just paging through that black, iron-bound book and moving his lips.

Wrapping the parcel, I came out. “Anything else, sir?”

“Oh—yes. Could I have about a dozen candles? The large size?”

I opened a drawer and scrabbled for them under the dust.

“I’ll have to melt them down and reblend them with the fat,” he said.

“What?”

“Nothing. I was just figuring.”

Sure. That’s the kind of figuring you do best when you’re counting the pads in your cell. But it wasn’t my business, was it?

So I handed over the package, like a fool.

“Thank you. You’ve been very kind. I must ask you to be kinder—to charge this.”

Oh, swell!

“You see I’m temporarily out of funds. But I can assure you, in a very short time, in fact within three days, I shall pay you in full. Yes.”

A very convincing plea. I wouldn’t give him a cup of coffee on it—and that’s what bums usually ask for, instead of aconite and candles. But if his words didn’t move me, his eyes did. They were so lonely behind his spectacles, so pitifully alone, those two little puddles of hope in the desert of despair that was his face.

All right. Let him have his dreams. Let him take his old iron-bound dream book home with him and make him crazy. Let him light his tapers and draw his phosphorescent circle and recite his spells to Little Wahoo the Indian Guide of the Spirit World, or whatever the hell he wanted to do.

No, I wouldn't give him coffee, but I'd give him a dream.

"That's okay, buddy," I said. "We're all down on our luck some time, I guess."

That was wrong. I shouldn't have patronized. He stiffened at once and his mouth curled into a sneer—of superiority, if you please!

"I'm not asking charity," he said. "You'll get paid, never fear, my good man.

In three days, mark my words. Now good evening. I have work to do."

Out he marched, leaving "my good man" with his mouth open. Eventually I dosed my mouth but I couldn't clamp a lid on my curiosity.

That night, walking home, I looked down the dark street with new interest. The black houses bulked like a barrier behind which lurked fantastic mysteries. Row upon row, not houses any more, but dark dungeons of dreams. In what house did my stranger hide? In what room was he intoning to what strange gods?

Once again I sensed the presence of wonder in the world, of lurking strangeness behind the scenes of drug-store and apartment-house civilization. Black books still were read, and wild-eyed strangers walked and muttered, candles burned into the night, and a missing alley-cat might mean a chosen sacrifice.

But my feet hurt, so I went home.

II

SAME old malted milks, cherry cokes, vaseline, Listerine, hairnets, bathing caps, cigarettes, and what have you?

Me, I had a headache. It was four days later, almost the same time of night, when I found myself scrubbing off the soda-taps again.

Sure enough, he walked in.

I kept telling myself all evening that I didn't expect him—but I did expect him, really. I had that crawling feeling when the door clicked. I waited for the shuffle of the Tom McCann shoes.

Instead there was a brisk tapping of Oxfords. English Oxfords. The $18.50 kind.

I looked up in a hurry this time.

It was my stranger.

At least he was there, someplace beneath the flashy blue pin-stripe of his suit, the immaculate shirt and foulard tie. He'd had a shave, a haircut, a manicure, and evidently a winning ticket in the Irish Sweepstakes.

"Hello, there." Nothing wrong with that voice—I've heard it in the ritzy hotel lobbies for years, brimming over with pep and confidence and authority.

"Well, well, well," was all I could say.

He chuckled. His mouth wasn't a crease any more. It was a trumpet of command. Out of that mouth could come orders, and directions. This wasn't a mouth shaped for hesitant excuses any longer. It was a mouth for requesting expensive dinners, choice vintage wines, heavy cigars; a mouth that barked at taxi-drivers and doormen.

"Surprised to see me, eh? Well, I told you it would take three days. Want to pay you your money, thank you for your kindness."

That was nice. Not the thanks, the money. I like money. The thought of getting some I didn't expect made me genial.

"So your prayers were answered, eh?" I said.

He frowned.

"Prayers—what prayers?"

"Why I thought that—" I'd pulled a boner, and no mistake.

"I don't understand," he snapped, understanding perfectly well. "Did you perhaps harbor some misapprehension concerning my purchases of the other evening? A few necessary chemicals, that's all—to complete the experiment I spoke of. And the candles, I must confess, were to light my room. They shut my electricity off the day before."

Well, it could be.

"Might as well tell you the experiment was a howling success. Yes, sir. Went right down to Newsohm with the results and they put me on as assistant research director. Quite a break."

Newsohm was the biggest chemical supply house in our section of the country. And he went right down in his rags and was "pat on" as assistant research director! Well, live and learn.

"So here's the money. $2.39, wasn't it? Can you change a twenty?"

I couldn't.

"That's all right, keep it."

I refused, I don't know why. Made me feel crawling again, somehow.

"Well then, tell you what, let's do. You are closing up, aren't you? Why not step down the street to the tavern for a little drink? I'll get change there. Come on, I fed like celebrating."

So it was that five minutes later I walked down the street with Mr. Fritz Gulther.

We took a table in the tavern and ordered quickly. Neither he nor I was at ease. Somehow there was an unspoken secret between us. It seemed almost as though I harbored criminal knowledge against him—I, of all men, alone knowing that behind this immaculately-clad figure of success, there lurked a shabby specter just three days in the past. A specter that owed me $2.39.

We drank quickly, both of us. The specter got a little fainter. We had another. I insisted on paying for the third round.

"It's a celebration," I argued.

HE LAUGHED. "Certainly is. And let me tell you, this is only the beginning. Only the beginning! From now on I'm going to climb so fast it'll make your head swim. I'll be running that place within six months. Going to get a lot of new defense orders in from the government, and expand."

"Wait a minute," I cautioned, reserve gone. "You're way ahead of yourself. If I were in your shoes I'd still be dazed with what happened to me in the past three days."

Fritz Gulther smiled. "Oh, that? I expected that. Didn't I tell you so in the store? I've been working for over a year and I knew just what to expect. It was no surprise, I assure you. I had it all planned. I was willing to starve to carry out my necessary studies, and I did starve. Might as well admit it."

"Sure." I was on my fourth drink now, over the barriers. "When you came into the store I said to myself, 'Here's a guy who's been through hell' !"

"Truer words were never spoken," said Gulther. "I've been through hell all right, quite literally. But it's all over now, and I didn't get burned."

"Say, confidentially—what kind of magic did you use?"

"Magic? Magic? I don't know anything about magic."

"Oh, yes you do, Gulther," I said. "What about that little blade book with the iron covers you were mumbling around with in the store?"

"German inorganic chemistry text," he snapped. "Pretty old. Here, drink up and have another."

I had another. Gulther began to babble, a bit. About his new clothes and his new apartment and the new car he was going to buy next week. About how he was going to have everything he wanted now, by God, he'd show the fools that laughed at him all these years, he'd pay back the nagging landladies and the cursing grocers, and the sneering rats who told him he was soft in the head for studying the way he did.

Then he got into the kindly stage. "How'd you like a job at Newsohm?" he asked me. "You're a good pharmacist. You know your chemistry. You're a nice enough fellow, too—but you've got a terrible imagination. How about it? Be my secretary. Sure, that's it. Be my secretary. I'll put you on tomorrow."

"I'll drink on that," I declared. The prospect intoxicated me. The thought of escape from the damned store, escape from the "coke"-faces, the "ciggies"-voices, very definitely intoxicated me. So did the next drink.

I began to see something.

We were sitting against the wall and the tavern lights were low. Couples around us were babbling in monotone that was akin to silence. We sat in shadow against the wall. Now I looked at my shadow—an ungainly, flickering caricature of myself, hunched over the table. What a contrast it presented before his suddenly erect bulk!

His shadow, now—

His shadow, now—

I saw it. He was sitting up straight across the table from me. But his shadow on the wall was standing!

"No more Scotch for me," I said, as the waiter came up.

But I continued to stare at his shadow. He was sitting and the shadow was standing. It was a larger shadow than mine, and a blacker shadow. For fun I moved my hands up and down, making heads and faces in silhouette. He wasn't watching me, he was gesturing to the waiter.

His shadow didn't gesture. It just stood there. I watched and stared and tried to look away. His hands moved but the black outline stood poised and silent, hands dangling at the sides. And yet I saw the familiar shape of his head and nose; unmistakably his.

"Say, Gulther," I said. "Your shadow—there on the wall—"

I slurred my words. My eyes were blurred.

But I felt his attitude pierce my consciousness below the alcohol.

Fritz Gulther rose to his feet and then shoved a dead-white face against mine. He didn't look at his shadow. He looked at me, through me, at some horror behind my face, my thoughts, my brain. He looked at me, and into some private hell of his own.

"Shadow," he said. "There's nothing wrong with my shadow. You're mistaken. Remember that, you're mistaken. And if you ever mention it again, I'll bash your skull in."

Then Fritz Gulther got up and walked away. I watched him march across the room, moving swiftly but a little unsteadily. Behind him, moving very slowly and not a bit unsteadily, a tall black shadow followed him from the room.

III

IF YOU can build a better mousetrap than your neighbor, you're liable to put your foot in it.

That's certainly what I had done with Gulther. Here I was, ready to accept his offer of a good job as his secretary, and I had to go and pull a drunken boner!

I was still cursing myself for a fool two days later. Shadows that don't follow body-movements, indeed! Who was that shadow I saw you with last night? That was no shadow, that was the Scotch I was drinking. Oh, fine!

So I stood in the drug store and sprinkled my sundaes with curses as well as chopped nuts.

I nearly knocked the pecans off the counter that second night, when Fritz Gulther walked in again.

He hurried up to the counter and flashed me a tired smile.

"Got a minute to spare?"

"Sure—wait till I serve these people in the booth."

I dumped the sundaes and raced back. Gulther perched himself on a stool and took off his hat. He was sweating profusely.

"Say—I want to apologize for the way I blew up the other night."

"Why, that's all right, Mr. Gunther."

"I got a little too excited, that's all. Liquor and success went to my head. No hard feelings, I want you to understand that. It's just that I was nervous. Your ribbing me about my shadow, that stuff sounded too much like the way I was always kidded for sticking to my studies in my room. Landlady used to accuse me of all sorts of things. Claimed I dissected her cat, that I was burning incense, messing the floor up with chalk. Some damn fool college punks downstairs began to yap around that I was some kind of nut dabbling in witchcraft."

I wasn't asking for his autobiography, remember. All this sounded a little hysterical. But then, Gulther looked the part. His sweating, the way his mouth wobbled and twitched as he got this out of me.

"But say, reason I stopped in was to see if you could fix me up a sedative. No, no bromo or aspirin. I've been taking plenty of that stuff ever since the other evening. My nerves are all shot. That job of mine down at Newsohm takes it all out of me."

"Wait a minute, I'll get something."

I made for the back room. As I compounded I sneaked a look at Gulther through the slot.

All right, I'll be honest. It wasn't Gulther I wanted to look at. It was his shadow.

When a customer sits at the counter stools, the storelights hit him so that his shadow is just a little black pool beneath his feet.

Gulther's shadow was a complete silhouette of his body, in outline. A black, deep shadow.

I blinked, but that didn't help.

Stranger still, the shadow seemed to be cast parallel with his body, instead of at an angle from it. It grew out from his chest instead of his legs. I don't know refraction, the laws of light, all that technical stuff. All I know is that Fritz Gulther had a big black shadow sitting beside him on the floor, and that the sight of it sent cold shivers along my spine.

I wasn't drunk. Neither was he. Neither was the shadow. All three of us existed.

Now Gulther was putting his hat back on.

But not the shadow. It just sat there. Crouched.

It was all wrong.

The shadow was no denser at one spot than at another. It was evenly dark, and—I noted this particularly—the outlines did not blur or fade. They were solid.

I stared and stared. I saw a lot now I'd never noticed. The shadow wore no clothes. Of course! Why should it put on a hat? It was naked, that shadow. But it belonged to Gulther—it wore spectacles. It was his shadow, all right. Which suited me fine, because I didn't want it.

Fiddling around compounding that sedative, I got in several more peeks.

Now Gulther was looking down over his shoulder. He was looking at his shadow, now. Even from a distance I fancied I saw new beads of sweat string a rosary of fear across his forehead.

He knew, all right!

I came out, finally.

"Here it is," I said. I kept my eyes from his face.

"Good. Hope it works. Must get some sleep. And say—that job offer still goes. How about coming down tomorrow morning?"

I nodded, forcing a smile.

Gulther paid me, rose.

"See you then."

"Certainly." And why not? After all, what if you do work for a boss with an unnatural shadow? Most bosses have other faults, worse ones and more concrete. That shadow—whatever it was and whatever was wrong with it—wouldn't bite me. Though Gulther acted as though it might bite him.

As he turned away I looked at his departing back, and at the long, swooping black outline which followed it. The shadow rose and stalked after him. Stalked.

Yes, it followed quite purposefully. To my now bewildered eyes it seemed larger than it had in the tavern. Larger, and a bolder black.

Then the night swallowed Gulther and his non-existent companion.

I went back to the rear of the store and swallowed the other half of the sedative I'd made up for that purpose. After seeing that shadow, I needed it as much as he did.

IV

THE girl in the ornate outer office smiled prettily. “Go right in,” she warbled. “He’s expecting you.”

So it was true, then. Gulther was assistant research director, and I was to be his secretary.

I floated in. In the morning sunshine I forgot all about shadows.

The inner office was elaborately furnished—a huge place, with the elegant walnut panelling associated with business authority. There was a kidney-desk set before closed Venetian blinds, and a variety of comfortable leather armchairs. Fluorescent lighting gleamed pleasantly.

But there was no Gulther. Probably on the other side of the little door at the back, talking to his chief.

I sat down, with the tight feeling of anticipation hugged somewhere within my stomach. I glanced around, taking in the room again. My gaze swept the glass-topped desk. It was bare. Except in the corner, where a small box of cigars rested.

No, wait a minute. That wasn’t a cigar-box. It was metal. I’d seen it somewhere before.

Of course! It was Gulther’s iron-bound book.

“German inorganic chemistry.” Who was I to doubt his word? So naturally, I just had to sneak a look before he came in.

I opened the yellowed pages.

De Vermis Mysteriis.

“Mysteries of the Worm.”

This was no inorganic chemistry text. It was something entirely different. Something that told you how you could compound aconite and belladonna and draw circles of phosphorescent fire on the floor when the stars were right. Something that spoke of melting tallow candles and blending them with corpse-fat, whispered of the uses to which animal sacrifice might be put.

It spoke of meetings that could be arranged with various parties most people don’t either care to meet or even believe in.

The thick black letters crawled across the pages, and the detestable odor arising from the musty thing formed a background for the nastiness of the text. I won’t say whether or not I believed what I was reading, but I will admit that there was an air, a suggestion about those cold, deliberate directions for traffic with alien evil, which made me shiver with repulsion. Such thoughts have no place in sanity, even as fantasy. And if this is what Gulther had done with the materials, he’d bought himself for $2.39.

“Years of study,” eh? “Experiments.” What was Gulther trying to call up, what did he call up, and what bargain did he make?

The man who could answer these questions sidled out from behind the door. Gone was the Fritz Gulther of the pinstripe suit personality. It was my original Caspar Milquetoast who creased his mouth at me in abject fear. He looked like a man—I had to say it—who was afraid of his own shadow.

The shadow trailed him through the doorway. To my eyes it had grown overnight. Its arms were slightly raised, though Gulther had both hands pressed against his sides. I saw it cross the wall as he walked toward me—and it moved more swiftly than he did.

Make no mistake. I saw the shadow. Since then I’ve talked to wise boys who assure me that under even fluorescence no shadow is cast. They’re wise boys all right, but I saw that shadow.

Gulther saw that book in my hands.

“All right,” he said, simply. “You know. And maybe it’s just as well.”

“Know?”

“Yes. Know that I made a bargain with—someone. I thought I was being smart. He promised me success, and wealth, anything I wanted, on only one condition. Those damned conditions; you always read about them and you always forget, because they sound so foolish! He told me that I’d have only one rival, and that this rival would be a part of myself. It would grow with my success.”

I sat mute. Gulther was wound up for a long time.

“Silly, wasn’t it? Of course I accepted. And then I found out what my rival was—what it would be. This shadow of mine. It’s independent of me, you know that, and it keeps growing! Oh, not in size, but in depth, in intensity. It's becoming—maybe I am crazy but you see it too—more solid. Thicker. As though it had palpable substance.

CREASE-MOUTH wobbled violently, but the words choked on.

"The further I go the more it grows. Last night I took your sedative and it didn't work. Didn't work at all. I sat up in the darkness and watched my shadow."

"In darkness?"

"Yes. It doesn't need light. It really exists, now. Permanently. In the dark it's just a blacker blur. But you can see it. It doesn't sleep, or rest. It just waits."

"And you're afraid of it? Why?"

"I don't know. It doesn't threaten me, or make gestures, or even take any notice of me. Shadows taking notice—sounds crazy, doesn't it? But you see it as I do. You can see it waiting. And that's why I'm afraid. What's it waiting for?"

The shadow crept closer over his shoulder. Eavesdropping.

"I don't need you for a secretary. I need a nurse."

"What you need is a good rest."

"Rest? How can I rest? I just came out of Newsohm's office. He doesn't notice anything—yet. Too stupid, I suppose. The girls in the office look at me when I pass, and I wonder if they see something peculiar. But Newsohm doesn't. He just made me head of research. Completely in charge."

"In five days? Marvelous!"

"Isn't it? Except for our bargain—whenever I succeed, my rival gains power with me. That will make the shadow stronger. How, I don't know. I'm waiting. And I can't find rest."

"I'll find it for you. Just lie down and wait—I'll be back."

I left him hastily—left him sitting at his desk, all alone. Not quite alone. The shadow was there, too.

Before I went I had the funniest temptation. I wanted to run my hand along the wall, through that shadow. And yet I didn't. It was too black, too solid. What if my hand should actually encounter something?

So I just left.

I was back in half an hour. I grabbed Gulther's arm, bared it, plunged the needle home.

"Morphine," I whispered. "You'll sleep now."

He did, resting on the leather sofa. I sat at his side, watching the shadow that didn't sleep.

It stood there towering above him unnaturally. I tried to ignore it, but it was a third party in the room. Once, when I turned my back, it moved. It began to pace up and down. I opened my mouth, trying to hold back a scream.

The phone buzzed. I answered mechanically, my eyes never leaving the black outline on the wail that swayed over Gulther's recumbent form.

"Yes? No—he's not in right now. This is Mr. Gulther's secretary speaking. Your message? Yes, I'll tell him. I certainly will. Thank you."

It had been a woman's voice—a deep, rich voice. Her message was to tell Mr. Gulther she'd changed her mind. She'd be happy to meet him that evening at dinner.

Another conquest for Fritz Gulther!

Conquest—two conquests in a row. That meant conquests for the shadow, too. But how?

I turned to the shadow on the wall, and got a shock. It was lighter! Grayer, thinner, wavering a little!

What was wrong?

I glanced down at Gulther's sleeping face. Then I got another shock. Gulther's face was dark. Not tanned, but dark. Blackish. Sooty. Shadowy.

Then I did scream, a little.

Gulther awoke.

I just pointed to his face and indicated the wall-mirror. He almost fainted.

"It's combining with me," he whispered.

His skin was slate-colored. I turned my bade because I couldn't look at him.

"We must do something," he mumbled. "Fast."

"Perhaps if you were to use—that book again, you could make another bargain."

It was a fantastic idea, but it popped out. I faced Gulther again and saw him smile.

"That's it! If you could get the materials now—you know what I need—go to the drug-store—but hurry up because—"

I shook my head. Gulther was nebulous, shimmery. I saw him through a mist.

Then I heard him yell.

"You damned fool! Look at me. That's my shadow you're staring at!"

I ran out of the room, and in less than ten minutes I was trying to fill a vial with belladonna with fingers that trembled like lumps of jelly.

V

IT MUST have looked like a fool, carryrying that armful of packages through the outer office. Candles, chalk, phosphorus, aconite, belladonna, and—blame it on my hysteria—the dead body of an alley-cat I decoyed behind the store.

Certainly I felt like a fool when Fritz Gulther met me at the door of his sanctum.

"Come on in," he snapped.

Yes, snapped.

It took only a glance to convince me that Gulther was himself again. Whatever the black change that frightened us so had been, he'd shook it off while I was gone.

Once again the trumpet-voice held authority. Once again the sneering smile replaced the apologetic crease in the mouth.

Gulther's skin was white, normal. His movements were brisk and no longer frightened. He didn't need any wild spells—or had he ever, really?

Suddenly I felt as though I'd been a victim of my own imagination. After all, men don't make bargains with demons, they don't change places with their shadows.

The moment Gulther closed the door his words corroborated my mood.

"Well, I've snapped out of it. Foolish nonsense, wasn't it?" He smiled easily. "Guess we won't need that junk after all. Right when you left I began to feel better. Here, sit down and take it easy."

I sat. Gulther rested on the desk nonchalantly swinging his legs.

"All that nervousness, that strain, has disappeared. But before I forget it, I'd like to apologize for telling you that crazy story about sorcery and my obsession. Matter of fact, I'd feel better about the whole thing in the future if you just forget that all this ever happened."

I nodded.

Gulther smiled again.

"That's right. Now we're ready to get down to business. I tell you, it's a real relief to realize the progress we're going to make. I'm head research director already, and if I play my cards right I think I'll be running this place in another three months. Some of the things Newsohm told me today tipped me off. So just play ball with me and we'll go a long way. A long way. And I can promise you one thing—I'll never have any of these crazy spells again."

There was nothing wrong with what Gulther said here. Nothing wrong with any of it. There was nothing wrong with the way Gulther lolled and smiled at me, either.

Then why did I suddenly get that old crawling sensation along my spine?

For a moment I couldn't place it—and then I realized.

Fritz Gulther sat on his desk, before the wall but now he cast no shadow.

No shadow. No shadow at all. A shadow had tried to enter the body of Fritz Gulther when I left. Now there was no shadow.

Where had it gone?

There was only one place for it to go. And if it had gone there, then—where was Fritz Gulther?

He read it in my eyes.

I read it in his swift gesture.

Gulther's hand dipped into his pocket and re-emerged. As it rose, I rose, and sprang across the room.

I gripped the revolver, pressed it back and away, and stared into his convulsed countenance, into his eyes. Behind the glasses, behind the human pupils, there was only a blackness. The cold, grinning blackness of a shadow.

Then he snarled, arms clawing up as he tried to wrest the weapon free, aim it. His body was cold, curiously weightless, but filled with a slithering strength. I felt myself go limp under those icy, scrabbling talons, but as I gazed into those two dark pools of hate that were his eyes, fear and desperation lent me aid.

A single gesture, and I turned the muzzle in. The gun exploded, and Gulther slumped to the floor.

They crowded in then; they stood and stared down, too. We all stood and stared down at the body lying on the floor.

Body? There was Fritz Gulther's shoes, his shirt, his tie, his expensive blue pinstripe suit. The toes of the shoes pointed up, the shirt and tie and suit were creased and filled out to support a body beneath.

But there was no body on the floor. There was only a shadow—a deep, black shadow, encased in Fritz Gulther's clothes.

Nobody said a word for a long minute. Then one of the girls whispered, "Look—it's just a shadow."

I bent down quickly and shook the clothes. As I did so, the shadow seemed to move beneath my fingers, to move and to melt.

In an instant it slithered free from the garments. There was a flash—or a final retinal impression of blackness, and the shadow was gone. The clothing sagged down into an empty, huddled heap on the floor.

I rose and faced them. I couldn’t say it loud, but I could say it gratefully, very gratefully.

“No,” I said. “You’re mistaken. There’s no shadow there. There’s nothing at all—absolutely nothing at all.”

Gather 'Round the Flowing Bowler

Lefty Feep had a great idea: why not get the world's most experienced bowler, the Catskill dwarf, to challenge the champs!

I WAS sitting in my usual seat at Jack's place the other night when I was startled out of it. I literally began to rise and show the shine on my trousers.

"Hey, there!" I called.

A gangling figure paused midway between tables and veered rapidly in the direction of my booth. With a melancholy grin, Mr. Lefty Feep sidled over and extended a dripping hand.

"You been carrying a herring?" I inquired. "Your hand is wet."

"I am all wet," said Lefty Feep. "And I like it."

It was true. Lefty Feep was all wet. For the first time I permitted my gaze to run along the rainbow of his suit. Feep was wearing a box-shoulder Navajo blanket pattern of such blinding hue that at first I thought somebody had spilled spaghetti on him.

But it was not spaghetti that poured from his lapels and cuffs. It was water. Lefty Feep was soaked to the skin.

"Have you been out in the rain?" I ventured.

"You win the $32 question, friend," said Feep. "I am strolling in a storm this last hour. Outside it is mostly moistly."

"But you'll ruin your clothes," I said—as if it were possible to ruin that atrocious costume.

"So I buy another suit," Feep grinned, sitting down. "You will pardon me if I seem to drip."

"I never knew you liked water."

"I am extremely fond of water—for external use only. Why, it is water that brings me my fortune this last year."

"Your fortune?" I echoed. Then I regretted it.

For the last time I'd met Lefty Feep he was introduced to me as the biggest liar in seven states. The story he told then more than qualified him for that honor. It dealt, as I remember, with Mr. Feep's accidental visit to the bowling dwarfs of the Catskill Mountains. Feep claimed to have followed the footsteps of Rip Van Winkle by drinking the dwarf's brew and sleeping twenty years into the future. He explained his return by claiming he'd bribed the dwarfs to send him back—by building for them a regulation bowling alley on the mountain top.[1]

When Feep had unfolded this slightly incredible saga there had been a curious glint in his eye. I saw it now, as I mentioned his fortune.

"Fortune?" he murmured. "Friend, I have adventures in the last annum that, will make your blood run from zero below. I have experiences that will make icebergs out of your corpuscles. Doubtless you wish to catch the details?"

"No," I grated.

"Well, if you insist—" said Lefty Feep.

AT FIRST I think I am lucky last year when I do not run into pneumonia. Then something worse happens to me—I run into Gorilla Gabface.

Gorilla Gabface, I believe I mention before, is quite a lusty shout in the old rackets, and he and I are what you might call unfriendly enemies for many the year. We are always making sociable wagers on such matters as who will win the pennant, or what bank will be held up next, and such matters of sporting interest.

Gorilla hangs out in a pool room night and day, in fact I never know him to leave this cue casino in all his unnatural life. I even state the fact that he would not stick his neck out the door if there was a ten-pound cheese on the sidewalk. And this should be quite a temptation, because he is a rat.

So I am quite naturally confused when I see him this night walking down the old stem. He is bouncing along like a bad check, and almost runs me off the sidewalk.

What crooked parole board lets you out? I naturally inquire.

He blinks at me and sticks out his paw. I do not take it, because there is a ring on my own hand which I value.

“I am on my way to the bowling alleys,” he cracks.

I just stare. “Bowling alleys? I never hear you are a sports-lover.”

Fie gives a laugh. “There is a lot those big floppy ears of yours never hear, Feep. But it may interest you to know that I am now manager and owner of none other than Yank Albino, the world’s champion pin-punisher. Tonight we are holding an exhibition match with Ed Knight, and I am on my way down to take charge of the box office receipts.” He laughs, and several persons look around to see if a hyena is loose. “I am making myself some pin money, you might say.”

What I might say I say under my breath. It grieves me extremely to see this Gorilla muscling in on something like the bowling game, which is a line I am personally fond of. I figure it a nice clean sport, and do not approve of putting vaseline on bowling balls, or plugging up the finger-holes with cork, or otherwise bollixing the works. But if Gorilla Gabface is operating, it will sooner or later be too bad for the bowling game. How he gets hold of a champion like Yank Albino I do not figure out. So I ask him.

“SIMPLE,” he says. “Albino owes me a number of yards on a little bet, so I take over his contract and he will work it out. Right now I am figuring a few neat deals. “You know,” he says, “the bowling game is so clean it hurts me to look at it. Give me a few months with this champion and I will put over so many angles that it will take a cross-eyed accountant ten years to untangle the mess.” And he laughs again, causing several people to run home and hide under their beds.

But I do not say anything, and when he asks me if I want to come along and place my peepers on the exhibition matches, I make with the feet to the bowling alleys and take a seat.

This Yank Albino is indeed a sweet bowler, and when I grab a place in the crowd watching I am soon exhibiting my pleasure by uttering such sounds as “Wow!” and “Atta baby!”

All at once I hear a voice at my side contradicting me in such a manner as “Boo! Take him away! He stinks!” This more than surprises me, particularly since the voice comes out of the mouth of a very pretty ginch. This ginch is just a little thing with long 18-karat hair, but she has a very loud voice, and she keeps up with her “Boo! Throw him out!” even when I stare at her. So naturally I inquire, “Why, ginch, do you make like a censor? Is it the bowling, or do you have a grudge against Yank Albino?”

She gives me a stare and then she starts to bawl. “Boo hoo!” she yammers. “Yank Albino is my fiance. Boo hoo!”

Naturally I do not catch, and tell her so. If Yank Albino is her fiance she should be happy to scramble with such a champion instead of hollering out in public that he is a menace to the nose.

“You do not understand,” she tells me. “I don’t want people to like Yank’s bowling. Because if he becomes unpopular, then maybe his manager will break his contract. I want this to happen, because I know his manager is no better than a thug, and he has got Yank tied up on account of debts and is making some crooked plans for him. I tell Yank this, but he won’t believe me, and he refuses to bowl badly. I don’t know what to do.”

“Leave it to me,” I advise. “I have a few ideas I wish to talk over with Mr. Gabface.”

She gives a little jump. “Oh, you know Yank’s manager, too?” she asks. I wink.

“I know him like a book,” I tell her. “Even better, because I am not acquainted with any books except racing. I think I have me an idea which will make you happy and me money.”

“What is it?” she pipes, cheering up a little and giving me a smile that would go good in advertising love-seats anywhere.

“I think I can find a bowler to beat your Yank Albino,” I say. “In fact I will wager with Gorilla that I find such a character. Then when he beats Yank I will win the bet and Gorilla will get mad and release his contract.”

“You are crazy,” sobs the ginch. “Nobody can beat my Yank.”

I smile.

WHEN I run down to the box office and catch Gorilla Gabface. I tell him what I tell the ginch, or at least part of it—that I am willing to lay a grand on a bowling match against Yank Albino if I can provide another champion.

“Who is he?” asks Gabface. “Albino already beats every bowler in all leagues.”

“My man is called the Masked Marvel,” I tell him.

“You are making a bad bet,” chuckles Goldfarb.

I dig into my pocket. “Here is the alphabet for you—one G that says my Masked Marvel will beat Yank Albino in an exhibition match, any date after April 30th.”

“Why after April 30th?” he asks.

“I got to go get him,” I answer. “He lives outside the city. Way outside.”

“How about May 1st?” says Gabface. “We got a date open.”

“Pretty quick, but it’s ok with me,” I agree.

Gabface takes the money and laughs again. “I still say that no human being can beat Yank Albino,” he gurgles.

I answer, but under my breath. “I didn’t say he would be a human being,” I whisper.

DRUNK and early on the morning of April 30th, I slip out of my pajamas and into a Manhattan. I grab me a flask and make for the car, heading up the Hudson valley and cutting west.

From time to time I take a slug from the flask, because I am looking forward to a tough time.

Pretty soon I am in Catskill country, on my fourth side road and my fifth drink. I am climbing up, and I figure I might as well be as high as the scenery.

The old bus clunks along pretty steady, but I am doing the shivering. Particularly when I get off on the last side road, which is so deserted there aren’t even any hot-dog stands.

I am driving all alone up steep hills covered with trees so they look like a bunch of Smith Brothers’ faces without a shave. To make the resemblance complete, it is so quiet you can hear a cough drop.

Then it isn’t so quiet any more. Far off in the distance there is a low, rumbling sound—like Gorilla Gabface makes after a heavy meal.

I climb higher, it gets darker, and the noise is louder. In spite of myself I begin making like a goose with the flesh. Here I am, all alone in the Catskills, without any weapon but my flask.

By the time I rise over the top of the highest hill, the rumbling is strictly from thunder. A minute later I know I have arrived. Because there is the sign on the rocks at the end of the deserted road.

ANNUAL PICNIC
THE DIMINUTIVE SOCIETY OF THE CATSKILL MOUNTAINS

I am back with the dwarfs I meet last year, and, sure enough, up ahead is the open-air bowling alley I build for them. The rumbling comes from inside, so I park the car and go over.

This takes some time, because my feet want to go the other way. You see, I do not wish to remember my last meeting with these half-pints, when they slip me the old double cross and I wake up twenty years too late for the current World Series.

But I have my scheme to make a thousand government etchings of old George Washington, and I know what I must do.

So I do it. I walk inside.

There on the alleys are about twenty of these extremely small fry that call themselves The Diminutive Society of the Catskill Mountains, although what they really are are dwarfs. Some of them are bowling and the rest are glassing around a beer barrel.

I almost run out again when I see the beer, because it is this stuff that knocks me out for the long count last time. But I take a deep breath and go up to them.

“Hello slobs, what you hear from the mob?” I ask politely.

The whole crew looks up. They have to look up to see me, because they are only three feet tall, and besides most of them have beards growing right into their eyes.

“Why it’s Squire Feep!” cackles the head shorty, who I remember from before. “Back to visit us again!”

THEY get very excited and start dancing around me like I was a Maypole. Some of them are thanking me for the bowling alley, and the head shorty tells me that the new alleys work very good, and that they are using a couple field-mice for pinboys.

“Have a drink,” says the head shorty, holding out a tankard.

But this time I play smart. “Not on your life,” I tell him. “This is the stuff that ripped Van Winkle. Me, I am sticking to my little flask this trip. I just drop in to see how you boys are getting along.”

Well, they do not seem offended, but get back to bowling again, and I take a couple turns at the alley myself.

It is a regulation alley, you understand—I send up a gang to build it myself, because the dwarfs only come out once a year on April 30th, and there is nothing around on other days to make the workmen suspicious. The dwarfs always go in for lawn bowling and ninepins before, but I am glad to see that they understand the new alley very well.

I keep my eye particularly on the head shorty. He is a little guy, like the others, and he has a long white beard that hangs down to his knees, but this does not interfere with his bowling. This personality just runs up one strike after another, even though he stands wrong and his arms are so long I am afraid he bruises his knuckles because they scrape along the alley. But he strikes and drinks and drinks and strikes, and I know I have found what I was looking for.

I sit tight, and after a while the dwarfs get tight. They spend more time around their beer barrel than they do on the alley, and pretty soon I signal the head shorty to come over and sit down with me.

"I wish to ask you a few questions, shrimp," I inform him. So he leaves the beer barrel polka and sits on my lap, confidential like.

"Now, my little Charlie McCarthy, I got a proposition for you. How would you like to make some money?" I say.

He just blinks.

"Big money," I tell him. "A fortune."

"What is money?" he asks.

"Cash. Dollars. Hay. Mazuma Laughing lettuce."

"Squire Feep, you jest."

"I just what?" Then I catch on This midget is so far back in the woods he does not even know what money is. So I explain. Then he shakes his head. His beard bobs around like a dust mop.

"What do I want with money?" he asks. "I do not visit the face of the earth save once a year, on April 30th. And then it is only to bowl and drink, as is our ancient custom."

"That's just the point," I tell him. "You can make a lot of money bowling the way you do. And then you won't have to live in a hole in the ground.

You can live in a swell dump in town. You can visit the Stork Club. Why, you can even go to a barber! A clean shave will make a new man out of you.

“Besides, I never do figure out why you dwarfs are not around except on this one day, April 30th. Can’t you live above ground the rest of the year? Or do you just figure rents are too high?”

“No,” he tells me. “I can live above ground. But it’s so much nicer down below. All that nice dirt to dig and eat.”

“You sound like a columnist,” I tell him. “But seriously now, how about coming back to town and bowling for me? I’ll manage you and we’ll clean up. I’ve arranged a little exhibition match for you tomorrow night. All you got to do is get up and sling a few balls.”

“Tomorrow night? Never!” squeaks Shorty. “I tell you, we of the Catskills must not bowl save on one day alone. If we transgress, dire things transpire.”

“Cut the double talk,” I tell him. “This is your big chance.”

I must refuse, Squire Feep,” Shorty pipes. And he wriggles off my knee.

SO THERE I sit, thinking about my lost G. There is nothing to do but pull out my flask.

I do. And then the idea hits me. Why not? That’s what the head shorty does to me the last time I visit him. Turn about is fair play. I drink his beer and pass out. What if he drinks my whiskey?

No sooner said than drunk. I amble over to the keg. The dwarfs are singing now in voices that would not please Walt Disney, but I do not mind. I just stand there and tug at my flask, making happy faces. And sure enough, pretty soon the head shorty sees me and his eyes begin glowing.

“What are you drinking, Squire Feep?” he asks me.

“Just a little beer of my own,” I tell him. “Have a slug?”

He takes one. Pretty soon his nose begins glowing.

“Methinks it powerful strong,” he tells me.

"Have another."

He does. We sit down in the corner and I let him play spin the bottle.

Meanwhile, outside it is getting dark. The dwarfs begin bowling again, and the rumbling gets louder and louder, drowning out the way my little shorty pal is burping.

Then I see the dwarfs looking over their shoulders at the sunset, and they begin scurrying out of the bowling alley pretty quick. I know they are going back to their caves on the inside of the hill. It is all over.

It is all over with the head shorty, too. Because he is lying under the seat. I cover him with my coat and nobody notices he is missing. The dwarfs say goodnight, and leave.

So I sit there alone in the twilight with the empty flask. It is very quiet now on the mountain. In fact I hear only one sound, like a dive bomber calling its mate.

It is the head dwarf, snoring under my seat.

"Come on," I whisper, carrying him out the door and into the car. "Little man, you'll have a busy day."

IT IS a very busy day indeed, that 1st of May. When the dwarf wakes up in my room about lunch time I can see that he does not want any.

"Where am I?" he groans.

"In my dump, pal," I inform him.

"Why is my beard in my mouth?" he asks.

"There is no beard in your mouth. What you have is merely a slight hangover." I do not tell him that I Mickey Finnish him, but he can guess.

"It is another day!" he squawks, climbing out of the bureau drawer which I park him in for a bed the night before. "Squire Feep, you are a false friend! Now I am stranded on upper earth for a year!"

"Calm down," I advise. "It isn't going to hurt you any. A little fresh air and sunshine will do you good."

"Fresh air!" he squeaks. "Sunshine? Never!" He begins to dance up and down, tearing at his beard. "Take me back to my cave!"

"You've got a bowling match tonight," I tell him. "And there'll be lots of nice beer, too."

"I'm hungry. I want some dirt!" he yells.

"How about some nice scrambled eggs?"

"Fie upon eggs! Bring me some nourishing dirt——I need humus!"

Well what can I do but humor him? So I go downstairs and borrow a vacuum cleaner and let my small feathered friend get at the bag. For dessert he finishes up with a little pocket fuzz I find in my overcoat.

"Fine," he says. "Now, Squire Feep, if you'll take me back to the mountains, I can get along very well for the next 364 days until the Diminutive Society comes out again."

"Not on your life," I remind him. "You're going to bowl tonight. Not only that," I say, pulling out a little black mask, "but you're going to wear this over your puss because you are now the Masked Marvel."

"Never, never, never!" says the dwarf. "My name is Timothy."

"I will call you Tiny Tim for short, then. But you are still the Masked Marvel and you bowl tonight."

This does not please Tiny Tim at all. I am none too pleased myself, because the doorbell rings and I have to answer it.

There is the little blonde ginch who is engaged to Yank Albino.

"Oh Mr. Feep!" she says. "I'm so worried, I had to stop by and see if everything is all set for tonight."

"It is," I tell her. "In fact, I have the Masked Marvel right here with me now."

WHICH is true. Because Tiny Tim sticks his head out from between my knees and stares up at her.

"Is this the Masked Marvel?" asks the blonde ginch, with a little shriek. "Why he's so little and old—"

And then she lets out a real shriek, because Tiny Tim leaps up in the air and begins yanking on her curls.

“Gold!” he yells. “Gold!”

“That’s hair, you dope,” I tell him, pulling him down.

“Then what is that creature?” he asks.

“A ginch.”

“What?”

“A broad, a queen, a babe—a woman.”

“Woman? What is that?”

“I have not time to go into the matter with you now,” I say.

But the blonde giggles. “You mean your little friend has never seen a woman before?” she asks.

“He is a very backward personality,” I explain. “In fact he is a hermit from the Catskill Mountains.”

“You want to eat some dirt?” Tiny Tim asks her.

The blonde giggles again.

“I think he’s cute,” she says. And pats him on the head.

Tiny Tim lets go with a smile. Then he blushes. “I like you. Your hair is gold. I like gold,” he tells her. Then he makes a grab for her finger. “Gold!” he hollers, tugging at her ring.

“Mustn’t touch!” I say, politely bopping him one on the old orange.

“Eccentric, isn’t he?” says the blonde ginch. “I hope he knows how to bowl. He must beat Yank tonight.”

“Will you be there?” asks Tiny Tim. “Certainly,” she says.

Tiny Tim turns to me. “Very well, then. I shall bowl. I shall beat this Yank of yours if you wish me to.”

I wink at the ginch, because this is a big load off my mind.

“Give me a nice dirt supper,” squeals Tiny Tim. “I’ll show you some bowling you’ve never seen in your life!”

It turns out he isn’t kidding.

WHEN we get to the bowling alleys that night, Gorilla Gabface is waiting at the door.

"So there you are, Feep," he greets me. "I do not figure you will even turn up after that foolish bet you make. In fact," he sneers, "I already send word to Yank Albino to start exhibition stunts so the crowd will get something for its money. Which is more than you will get for your money, Feep, because I never see anyone in top form like Yank tonight. He has more strikes than an eight day clock."

"Well here is somebody to fix his clock for him," I announce, and push Tiny Tim out from behind me.

He does not look any too good to me, wearing that old-fashioned pair of square-cut shorts the dwarfs caper around in. More and over, he is standing with his knuckles touching the pavement and his beard hanging down between. There is a lot of caked earth on his beard, too, because he insists on having mud-pies for dessert at supper. Besides, his mask is on crooked, and you can't see his face under the hair.

Gorilla Gabface stares. "What is this, a trained monkey?" he yaps. "I do not realize you make your money with a hand organ before, Feep."

"This is the Masked Marvel," I tell him. "Which you will find out as soon as we get on the alleys. Kindly move your fat figure along, Gorilla—I want that thousand smackers."

We go inside; Tiny Tim, the blonde ginch, and myself. Halfway down the aisle the dwarf nudges me.

"I forgot!" he whispers. "This is not April 30th. I cannot bowl. It is against the Catskill laws."

"Quit stalling," I whisper.

"But I mean it, Squire Feep. Something dreadful happens if we bowl on any other than the permitted day. That's why we only appear on April 30th. On all other days something terrible occurs. For your own sake—" Then the ginch takes over. She gives him the old eye and begins to play with his beard. "You'll do it for me, won't you, Tiny Tim? You must do it."

He turns very red. "Yes, but—"

“Never mind,” I crack. “Get hold of a ball and let fly.”

Meanwhile I got hold of his whiskers and dragged him out there before the crowd of yahoos in the audience.

They begin to laugh the minute they see him. Gorilla is still introducing the Masked Marvel, and when they see this dopey looking dwarf stumble out they let out a howl.

But after that first ball they howl from astonishment.

To make a short story shorter, Tiny Tim knocks down no less than 240 pins in a row, in less than seven minutes.[2]

He keeps four alleys busy—he does not bother with rules—just picks up a ball and hurls it whenever he sees ten pins together. Yank Albino stands there with his mouth open, and so does Gabface, and so does nearly everyone in the crowd. For that matter I am breathing through my tonsils myself.

The crowd howls and the balls rumble, and the dwarf bowls. And then maybe I am cuckoo, but it seems to me the rumbling is getting louder. It is getting louder. It sounds like thunder. It is thunder.

Because something hits me on the tip of the nose just then.

Water.

The thunder gets louder, I look up, and I see an extremely strange thing.

It is raining in the bowling alley!

YES, right there inside under the roof, rain is pouring down from the ceiling. And now the thunder is louder than ever, and I can even see a flicker of lightning.

The crowd sees it too. They set up a murmur, but it is better for them if they set up umbrellas, because in a minute the rain turns into a downpour.

Yank Albino and Gorilla Gabface run around making with amazement. But the dwarf is so excited he does not even notice—just keeps right on tossing balls down the four alleys, one after another. And now, every time he makes a strike there is more thunder, and a big streak of lightning to keep score.

People are screaming and pointing at the ceiling, and the alley is getting wet so that the balls float down. Pretty soon the pins are bobbing around on top of water, and the dwarf's legs are wet to the knees. He is almost doing the Australian crawl every time he lets go with a ball.

Then the old panic comes on and the crowd does a Brooklyn—getting up and screaming and trying to head for the door—and Gabface runs out like he hears they discovered gold in the next room.

"Hey—stop!" I call to the dwarf. Now I realize what he means when he says something dreadful happens if he bowls. Because drowning is dreadful, and that is what we are all liable to do here. The water is rising, and now there is more lightning. But the dwarf does not stop. He can not hear me over the thunder and shouting.

I see I have to yank him off the floor, so I wade down and by this time he is up to his waist and swimming in a pool.

But he manages to hurl one last ball—and that does it.

A streak of lightning bangs down from the roof, all the lights go out, and the side of the bowling alley caves in. It is struck.

I get to the dwarf just as he is going down for the third time.

And that is when the cops get to me.

"WHAT do you mean, disorderly conduct?" says Magistrate Donglepootzer.

We are all lined up in front of him in night court about an hour later—me, the blonde ginch, and Tiny Tim.

The cop that brings us in looks at Magistrate Donglepootzer and shrugs. "These people are the ones I find creating a disturbance in a bowling alley," he says.

"A disturbance? What kind of disturbance?"

"Well, this little runt here is bowling and the wall comes down."

“That sounds pretty serious,” says the Magistrate, frowning. “You mean he knocked the wall down with a bowling ball? Doesn’t look like he has the strength.”

“Not exactly,” says the cop, turning red a little. “He bowls and lightning knocks the wall down.”

“Oh, lightning. Then it turns out that a storm is responsible for the damage, and not this man. So why arrest him?”

“He started the storm, Your Honor,” pipes the cop, kind of embarrassed.

“What kind of talk is this? People don’t start storms, you know. And come to think of it, it isn’t raining at all outside.”

“I know, your Honor. It’s only raining inside this bowling alley.”

Magistrate Donglepootzer stares at the cop for a long time. “Do you mean to stand there and tell me that it is raining inside a bowling alley?” he repeats, in a nasty voice.

“I know it’s hard to believe, Your Honor, but that’s the way it is. I nearly drown trying to arrest these people.”

Donglepootzer stares again. “I wish you would drown!” he groans. “Drown dead! Telling me that it’s storming inside a bowling alley and a wall falls down—and then arresting these innocent bystanders for disorderly conduct!”

“But this guy starts the storm,” protests the cop. “I see it myself. He bowls and it rains.”

Donglepootzer turns red now. “Are you trying to drive me crazy?” he says. “Or have you?”

“Yes, Your Honor,” says the cop.

“Shut up!” yells Donglepootzer. “I can’t stand this. You’re trying to tell me this midget with the moss on his face starts storms in bowling alleys. What about the mask on his face, then? Isn’t he a burglar, too? And I suppose the woman is his gun moll. And that stupid-looking oaf next to her is undoubtedly an accomplice, perhaps an umbrella salesman.”

When he says the part about the stupid-looking oaf he points to me. I resent this, because pointing is not nice.

"Speak up!" he yells at Tiny Tim, all of a sudden. "Maybe you can explain this mad story?"

"It's true, Squire," pipes Tiny Tim. "But I am not responsible. If Squire Feep here hadn't dragged me out of my cave and made me eat dirt all day, I'd still be happy up in the hills with the other dwarfs instead of making thunderstorms in bowling alleys."

DONGLEPOOTZER pulls out a handkerchief and wipes his forehead. Then he talks, in a sort of strangled voice. "That last sentence is perhaps the most remarkable one I shall ever hear," he chokes. "Before I break you," and he points at the cop, "and before I turn all of you maniacs over to the court psychiatrist, I should like you to repeat one statement. Did you or did you not start a thunderstorm in a bowling alley?"

"I did," says Tiny Tim.

Donglepootzer groans. "No, no," he whispers. "I can't believe it. I won't believe it! All of you—come with me."

"Where are you taking us?" asks the blonde ginch.

"Downstairs," says Donglepootzer. "Downstairs. There is a recreation gymnasium here in the station for police officers. I believe it has a bowling alley attached to the premises. You are going to bowl for me, by little friend. I want you to show me exactly what you did before I see a psychiatrist myself."

"You will not enjoy it," says Tiny Tim, pulling at his beard.

And when we get to the alley, Magistrate Donglepootzer does not enjoy it, a small bit.

While the cop watches, he gives Tiny Tim a ball. I act as pinboy. And Tiny Tim lets go.

At first everything is fine. Donglepootzer cannot believe the way he knocks the pins over.

Then I hear a rumbling.

"How about stopping?" I ask.

Donglepootzer shakes his head. “I must see this,” he groans.

I shrug. Tiny Tim bowls. Thunder growls.

Well, what’s the use? All I can state is that ten minutes later Donglepootzer is trying to dog-paddle his way out of the alley when a bolt of lightning uncorks from the ceiling and the police gymnasium roof caves in like an eggshell.

“Help!” yells the blonde ginch.

“Blub-blub,” gurgles the dwarf, going under water.

“Holy Smokes!” bawls the cop.

“Six months for disorderly conduct,” groans Magistrate Donglepootzer.

IT IS lucky for me that Tiny Tim and I end up in the same cell that night.

It is also lucky for me that the dwarf is in good appetite. Otherwise he can never swallow all the dirt he does, to say nothing of about three pounds of cement.

But he manages. It is nearly six a.m. when he finally gets a hole big enough at the bottom of the side of the cell and wriggles out.

He crawls down the hall to the turnkey’s office and manages to sneak the keys off the desk. Then he crawls back.

I unlock the cell and we do a fast and furious powder. This powder does not end until we are in the car and heading out of town.

Before I go, I stop for only one thing. I call up Gorilla Gabface on the phone and get him out of bed.

“About that thousand bucks,” I tell him, “I still claim my Masked Marvel wins and you owe me.”

“I owe you nothing, Feep!” growls Gabface. Then he laughs. “Because the match is called on account of rain!”

I let out a few harsh names, but I can do nothing—except get out of town before the heat is on.

Which I do.

We reach the Catskills that afternoon. I dump Tiny Tim out of the back seat.

“Well, now what?” he asks me.

“Help me with these canned goods,” I tell him. “Bring them inside your private bowling alley here. I need something to eat these next 363 days.”

“You are staying here?” he asks.

Where else? The heat is on in town for me, and you can’t go back to your little pals until next April 30th. We might as well live here together. Then neither one of us gets into trouble. We are all alone here in the alley on top of the mountain, and I hope we stay that way.”

We do.

There is not much worth telling about that year. I am not cut out for the hermit life, being an uptown boy, but after I teach Tiny Tim how to deal a few hands of pinochle, we get along all right. Beside I keep him in bowling practice.

Every once in a while I slip down the mountain into town to catch up with this and that. I find out from the local bladder’s sports section that Gorilla Gabface takes his Yank Albino on a tour all over the country, and is cleaning up.

I just smile, because I figure out a plan. I smile and keep track of the days, and finally the time comes.

One morning I grab Tiny Tim by the beard to wake him up, as usual. Only this time I have a scissors in my other hand. And in two snips the beard is off.

“What is this?” he bawls. “Squire Feep, what are you doing?”

“I am shaving you,” I tell him. “But close. So hold still.”

HE DOES not hold still, but I shave him.

“What is the meaning of this?” he squeaks, feeling his chin.

“It means that you are now Tiny Tim, the Boy Bowler,” I say. “Let me put on this hair dye, now.”

Which I do, holding him down until I finish and he is a little clean-shaven guy with black hair.

"Boy Bowler?" he gasps. "Certainly." I tell him. "You do not think I spend my time this year with you because I love your company. I prefer to be a hermit with somebody like Lana Turner. But I am going to get my money back from this Gorilla Gabface before you go back to the hills for good, and so I figure out this scheme.

"Today is April 27th. We drive to Milwaukee and arrive there on the 29th. I wire ahead and arrange a match between the Boy Bowler and Yank Albino—because the papers tell me he will be playing exhibition games there. And I make another bet with Gorilla, only this time I collect, rain or no rain. Then we fly back here in time for the 30th and you can join your pals, the Catskills Mountain Junior G-Men, or whatever they are."

Tiny Tim listens to this and scratches the place where his beard should be. "Methinks it sounds reasonable," he decides. "But it rains when I bowl."

"Just leave that part to me," I say. "I have it all figured out, this time." Which I have. Only it is not figured out the way I care to tell him about. Because I tell him it is the 27th when I know it is the 28th. So we will arrive in Milwaukee on the 30th and hold the match.

Of course the 30th is the one day a year when it will not rain if the dwarf bowls.

That is not such a hot trick on Tiny Tim, I know—but I need the money and after all I spend a year in hiding. I figure that the next year will be easier on him, now that he knows pinochle. Besides, when I clean up, I will not only buy him a bushel of the best dirt, but also some fancy milorganite.

So we make the drive. A thousand miles between the Catskills and Wisconsin is not too easy, but I am so happy at figuring things out, I do not mind.

In Buffalo I wire ahead to Gorilla Gabface that I find a new champion bowler and want another match with Yank Albino.

"Play it up big," I state. "My boy is only 7 years old and a marvel. But five grand says he beats Yank Albino."

I get an answer waiting for me in Cleveland. It is OK, bet and all.

And so, on April 30th, at 8 o'clock, we pull up in front of the Milwaukee alleys, Tiny Tim and I.

It is a beautiful spring day, and I cannot help but wonder how the dwarfs are enjoying it back in the Catskills. Only I do not speak to Tiny Tim about this, because he will not understand and just get sore.

So far everything is under control. I buy clothes on the way, and now Tiny Tim the Boy Bowler is wearing a little knicker suit and a moppet's hat. He is disguised perfectly, as I shave him again, close.

GORILLA is waiting in the office, and when he sees Tiny Tim he doesn't tumble.

"Feep, you pick up the oddest characters," he chuckles. "First a fugitive from a miniature golf course, and now a school boy. Of course it's tremendous publicity stunt stuff, but why you want to plunk away five grand, I don't know."

"I am making five grand," I tell him.

"And besides, this is no school boy, but a genuine Quiz Kid. Come on, let's get started."

Gabface steps close to me. "Just a minute, Feep," he says. "If there's anything phoney about this kid, you're going to catch plenty. I'll leave you looking like a map of Japan. Because unless Yank Albino makes a good showing tonight, I'm dropping his contract and taking another man. Bowling officials are here to look him over. So just remember—if you cross me you can mark the 29th of April as your unlucky day."

"The what?" I gasp.

"The 29th of April, dope! Today." I go green around the gills. I realize I make a terrible mistake in keeping track of the days back there in the Catskills. I think I am kidding the dwarf about the dates, but I really kid myself. Today is the 29th—and it looks like thunderstorms ahead!

But it is too late to say anything. Because a bald-headed man sticks his head in. “Come on, all set?” he yells. “You should see the crowd out there —boy, we’re packing them in. Bet you a hundred there’s 2,000 people.”

“This is Better O’Brien, the promotor,” Gabface introduces. “Better, meet Lefty Feep and the Boy Bowler.” Tiny Tim keeps plenty quiet. He thinks it’s all right and I have a scheme. He should only know!

“Go on out there, Tim,” I tell him, gulping. “Everything is all set.”

SET is right. The dwarf marches out, with his arms dangling. This Better O’Brien person laughs.

“Some champion you’ve dug up, Feep,” he chuckles. “Hear you put five grand on him to win out tonight. Wish I had a piece of that myself. Why that little kid couldn’t lift a ball, let alone beat Yank Albino. Gorilla has a sure thing betting against you.”

All I do is groan.

“You wouldn’t want to make another wager on him, would you, Feep?” says O’Brien.

I groan again. Because outside in the alleys I hear a rumbling that tells me the match is starting. And the rumbling is getting louder. Like thunder.

“Frankly,” O’Brien keeps up, “I think your man is all wet.”

I groan again and walk into the alleys with O’Brien. What else can I do? I am a drowning man without a straw.

To make a long story short, I guess you know what happens on that Milwaukee alley on the 29th of April. The local bladders tell the story, only I do not save any.

All I can say is that after the storm I pay Gorilla Gabface five grand, he bounces Yank Albino off his contract, Yank Albino makes up with his blonde ginch, and me—me, I’m spending two hours pumping water out of Tiny Tim the dwarf, who nearly drowns.

The alley is flooded, and this time lightning hits the top of the building outside. In the excitement I wade down into the water and shrink a brand new suit.

Then I hop a plane with Tiny Tim and get him back to the Catskills the next day and turn him loose with the other dwarfs. This time I do not stay to bowl, but come right back into town. And so here I am with my fortune.

* * *

LEFTY FEEP finished his story and shook the water from his hair as he looked at me.

I stared back.

“That’s a pretty hard story to swallow,” I commented.

He just grinned.

“Not that I don’t believe you about the dwarf and all,” I told him. “But that other stuff—about making your fortune. I thought you said it stormed in Milwaukee and you had to pay Gabface five thousand dollars. Where does your fortune come in?”

“Didn’t I mention?” asked Feep. “Didn’t I tell why I like rain?”

“You didn’t.”

“Well it is funny such a matter slips my mind. Because it is all very simple. You remember I mention a personality name of Better O’Brien the promoter who talks with me before we go into the alleys?”

“Yes.”

“Well, I make a fortune from Better O’Brien. The idea comes like a flash while we stand there. I know I lose five thousand to Gorilla because of what will happen, so I turn around and bet O’Brien ten thousand. It looks like a sure thing to him and he takes it up.”

“You mean you bet O’Brien ten thousand dollars that your dwarf would win at bowling?” I asked.

“Of course not,” grinned Lefty Feep. “I merely bet him ten thousand dollars that it is going to rain all over his brand new suit in ten minutes.”

THE END

[1] Time Wounds All Heels," April 1942 issue of Fantastic Adventures.—ED.

[2] When Tiny Tim knocked down 240 pins in a row, he achieved the astounding feat of bowling two perfect games in succession. A perfect game is a score of 300, and is the result of twelve strikes in ten frames, or a complete game. Bowling is scored in ten separate frames, by adding the product of the total pins knocked down on three successive balls. Thus, the first frame receives no score until the third ball, whereupon a score of 30 is marked up. When the fourth ball is bowled, the second frame receives an added 30 pins, making the score 60, and so on, till the last frame. Three balls are thrown in the last frame to finish out the 300 total. This scoring only applies when only consecutive strikes are made. A spare is worth two balls, and thus cuts down the score by ten pins.—ED.

The Pied Piper Fights the Gestapo

He was the hottest music man in town. He could really cook with gas! Even the rats came out and danced. But then the Gestapo found Pfeiffer; came to exact their revenge!

WHEN I walked into Jack's Shack I saw Lefty Feep sitting at his usual booth. With the suit he was wearing, it was impossible not to see him. Even a blind man would have found Feep at once—if he couldn't see the suit, its color was so loud he'd hear it.

Feep was waving his arms at Jack as I approached. He turned and gave me a nod of recognition, then continued to place his order.

"Make please with the cheese," he demanded. "But snappy."

"You want some snappy cheese?" Jack inquired.

"I do not care what kind of teeth the cheese is using," Feep asserted. "Just so there is plenty of it. Let it be long and strong. Let it be mean and green. Let it be old with mould. But bring me lots of plenty in a fast hurry."

Jack scribbled his order and shuffled away. Lefty Feep turned and I saw his beady eyes were unstrung.

"Cheese," he whispered reverently. "Limburger with real limbs! Thick brick! I love it. Swiss is bliss. Cheddar is better. Camembert is the nerts!" I stared.

"What's the matter?" I asked. "You sound like a cross between Ogden Nash and Mickey Mouse. Since when did you develop such a passion for cheese?"

"It is not all for me," Feep explained. "I take some of it to a friend of mine."

"Are you hanging around with a bunch of rats?"

Feep shook his head. "I do not see Gorilla Gabface for weeks," he declared.

"Then what in the world—" I began, but didn't finish. For Jack returned, bearing an enormous platter loaded with concentrated nose-torture.

"Ah!" sniffed my companion. "The breeze of cheese! What a stiff whiff!"

The whiff was almost too stiff for me. But Feep inhaled ecstatically.

"It brings memories," he exclaimed.

"It brings suffocation," I corrected.

Feep picked up a hunk of Roquefort and began to nibble eagerly. All over the cafe, patrons were hastily retreating to tables near the open door. Feep smiled as he saw them go.

"We are alone," he grinned. "Maybe now I can tell you the reason I am so partial to this cow-candy."

"Go ahead," I urged. "But your reason must smell better than your cheese. And if there are as many holes in your story as there are in your limburger—"

Feep waved his Parmesan at me indignantly. Then he bent forward.

"Hold your nose," he muttered. "And I will give you a blow by blow description which I guarantee is not to be sneezed at."

* * *

IT all starts two months ago when I suffer an accident one night. It seems I get my fingers stuck around the handle of a slot machine at a very embarrassing moment—in fact it is the moment when a couple of bloodhounds break down the door of the joint. They invite everybody to play cops and robbers with them and take a little ride in the city taxi downstairs.

Which we do. Of course, when the patrol wagon arrives down at night court, I am bailed out at once. I think nothing of it and am just getting ready to go, when a little guy rashes up to me and grabs my hand. I recognize him at once for a personality named Boogie Mann.

"I am so grateful to you," he shouts.

"How can I ever thank you?"

"What did I do?" I ask, lightly, but politely.

"I hear you give your seat in the patrol wagon to an old tomato who is standing there," he says.

"That's right. So what?"

"She is my mother," says Boogie Mann, and tears of gratitude come into his eyes.

"You are a gentleman and a scholar," he tells me. "Giving a seat in the paddy wagon to my dear old mother."

"It is nothing," I assure him. "She looks like she is too high to stand up anyway."

We walk out of the court together, and all the time this Boogie Mann is thanking me I am looking him up and down. You see, I never have much to do with such a personality before, because this article happens to be a swing band fan—what they call a "hep-cat." And I personally have nothing at all to do with swing, not being a hangman. So here and to fore, I steer clear of Boogie Mann and his unusual brand of swing-talk and his dizzy enthusiasm for juke symphonies.

When we get outside, Boogie grabs my shoulder by the padding and hangs on.

"Feep," he says, "I must reward you for what you do tonight. I am going to let you in on a big deal."

"The last time I am let in on a big deal," I answer, "I am holding a full house and the other guy turns up four kings."

"This is terrific," Boogie insists. "I will give you the chance to make a fortune. A fortune. Do you like money?"

Well, this question is easy to answer. I do, and then ask him one.

"What's the angle?" I inquire.

"How would you like to be the agent for the hottest swing musician in the world?" he asks.

"Who is it—Nero and his fiddle?" I crack. But he doesn't bend.

"No, this is the genuine jive," he tells me. "A hep Joe from Buffalo. A walkie-talkie from Milwaukee. Strictly a mutt from Connecticut."

"Who is he, where is he, and how come I get a chance to be ten per center for such a wonder man?"

"THAT is easy," Boogie tells me.

"He is a refugee and nobody discovers him yet. He is playing in a little joint called the Barrel House way down the street, and nobody suspects that he plays the warmest licorice-stick in the world."

"Licorice-stick?"

"Clarinet, of course."

"A refugee, huh?"

"That is right," says Boogie. "The whole band is made up of refugees. Hot Mickey is the leader."

"Hot Mickey?"

"Sure. The outfit bills as Hot Mickey and His Five Finns."

"Do tell."

"They are not Finns, though—most of them are German refugees. But they ride with a solid slide. They groove. They send."

"But can they play?"

"Play?" yells Boogie. "Wait until you hear the way they dig it out of the dugout! The fella on the slush pump is terrific, the guy who handles the gut-bucket can really slap doghouse, and they've got an alligator who really can keep the plumbing humming."

I ask for an explanation, and I find out that Boogie refers to a trombone player, a jerk with a bass viol, and a saxophone snorter.

By this time Boogie is so excited he is dragging me down the street.

"No contract," he yells. "You can get this guy for next to nothing. Take him uptown. I guarantee once you get him in for an audition, any band in the country will offer him half a G a week to start. He's playing for peanuts here—it's the chance of a lifetime! Wait until you see what he does to a crowd. Here we are—just step into the silo."

"What silo?"

"The place where they keep the corn. The dance-hall."

Sure enough. We are standing in front of a little rat-race track called the Barrel House. Before I can make up my mind, he drags me inside.

It is nothing but a made-over barn, with a bar and a lot of tables where the stables used to be. A gang of jitterbugs are shagging all over the floor, and up on the platform sits this Hot Mickey and his refugees. They look like refugees from a bath-tub to me.

In fact I never see such a mangy collection of human beings outside of a Turkish Bath on the day after New Year's Eve. They look like they are dying, and they sound like it, too.

Because they are playing a brand of noise I never hear in all my life, and I once work in a steel foundry for a year. But these cookies are hammering and yammering on horns and trumpets and drums, and they are blasting so loud you would think somebody was building a subway.

BUT the crowd loves it. The place is packed, and everybody is prancing around with their fingers in the air, and sometimes their skirts. I do not need to take a second squint to see that there really are a lot of finks who go for this kind of bazoo.

Boogie drags me over to a table and leers.

"Listen," he chirps, beaming all over. "Come on and listen," he urges, making me take my fingers out of my ears. "Hear that baby pounding the tusks."

"What?"

"Punching ivory," says Boogie.

“Huh?”

“Playing the piano.”

“Oh.”

“Scar me, Daddy, eight to the mar,” he yells, or something like it. “Feep, I want you should pipe that clarinet.”

Me, I do not know a clarinet from a ocarina; in fact, where music is concerned I can not tell a bass from a hole in a piccolo. But I look for the guy who is playing most loud and proud, and I spot who he refers to.

He is a tall, thin drip tooting on a tall, thin horn. He stands up when he plays, and the rest of the band follows. When I try hard I can hear his clarinet honking way up above the other noise, and it has plenty of rhythm.

In fact, the whole crowd hears it, because they do not wish to stop dancing at all. Whenever a number finishes, they clap their pinkies together so hard and long that the band must keep right on playing.

“See?” whispers Boogie. “What did I tell you? He’s a natural. He’s hep to the step.” Boogie jerks his finger at the mob. “Look—even the bartenders have to dance.”

This is a fact. I notice them myself. Also I find my own feet jumping up and down a little. It is really rhythm.

“Pipe that!” grunts Boogie, all of a sudden. He points to the floor. I see a little mouse run out of its hole in the woodwork and scamper up and down in time with the music.

“It takes a real hep-cat to catch mice,” Boogie tells me. “Now come on up to the stand and tell this guy you want to be his agent. Tell him you’ll line up an audition with a big-time band for him. Take it easy, because he is plenty timid and he doesn’t know the score yet, being new in this country.”

So when the number is over and the crowd finally finishes clapping and sits down, we slide over to the stand. First Boogie introduces me to the leader.

“Come on, ick, meet the stick,” he says. “This is Hot Mickey. Mickey, my pal here would like to talk to your clarinet player.”

“Huh,” grunts the fat leader. “Is he safe?”

“Strictly a square from Delaware,” Boogie tells him. He drags me over to the skinny clarinet man. “They’re all nervous about meeting strangers,” he whispers. “Afraid of spies on their trail, or something. These refugees have a pretty tough time getting out of Europe. So take it easy.”

THEN he pushes me up on the platform and grabs the skinny man by the arm.

“Herr Pfeiffer,” he says, “I want you should meet your new agent, Lefty Feep.”

The skinny guy looks up. He has big, deep eyes, with a light in them like burning reefers. It is a very powerful stare, and when we shake hands I find out he has a very powerful grip.

“Agent?” he says. “I do not need an agent. I have here a good job, I am in this fine orchestra playing, so why in the world should I an agent want?”

This double-talk turns out to be a kind of German accent, but I just pass it off and do what Boogie tells me.

“How would you like to earn big money in a real band?” I brace him. “I can get you a job where you’ll be famous overnight.”

Pfeiffer shakes his head very fast.

“I do not wish to famous become,” he says. “I have on my trail enemies, and I do not wish publoosity.” He shakes his long curly hair again.

Then Boogie and I really go to work on him. It takes an hour between dances, but to make a long story, he finally agrees to show up tomorrow, on his night off, for an audition.

So Boogie and I leave, very happy, while he is playing the last number for the evening. When we go out the door, the crowd is making like crazy all over the floor.

“He’s a sensation,” Boogie yells. “Broadway will love him! Think of the radio—movies—ouch!”

The last word comes from him when he nearly trips going out the door. He stumbles over a gang of mice that are waltzing around in the hall.

“We can at least sell him to Walt Disney,” I decide.

BUT it is not Walt Disney I sell Pfeiffer to the next day. Boogie and I go down and arrange an audition with none other than Lou Martini and his Cocktail Cavaliers. They are playing in a big hotel, in what they call the Tiger Room.

Boogie handles all the details. I learn that the way a player auditions is to show up for a regular dance performance and sit in with the rest of the orchestra, to see if his noise fits in with the blasting. And Boogie gives this Lou Martini a terrific buildup about how good Pfeiffer is. From the way he describes his tooting you’d think Pfeiffer was the angel Gabriel instead of a broken-down refugee. But Martini says all right, he’ll give him a chance, let him come around tonight with his clarinet for the dinner dance hour. Only Martini warns us that Pfeiffer better be good, because the Tiger Room only caters to the cream of society, and bad music will make them curdle.

So out we go, very steamed up, and I take Pfeiffer up to my place and tell him the good news. Pfeiffer doesn’t seem any too pleased—in fact, you would think he had a date to be hung in the Tiger Room. Those big eyes of his get misty and he runs his skinny fingers through the mop on his head.

“Ach, this playing I do not like the idea of, Mr. Feep,” he grunts. “My music is safer to play a stable in, but on a dance floor not.”

“You’re terrific,” Boogie tells him. “You know all the numbers Martini uses anyway. Besides, you have your own style, and all you do is hot licks, not score-work.”

“Perhaps the licks too hot will be for this band,” Pfeiffer mourns.

“The crowd will go wild over you,” Boogie promises.

“That is what I am afraid of,” says Pfeiffer. “Besides, there are on my trail now certain men I do not wish to find me.”

“What’s the matter, you owe money on that clarinet?” Boogie asks him.

“Nein. The instrument, I make it myself a long time ago,” Pfeiffer says. “And it is not a clarinet.”

"I wonder about that," Boogie tells him. "It does not resemble an American instrument at all, but it sounds like one."

Pfeiffer smiles.

"I can make it sound like many things," he answers. "But I do not make it sound tonight. Positive!"

Well, I see a great opportunity slipping away, so I stick in my oar.

"You have to play, Pfeiffer," I argue. "It's the chance of a lifetime. A young punk like you ought to have a big future."

"You are wrong," he says. "I am not so young and not so punk, and I have a great past. But if the men on my trail up to me catch, I will have no future left at all."

"How will they know?" I tell him. "All you do is sit in on a few numbers with a big band. Nobody will even notice you."

I'm wrong. I find it out that night.

WE finally argue Pfeiffer into keeping his date, and at eight in the evening we breeze into the Tiger Room and take him up to Lou Martini, who gives him a seat with the band.

Then Boogie and I sit down at a table and order a couple hamburgers while we wait for the dancing to start. I gander around and I am impressed. The Tiger Room is strictly uptown—some of the customers have as many as six chins, and most of the guys are wearing tuxedos nearly as good as the waiters have. There are a lot of old society tomatoes and a whole gang of debutramps. I begin to worry a little about whether this Pfeiffer is as good as we think he is—because from the looks of this mob they don't go for anything but the best. If they dance, they got to have at least St. Vitus leading the orchestra.

And there is skinny Pfeiffer up on the platform with his battered old clarinet, wearing the kind of a suit they put on window dummies when they want to burn them. His big round eyes are rolling, and he looks frightened and nervous. He keeps staring out at the tables like he was afraid of seeing a ghost, or his mother-in-law.

Then I see they are ready to start. Just before Martini goes out to lead the band, he stops over at our table and throws down a sheaf of papers.

“This is our stock contract,” he tells me. “If your man is any good tonight, we’ll sign it.”

Then he blows, and Boogie and I sit there, biting our nails without ketchup when we see Martini raise his stick.

The music begins. Couples get up from all the tables and begin to break down their arches. They jiggle along, and I look at Pfeiffer and see he is playing kind of soft behind the band. So far, so good.

There is another number, and this one is a little on the torrid side, so I know pretty soon Pfeiffer will have a chance to let out some blasts on his kazoo. Sure enough, comes the second chorus and Pfeiffer begins to let go with those high notes. They shriek out plenty loud, and the rest of the band lets him carry the tune. He has to carry it, the way he is mangling same, but everybody seems to like it. The dancers wiggle a little harder, and when it is over they all push their paws together. Pfeiffer is plenty red in the face, but Martini calls for another number and off they go.

This time he must pick out a special, because it is almost all clarinet There are some drums, but what you hear is that awful squeaking. It runs up and down my spine like I have frogs down my neck. But these hepcats are crazy for it. They begin to truck all over the place, and Pfeiffer stands up and blows away.

“Look at that man send!” Boogie shouts.

But I am not looking at that man. I am looking at something else.

WE are sitting at a table near the wall, and I happen to glance down when I see it. There is something crawling out of the woodwork, and I recognize it right away. It is a mouse. A big, black mouse. And behind it is another mouse. And another.

I turn away, not believing my peepers, and then I see something else running between two tables. Grey mice. Three or four of them, scampering out onto the dance floor. I turn to the bandstand and I see a couple more, jitterbugging out from underneath.

"Jumping jive!" yells Boogie. "Look twice at the mice!"

And all at once the floor seems to be full of them. They are running and squeaking between the dancers. Some of the society tomatoes notice them for the first time and begin to let out little squeaks themselves, pointing down at their feet.

Martini turns around to see what the matter is and he is so astonished he nearly drops his stick. Then he waves at Pfeiffer. But Pfeiffer doesn't pay any attention. He is blowing his clarinet, and like Boogie says, he is out of this world. His eyes are shut, his face is red, and all he can do is squeal out that high note of his.

And the mice run out, dozens of them, from all over the place. Some of the men are trying to kick them, and a couple of the jitter girls climb up on chairs and go right on dancing while they scream to take them away. A waiter is crossing the floor, running very fast, and he trips over a brown rat.

Everybody is squawking and running at once. By this time mice are climbing up on the tables and grabbing at food, and I see one fat bozo going crazy with the giggles because a mouse crawls into his tuxedo and tickles him.

Boogie runs up to the bandstand and helps Martini grab the clarinet away from Pfeiffer. Meanwhile I am very interested watching a young tomato at the next table who seems to get a mouse caught in her bustle. She is doing a very torrid rumba even after the music stops.

So the next thing I know is when Martini grabs me by the collar and pushes me out of my chair. He has Pfeiffer's neck in his other hand, and he is sort of kicking Boogie along with his feet in a mild sort of way. Also he is saying things that I do not wish to repeat.

"But what about our contract?" I ask, as he moves us along to the door. "What about our contract?"

“Take a look,” Martini gurgles, between curses.

I look back at the table and all I see is a pile of mice scampering around a few strips of paper. They eat our contract for us! And something tells me Martini is not going to make out another one. In fact he confirms this suspicion when he throws us down the stairs of the Tiger Room.

“Get out and stay out,” he shouts. “You rats will bring a bunch of mice into my place!”

“Aw, shut your trap!” yells Boogie, which is not the right thing to say, because Martini turns very red and throws a small chair after us.

It happens to hit me on the head, so the last words I hear come from Martini when he yells after us:

“I’ll teach you—trying to put the Pied Piper in my orchestra!”

WHEN I come to, I am sitting in the alley, and somebody is pouring water over my noggin as if I was some kind of potted plant. I look up and see Pfeiffer.

“Where is Boogie?” I ask, strictly from confusion.

“I do not know, Herr Feep. He says he wants to make a grab far.”

“Grab far? You mean, a get-away?”

“Yes. Ach, he runs very fast, that Herr Boogie.”

I stand up, and when I do I remember everything. I stare a long stare at this skinny guy with the wild mop of hair, the big bulging eyes, and the funny clarinet.

“What is this Martini yells about you being the Pied Piper?” I get out, finally.

Pfeiffer’s eyes turn down and he does a slow shrug. Then he sighs.

“I might as well confess,” he whispers. “It is true. That is why tonight I do not wish the music to make. Because when I play little mice and rats come out. In the stable where it is dark, the customers do not notice take, but when I play upstairs right away they smell a mouse. It is just what I am afraid of.”

I listen, but all the while I am wrecking my brains to remember what I hear about this Pied Piper. I catch the gossip when I am a brat in school, I guess. Some burg over in Germany gets filled with rats—even before the Nazis arrive. And instead of calling the exterminator, they hire this guy with the pipe to swing out a few tunes. He plays and the rodents follow him and get drowned. Then he comes back and turns in a bill, but the rats are gone and they try to stall him off on a cash settlement. So he plays again and all their moppets run after his music like jitterbugs and dance away forever.

I ask him about this story, and Pfeiffer shakes his head.

"It is a lie," he hollers, waving his arms. "It is a dirty black lie; propaganda. It is true I go to Brunswick, to Hamelin where the rat-plague is. It is bad, that plague. Across the Volga the rats swim, from Asia they come. Brown rats. To Prussia they march, like an army on its stomach traveling. Because they eat everything. Food, merchandise, poultry, flowers, seeds. At buildings they gnaw, at the pipes and walls and the foundations even. Fires they start by gnawing matches. Floods they commence by gnawing dams. In Hamelin there are more rats than people.

"And in Hamelin they hire me the rats to kill. I have my pipe and my music which I learn from traveling in India where they charm serpents. So for the rats a concert I arrange and they follow me to the river and drown dead. This is true.

"But it is a lie that I take away children! It is a lie made up to spoil my business. Now they only mouse-traps use and I am—how you call it?—a bum. It gets so bad I must a job in an orchestra take, playing my pipe like a clarinet. Still the music I make enchants the rats, so I get from many theatres and cafes on my behind thrown out.

"Then come the Nazis, and because of what I do I must from Germany run like a rat myself. What happens after that you know."

PFEIFFER shakes his head. I pat him on the shoulder.

"Why don't you spill this before?" I tell him. "You got a fortune in that pipe of yours and you don't know it! Why you could set yourself up as a rat-remover and put the exterminator companies out of business!"

"Nein. You forget—they are still on my trail, those Nazis, because of what I try to do before I leave. That is why to Pfeiffer I change my name—it is German for Piper. Publoosity would be deadly fatal. The Gestapo wants to take me back. Up to now I sleep in the basement under the Barrel House because I am afraid. Down there the rats and mice protect me. But now I will be caught and they will—how you say so?—bake for me my goose."

"Nuts to that," I console him. "We get no Gestapo over here. The government cleans out fifth columnists. You got nothing to worry about. Just put that in your pipe and play it."

Pfeiffer smiles a little.

"You are kind, Herr Feep."

"Come home with me," I tell him. "I'll figure an angle for you. A guy with your talent—a regular rat Stowkowski—you won't have any trouble."

We start off down the side street. I am still talking to Pfeiffer and I pay no attention to the car that pulls up alongside the curb just ahead. The street is deserted anyway, so I just give Pfeiffer the old juice.

"I got a million ideas for you," I am saying. "Maybe not playing in a swing band, but other places. Hold it—I've got it—I see the light!"

But it is not the light I see.

It is the dark. Because when I say this I suddenly feel something hard smack me across the back of the head. A big hand reaches out and grabs me, and just as I turn around, I get it in the hat-rack again, and everything goes blankety-blank. For the second time that night I am down and out.

And when I wake up I am higher than ever in my life. Twenty thousand feet, to be exact.

I am in a plane, and so is Pfeiffer. We are lying on the seat of the rear compartment, and in the seat ahead a pilot is giving out with the old push and pull.

I sit up, and that is all I can do. Because Pfeiffer and I have our hands and legs tied together in Boy Scout knots.

Only one look at our pilot tells me he is very far from being a Boy Scout. He is a big side of meat with shoulders like a wrestler, and his head is shaved, even though his face isn't. He is wearing a pilot's outfit, but there is a little round badge in his sleeve. Pfeiffer looks at it and shudders.

"Ach!" he whispers. "Gestapo!"

SURE enough, I spot the swastika. I give Pfeiffer a nudge.

"What's happened?" I ask.

"Just what I am afraid of. They catch up to me, as I know they will. They drag us into the car and take us to some place where this plane in a secret hangar is kept. Now they fly us back to Germany."

I raise my head.

"But feel how cold it is. We're heading north. And look down there—we're over land, not water."

Pfeiffer shakes his head.

"We are probably to Canada going first. To another secret hangar. We make the trip in instalments, and I am worried only about the last payment."

The pilot never looks around. It is getting very frigid in the plane, and steam comes out of our yaps when Pfeiffer and I whisper. I squirm closer to him.

"I don't get this," I remark. "Just what is it you do in Germany that makes the Gestapo so hot to catch you?"

"I may as well tell you now," Pfeiffer decides. "I play for the rats."

"So what?"

"You do not understand. I play for the rats over the underground—the secret radio broadcasts against the Nazis. Music I make for them to come out, music I make for them to appear in every city. So they will jaundice bring, and typhus, and the plague. There is a rat for every man, you know—a population of millions. And I play oh so sweetly for the rats, to make them happy, to make them hungry. I play music that is with appetite filled, so they will eat. They will eat under buildings and bite away the foundations. They will destroy docks and warehouses and railroad bridges. They will make sabotage and the machinery up-geshcrew."

"I get it."

"So do the Gestapo. Every night I play, hidden away, over the wireless. And every night they hunt for me and my broadcasting set. Because the rats and mice come out and eat. Finally—how you say it?—the heat is upon me. I must smuggle myself from the country out. And now, even here, they have orders to find me and bring me back. So now they do. Achoo!"

This last remark is a loud sneeze. It is very cold, and Pfeiffer is shivering. So am I, but not from cold. I merely have to look at the bullet-headed pilot to start shivering.

"You really can get the rats to go on a rampage with your music?" I whisper.

"That is so. Music has charms—achoo!"

I SIT there thinking about the screwy pickle I am in, but not for long. Because the pickle develops warts very soon. We start going down. The plane noses over and I look out and see us rushing down into blackness. No lights, no nothing.

At first I think we are cracking up, but the pilot is still sitting very calm. Then all at once I see a flare shoot out, and it hangs in the air while we land.

We taxi along some dirt almost into a clump of trees, and I look around. All I can see outside is woods, and some patches of snow.

"Canada, all right," I whisper to Pfeiffer, while the pilots gets out. "Must be another hideaway."

This turns out to be a good guess. Because the pilot comes around to the rear door, opens it up, and cuts our feet loose. For the first time I get a full look at his bearded puss, and it is a face that only Karloff's mother could love.

"Raus!" he says, kindly dragging Pfeiffer and me out by the neck. "To the cabin—march!"

And he pulls us along the ground toward a little cabin standing there all alone in the wilderness. The door is open and we go inside, Pfeiffer sneezing his way ahead of me.

Now I do not like the buzzard with the beard, but I will take him for a cellmate any time instead of the personality waiting for us inside the cabin.

He is sitting at a little table, and when we come marching in, he waves us to a seat with a smile and a big black Luger.

He is an old character, but his age does not make him any more harmless than a lot of other old things, such as tigers. He has a big beak of a nose which he points at us like he does the Luger, and behind the schnozz are two red eyes that go through me and come out of the back of my head.

"So," he says to the beard. "You bring guests, hein?"

"Ja," snaps the beard, lifting a hand like he wanted to leave the room. "Heil Hitler." And he stands at attention.

"Good, good. This is Pfeiffer. And the other garbage?"

I do-not know who he is referring to, but I can guess. What he calls me is appropriate, because I look like I am down in the dumps.

The beard starts to wag.

"I wish to report that I make contact with the man Pfeiffer and his companion tonight at 9 o'clock, in the sedan. No trouble picking them up. I bring them with me to the plane and here we are."

"Good, good." The beak is smiling. "Go outside to the tanks and refuel at once. You must leave immediately and deliver our guests to the proper authorities."

The beard smiles and heils, then ducks out to refuel the plane. Meanwhile the beak gives us the old eye.

"SIT down," he says, gesturing with the gun in way that is too careless to suit me. "You seem cold, Pfeiffer?"

Pfeiffer is sniffling and shivering again.

"Yes," he whispers.

The beak smiles. "Too bad you are so cold, but it will not be for long. Soon your journey will be over, and then I am sure they will make it hot enough for you."

This does not strike either me or Pfeiffer as so funny.

But the beak laughs.

"Yes, they are waiting anxiously for you, Pfeiffer. The Pied Piper is quite a catch, even for the Gestapo. It is well worth the risk we are taking to maintain a plane service when we can handle such passengers as yourself." He grins very wide. "You are going for a ride."

"Achoo!" says Pfeiffer.

"Gesundheit," says the beak, very polite.

I study the situation. There is nothing in the old cabin but the table, some chairs, and a couple bunks. Nothing to throw or hide behind. And the beak has a Luger. In a couple minutes we will be back on the plane, headed for Germany. I wish very sincerely to get my hands on that gun—but my hands are tied. I begin to feel a trifle depressed.

And Pfeiffer just sits there and sneezes. He has a terrific cold.

The beak notices it. "It is too bad I cannot light a fire," he remarks. "But sparks fly up from a chimney, and this is Canada. One must be very careful, you understand."

Pfeiffer shakes his head. And then a kind of gleam comes into his eye.

"Perhaps I can make myself warm," he suggests. "If you do not mind, I will my pipe play the time to pass."

The beak chuckles.

"A serenade? Wonderschon! It is not every man who can hear the Pied Piper play."

Pfeiffer reaches into his coat with his bound hands. And the beak's Luger follows every move, in case Pfeiffer springs a gat or something. But nothing comes out except the clarinet from inside the overcoat pocket. It is pretty well dented, but Pfeiffer puts it up to his lips and lets out a blat. The squeaking starts.

The beak doesn't care. Out here in the wilderness there is nobody to hear. So Pfeiffer begins to dig in. He smiles a little and wrestles with the cold pipe. It doesn't seem to work right, somehow. The cold air makes the notes lower. And Pfeiffer's cold does something to his breathing, so that the tones are all screwy. They carry a long wail, a sort of echo from far away.

SOMEHOW it is all kind of impressive—Pfeiffer sitting there tied up in this cabin in the woods at night, with a guy pointing a gun at his head—playing like one of those statues of Pan, or whatever they call him. His long fingers tug at the pipe and his lips pucker up, and the big squeals run up and down the air.

Then the door opens and the beard comes in. He has finished refueling and he is ready. He sits down for a minute when he hears Pfeiffer tooting away. He tries to get the beak's attention, but the beak is watching Pfeiffer.

And then I hear it. Far away. That rustling noise. That padding sound. It seems to be coming nearer, getting louder. More like a clumping noise. It sort of moves in rhythm to the piping. I look around, quick, but I don't see anything.

From the look in Pfeiffer's eyes, I know he hears it too. And all at once he pulls out the stops and gets loud on the clarinet. He rides to town. And over it comes the running sound, nearer and nearer.

Then the beak gets it too. He stands up all at once.

"Stop that!" he yells. But it is too late. All of a sudden there is a cracking sound, the walls of the cabin start to bend in, and the side of the door breaks down with a crash.

Pfeiffer's tune blares out louder, and there is a hell-splitting bang. The table spins into the comer.

"Himmel!" gasps the beak, turning around to face the door.

This is my chance. I throw myself across the room and grab the gun out of his hands. The beard falls down when the door topples over on him.

“Come on, Pfeiffer!” I advise him. For a minute or two there is nothing but confusion when the cabin is filled with what Pfeiffer calls on his pipes.

Then we are running down the trail, keeping the gun in the beak’s ribs, and climbing in the plane. In three minutes we are off, making the beak pilot the ship.

* * *

“SO there is not much more to tell.

When we return, we hand the beak over to the FBI, along with the plane. They get all the details on this Gestapo ring from the beak, and that is that.

“Naturally, Pfeiffer is a hero. I guess he will be doing sound effects for Walt Disney pretty soon. But right now he is working with the Coordinator of Information’s office. You know, the babies that broadcast short-wave radio to the Axis.

“He is doing just what he does back in Germany—playing request numbers for the mice over there. He is trying to get the mice to revolt by using his pipe over the radio. Maybe he can get a bunch of them to tunnel under Berchtesgaden and kill Hitler. Perhaps the mice will get that rat.

“So that is why I come in here and order all this cheese. I take some down to the headquarters where the Pied Piper makes his broadcasts from, and feed it to the mice and rats that sneak into the studio when he starts to play.

“It is better to feed them than bump them off, because they do us such a good turn.”

Lefty Feep sat back and folded his hands.

“Does this answer your questions?” he asked.

I stared him straight in the eye. “Listen, Feep. When you started this wild story of yours, I warned you. About holes in the story, wasn’t it? And there is something you haven't managed to explain. Thought you'd get away with it—but I've caught you."

"To what do you refer, pal?" asked Feep, pleasantly.

"To that little matter of Pfeiffer playing in the cabin. You said he did something which caused an awful commotion; started some kind of row that you took advantage of in overpowering the Gestapo men and escaping."

"Of course," Feep answered me. "I can set you straight on that."

"Just a minute." I raised my hand. "I think I know what you're going to tell me. You're going to tell me that Pfeiffer played his pipe and a lot of mice started to tunnel under the cabin and eat away the foundations so that the door fell in. And I tell you right now, I won't believe it!"

"You don't have to believe it," Feep grinned. "This is not what happens. Pfeiffer has such an idea when he starts to play, but it is lucky for us that he also has a bad cold."

"What's that got to do with breaking the door down?" I snapped.

"I tell you before Pfeiffer has a bad cold and it makes his music sound different."

"I know that," I replied. "And I also know that you won't find mice running around in the wilds of Canada."

"Sure," Feep agreed. "It is not mice that break down the cabin door. Pfeiffer plays music for a mouse to come, but his cold causes a slight mistake. And he does not get a mouse."

"What does he get to break the door down?"

"A moose," said Feep, grinning.

The Weird Doom of Floyd Scrilch

Lefty Feep really ran into something when he met the “average man” the advertisements are always aiming at! He was too average!

I HAD almost finished with my meal over at Jack’s Shack. In fact, I was half-way between my last cup of coffee and my first bicarbonate of soda. Shaking the gravy off my newspaper, I unfolded it and began to read.

Suddenly a hand descended and brushed the pages aside. I looked up into the startled face of Lefty Feep. His wildly rolling eyes were staring at the discarded paper with a look of intense loathing.

“Remove it away,” he grated. “Grab loose from that!”

I raised my eyebrows as he lowered his hips into a seat.

“What’s the matter, Feep?” I asked. “Does the sight of the news upset you so much?”

“News?” echoed the eccentric Mr. Feep. “It is not the news which upsets me at all. It is the advertisements that drain the rosy color from my handsome face. I can not bear to look at them.”

For the first time I foresaw that I was going to get into an argument with my friend.

“So you’re just another highbrow, eh?” I said. “Just another one of those know-it-alls who run around pointing their fingers at the advertising business. Don’t you realize what advertising has done for this country? How it has revolutionized business, brought new products and better products forward to the average consumer, given ethics to commerce? Advertising today is more than a profession—it's an art, and a science. The American public owes a debt of gratitude to advertising for—"

"Yeow!" yelled Lefty Feep, quite suddenly. His hands covered his ears as he rocked back and forth in his seat. In a moment he regained composure and leaned forward.

"Please," he whispered. "Pretty please, with ketchup on it. Do not mention that word to me. It gives my dimples goose-pimples."

"Why?" I asked. "What harm has ad—all right, what harm has commercial display ever done to you?"

"Not a bit," Feep answered. "It is not because of myself that I ache and shake. I am merely thinking of what advertising does to poor Floyd Scrilch."

"Floyd Scrilch?"

"Perhaps I better tell you about Floyd Scrilch from the beginning," said Lefty Feep. "It will teach you a lesson."

"I'm sorry, Feep," I said. "But I've got to be going. Heavy date. Some other time, perhaps?"

"Well," Feep shrugged. "If you insist."

He pulled me back into my seat and held me there firmly. Then, plunging his elbows into the butter plates, he began.

* * *

WHEN I first meet up with this Floyd Scrilch, I do not pay any great attention to him. He is that kind of personality. A nobody from nowhere. Strictly a dud. When he walks into a room it is just like somebody else walks out. You don't even know he's there even after you look at him. His face is as empty as a Jap's promise. He never opens his mouth between meals. He is so shy he never looks in the mirror when he shaves. He is what the psychologists call an introtwerp, if you follow me.

He hangs out around the poolroom, and also around the elbows. His clothes are a model of what the well-dressed scarecrow doesn't wear. Also he is very puny. In fact, he is so thin that when he has a toothpick in his mouth it looks like he is hiding behind a tree. One glance at him and you know he cannot lick his weight in wild flowers. In fact, one day I am standing in the pool parlor when he weighs himself and I see he only tips the scales at 84 pounds. Not stripped, either, because the poolroom is crowded.

That is the first time I have anything to do with Floyd Scrilch. He notices I am watching him, and he turns around and hands me a sick smile.

“I do not seem to be so healthy,” he gets out.

“At least you won’t be taken by the draft,” I console him.

“I always get pneumonia from drafts anyway,” he sighs.

“Why don’t you visit a croaker?” I inquire.

“A what?”

“An undertaker’s understudy. A pulse-promoter. A doctor.”

He shakes his head.

“No use,” he tells me. “All the doctors give me up for dead long ago. The last medico who examines me says my lungs look like a couple of tea-bags and my heart only beats to mark the hour.”

I feel sorry for this weak but meek little guy, and I want to pat him on the shoulder, only I am afraid he will collapse.

But Gorilla Gabface does not share my sentiments. He is watching this Floyd Scrilch hang around his pool-room for the last week, and just now he waddles over to where Scrilch is standing and grabs him by the collar, which rips.

“Listen, jerk,” says Gabface. “You got a job?”

Scrilch shakes his head.

“No,” he mumbles. “Nobody will hire me.”

“You got any money?” Gabface sneers, shaking Scrilch up and down like a dice-box until his teeth roll sevens.

“No money,” Scrilch chatters.

Gabface grunts.

“That is the way I figure it, too,” he says. “And I do not wish for my poolroom to become a Rescue Mission. So I fear I shall invite you to get the blazes out of here.”

GABFACE sort of emphasizes his remarks by picking Scrilch off the floor and tossing him through the door. He lands someplace out on the curb, and when I run out to see what happens he is still bouncing. I catch him on the third bounce and pick him up again.

“That is a mean thing to do,” I console him. “Gorilla Gabface is no better than a skunk in wolf’s clothing.

If I am you I go back in and give him a good beating.”

Scrilch sighs.

“I can not beat up an eggnog, let alone a big ape like that,” he tells me. “But I only wish I can peel his orange for him some day. Only it is no use, I guess. I am just a rundown weakling. Nobody ever worries about me. I got no friends, no girl, no job. I just as soon go home and put my head in the oven, only the gas company turns it off on me.”

Then I get an idea. I have a newspaper in my hand, fanning Scrilch with it to bring him around, and I happen to glance at the page. And I see the advertisement.

It is a big muscle-building ad. I grab Scrilch by the hair.

“Listen to this!” I holler.

“Nuts!” says Joe Stronghorse in the ad. “In seven days you can have a body like mine l

“You wouldn’t think to look at me that I am just a 92-pound weakling? Yet I have no muscles painted on. I am just a nobody, but my body is as good as anybody’s. You can possess the same muscular strength.

“Let me tell you how you can add three inches to your biceps, eight inches to your calves, sixteen inches to your chest—or bust!

“No complicated exercises! No harsh laxatives! Earn big easy money at home growing hair on your chest in your spare time!

“Send for my exercise system today! A free tiger-skin included with every order! I will build you a powerful body in three weeks, or your muscles refunded. This course guarantees a powerful physique. It will even make your breath stronger!”

Anyhow, it reads something like that. And when I spill this to Floyd Scrilch his eyes light up. He looks at the picture of Joe Stronghorse and a grin spills down his chin.

“Say,” he whispers. “Do you think it will work for me?”

“All you got to do is tear out this coupon,” I tell him.

“I’ll do it!” he shouts. “Yes sir, I’ll do it!”

Then his face falls. “Can I ask you one favor, Mr. Feep?” he gulps.

“Sure. What is it?”

“Will you please tear out the coupon for me? I’m too weak to do it myself.”

SO that is how Floyd Scrilch answers his first advertisement. I forget about him in a couple of weeks, because I do not see him at the poolroom any more.

I am playing a little game on the first table one afternoon about a month later when an elephant flies over my head.

I do not notice this at first, but then I hear the elephant trumpeting, so I look up and see that it is none other than Gorilla Gabface. He is flying through the air and traveling very fast. He does not even stop to go out the door, but plows right through the plate glass window. Then he sits down very carefully on the sidewalk and pulls splinters out of his ears.

I turn around to the back and duck very quick, because two other personalities are doing a nonstop flight my way. They land up against the wall and pause for a nap.

And I hear a big booming voice say,

“Any other goon want a trip to the moon?”

The rest of the mob just stands there very quiet indeed while a broad-shouldered little guy walks out from between them. I take a good look and then another. Because I recognize none other than Floyd Scrilch.

But he is plenty changed. He has big arms and a broad chest, and looks like he weighs 170 in muscles alone. He walks over to me and yells,

"Hello, Feep—glad to see you! Put 'er there."

"Ouch!" I remark, shaking hands. He has a grip like a politician.

"I want to thank you for what you do for me," he says. "Ever since I mail that coupon, I feel like a new man. Once I get those lessons they do wonders for me. A month ago, if I want to tear a telephone book in half, I have to do it one page at a time. Today I can tear a telephone booth in half."

He slaps me on the back and I cave in.

"Now I settle with this Gorilla person, I feel like celebrating. How about coming along with me for a little drink?"

"O.K.," I tell him. "But aren't you hard up for money?"

He laughs.

"Not since I answer the advertisement," he tells me.

"The muscle ad?"

"No. The other one. About entering the big $5000 prize contest. I enter it and win."

SURE enough, when we get outside I notice Floyd Scrilch is wearing a new English burlap drape suit, and he leads me over to a big car with actual new tires on it.

We go over to Daddy's Tavern, where you always find about eight to the bar, and have a drink on Scrilch's new success.

"It is a funny thing," he tells me. "Ever since you point out that ad to me, I study advertisements and answer them. And every ad I answer works out for me."

"How do you mean?"

"Well, take like this ad about raising a truck garden at home. My neighbors send for some seeds a long time ago and try. it out, and they tell me nothing comes up. Me, I send in just ten days ago and already my garden is full of carrots and tomatoes and peas and radishes and such articles. It is like magic.

"Then, just for fun, I send in for another ad which tells about getting rid of unsightly pores. And now look at me. Go ahead, look at my face."

I stare at him real close. Sure enough, there is not a pore on his face. The skin is closed up tight all over.

"You see?" he tells me. "I got no more pores than an empty bottle. I got a hunch I am going places with these advertisements. For some reason they just work out right for me."

I have to leave just then, because I have a heavy freight date. And when I duck out, I do not see Floyd Scrilch again for weeks.

This is because I am all the time riding these heavy freight dates. I happen to be mixed up with a torrid tomato. I call her Pearl, because her old man is a bad oyster.

I am not a personality who usually makes like a wolf after the little red riding hoods, but this dame has me dizzier than a Joe Louis left. I am almost on the point of hanging a ring on her finger, even if it means she will then be leading me by a ring through my nose. We do the old dine and dance routine every night, and she has old Lefty Feep's name down in the number I spot on her hit parade. We are closer together than the Gold Dust Twins—and prettier, too.

SO WHEN she calls up one night and asks me to take her out, I give her the nod, quick.

"Will you take me down to the Sunset Roof?" she asks. "I hear there is a new piano player there that can really barrelhouse the boogie in a lowdown doggy way."

She is just crazy for music and culture like this, see?

Well, the Sunset Roof is very high in its class and also in its price, but who am I to refuse Pearl anything her little ticker desires?

So I tell her sure, and pick her up after dinner, and take her down to the Sunset Roof. I bring her a lovely orchard to wear on her dress, and I hire a taxi, and I pay the stiff cover charge without a squawk, and I give her the old routine, so by the time we sit down at the table she is practically in my lap. She is giving me the gaze—you know, the old "we-can-buy-our-furniture-on-the-instalment-plan" look, and I am going for it three ways. Hook, line, and sinker.

Then the floor show starts, and the slush melts all of a sudden. Because that piano player she is so crazy to hear wheels out his infant grand and begins to polish ivory.

"Listen to that man play!" squeals Pearl. So I listen. He is really a gee with the keys, and everybody is quiet while he meddles the pedals under a blue light all alone.

When he chalks up his numbers, there is a lot of palm-pounding, and the lights go on, and Pearl yaps.

"Isn't he just like Eddy Duchin?" So I take a squint at the face and shake my head fast.

Because this piano player is not like Eddy Duchin. He is not like Rachmaninoff either. But he is exactly like my old friend Floyd Scrilch!

In fact, he is Floyd Scrilch, in a tuxedo. He spots me when he is coming off the floor, and runs over.

"Well, it is Lefty Feep!" he gurgles. "And with a charming companion." He bows like a movie extra.

So I make with the introductions and he drapes his creases in a chair at our table.

I can not resist asking him the natural question, which I do.

"What are you doing here?" I get out. "Since when do you manicure a keyboard?"

He turns and gives me a big smile.

“A month ago I am ignorant of music,” he admits. “The only notes I can read are the ones I get from my creditors. I think a sharp is a card player and a fiat is some place you live in. Then I pick up this magazine and read the ad. They Laugh When I Sit Down At the Piano. It tells how you can learn to play in ten easy lessons, or five hard ones. So I mail the coupon, get my lessons, and right away I am so good I figure I can get a job. So I come up here and they hire me. It is sensational, no?”

HE TALKS to me, but he looks at Pearl. She giggles.

“Why, Mr. Scrilch, you must be a virtuoso.”

“Never mind my private life,” he tells her, with an enchanting leer. “And why be so formal? Just call me Floydie.” His eyes light up like payoff numbers on a pinball machine.

“You just answer the ad and you get what you want, huh?” I ask.

But Floyd Scrilch is not paying any attention to me. He is too busy casting the old goo-goo glance at Pearl.

“What?” he mumbles.

“I say what you got in your hand?” I inquire.

“Why, Pearl’s arm,” he tells me. And he has. “Pearl,” he whispers. “A lovely name. Pearl, you are too good to cast yourself before swine.”

This sounds like a dirty crack of some kind, but Pearl just giggles and wiggles, and I see the handwriting on the wall. Also on the check.

“Shall we waddle out of here?” I ask her.

“No, I want to stay. Floydie here says we’re going to have lots of fun,” she simpers.

So that is the way it is. Floyd Scrilch sits there in his tuxedo, with his big broad shoulders waving and his hair slicked down, handling my tomato like she comes from his own vine.

I get up to go. I should be sore, but for some reason I am more interested in how he does it. In fact, I have a little suspicion when I see his hair. I can not resist bending down and whispering to him before I exit.

"Tell me the truth, Scrilch," I mutter. "Do you also answer one of these ads which tell you to buy hair tonic that makes you irresistible to women?"

He grins.

"You guess it, Feep," he admits. "I just mail the coupon and in comes the stuff to put on my hair, and now wherever my hair goes, women get in it."

I shrug and sneak off. I make up my mind right then and there to forget Pearl and this guy Scrilch.

But this is not so easy to do. Because how can you forget a guy with hair three feet long?

THAT is the way Floyd Scrilch's hair is when I bump into him on the street a few weeks later.

He is running down the block wearing a purple nightgown, and a big shock of long bushy air is tangled all over his dome.

In fact, he bumps into me and I get a mouthful of the stuff. I chew a while and then let go and Scrilch recognizes me.

"Don't tell me," I say. "You figure you have falling hair so you send in for a hair restorer and this is what happens."

"Right," he says. "It almost worries me, the way these ads come true. I begin to think they overdo things for me a little."

"But why the purple nightgown?" I ask.

"That is no nightgown," he comes back. "That is a smock."

"Smock?"

"Sure. All artists wear smocks."

"Since when are you artistic?"

"Since I get this long hair. It gives me the idea. All guys with long hair are artists. So I happen to be looking through a magazine and I see this ad.

"Be an Artist!" it says. And there is a picture of an animal down below it. Get Out Your Easel and Draw This Weasel, it states. And it says that the guy who draws the best weasel gets a free art course from this school, by mail. Now me, I think a palette is something you have in your mouth, and a brush is something you have with the law. But I draw, and I win the course, and every lesson works out. In fact I am way ahead of the lessons. I get some oil paints and start to work three weeks ago. I quit my job at the Sunset Roof and take up painting in a big way.

“Last week I have about twenty paintings done. And the big art critic, Vincent van Gouge, happens to drop into my place and—”

“Wait a minute,” I cut in. “Since when do guys like art critics come to see you? You are not so popular as that.”

Scrilch smiles.

“I am since I answer that ad about Be the Life of the Party,” he tells me. “I win friends and influence people all over the place. So they are always running around to see me. Anyway, this van Gouge drops in, takes one look at my paintings, and tells me I got to have an opening.”

“You tell me he is an art critic,” I object. “So why does he give you advice like a doctor?”

“You don’t understand. He means an opening—an exhibition of my paintings. In fact he gets up some sponsors, and today I have twenty paintings hanging down in the art gallery up the street. So I put on my smock and go down there now to the big reception. I am going to be famous. I answer the right ads.”

By this time I am a little dizzy. In fact I am so dizzy I decide to go down to the art gallery with Scrilch and see what this is all about.

ON THE way down I ask him about Pearl. He does not even remember her name.

“I am so popular,” he babbles. “Like the ads say, I have friends and invitations galore.”

I just groan.

When we get to the art gallery I groan again. Because I see Scrilch’s paintings.

There are twenty of them, all right, and they look like two sets of ten nights in a barroom. Never in my life do I see such screwy drawings, and I am a fellow who goes in a lot of phone booths.

But there is a big gang of society people walking around and making bleats over the things. Mainly they stand around a big painting at the end. It is a study of two goldfish with skis on, waiting for a street car at the North Pole during a thunder shower. Anyhow, that is the way it looks to me. But not to the society crowd. “Look!” yaps one old babe. “It reminds me of Picasso in his blue period.”

“Blue, lady?” I tell her. “He must be ready for suicide.”

The old babe sniffs and trucks away from there.

I turn to Scrilch.

“What kind of stuff is this?” I ask. I point to another picture. “How about that one? It looks like a kangaroo walking a tightrope over a garbage dump with Mayor La Guardia in its pouch reading a newspaper.”

“You do not understand,” Scrilch shrugs. “This is all surrealism.”

“You and your sewer realism,” I sniff. “If you ask me, the only things you can draw is your pay and your breath.”

Scrilch puts his finger to his lips. “Not so loud,” he tells me. “Lots of important people here. They’re all very much impressed.”

“Depressed, if you ask me,” I come back.

“I am sorry you don’t like it,” he tells me. But perhaps you will like my writing better.”

“Writing?”

“Why of course. I am writing the Great American Novel. I answer an ad just this week. Shake a Leg and Be Another Shakespeare! Just Clip This Coupon And Learn To Write! So I am only on my third lesson, but yesterday I start my novel. It is almost half through already.”

I listen to this and start foaming at the mouth like a beer keg. And I am not the only one.

A LITTLE short fat personality stands right behind us. Now he taps Scrilch on the shoulder and stares at him. He is wearing a heavy pair of cheaters, with enough glass in them to cover a store window.

"Pardon me," he croaks. "But is it not Floyd Scrilch the artist whom I have the honor of addressing?"

"Right."

"And do you not just remark that in addition to your remarkable gifts as a painter, you are also a literateur?"

"Naw, I write stuff."

The little goggle-eyes smiles. "Really?"

"That isn't the half of it," I butt in. "He is also a piano player, a social lion, and an all-around athlete."

"Wonderful!" breathes the goggle-eyes. "How I wish I might psychoanalyze such a genius!"

Then he introduces himself. He turns out to be none other than Doctor Sigmund, the psychiatrist—better known as Subconscious Sigmund.

Subconscious Sigmund grabs Scrilch by the collar.

"How do you manage to cope with such versatility?" he asks.

"I just take a little bicarbonate."

"I mean to say, how is it that you are so accomplished in so many different fields of endeavor?"

"Oh," blurts out Scrilch. "I just answer advertisements and they work out for me."

Subconscious Sigmund stares.

"You mean you just clip out advertising coupons that offer to teach you things and you learn them?"

"Sure."

"Then, Mr. Scrilch, I beg of you—permit me to psychoanalyze you at once."

"Does it hurt?"

"Certainly not. I merely take you to my office and ask you a few questions. I wish to probe your unconscious."

"You wish to what my what?"

"Look into your inner mind. You seem to be a most remarkable man." Well, Scrilch is a sucker for flattery. The end of it is, he agrees, and we go off to the psychiatrist's office together.

"Come with me, Feep," Scrilch says. "I do not wish to get my brain drained without protection."

SUBCONSCIOUS Sigmund has a swell office downtown, and he takes us into a nice private room and we all sit down and have a drink.

"Now," he says, rubbing his hands together. "I am going to ask you to sit down here, Mr. Scrilch." And he puts Floyd Scrilch in a soft chair. Then he turns out all the lights except one lamp, which shines in Scrilch's face. "I will now ask you to answer a few questions," he purrs.

It is just like a high class third-degree.

So he begins to ask questions and Scrilch answers him. And now I see what Subconscious Sigmund is doing. He is pumping Scrilch for his whole life history. And the story comes out. About what a dull life Scrilch leads as a kid. About how nobody ever pays any attention to him, how he is just an average jerk.

And then Scrilch tells about the advertisements. How he answers the first one and gets muscles. About answering the piano-playing ad and getting lessons and being a wizard on the piano. About how he becomes irresistible to women like the hair ad tells him. About his hair growing with scalp restorer. About the painting ad and the writing ad and the life of the party ad.

Subconscious Sigmund is amazed. I can see it. He walks around Scrilch grunting and coughing and chuckling, and then he stops.

"I see it all," he whispers. "It is truly remarkable! Scrilch, you are that mythical cipher, that abstract integer, that legendary personification—the typical average man! The forces of heredity and environment have for once conspired to blend perfectly the component elements of physique and mentality into the pure norm!"

Scrilch gives him the double take.

"What does this mean without pig Latin?" he inquires.

"It means you are the man all these ads are written for," Subconscious Sigmund tells him. "You are the average citizen these ads are slanted to appeal to. You are the normal man on which these preparations and lessons and exercises and products are designed to work. On a lesser personality or a greater one, they never succeed so fully. But by some kinetic miracle, you are the one person in the world who is perfectly attuned to advertising formulae. It is almost magical. The very words and phrases advertisers use come true in your case."

"You mean if an ad comes out saying you can live forever, I might live forever?"

"Who knows?" Sigmund comes back. "You are physiologically and psychically attuned to the vibrationary reflexes induced by advertising."

IT WORRIES me," Scrilch confesses.

"How do you mean?"

"Well, lately, the ads work too good."

"Too good?"

"That's right. I mean, I learn piano playing, but I become a master. I take up drawing, and right away I'm a great artist. I tackle writing, and I write half a novel in one 12-hour day. I send for a hair restorer and I get too much hair. I try to attract friends and women and I have too many friends and too many women. See what I mean? Something is working so that I just seem to get too much."

"So? That is most interesting, my friend."

"Sometimes I wonder if I answer the wrong ad, will it kick back on me? Will I get too wealthy or too strong or too talented?"

“I see,” mumbles Subconscious Sigmund. “Over-compensation. A most illuminating development. We must probe further.”

“What you going to do, Doc?” asks Scrilch.

“Just look at me,” Subconscious Sigmund says. He sits down in front of Scrilch and begins to stare at him with those big cheaters wobbling.

I catch on right away. He is trying to put Scrilch to sleep. He talks to him and keeps the light shining in his face all the time, and he stares away and waves his arm around a little.

Scrilch just sits there.

Subconscious Sigmund stares harder and waves more. He begins to sweat.

Scrilch just sits there.

Subconscious Sigmund’s eyes pop out under his goggles. His hands tremble. He sweats plenty.

Scrilch just sits there.

And all of a sudden, Subconscious Sigmund stops mumbling. His pop eyes go shut. His hands drop in his lap. He slumps down in his chair. Then he tumbles off on the floor and just lies there.

Scrilch gets up.

“Come y on,” he says. “Let’s get going.”

“But what about Subconscious Sigmund?”

“We’ll leave him be,” Scrilch tells me. “Can you imagine,” he says, in a disgusted tone of voice. “This psychiatrist tries to hypnotize me! Me, when just the other day I answer that swell ad about Hypnotism Made Easy!”

THAT is the last I see of Floyd Scrilch for many a week. I do not hear anything more about his painting or his writing or his piano-playing. I do not see anything in the papers. I figure maybe he answers an ad on how to be a hermit or something, and let it go at that.

But one afternoon I am at the pool hall, minding my ps and cues, and a hand taps me on the shoulder.

I turn around and see Floyd Scrilch. His hand still taps me, because he is trembling. And because I do not recognize him there at first.

Floyd Scrilch is pretty pale. He looks thinner, and there are a couple rings under his eyes I would not like to see on bath tubs.

“Feep,” he whispers. “You got to help me.”

“Sure, what do you want me to do?”

“I want you to come out to my house,” he mutters. “We’re going to burn some ads.”

“Burn some ads?”

“Sure. All of the ads. All the ones I answer and all the ones I plan to answer. Get rid of them. Before they get rid of me.”

I give him a long stare and see he means it.

“There’s a taxi waiting outside,” he says. “Come on. There’s not a minute to lose.”

We hop in and drive away. It is a long ride.

“Make with the explanations,” I request. “What happens to you? Why don’t I see you around?”

“If I am around once more, I am dizzy,” Scrilch tells me. “It is terrible. I have no peace. Friends calling me up. Women rushing in to visit me. Art galleries phoning. Agents after my book. And look!”

He is wearing a hat, and now he yanks it off. His hair falls out. So help me, it is six feet long!

“You see?” he mutters. “It won’t stop growing! Nothing stops any more. Just for fun I send in my picture to a movie talent bureau that advertises. I win a Hollywood contract. I win another contest. But I can not go away. I am almost too muscle-bound to walk, now!”

He waves his arm, and his sleeve rips. A bicep sticks out and he pushes it back.

“You see? Ads are good for everybody else, but not for me. They work too well. That is why I run away. I have to get away from people, from women, from advertising.

"That is another thing. A compulsion. That's what Subconscious Sigmund calls it. Every time I see an ad now, I must answer it.

"So I leave my studio and get myself a house in the country. I must. And that is where things go wrong. I hope we're not too late. We must destroy the ads and—something else."

HE SITS huddled up in the cab as we drive out into the sticks. At last the cab pulls up in front of a rickety old frame house and we climb out. It is almost dark, and Scrilch runs up the steps so fast he nearly trips in the dim light.

I follow him in.

"No time to lose," he says. "Help me bundle this stuff up. I must get it down into the furnace while I'm still able to. At this rate of growth I may not even get into the cellar."

I see he is a little off the beam, but I do not comment. I merely look at the living-room which is just filled with old paper. It looks like a government drive.

There is nothing but piles of clipped out coupons. Thousands of them. And Scrilch begins to stuff them into boxes. So I help.

All the time he looks at the door.

"Smell anything?" he asks me. I shake my head. We pile some more. "Hear anything downstairs?" he asks. I shake my head.

I notice he is shaking again.

"What's the matter?" I ask. "What am I supposed to smell and hear?"

"It's the last ad I answer," he breathes, hoarsely. "I'll tell you about that later. We'll have to figure out a way to destroy it. Dynamite, or something. It's growing every hour. I'm almost afraid to go down there. I want to get this stuff in the furnace before it blocks the way."

"What?" I come back, while we bundle up the stuff and carry it out to the cellar door.

Then I hear a rippling noise. Scrilch wheels around. His eyes bulge.

“You don’t smell anything, or hear anything,” he yells. “But you must see something? Or am I nuts?”

I think I am. Because I do see something now.

It is the kitchen floor. It bulges. Yes, the boards in the floor are bulging up. And the ripping noise comes from the wood.

“Growing!” Scrilch screams.

Then he grabs up a pile of coupons. “I’ll get these in the furnace anyway,” he shrieks. “No matter how big it is! I’ll do it—I’ll show you no ad can frighten me!”

He opens the cellar door. It is black down there, but he does not turn on a light. Instead he grabs his pile and runs down the steps.

I hear him yelling in the dark. “Don’t follow me!” he shouts. “It might be dangerous.”

Then I just hear some thumping. All at once he yells again.

“Oh—no—it can’t be—growing—no—get away—oh—”

And I hear something else. An awful noise. A rubbery noise, like somebody was bouncing a zeppelin up and down like a ball. Then there is an awful grunt, and I do smell something, and I hear another sound.

The floor rips further. I hear Scrilch give just one last scream, and then I hear the other sound again.

But the other sound comes from far away, because I am already out the back door and running down the street.

I never go back. Because now I know what happens to Floyd Scrilch. He answers the wrong ad.

* * *

LEFTY FEEP took his elbows out of the butter plates and gave a long sigh.

“Poor Floyd,” he whispered, reminiscently.

I coughed discreetly.

“There’s just one thing bothering me,” I said.

“Name it and you can have it.”

"Well—apparently, Floyd Scrilch was killed there in his cellar. But I don't see how it happened."

"He gets swallowed," Feep told me.

"Swallowed?"

"Sure. For answering the wrong ad."

"But what is this thing that grows down there and makes the floor creak?" I asked. "What did you smell and hear at the last? In plain words—what was it that Floyd Scrilch kept in his cellar?"

"That I never know," Feep answered.

"I thought so!"

"Except for a lucky break of mine," Lefty Feep added, triumphantly. "When I run out of there I happen to have an ad in my hand. I hang on to it unconscious. And later, when I look at it, I figure out what Floyd does. This is the last ad he tells me he answers. And it works too good again. So he gets killed."

"You mean this ad tells what he had down there in the cellar?"

"Look for yourself," said Lefty Feep.

He reached into his vest pocket and handed me the crumpled piece of paper.

The advertisement was quite small. I read only the top line, but that was enough.

"Earn Big money!" the advertisement urged. "Use Your Own Basement to Raise Giant Frogs!"

Men Scared of Nothing

Deep in the jungle was a weird "nothing" that made the souls of men shudder. It was Klipura, the mighty!

WAVELL DARK brought the heavy rifle to his shoulder. His gray eyes sought the line of the sights. At the foot of the slope below the log house, at the edge of the river, a party of natives were busy preparing the torches to light the canoes on their return journey. Across the sullen flood of the river, distant a good three hundred yards, three fat logs lay stranded on a sandbar. Dark lined up the sights. Frowning, he took the gun from his shoulder and glanced up at the lowering sun.

"Light's bad," Mosier muttered, interpreting his glance. Mosier was sitting on the steps. He was a biologist, and a good one. Weighing perhaps two hundred and fifty pounds, he normally possessed all the good humor characteristic of fat men. He wasn't in a good humor now. He slapped fretfully at the mosquitoes, and the tiny camera, suspended on a leather cord around his neck, bounced up and down with the motion.

"Too near night," he said. "Light's bad. And you're shooting down."

Dark glanced down at the broad back. He was rather fond of this fat biologist and he was inclined to sympathize with Mosier's exasperation. "I'll take the middle one," he said.

He brought the gun up again. Muscles writhed steadily in his thick forearms. His brown cheek cuddled gently against the stock. The barrel came up slowly, smoothly, steadied for an instant. Mosier put his fingers in his ears. The gun roared.

Across the river two of the logs stranded on the sandbar erupted to violent life. Raising on short forelegs, they hurtled into the water. The middle log lifted too, to whirl in a dozen fantastic somersaults. Then, forelegs pawing at the sand, it dragged itself into the river. A second later it flashed to the surface, splashing as it rolled. It ceased rolling. The current caught it. Yellowish belly up, it floated with the flood.

"It was a good shot," Mosier admitted. "Not quite dead center or even a crocodile would not have been able to move after so heavy a bullet hit it, but a good shot. It is a good gun that you have had sent to you from the states. But why an elephant gun, Dark? Why an under-and-over rifle in this country?"

He waved his hands at the jungle stretched away in a warm haze under the lowering sun. Mosier had just arrived from up stream. He made regular trips to this country, gathering specimens for some museum in the United States. Every time he went up or down the river he stopped at Dark's rubber plantation.

Dark retired into silence. He was not a big man; he wouldn't tip the scales past 170. But he was all bone and hardened muscle. He slapped at the mosquitoes, lit a cigarette, and spoke out of a cloud of smoke.

"I got troubles."

Mosier waited for him to go on. When he didn't, the biologist waved his hands apologetically. "Look, Dark, I'm not trying to pry. Your business is your business. But I am not exactly unfamiliar with this jungle, and if you are in trouble, I might be able to help. But I can't for the life of me understand how an elephant gun can help you solve your troubles."

"Animals," said Dark. "An animal."

"Nonsense!" Mosier exploded. "Animals! That is nonsense. This is the Amazon country. We have here the jaguar, we have the tapir—" He ticked them off one by one on his fingers. "We have monkeys, big and little. But there is in all of South America no animal that is hunted with an elephant gun. No rhinos, no hippos, no big water buffalos, and no elephants. They just aren't here, my friend."

"Yeah," Dark answered. "I know. Hello, Merto. What say?"

AS SILENTLY as a jaguar, Merto had come around the corner of the house. He was a native, but he stood a good six feet two inches in his bare feet and he was all man.

"Master, the drums," he said.

Dark listened. In the far distance, almost lost in the tropic stillness, was a thin rattle of sound, the talking drums.

"What do they say?" Dark questioned. He had spent years in this jungle but neither he nor any white man had ever learned the meaning of the drums.

"They talk of Klipura," Merto answered. He showed no fear. If anything, he stood a little straighter.

A shadow crossed Dark's face. It was instantly gone, "How do they talk—of Klipura?"

"They say Klipura walks."

"Is that all they say?"

"They say they are afraid. The hands of the drummers shake with fear."

The shadow came back to Dark's face. He was sitting in a crude chair on the front veranda, his feet on the railing. His fingers tightened on the elephant gun that lay across his legs. Merto watched him. When he showed no disposition to ask further questions, the native turned and vanished around the house as silently as he had come.

Mosier smote fist into palm. "By damn, Dark, that man of yours is the finest specimen of physical manhood I ever saw. There's nothing like him in these jungles. I'd give my right eye to know his genealogy."

"He's pure native," Dark answered, the shadow still on his face. "He comes from the tribe that gathers my rubber. You've seen them."

Mosier nodded emphatically. “He comes from a race that averages four and a half feet tall and weighs, when times are good and they have enough to eat, a husky hundred pounds. They’re damned near pygmies, your rubber gatherers are. But Merto is a giant. How does it happen that a race of pygmies can produce a giant?”

“You’ll have to answer your own question. You’re the biologist.” Mosier nodded again. “I can answer it. He’s a freak, a sport, a mutation. Nature seems never to cease experimenting. She’s always trying to improve the stock. We know how she goes about doing it too. She uses cosmic rays, radiations from radium, and possibly a dozen other forces about which we know nothing as yet, to produce changes in the germ plasm which in turn produces mutations, freaks. Usually these freaks are monsters, but occasionally—and Merto is one of those occasions—they are perfect physical specimens. That’s how evolution is brought about, on a grand scale, in nature’s laboratory. The same thing happens to plants. This new rubber tree of yours, that you’re tending so carefully, is also a mutation.”

The biologist was full of the subject. It was his life’s work and at the slightest opportunity, he would talk his head off about it. He went on talking. Dark wasn’t listening. In the far distance he could hear the whispering drums. Inside the house he could hear a man packing his belongings, a man named Clayton, who had been Dark’s sole assistant. Had been. Down at the river landing the natives finished preparing their torches and began looking expectantly up toward the house.

A shrilling tucano, frightened by something lurking in the jungle, flew across the path that led from the house down to the edge of the river. Dark’s eyes followed the flight of the bird. His mind was elsewhere.

THE door banged. Clayton came out, a bag in each hand. He was thin and sallow, with a ragged mustache and sandy hair. He had been here in the jungle, as Dark’s assistant, for three years. He set the bags down and went over to shake hands with Dark. Mosier watched him.

“Sorry, Mr. Dark,” Clayton said, “Forget it. You’re doing what’s right. I don’t blame you.”

Clayton seemed relieved. “Nice of you to take it that way. I really hate to run out on you, but I’ve got to get away from here for six months. I’ll come back after I’ve had a rest, but if I stay here another month—another week—I’ll crack up.”

His voice was a husky note in the thickening shadows of night.

“If I hadn’t seen it,” the voice said, the words coming in little gusty sounds. “If I hadn’t seen it, I would have been able to stay. But I saw it—”

“Forget it,” Dark said, slapping him on the shoulder. “Go back to civilization and take a rest. You’ll be all right as soon as you get out of the jungle.” Again he slapped his former helper on the shoulder. Still apologizing, Clayton picked up his bags and started down the path that led to the river. The two men watched him. He vanished into the shadows toward the waiting canoes.

“What’s the matter with him?” Mosier questioned suddenly.

“He saw it,” Dark answered.

“What the devil are you talking about?”

“Klipura,” Dark said tonelessly. “It. Klipura. The natives think it is a jungle demon.”

“A jungle demon! What kind of a monkey business is this? Have you gone off your nut, Dark?”

“I haven’t seen it. But my rubber workers believe in it.”

“Hell, they believe in anything!” the biologist exploded. “Every tribe, every village, has a jungle demon. It’s twiddle-twaddle, Dark. It results from the efforts of the primitive mind to explain the forces of nature in terms the natives can understand. When a storm comes, they say a demon caused it. If a croc carries off one of their kids, they say the river demon took it. If you pay any attention to the natives, they’ll have you believing there’s a demon behind every tree. You don’t mean to tell me that you—Say, is that why you had that elephant gun brought in here?”

Dark hesitated. “Well—yes.”

There was a moment of silence. Then the biologist spoke soothingly. “My friend, you had better take a trip to civilization and have yourself looked over. Put yourself in the hands of some good doctor and get a thorough examination. Sometimes these tropic fevers get a man down before he knows it.”

“Clayton saw it,” Dark said almost defensively.

“Clayton is wise enough to know when he needs a check-up.”

“He said it was about seven feet tall and covered all over with gray fur. He said it walked on two legs and carried a club. It was big, he said. Big. So I got an elephant gun,” Dark ended.

“Fever,” Mosier diagnosed. “There is no animal in this country answering that description. Nor in any other country. I know. That is my business.”

“No animal, perhaps. Demon.”

“Tosh! Fiddle-faddle! Nonsense!”

To the left in the jungle, something grunted, a low forceful sound. The darkness was thick by now. At the landing the torches of the natives flared against the night. The natives had been talking, and their voices had drifted upward as a gentle murmur of sound, sound that went into sudden silence now.

DARK came to his feet, gun in hand.

He took one step, jerked open the door and leaped into the house. Mosier rose, perturbed without knowing why. “What are you running for?” he asked.

The door slammed again. “I’m not running,” Dark said. “Here. Take this.” He shoved a long flashlight into the biologist’s hands.

“Clayton!” he called sharply. “Clayton. Lookout!”

Down the path a man shrieked. Once. Then the shriek was cut off by the sound of a heavy thump. There was a wild, harsh gibbering, a heavy grunting, a strange slobbering. The man screamed again, a sound that ran through the depths of terror into the shrill tremulo of unutterable pain.

"Light!" Dark husked. But the biologist was already using the flash, flinging a beam of bright radiance down the path.

Something loomed in the lancing beam of light. Taller than any man, broader than three. Hulking, heavy. In one hand it held a club, in the other hand it held an arm.

It looked up the slope, seeking the source of the light. Tiny eyes gleamed in the illumination.

"Shoot!" Mosier whispered.

"Can't. Don't know where Clayton is. The natives down below are in the line of fire," Dark answered. He ran down the path, the heavy rifle in his hands. Mosier followed.

The thing saw them coming. As lightly as a jaguar, it leaped from the path and into the tangle of the jungle. Dark's rifle boomed. It was a snap shot, hurried, without aim. The heavy slug whanged into the trees. A body crashed through the underbrush. Saplings shook. Dark fired the other barrel. He didn't have a target. He was shooting blindly.

A tornado crashed through the underbrush. It rolled away while Dark plugged fresh cartridges into his gun. Mosier held the light, playing it over the green tangle. Dark brought up the gun, seeking a target. The crashing in the underbrush died in the distance.

Clayton lay in the trail. He didn't move. The two men knelt beside him.

"God!" Mosier whispered. "It had an arm in its hand. God. . . ."

Clayton no longer had a left arm. Apparently the first heavy thump had been the club striking him. Then he had been grabbed. He had screamed. While he screamed, his arm had been torn off at the shoulder. Blood slowly rilled out of the empty socket, rilled slower and slow, and stopped running.

At the landing the natives frantically launched their canoes and paddled madly downstream. "Klipura!" they were screaming. "Klipura!"

THE drums started at sun rise.

Dark, carefully pulling a clean rag through the rifle, heard the thin rattle of sound coming through the dawn. He finished pulling the rag through the gun, squinted down both barrels, snapped shut the breech and looked inquiringly at Merto.

The native was stringing a bow, one foot pressed against the stave. Muscles writhed in his brown back and the string slipped into its notch. Merto stroked his thumb across the string. It hummed. He glanced at Dark.

“They talk of Klipura,” he said.

“Nothing else?”

Merto squinted, turning an ear up to the sky. “They are afraid,” he said. “Their hands shake. The drums talk foolishly because the hands of the drummers shake. It is hard to understand, this shaking talk.”

“Listen closely.”

Merto listened, mouth open, to the thin rattle of sound running through the morning sky. “They call all together. They make talk-talk.”

“They do not talk of leaving?”

“No, Master. Nothing is said of leaving. They call all together and make talk-talk.”

Dark sighed with relief. The natives were only holding a pow-wow. They weren’t clearing out of the country, yet. He still had a little time. To get Klipura, to kill the jungle demon. The natives were jumpy, scared. They liked the white man, but they feared Klipura. How they feared him! Nothing Dark could offer would induce them to stay much longer in this region. If they left—

He thought about that. Without the help of the natives, the jungle would swarm over his new growth of rubber trees. Eight years he had spent with these new trees, working with them, babying them along. Sweat and blood. All wasted. Eight years wasted, if the natives left. Wasted because the jungle spawned a beast that frightened away his helpers. Nor could he solve the problem by getting new helpers. The talk of the drums would be relayed for hundreds of miles. No new tribe would come here and work on a plantation inhabited by a demon.

“Damn Klipura!” he muttered, under his breath.

The door of the house opened. Mosier stood there. The fat biologist was clad in khaki shorts. He was wearing a sun helmet. Suspended on a leather thong around his neck was a camera. He had no gun.

“Gad, what a bow!” he said, seeing Merto’s weapon.

“Yeah, it’s something all right,” Dark said. Abruptly he changed the subject. “We ought to be back by night. In the meantime, make yourself completely at home here.”

Mosier shook his head.

“You’ll find the larder well stocked,” Dark said. “Sorry to go off and leave you like this but I’ve a little job to attend to.”

“But you are not going off and leaving me like this,” Mosier answered. “I’m going with you.”

“No.”

“But, of course, I am. Do you think I am going to miss an opportunity like this? I am interested in your demon too, for scientific reasons.”

Dark grinned. He decided he really liked this biologist. “Well, if you want to come along, I’m willing. But we may run into a bit of danger.”

“So what, my friend? There is danger if I stay here. I might catch a fever, or something. No. Decidedly you are not going to leave me here.” He came down the steps.

“Okay,” Dark said. “Where’s your gun?”

Mosier stared reproachfully at him. “When you have an elephant gun and your man has a six-foot bow, why should I need a weapon? No. I will do my hunting with this.” He pointed at the camera.

“I wish I had a tribe like you, to work my rubber trees,” Dark said approvingly. “Come on.”

Merto led the way. Starting at the spot where Clayton had died, he plunged into the jungle. There were footprints in the path, huge misshapen blotches. They led into the green tangle. Merto followed. Torn vines, crumpled plants marked the trail. A heavy weight had gone this way in a hurry. As long as Klipura had been in a hurry, Merto had no difficulty. But Klipura had recovered from his fright. Merto went slower and slower still, but always he went forward. Dark followed, a step behind, the rifle ready. The biologist brought up the rear.

They passed near a space where the jungle growth had been thinned. Slender trees, spaced regularly, grew here.

"Rubber," said Dark proudly. "The beginning of what will someday be a huge plantation."

Mosier glanced around. "Where are your workers?" he questioned.

"Holding a pow-wow," Dark answered. Listening, he was aware that the drums had gone into silence.

"Klipura go this way," Merto said, leading on.

THE trail led near the village where the workers lived. To Dark, the silence of the drums was ominous. "We will stop for a while at the village," he said.

The natives were there all right. They greeted the white men with sullen silence.

"Scared bunch of little men," Mosier commented.

"Tell them," Dark said to Merto. "Tell them they no longer need be scared. Tell them I have sent far away to the country of the white men and gotten a great gun, with which to destroy Klipura. Tell them we seek Klipura now, to destroy him."

Merto relayed the message. "We will destroy the jungle demon," he said proudly. "See the new gun of the white man. With it, he will destroy the demon."

"Guns will not destroy demons," the halting answer came. "The gods are angry and they send the demon. The gods must have a sacrifice."

Beyond that, they wouldn't talk. Merto looked at Dark. "It is bad," he whispered. "They plan something, won't say what. They scared. Master must kill Klipura. If Klipura not destroyed, they not stay here long."

"Tell them Klipura will be dead before night," Dark answered grimly.

He turned and walked back to the jungle. Mosier followed him in sympathetic silence. The biologist knew how much this rubber plantation meant to Dark. He knew, also, upon how slender a thread it hung.

The sun was sloping toward the west when Merto halted. They were at the edge of a little glade where the ground began to slope upward toward the hills. The trail had led here. Merto did not enter the glade. He stopped suddenly, just at the edge.

Dark, a step behind him, stopped too. "It's coming," he thought. "It's here." Merto's stiffened silence told him that the native sensed something. Perhaps he didn't see it yet. But he sensed it. Dark brought the rifle forward. He didn't raise it to his shoulder. He just brought it forward, got it ready.

Behind him he could hear Moiser trying to breathe quietly. The biologist knew the jungle. He knew when to be quiet.

There wasn't a sound. It was afternoon and the air was quiet. The animals were taking a siesta. Not even a monkey was chattering. No bird called. There was only sticky heat and silent oppressive air. The jungle seemed to stand on tiptoes, listening.

Dark's eyes ranged through the green foliage. The little glade ahead of them was empty. He saw nothing. Merto moved.

Slowly, ever so slowly, Merto moved his hand, sliding a long, iron-tipped arrow across the bow. He didn't draw the bow. He stood with the arrow on the string, waiting.

"He thinks he sees something," Dark thought. "He isn't sure, but he thinks he sees something."

He whispered. "What is it?"

Merto slowly pointed.

Straining his eyes, Dark could see something in the shade of the trees across the glade. There was a tangle of green leaves, but between the leaves was a grayish blotch. Grayish! It might be the bark of a tree. It might be—Klipura!

Dark couldn't be certain. Piggy eyes might be watching them. Klipura might be waiting for them. Demon or animal, he was cunning. He had been lurking beside the trail when Clayton had come along. He might be lurking across the glade, waiting.

"Put an arrow into the gray place," Dark said softly. "If it's the trunk of a tree, nothing will be wasted. If it's Klipura, an arrow will bring him out."

Merto's dark face gleamed. Slowly, ever so slowly, he brought back the nock of the arrow toward his ear. He didn't release it. He didn't have time.

With a coughing grunt something erupted from the other side of the glade. It was—Klipura!

DARK was vaguely aware that Merto had released the arrow. He caught a glimpse of the iron-tipped shaft hurtling across the glade. The shaft missed. Merto had been startled and the shaft had missed. More certainly he realized that a grayish mass—it looked to him to be as big as an elephant—was charging across the clearing.

He shuffled his feet, finding a firm foothold in the leaves.

"One side, Merto," he hissed.

It was an order that Merto did not need. He knew he was in the line of fire. Besides, he saw the thing that was coming. He stepped to one side. He wanted to run. He was a native, a magnificent one but a native, with all the fears and superstitions of the primitive. He wanted to run. But his master wasn't running. And he did not run. He stepped to one side, his hand seeking another arrow.

Dark brought up the gun. It was not thirty yards across that glade. The grayish mass would cover that distance in seconds, in less than seconds. Dark snuggled the butt of the heavy rifle against his shoulder, laid his cheek against the stock. He might have been at target practice.

"Shoot!" Mosier shouted behind him, then lapsed into apologetic silence.

“One shot!” Dark thought. “One’s all you get.”

Somewhere in his mind was the idea that this shot had better be good.

His rubber plantation was hanging on this one shot. Eight years of his life was hanging on it, eight years in this tropic hell. That his life itself was hanging on the shot did not occur to him.

Klipura was big. He was coming like a race horse. Vaguely Dark wondered what that beast really was. It looked like King Kong. His eyes went down the sight. It seemed that Klipura was reaching out to take hold of the end of the gun barrel. His finger tightened on the trigger, tightened gently. The gun smacked against his shoulder. Thunder raced through the jungle.

He saw the hair curl where the bullet hit. It was lead, was that slug. It would hit and spread. It would make a tiny hole where it entered and a huge hole where it came out. It had a shocking power of thousands of foot pounds. He couldn’t remember exactly how many thousands. It was designed to knock down an elephant.

Dark tried to bring the gun to bear for a second shot. To him it seemed that the charging mass was diving under the line of sight. He tried to depress the gun. He was still trying to depress it when he realized a heavy weight had slid against his legs and stopped. He looked down. Klipura lay on the ground. Shoulders against Dark’s legs, the jungle demon lay on the ground. A tremble passed through the mass, a quiver. It was still.

Automatically, Dark clicked open the chamber of the rifle, slipped in fresh cartridges. He was aware that Mosier was talking.

“By gad!” Mosier was saying. “I’m sure as hell glad that is an elephant gun.”

The biologist stepped around Dark, mopped sweat from his forehead. “By gad!” he repeated. “I’m glad that’s an elephant gun!”

“So am I!” Dark said suddenly. There was a weakness in his knees. He sat down.

“Now,” said Mosier, “With your permission, I’ll take a few pictures of this beast.”

"Hell, yes," Dark answered. "Take all the pictures you want."

He didn't care what the biologist did. All he was thinking was that Klipura was dead. To hell with what the beast was and where he had come from. It was dead. Now his workers would return to their tasks, helping him fight the jungle. Now he had proved to them that the jungle demon could be killed. They would not be afraid any longer. They would help him fight the jungle. He had won, the thought was in his mind. He had won the right to his rubber.

The thought was singing through his mind as they worked their way back home. He realized that Mosier was muttering about the possible origins of the creature he had killed, but he didn't pay any attention to the biologist. To hell with that. The thing that counted was that his rubber plantation had been saved. He detoured to look again at the growth of trees.

He came to the place where the jungle growth had been thinned, where the trees stood. He looked. Something choked him. There was an obstruction in his throat. His eyesight was blurring. Beside him, Mosier suddenly stopped talking. The biologist looked at the grove of trees. Merto looked at them. Both seemed to be dumfounded.

The trees were there. But they didn't stand erect any longer. They were on the ground. All of them. On the ground. Chips showed where axes had been used.

Chopped down. Every rubber tree. Already their leaves were curling in the heat of the dying sun.

DARK sat in the night on the porch and slapped at the mosquitoes. Inside the house he could hear Mosier puttering around as he developed the films he had taken. Below him on the steps a dispirited shadow sat.

"They not know," the shadow said, for the tenth time. "Master, they not know. They think the gods send Klipura. They have to make sacrifice to make the gods friendly again. It has to be big sacrifice because Klipura was big. They chop down trees. Make big sacrifice to the gods."

Dark said nothing. In his mind he cursed the natives, cursed the fears that had driven them to chop down his rubber trees as a sacrifice to their gods. That was what was wrong with working in this country. The natives could not understand, they could not be trusted. White men were needed to fight the jungle, white men who feared neither gods nor demons, and laughed at danger.

If he could bring white men in here! If! He could start over again. The trees would be transplanted and tended. They would send out new shoots from their roots. These shoots would grow. A new plantation could be started. It would take years, and a fortune. The world would be the gainer, by a new rubber tree. The world could use that, its appetite for rubber being what it was. But it would cost a fortune. Every dollar he owned and every dollar he could borrow had gone into this growth of trees. They would have been producing in another year, if the natives had not—

He cursed softly in the darkness. "They not know," Merto almost whimpered. "They not understand."

"It's all right, Merto," Dark said. "It's not your fault that your people are afraid of demons."

Merto straightened up. "Make new plantation," he said. "Master and Merto. Grow new trees. My people not help, but Merto help. Merto not afraid. Merto and master grow new trees, whip jungle yet."

Dark swallowed. "You're all right, Merto. No, I'm afraid it wouldn't work. We need capital. We don't have it." He lapsed into silence.

Mosier came out of the building. He sat down on the steps. With exaggerated slowness he lit a cigarette, slapped at the mosquitoes.

"How does it feel to be rich?" he said.

"I don't know."

"You ought to," the biologist continued. "You're probably the richest man in all Brazil right now."

"Cut out the damned chatter," Dark snarled. "Sorry," he apologized a second later. "I feel like the devil. Didn't mean to be snappish."

"It's all right," said the biologist. "But you are rich, you know."

A SUDDEN silence fell. Dark sat up in his chair. “What the devil are you talking about?” he demanded.

“My plates were all fogged,” the biologist answered. “Every damned one of them. Not a picture in the bunch that’s any good.”

“So what? I lose a rubber plantation and you whimper because your pictures are no good.”

“That’s the point,” Mosier answered imperturbably. “That’s why you’re rich.”

“What the hell are you talking about?”

“I’m talking about your rubber trees. They were a mutation. I’m talking about Merto. He’s a mutation. I’m talking about Klipura. He was a mutation. You know what stock he came from? Ape. He was just an ape that forgot to quit growing. Something happened to his mother before he was born and he forgot to quit growing. Finally, I’m talking about my plates. They’re fogged. No good.”

“What does it add up to?”

“It adds up to radium. You located your rubber plantation right in one of nature’s laboratories, right in a place where she creates new species. Your new rubber tree, Merto, Klipura, my fogged plates, all point to the same thing. There’s a deposit of pitchblende somewhere near here. We crossed it today and didn’t know it. Dark, damnit, you’ve lost a rubber plantation, but you’ve found what must be one of the richest radium deposits in the world.”

Dark was suddenly out of his chair. He was shaking the biologist. “Damn you, are you sure?”

Mosier pushed him away. “Of course I’m sure. I don’t know the exact location of the deposit but we can find it. Damn it, man, how was radium first discovered? By a fogged photographic plate! Of course I’m sure.”

“My God!” said Dark. He sat down. Radium. He didn’t doubt that the biologist knew what he was talking about. With radium as the goal, white men would come into the jungle. With radium paying the bills, he could hire men to replant his rubber plantation. Radium. Radium had created the rubber trees, had created Merto, and Klipura.

"I once said I wished I had a tribe like you to tend my rubber trees," Dark said suddenly. "How would you like to be my partner in helping discover and develop a radium mine?"

"White man, you've got yourself a partner," Mosier answered.

THE talking drums of the upper Amazon still whisper of the dance of the two crazy white men in celebration of the slaying of Klipura, the jungle demon. They still talk of demons, do these drums, whispering darkly of strange creatures that walk the night. They also tell of the many white men who came later, and of the clanking machinery they brought, seeking yet another demon who lurks in the earth. The white men are crazy, the drums whisper. The white men have no fear of demons and are therefore crazy.

They tell also of how the two white men who slew Klipura, after they had gone down river and brought back with them many other white men who sought the demon in the ground, went yet farther up the river, taking with them, of all things, the tender shoots of trees. They say also how the white men carefully planted the shoots in the ground and brought still other white men to stand guard over them. "No doubt they will grow demons from these trees," the drums say, whispering sagely in the night.

The natives give these strange affairs a wide berth. No man not white dares pit his strength against the jungle demons. It is even whispered by the drums, not without some reason, that the two white men are themselves demons.

If the native giant who goes with the two white men, guiding them, working with them, hears the talking of the drums, he gives no sign. Deep in his heart he knows his masters are not demons.

"Men scared of nothing," he calls them. He is proud to be the friend of men who are scared of nothing, not even of demons.

THE END

The Little Man Who Wasn't All There

When Lefty Feep put on that coat, he let himself in for a lot of trouble because it was a coat that was part of a suit of invisibility. And being half invisible isn't practical

I WALKED into Jack's Shack accompanied by a terrific appetite. It tugged me toward a table with a haste not to be denied. I didn't notice the thin and melancholy figure in the booth until a thin and melancholy arm grabbed my coat tails.

"Hey!" said a voice, plaintively. "Why, Lefty Feep! I didn't see you when I came in."

A grimace of positive horror crossed Mr. Feep's face, together with half of the sandwich he was eating.

"Don't say that," he pleaded.

"But I really didn't notice you." Feep trembled violently.

"Please put a collar on that kind of holler," he begged. "It makes me queasy but uneasy when you say you do not see me."

"Oh, I see you now all right."

"That's better." Feep pushed a relieved smile through the sandwich lettuce and waved me to a seat opposite him. "Now you're cooking with sterno."

I gave my order and sank back in my chair.

"Well, Lefty, what's new? Haven't seen hide nor hair of you for a few days."

"Don't say it that way!" Feep grated.

"What's biting you?"

"The finance company," Lefty Feep replied. "But that is neither here nor there. It is this stuff about not seeing me that disturbs and perturbs."

I began to feel a question coming on. I struggled to resist, but it was no use.

"What's the reason you're so upset when I mention not seeing you?"

Feep wiggled his ears impressively.

"Do you really want to know?" he asked.

"No. But you're going to tell me, anyway."

"Seeing you are so inquisitive," said Lefty Feep, "I suppose there is nothing else I can do but spill it. The whole thing starts out when I get tangled up with this Gorgonzola."

"The cheese?" I inquired.

"No—the magician," Feep replied.

Waving a stalk of celery in mysterious rhythm, Lefty Feep hunched forward and began his story.

I KNOW this Great Gorgonzola for many a year. In fact, I know him when he is just plain Eddie Klotz, doing a vaudeville act. Then he gets a magic show of his own, and pretty soon he calls himself the Great Gorgonzola and becomes tops in the sleight-of-hand racket.

I see his latest show just recently, and it is only a couple of days later that I run into him in front of a brass rail I happen to be standing on.

I give him the old once-over, because he is dressed very stylish, like a corpse, and he has a dance-floor mustache—full of wax. Then I recognize him.

"Well, if it isn't the Great Gorgonzola," I yap. "How are tricks in the magic game?"

"Fair," he tells me. "The legerdemain is all right, but the prestidigitation is lousy."

"I am sorry to hear that," I reply. "But by the way, as one magician to another—who is that lady I saw you in half with last night?"

"That is no lady, that is my wife," he comes back, with a straight puss. "She is my assistant in the show we are doing. How do you like it?"

"Very nice," I tell him. "Strictly uptown. I figure I will go again this week."

He shakes his head.

"The show closed last night," he informs me. "I have a little business to attend to the rest of this week, so I close up and get ready to leave town. But I hate to do it."

"Why?"

"Do you ever hear of my rival?"

"Rival?"

"Yes," he sneers. "Gallstone the Magician."

"What's with him?"

"My wife, mostly," says Gorgonzola, looking very sad. "Gallstone is nothing but a bushy-haired wolf. He is making passes at my wife, and not just to practise his hypnotism, either."

"That is a tough break," I agree. "But why do you not give him a tough break too—say, his neck, for instance?"

"An excellent idea," Gorgonzola tells me. "But I simply must leave on this business trip. Meanwhile this Gallstone will be hanging around my wife, trying to insinuate himself with her."

"That is a lousy thing to do," I pronounce. "There is nothing I hate worse than an insinuator. Isn't there a law?"

"You do not seem to understand me," says Gorgonzola. "He wants to worm something out of her."

"That is even worse."

"I mean, Gallstone is trying to get my wife to give away the secrets of my new magical effects for the next season's show. He wants her to tell him my new tricks."

"Aha! Then why don't you take your wife with you?"

"That's out. Private business, very important and just a little dangerous. I'm leaving her out at the house. Futzi will have to take care of her."

"Futzi?"

"My houseboy," Gorgonzola explains. "He's a Filipino." Then he slaps his hand on the bar. "Say, there's an idea. Listen, Feep—why can't you come out to the house and stay there this next three days? It would solve everything if you'd keep your eyes open."

"I AM sorry," I tell him. "But it is necessary for me to stay downtown and look after my interests."

"You mean those lousy $2 horse-bets?"

"Well, if you choose to put it that way."

"But you can come down every day anyway. Just so you are on hand if this Gallstone shows up. It means a lot to me, Lefty—more than I can tell you now."

"All right," I agree. "When do I go, and where?"

"Today," Gorgonzola tells me. "Here's what I'll do—I'll go home, pack, and leave. Then I'll have Futzi come around and call for you with the car. You can carry your things easier that way."

"What things?" I reply, very bitterly. "One toothbrush and a pair of socks is not exactly a load."

"Nevertheless, Futzi will call for you. He'll bring the keys and everything. Expect him at your place around two. And thanks a million."

With that, Gorgonzola breezes out and I go home and dry out that pair of socks. I am just shredding the bristles on my toothbrush when the doorbell rings.

I yank it open, careful, and look out into the hall. I do not see anybody. Then I glance down. Somewhere about a few feet from the floor is a little guy with a face like yellow jaundice.

This face is all plastered up in a big grin with the teeth sticking out like they want to use my toothbrush.

The little yellow guy bows up and down.

“Honorable Feep?” he says.

I give him the nod.

“Honorable Feep, honorable Gorgonzola say for me to carry you to honorable house. Myself, humble Futzi, am yours truly to command.”

This is Filipino double-talk meaning I am going to Gorgonzola’s dump with him.

So I grab my handclasp—it is so small, you can hardly call it a grip—and close the door.

“O.K.,” I tell this Futzi. “Lead the way, my Japanese sandman.”

HE TURNS around and gives me an un-laundered look.

“Me Filipino boy, not Japanzee,” he hisses. “I do not enjoy it when you stick amusement at me.”

“You mean poke fun at you?” I ask.

“Correctly. If I one of those Japanzees I go out commit hootchiekootchie.”

“You mean hotsytotsy?”

“No, hocus-pocus.”

Then I get it. “You mean hari-kari.”

“No. Hocus-pocus. I kill myself with magician’s knife.”

This kind of talk is hard to follow, and so is this guy’s driving. We skid through traffic in Gorgonzola’s car, and a dozen times I think we are morgue-meat, but little Futzi just sings away at the wheel. Then I decide to take advantage of the chance to find out a few things about the setup I am heading into.

“Does Mrs. Gorgonzola expect me?”

“Of coarsely. She expectorate you right away. Mr. Gorgonzola he tell her you coming down on week end and then he take it on the sheep.”

"On the lam, you mean."

"Honorable correction noted. And here we arrive."

We pull into the driveway of a two-story bungalow.

"What kind of woman is Mrs. Gorgonzola?" I ask, just to be on the safe side.

"She very female person," Futzi answers. "But so sorry. Too skinny for suiting me. Not too skinny for honorable Gallstone though. He all the time dangle around like ants in the pants."

"You mean snake in the grass."

"Surely. Shrubbery serpent, that honorable skunk. Mr. Gorgonzola say if you catch Gallstone hanging around you cut his throat from ear to there."

We get out and head for the door. Futzi rings, grinning at me.

"Mrs. Gorgonzola arrive now," he says.

Sure enough, the door opens.

"Slide in," Futzi suggests.

"Not me!" I yelp. I do not like what is standing in the doorway. I dislike it so much my knees begin to knock it.

"Listen, my fine Filipino friend," I whisper. "You tell me Mrs. Gorgonzola is thin, but you do not tell me she is that thin."

Because the thing that opens the door is nothing else than a white, grinning skeleton!

"SQUEEZE yourself together," Futzi giggles. "This is not Mrs. Gorgonzola. Is just a trick. Gorgonzola he very tricky honorable baby, you betcha! This just harmless bones."

Sure enough, I see the skeleton is attached to the doorpost. We edge inside.

"Now here are keys to honorable house," Futzi tells me in the hall. "Especially keys to Mr. Gorgonzola's bedroom. He hides tricks up there so nobody steals. He say you take nice care of these, so Gallstone cannot stick honorable schnozzola into secret business."

I pocket the keys and then I hear somebody coming.

"So there you are," snaps a voice. Futzi turns around.

"Honorable Mrs., allow me to gift to you honorable Feep, Lefty, Esq. He is here to sit down on week end."

Mrs. Gorgonzola gives me the old eye, and a very pretty eye it is too, under all that mascara and pencil work. She is a tall, thin damsel with drugstore-blonde hair. I hold out my hand, but she must think I have a bad case of tattle-tale gray, because she does not take it. Instead she hands me a stuffed fish look.

"My husband tells me you're going to be here until he gets back," she freezes.

"I hope it does not put you out," I tell her.

"Oh, it's perfectly all right, I suppose. Futzi, show Mr. Feep to his room. Dinner's at seven. Now, if you'll pardon me, I must go lock myself in a trunk."

"What kind of talk is that?" I ask Futzi, when we walk upstairs.

"Straight from elbow talk," he says. "Mrs. Gorgonzola always lock herself in trunk or safe or something. She makes practise for magic act. What you call, escape artist?"

"I see."

When I get into Gorgonzola's room upstairs, I see a lot more. The place is filled with trunks and boxes and cases, and when I hang my coat in the closet I find still more. There are decks of cards under the bed, and artificial flowers and flags and wands. I head for the bath to wash my hands and Futzi leaps for the door ahead of me.

"Wait!" he hollers. "You wish to release rabbits?"

"Rabbits?"

"Honorable Gorgonzola keeps rabbits in bath. Bathtub full of lettuce, you notice."

SURE enough, the place is full of bunnies. I start to wash, and the lop-ears flop around and jump up on me, while Futzi tries to shoo them off.

“Ow!” I mention, with my eyes full of soap, because a rabbit jumps onto the washbowl and starts tickling my stomach. But it is too late for me to do anything, and I get my coat splashed up plenty.

“Do not spend any attention to that,” Futzi grins. “I send honorable coat to honorable cleaners.”

“Fie upon that noise,” I bark. “If I do not get back downtown this afternoon I am going to the cleaners myself. I have to place a bet on a pet, and I cannot run down there in my shirtsleeves. The snappy dressers at the pool hall will laugh at me.”

“Why not wear coat of Mr. Gorgonzola?” Futzi suggests. “He got plenty clothes in closet. Enough for whole nudist colony, I gamble you.”

This seems to be an idea. After Futzi takes my wet coat away and tells me I can use the car to drive down, I go to the big bedroom closet and start looking around.

The place is full of magic paraphrenalia like I say, but there do not seem to be any clothes hanging there at all, except costumes. I do not wish to wear a turban or a Chinese kimono, and I am about ready to give up when I see this trunk.

It is a great big iron chest locked away at the bottom of the closet, and I pull it out and see that it is closed very tight indeed. For a minute I give up, because I do not carry any nitroglycerine on my person for many years. Then I remember the keys Futzi gives me.

Sure enough, the first key I try unlocks the trunk. It is filled with mirrors and folding stuff and glass balls—and I realize this must be the trunk full of new tricks that Gorgonzola is so anxious for me to watch over.

But there at one side is just what I am looking for—a nice tuxedo. There is a coat, a vest, a pair of pants, and a top hat to match.

I merely remove the coat and slip it on for size. It fits pretty well and I am just going to yank on the trousers when I look at the clock and see I must beat it downtown in a hurry if I wish to catch the fifth race.

So I just keep my old trousers and wear Gorgonzola's coat. I run down the hall and out into the yard, climb into the car, and make like crazy.

Ten minutes later I am entering Gorilla Gabface's pool palace. It is here that I make my modest investments on the races from time to time.

There are quite a bunch of bananas standing around phoning in their wagers, and big fat Gorilla Gabface is making book. When I rush in, they turn around and stare.

Now I admit it is unusual for me to wear a tuxedo coat and checked trousers. Such a spectacle is worth a stare any day of the week. But the kind of look I get from the personalities around the phone is quite queer indeed. And there is a very quaint silence along with it.

I RUSH up to Gorilla Gabface and hold up my hand. He is standing there with his mouth open and his tongue hanging out a mile, and when I come close he sort of shudders and puts his hands over his eyes.

"No!" he gasps. "No—no!"

"What's the matter, you big ape?" I ask, kindly. "You look like you never see me before in your life."

"I don't!" he gasps. "And if I never see you again I am very satisfied."

"But you know me. I'm Lefty Feep!" Gorilla moans a little.

"The face is familiar," he groans. "And so are the trousers. But what happens to the rest of you?"

"Nothing at all," I tell him. "I merely borrow this tuxedo coat to wear here."

"What tuxedo coat?" Gabface asks. "I don't see any."

"Then what do you think I'm wearing?"

"I don't know." Gorilla is sweating. He backs further away. "From the looks of you, you should be wearing a shroud. I don't know what holds your neck up."

"Are you giving me the rib?" I ask. "No—you're giving me the shivers," he says. "Coming in here like that; just a face and a pair of pants underneath. What happens to the rest of you?”

He pulls me along the wall by the seat of my trousers, very careful, until I am facing a mirror.

“Tell me what you see,” he whispers. I look, and then it is my turn to gasp. Because in the mirror I see a pair of pants, a neck, and a head. There is nothing in between. I am cut off at the hips, and my head and neck are floating around about three feet above in the empty air!

“You must do a lot of betting in the first races today,” Gorilla whispers. “I hear of guys losing their shirts on the horses before, but you go ahead and lose your whole torso!”

I just stand there. Looking down, I can see my tuxedo coat very plain. But it does not show in the mirror and it is not visible to anybody else.

“You say you borrow that coat?” one of the specimens at the phone inquires.

“Yes, I find it in a closet.”

“Maybe the thing is full of moths,” he suggests.

“Very hungry moths,” Gorilla chimes in. “So hungry they not only eat up the coat but your chest and arms, too.”

I just stare at the mirror. Because now I think I know what happens. I look around for clothes in a trunk where Gorgonzola keeps his magic tricks and I get a trick coat. One that makes me invisible.

Just to prove it, I take the coat off. And sure enough, I am all right again. I stand there in my shirtsleeves looking foolish, but not so foolish as the rest of these mugs.

“How do you do it?” Gabface asks me.

“It is a magician’s coat,” I admit.

“Well, do not put it back on,” he begs. “You give us all quite a shock with that trick. For a minute I think you must be suffering from an overdose of vanishing cream.”

"NEVER mind that," I snap. "I want to place a wager in the fifth race at Santa Anita. On Bing Crosby's horse."

"You are too late," Gorilla tells me. "It just finishes."

I let out an unkind remark. "Curse this coat business," I suggest. "It spoils a sure 15-1 shot for me."

"Cheer up," says Gabface. "You are lucky you do not make the bet, because you lose anyway."

"How come?"

"Well, Bing Crosby's horse is disqualified at the post, so Crosby runs the race himself instead. And loses."

This cheers me up a little, and so I take my leave and go back to Gorgonzola's house for supper. I am very careful not to wear this coat in the car, because if I do so it will look like the jallopy has no driver in it.

Besides, I can not get used to the idea of what I see when I look in the mirror. Being invisible is a very funny feeling, and every time I remember it I have to close my eyes and shudder.

The last time I do so I am just ready to park. And I run smack into the back of a big Packard.

"Aha!" yells a voice from inside. "Watch where you're going, you hoodlum!"

I look around to see what kind of uncouth person he is talking to, and then I realize the remark is made to me. More and over, the owner of the voice jumps out of the Packard and climbs up to the running board. He is waving one hand in front of my face and he does not have any flag in it, either. Just a big fist.

"I am sorry," I say. "I must be driving with my eyes closed."

"That is the way you will drive for a long time, you oaf," he says. "Because I am going to black both eyes for you."

I notice he is a big, beefy fellow with a red face and a big shock of bushy hair that stands out from his head like a dust mop.

"Can't we talk this over?" I suggest.

One big arm reaches in and grabs me. He lifts me out of the car and holds me up by the neck.

"The only thing I will talk over is your dead body," he snarls. "You smash both my rear fenders and that is what I am going to do to you."

Just then the front door opens and Mrs. Gorgonzola runs out. She smiles at the big bushy-haired specimen.

"Why Mr. Gallstone, you've arrived for dinner," she simpers. "I see you and Mr. Feep already know each other."

"Yes," I gasp. "I bump into him just now coming in."

"Mr. Feep is a house-guest," says Mrs. Gorgonzola.

"So?" Gallstone drops me down to my feet and takes his paw off my collar. "I am pleased to meet you," he snarls, and holds out his hand. I take it, and he nearly breaks my fingers off at the joints.

"So you are Gallstone the Magician."

"I manage to get out. "Gorgonzola tells me a lot about you."

"He does, huh? Well—he can't prove it." Gallstone sneers. Then he turns to Mrs. Gorgonzola and gives her a look at his big teeth.

"I hear your husband is away," he says.

"That's right."

"Too bad. Ha-ha!"

"Yes, isn't it, tee-hee!" cracks Mrs. Gorgonzola.

SO RIGHT away I figure it is one of those things. I get out of the way to avoid being hit by any flying mush they are slinging at each other.

Then Futzi sticks his head around the door.

"Dinner is swerved!" he yells. "Rush to put on honorable food-sack."

Mrs. Gorgonzola turns to me. "When you left, I didn't think you'd be back for dinner," she says. "So—"

I catch on to this, also.

"I eat downtown," I lie. "I will just go up to my room, if you don't mind. You two go right ahead and entertain each other. If you don't mind, of course.”

Gallstone grins and now I know what he reminds me of with his bushy hair. A wolf. It is like Gorgonzola says. And now he is sneaking around Gorgonzola’s wife.

I just go upstairs but already I have an idea in the old noggin. When I get into the room I make for the trunk and pull out the rest of the tuxedo, also the top hat. I put these on, and then go for the mirror.

For a minute I am afraid to look. I stare down at my coat and pants. They are very ordinary-looking to me, and I can see them very plainly. So naturally I know I must be able to see them in the mirror.

But when I do look in the mirror, there is nothing. Nothing at all. The coatsleeves come down over my hands and the pants cuffs cover my shoes, and the top-hat pulls down over my face—all this I know, but I do not see it in the mirror. The mirror is blank. Absolutely blank.

I pull off the hat. Then I see my head hanging in empty space. This looks worse, so I put the hat back on, slow. And I am invisible again.

Maybe there is some new chemical in the cloth, or some fibre that does not reflect light. Whatever it is, Gorgonzola has an invisible suit, and I am wearing it. This is enough for me.

Because I have this plan. I do not like Gallstone the Magician and I promise to watch Gorgonzola’s wife. So I decide to go ahead.

I wait awhile and then I sneak downstairs wearing the invisible suit. Sure enough, Gallstone and Mrs. Gorgonzola are at the supper table, flirting with each other.

When I slide in, he is showing off by juggling three water glasses in the air at once. She giggles and watches him and he smirks all over the place. Pretty soon he puts down the glasses and pulls out his napkin. A big rubber plant grows from underneath it.

“Oh, Mr. Gallstone, you are so clever,” she says.

“Just call me Oscar,” he says. And pulls a live snake out from the potatoes. “I’ll bet your husband can’t do this,” he remarks.

"Oh—him," sniffs Mrs. Gorgonzola. "He doesn't do anything. Before we were married, he used to be so cute—always grabbing rabbits out of my neck and surprising me by turning coffee into champagne. Now he doesn't even juggle the dinner plates any more."

"Such neglect! Shameful!" says Gallstone. He reaches over and tweaks her ear. A gopher jumps out.

"You're wonderful, Oscar," she tells him.

"That's nothing at all to what I can do," boasts Gallstone. "Come into the living room."

"Why?"

"I want to show you some of my parlor tricks."

THEY go into the living room. Mrs. Gorgonzola grabs his arm. I follow right behind, but of course they can not see me at all.

"You ought to leave that clumsy oaf of a husband," Gallstone suggests. "A woman like you deserves only the best kind of thaumaturgy, to say nothing of a little gayety now and then."

"Oh—I couldn't," she says.

"Why not? What has your husband got that I haven't got? What if he does saw you in half? I've got a trick where I can saw you into four parts. Six, even. And if you'll join my act instead I'll promise not to stop until I can cut you into sixteen pieces."

"That would be thrilling," she blushes.

"Why your husband doesn't even know how to stick knives into you in the basket trick," Gallstone sneers. "Me, I can use axes on you."

"You make it all sound so fascinating," she simpers, snuggling up against him.

"Tricks? Why I've got tricks Gorgonzola never even dreamed of," whispers Gallstone, grabbing her in a halfnelson and giving her the kind of look a rat has when he grabs a piece of cheese.

"I know what kind of tricks you have," I bust out. "And you can stick them back up your sleeve, Gallstone."

"What's that?" Mrs. Gorgonzola shrieks, jumping up.

Gallstone looks around.

"Huh?"

"That voice—it spoke to me out of empty air."

They stare but they do not see me, of course, even though I am standing right in front of them.

"You must be imagining things," says Gallstone, with a puzzled look.

"Ouch! I didn't imagine that," snaps Mrs. Gorgonzola.

Because I decide to pinch her in a likely spot at this moment, and do so, hard.

"What?" asks Gallstone.

"That!" shrieks the lady. "There—you did it again. You naughty boy."

"I didn't do anything."

"You pinched me."

"Where?"

"On the davenport here."

"How can I pinch you when you're holding both my hands?"

"Well somebody pinched me."

I stick my face down close.

"You'll get pinched again if you don't stop holding hands with that bushy-haired baboon," I mutter.

"Eeek—that voice again!" Mrs. Gorgonzola wails. "Don't tell me you didn't hear it this time, Oscar."

Gallstone is on the spot now. All at once he smiles.

"Oh, that voice," he says. "Just another little trick of mine your husband can't duplicate. That's a spirit. A ghost. I'm psychic, you know. I can call ghosts out of the empty air."

She gives him a sick calf look.

"Oh, how wonderful you are!" she says. They go into another clinch. I break this up by stepping on Gallstone's toes, hard. Then I let out a long groan. They jump apart fast.

"CUT out that romantic stuff, Goldilocks," I grate. "Or you'll be a ghost yourself in a couple of minutes."

"I don't think I'd like to live with such spirits," Mrs. Gorgonzola wails. "Oscar, make that voice go away." Gallstone is plenty confused. But he stands up, and tries to smile.

"Listen, darling—once and for all, let's forget all these things. I want you to go away with me and join my act. That's what I've come to tell you. You and I can take your husband's new tricks with us and—"

Aha, that was it! He was after those tricks, just the way Gorgonzola warns me. I watch the two of them close.

"I'm not sure," Mrs. Gorgonzola flutters. "You must let me decide."

"No time for that. I'll prove to you that I'm a better magician than Gorgonzola any day. And then you must come with me."

"Well—"

"Come on. Name a trick your husband can't do and I'll do it for you right now."

"Let me see. Oh yes, that safe trick. You know that big iron safe he has. He tries to get out of it after it's locked and he just can't seem to master the combination."

"Let me at it," Gallstone boasts. "Lead me to it. I'll show you."

"It's in the cellar," she says.

"Show me."

They go downstairs and I follow. I try to trip Gallstone on the stairs, but miss. And there we are in the cellar; the two standing in front of a big iron safe and me invisible next to them.

The safe is really a terrific box, big and heavy, with a huge lock on it. Gallstone looks at it and laughs.

"Why breaking that is like breaking a baby bank," he sneers. "I'll climb in and let you lock me up. In three minutes I'll be out again and we'll be off together. Is it a deal?"

Mrs. Gorgonzola blushes.

"Very well, Oscar," she says. "You have my consent. If you can break out of this safe I'll run away with you."

"Kiss me, darling," moos Gallstone. They clinch, but I stick my face in between and Gallstone kisses my neck. He blinks a little but breaks away. Then he wraps his coat around himself and opens the safe.

"Here I go," he says, crawling inside, and bending himself double to squeeze in. "Lock the door, darling. I'll be out in no time."

I stoop down and notice, when he pulls his feet in, that there is a little steel pick attached to the sole of one shoe. But Mrs. Gorgonzola does not see this. She closes the door and blows him a kiss and then steps back to wait.

In about a minute I can hear this Gallstone fumbling around inside with his pick, working on the combination. I just wait. The tumblers start to dick.

ANOTHER minute goes by and another. Still no Gallstone. Mrs. Gorgonzola stoops down.

"Are you all right, Oscar?" she calls. "Sure—be with you in a jiffy," he gasps.

But a jiffy passes and so does five minutes. And no Gallstone.

Mrs. Gorgonzola is getting impatient.

"Can I help you?" she asks.

"No—I'm—getting on fine—just a second," he groans.

Fifteen more minutes go by. Gallstone is thumping around and rattling the combination and panting for breath.

Mrs. Gorgonzola is getting redder and redder. All at once she looks at her wristwatch.

"You've been in there twenty-five minutes," she calls. "I'll give you five minutes more."

There is a grunt from inside and a lot of rattling. But five minutes pass, and Gallstone is still locked in the safe. The noise stops. Gallstone gives up trying to get out. Mrs. Gorgonzola gives a sigh and looks stern.

"Very well, Oscar, you have shown me your true colors. You are nothing but an imposter. You are not a good magician. You cannot find your way out of a telephone booth, let alone a safe. I will never run off with you. Good night!"

She turns around and marches upstairs. I followed her, because there is nothing more I have to do. I do my job when I keep turning the dial of the safe after Gallstone lines up the tumblers.

SO I go to bed very happy. Gallstone will sneak away like the beaten pup he is. Now I know Mrs. Gorgonzola is all through with him, and there is nothing to worry about. Gorgonzola will be back in a day or so and his tricks are safe after all.

I take off my coat and hat and am just going to remove the tuxedo trousers, when the door opens. Futzi walks in.

"Honorable Feep, I expect you are—oh mercy what in name is honorable that?" he yells.

He is staring at my trousers, or rather at the place where my trousers should be. But because of the pants I wear, he does not see anything below my waist at all.

"Oh what unhappy accident!" he wails. "You get cut in twice by auto car?"

"No, of course not," I say.

"Then perhaps you lose on races?"

"There are some things," I answer with dignity, "which I will never bet. No, I do not lose anything."

"But you have no limbs downstairs," Futzi wails. "Just head and torso."

"I have more so than torso," I assure him, stepping out of the trousers. "There, you see? All that happens, Futzi, is I wear this suit of Gorgonzola's.

It is some kind of trick suit, because when I wear it I am invisible."

"So?" whispers Futzi. "That is remarkable, also strange."

"Sure," I say. "This must be one of the new tricks that Gorgonzola wishes me to protect. I prefer you do not mention this around. Now I lock the suit up again and that is that."

So I haul out the trunk and lock up the tuxedo and hat. Futzi hangs around staring at me.

"Where is honorable Gallstone?" he asks.

"Downstairs on ice," I tell him. "He locks himself up in a safe like a defense bond."

"Then he does not rush away with Mrs. Gorgonzola?" Futzi says. "I expect they lope off together." His face falls.

"No elopement," I tell him. "You better go down and unlock the safe now and let Gallstone go home."

FUTZI still hangs around.

"Maybe you like me to press honorable suit?" he asks. "Make it nice and fresh for Mr. Gorgonzola to be invisible in? Gorgonzola always proud to look his best even if invisible, I gamble you."

"No, get out of here," I snap.

"I press and iron plenty fast," he begs. "Please, let me press nice invisible coat and trousers."

"I'll press your trousers for you with my foot if you don't scram," I suggest.

So Futzi scrams.

I go to bed. I tuck the keys right under my pillow, too, because I do not wish to lose them. An invisible suit is plenty valuable and I am taking no chances. I figure on keeping awake.

But I am not awake a couple of hours later. In fact I am very much asleep, and dreaming about rabbits with big teeth and bushy hair that are locking me into a safe. The dream is so real I can even hear the tumblers clicking.

The clicking gets louder and I wake up. Then I know what is making the sound. The keys under my pillow.

They are sliding out, in a hand.

It is a yellow hand. Futzi's hand.

He is standing over my bed in the dark, grabbing for those keys.

"Hey!" I yell, jumping up.

"Hey!" I yell, going down again.

Because Futzi's hand drops the keys and grabs my wrist. He jerks it and I go back on my head. Then his other hand gets hold of my waist. I turn over on my stomach. Then he uses both hands in a very busy fashion and we have quite a scramble.

In a minute I am sitting on the bed looking straight into a pair of legs wrapped around my neck.

Something about them looks quite familiar to me. And I suddenly realize that these are my legs. Around my neck. I am tied up like a Christmas package.

Futzi stands in front of me, grinning.

"Very sorry to disturb," he says.

"What is this?" I gasp, trying to get loose.

"Jiu-jitsu," he tells me.

"Jiu-jitsu? But that's a Japanese trick, isn't it? Then you're not a Filipino, you're a—"

Futzi bows.

"That is most correct," he tells me. "I am not a Filipino, Mr. Feep. Nor do I need to continue the disguise with that ridiculous accent, either. All I require now are those keys of yours. I shall take the suit and leave."

"But I don't understand—" I say.

"Of course not." Futzi laughs, very low. "Why should I disguise myself as a Filipino house boy, get a job in a magician's house, and act as a servant?

"The answer is obvious. Gorgonzola is a clever man, but I know his secret. Fie has not left town—he's here now, down at local headquarters of army ordnance. He's telling them that he has discovered a new chemical treatment which renders clothing invisible and offering it to the army as a military weapon. Like Dunninger's work in camouflage that makes battleships invisible. The invisible suit is just a sample of the material. Quite a valuable secret.

"Now I have that suit. I shall wear it, slip downtown and put Gorgonzola out of the way once and for all. Information comes to me that his conference with ordnance officials is scheduled for late tonight.

"Naturally I would not be admitted to such a gathering under normal circumstances." Here Futzi gives a little smirk and bow. "But with this suit on as a passport I think I can slip in quite freely. With your curiosity thus satisfied, I leave you."

I still sit there with my legs tied into Boy Scout knots while Futzi goes over to the closet, hauls out the trunk, and opens it. He gets the dress suit and hat and slips them on very fast. He is so small the clothes hang all over him and in a few seconds he is gone. Disappears into thin air. I see the door open. His voice chuckles.

"Goodnight, honorable Feep," he says, sarcastic. "We must discuss hari-kari again some time. Perhaps you will prefer committing it yourself when you think of what's going to happen to your friend Gorgonzola."

THEN the door closes and I am left tied to be fit. I grunt and groan and wrestle with myself, but I can not get my legs loose. Finally I roll off the bed onto the floor. That does it. It cracks my skull, but it loosens my legs.

I stagger downstairs to the phone and look up the ordnance headquarters number. I ring and there is no answer. Then I decide to call the cops—until I remember this invisible suit stuff is a military secret. Also, it will not sound so good to ask the cops to chase an invisible man at midnight.

So there is only one thing to do. I spot Gallstone’s Packard still standing outside. Futzi has the other car, of course.

I have some trouble sitting down inside, with my sore legs, but no trouble at all in getting that car up to ninety. When I think of that invisible little Jap sneaking around and trying to knock off Gorgonzola and steal his plans, I know there is no time to lose.

In exactly seven minutes I pull up in front of the old destination. The joint is dark, but open, and I make the stairs very fast to the second floor. There is a light burning in an office room and the door is open. They are inside—and I am sure from the open door that Futzi is with them. Invisible.

I tiptoe in and look through the inside door. There are four characters sitting around a desk, and sure enough.

Gorgonzola is with them. He has a briefcase open in front of him and he is talking very fast.

I am the only one who sees what is behind him, though. It hangs in the air very still, but it is ready for action. A big black revolver, in the hands of that invisible Jap.

I throw myself through the doorway and grab the revolver. There is a lot of yelling, but I get it in my hands. Then there is a real yell.

Naturally, all these birds can see is me, waving a gun. They do not see any invisible Futzi, and I can not yell out to them to look for him, either. He can be hiding anywhere in the room and nobody can spot him.

So I just turn my gun around, point it at a perfect bullseye, and shoot Futzi.

And that is how I save a military secret.

LEFTY FEEP stopped waving the celery and put it in his mouth.

“I can understand now why it upset you when I spoke of not seeing you,” I said. “You must have had quite an experience.”

“Sure. But it is O.K. now. Gorgonzola gives the ordnance department his new chemical invisibility formula, his wife gives Gallstone the air, and I give that little Jap spy some lead poisoning where it does him the least good."

I coughed.

"About that business of shooting the Jap," I said. "There's just one question that bothers me."

"Yes?"

"Well, you say he was wearing this invisible suit and nobody could see him. Yet you managed to shoot him at once. Just what were you aiming at?"

Feep blushed.

"I do not like to say exactly," he confessed. "But I will mention that I get suspicious that night when Futzi hangs around wanting to get his hands on the suit. I decide to figure out a way to make the suit a little less invisible, in case it is worn by anybody else. So I do, and as a result when Futzi wears it he gives me a target he does not notice himself in his hurry putting it on."

"What target?" I persisted.

"I refuse to say," Feep grinned. "All I can tell you is that before I lock honorable suit up for the night, I take a scissors and cut a big hole in the seat of honorable pants."

A Question of Etiquette

Cities always twinkle with little lights. Lights to ward off the great blackness of night; the blackness where the dead dwell—and the things that are not dead . . .

THE house was old, like all the rest of them on the block. The gate squeaked as I pushed it open. That was the only sound I heard. My shoes had stopped squeaking hours ago. Taking the census takes the squeak out of shoes very quickly.

I walked up the steps of the porch. I was tired of walking up steps. I rang the bell. I was tired of ringing the bell.

Feet sounded inside. I was tired of feet sounding inside.

Just the same, I braced myself.

"Here it comes," I thought. "Another nose!"

And I was particularly tired of counting noses.

You understand how it is. Walk all day. Ring doorbells. Lug a heavy portfolio under your arm. Ask the same stupid questions over and over again. And when you finish, you haven't sold anybody a vacuum cleaner. You haven't sold a Fuller brush, or even a package of shoe laces. All you get out of it is four cents a nose, taking the census. There's no chance for advancement. Uncle Sam isn't going to call you into his private office, hand you a cigar, and say, "Well, now! I hear you've been doing a mighty fine job of this house-to-house work. From now on you're going to sit at this desk. No more nose-counting for you."

No, all you get out of this census business is a new list of noses to count tomorrow. Four-cent noses. Big ones and little ones, pug noses and hooked noses, and red, white and blue schnozzles—until you develop a case of nasal allergy. You feel that if the door opens on just one more nose you'll slam it back and go away after tweaking or punching that nose.

So here I was, waiting for this particular nose to stick out. I braced myself, and the door opened.

A sharp pinched beak appeared, the advance guard for a nondescript face and an ordinary housewife's body. The nose sniffed the air and hovered there somewhat uncertainly in the protecting shadow of the door.

"Well?"

"I'm from the U.S. Government, madame. I'm taking the census."

"Oh. Census-taker?"

"Yes. May I come in and ask you a few questions?"

This kind of sparkling dialogue went on all day. Just one great big exchange of personalities after another.

"Come on."

Down a dark hall, into a dark parlor. A lamp flared up as I set the bulky portfolio down on the table, opened it up, and drew out the form.

THE woman watched me. Her solid face was expressionless. Housewife's face. Used to watching encyclopedia salesmen and bill collectors, with one eye kept on the kitchen stove.

Well, thirty-five questions to wade through. Routine. I filled in the MALE or FEMALE bracket, and the RACE bracket, set down the address. Then, "Name?"

"Lisa Lorini."

"Married or single?"

"Single."

"Age?"

"Four hundred and seven."

"Age?"

"Four hundred and seven."

"Oh—what?"

"Four hundred and seven."

All right, so I work all day, so I run into a half-wit. I looked into the blank face. Well, hurry on, get it over with. "Your occupation?"

"I am a witch."

"What?"

"I said that I am a witch."

For four cents it wasn't worth it. I pretended to write it down and skipped to the next question.

"Who do you work for?"

"I work for myself. And, of course, for my Master."

"Master?"

"Satan Merkatrig. The Devil."

FOR ten cents it wasn't worth it. Lisa Lorini, single, four hundred and seven years old, a witch, working for the Devil.

Oh, no, it wasn't worth while for fifty cents.

"Thanks. That's all. I'll be going now."

The woman wasn't interested. I folded up the sheet, jammed it into the portfolio, grabbed my hat, turned around, and headed for the door.

The door was gone.

Well, I can't help it. The door was gone.

It had been there only a minute ago, just a plain, ordinary door in an ordinary sitting room. There was an armchair at one side of it and a small table at the other.

Well, I saw the armchair and I saw the table. But there was no door in between.

I started off in another direction. Over here, perhaps. Still no door. No door anywhere in the room.

Walking around in the hot sun all day isn't good for anybody. Brooding about noses is tire first sign. Then you begin to hear voices answering questions in a crazy way. After that you can't find doors. All right. I turned to the woman.

"Madam—would you show me the way out of here? I must have—"

"There is no way out."

Funny. I hadn't noticed the quality of her voice. It was pitched evenly, but low. Resonant. And there was no tiredness in it. I sensed something else. Was it—amusement?

"But—"

"I should like you to stay here with me for a while. It was fortunate that you dropped in."

"Dropped in," from a witch! But she wasn't a witch, damn it! There are no witches.

There are no doors.

"You will share a cup of tea with me."

"Really, I must be—"

"It is prepared. Sit down, young man, please do. I'll just take it off the fire."

Now I hadn't seen the fireplace behind me. I hadn't seen the flame. But the fire was burning, and there was a pot on the hearth irons. She stooped over, and a shadow fell across the wall.

It was a big, black shadow. Big and black, in the way that a frightened child says the words. A big, black shadow of a woman, creeping across the wall.

I stared at Lisa Lorini. She still looked like a housewife. Black hair, plaited and parted in the middle. A slim figure, unbent by years.

Four hundred and seven years—

A good thought to skip. Her face now; the nose was sharp, the mouth taut, the eyes slightly slitted. But the features were quite ordinary. Quite ordinary, except that the trick of firelight lent them a vulpine cast. A red face grinning as it bent over a pot.

No, she was feeble-minded. Feebleminded, like the old hags they used to burn at the stake in medieval days. Hundreds of thousands of crones and beldames burned at the stake. All of them feebleminded. Millions of them. All feebleminded. Not a sane one in the lot. Of course not. Witches were a myth. All of the millions were merely crazy in the same way, with the same story. Millions of lunatics. There were no witches. Only—

Only I was afraid.

She was smiling at me. One claw—one hand, I mean—held out the cup. Steam spiralled up from a brownish liquid. Tea. Witch-brew. Drink it and—

Drink it and shut up! This was foolishness. I tried to look around again for the door, but it was dark in that room. The fire flickered so. It was quite red, that fire. I couldn't see clearly. Besides, it was hot in here. Drink the tea and get out.

She had a cup too. It wasn't poison. She hadn't dropped anything into it. What is it witches are supposed to drop? Herbs, I guessed. And all that stuff you read about in Macbeth. They believed it in those days. Lunatics!

So I drank the tea. Maybe she'd let me out then. Or rather, I'd humor her and drink it and then get out. That sounded a little better.

"I don't have many visitors."

Her words came softly. Across the table I felt her eyes watching my face. I imitated a man smiling.

"I used to. But business has fallen off."

"Business?"

"Witchcraft. Sorcery. It's no good any more. So few people believe. They don't come to me for love-philtres, or little things like that, let alone the big things. I haven't made a poppet for years."

"Poppet?"

"ONE of those little wax dolls shaped like a man. The kind you stick pins in when you wish death upon your enemies. Men don't hate any more. They don't want a witches' curse. I have not killed for years. Business has fallen off."

Sure, sure. Kill anybody today? No? All right, let's close the office up, our business has fallen off.

Just a tired business woman. A career girl, no less.

But my hand trembled so I nearly dropped my tea-cup.

"All of my beautiful spells and—but you're not drinking your tea."

The condemned man and his hearty breakfast. Eat your cereal, it's good for you!

"Drink your tea."

Quite a spot. My head told me that I must drink it. Drink it to prove that she was crazy, or that I was crazy, that there were no witches and nothing would happen. My hands didn't want me to drink it, though. It took quite a bit of maneuvering to get the cup to my lips. She watched me as I sipped.

The tea was bitter, acrid, but warm. A foreign brew, but it wasn't Oolong. It went down easily enough, except for that tart taste.

"I am surprised, young man, that you evinced so little interest in my occupation. One does not meet a witch every day."

She had to tell me.

"I'd like to talk about it," I said. "Some other time. But really, I've got a lot of names on my list, and I have to be going. Thanks for the tea."

I kept looking around for the door. The fire made a sort of red pattern in the room—but not wholly there. The red pattern was in my head, too. It flamed and danced. The tea had been hot, and now heat shimmered through my head. Shadows mingled with the red pattern in the room, and they too seemed to invade my brain. Dark shadows from the dark brew of the tea. Shimmering red and shadows in my head, before my eyes, blocking the vision of the door. I couldn't see it. I had the illusion that if I concentrated hard enough, and long enough, I could find it. It was there, somewhere in the room, somewhere amidst the redness and the shadows. It had to be there. But I couldn't see it.

I could see her, though, quite clearly. Her nondescript features were stronger now. That grim, ironic smile held an ancient wisdom. She didn't need wrinkles. That smile was older than a mortal lifetime could engrave on a face. It was as old as the grin on a skull.

Yes, I could see her, even if I couldn't see the door for lights and shadows.

"I must go now," I said. My voice sounded far away. Only her eyes were close. Her eyes, holding the red light and the black shadow.

I stood up.

I tried to stand up.

Once I drank nine vodkas in a hot tavern, then rose to go home and found myself lying on the floor.

Now I had drunk a cup of tea and when I rose—

I rose.

Floated. My feet weren't touching the floor. They were resting on air—solid air, made up of red firelight, dark shadow-blur. My limbs tingled with something stronger than vodka. Little needles pin-cushioned my body. I weaved in air.

"Don't leave yet." Her voice didn't notice my position. Her smile did. She understood, all right. "Don't leave yet," said Lisa Lorini. "I have so few guests. You must come with me tonight."

"Come with you?"

"I am going—out."

"A party?" Always the stiff upper lip, ready retort, mustn't realize where I was, how I was.

Her smile deepened, yawned, engulfed the thought. "Yes, you might call it that. And I need you as a matter of etiquette." A witches' etiquette. Beezlebub and Emily Post! I was crazy, definitely. Floating in air, and talking etiquette.

“You see,” said Lisa Lorini, “I must obey certain—rules. Just as you, holding a dinner party, must not seat thirteen at dinner. I must not hold a Sabbath unless there are thirteen present. A full coven. He wouldn’t like it.”

“He?”

“Satan Merkatrig.” Again the smile. I began to dread that smile, prepare for it—like a convict lashed to a post, waiting for the next cut of the whip.

“And so you must come with me to the Sabbath tonight,” said Lisa Lorini.

“A witches’ Sabbath?”

“Exactly. We hold it on the hills. We have far to travel, so you must prepare.”

“I’m not going.”

YES, and a three-year-old kid isn’t going to bed when its parents tell it to, either. I knew what good my refusal was when I wobbled there in the air. I knew it when I saw her eyes. She didn’t have to emphasize it with her laugh, though.

I was learning fast. An hour ago it was lunacy. Now that chuckle crept up and scraped at my heart. Witchcraft, Black Magic, ancient dreads in a room of black and red. It was real; just as real as when thousands died screaming in the flames to expiate their evil in an age when men were wise enough to dread man’s blasphemy before the laws of God and Nature.

“You are going. Maggit shall prepare you.”

Maggit appeared. There was no door, so I don’t know how Maggit got into the room. I don’t know exactly what Maggit was, either. Maggit was small and furry, like a weasel with human hands—very tiny—and a face. It wasn’t a human face, although Maggit did have eyes and ears and a mouth and nose. But the evil in that face transcended humanity—the evil, peering out from a tiny hood of animal fur, and grinning with a wisdom neither animals or humans should possess.

Maggit crawled across the floor and piped, “Mistress Lisa?” in a detestably shrill little voice that somehow shocked me more than anything else.

Maggit was—what was the term—the witch’s familiar. The animal thing, given to a witch or sorcerer by the Devil, when the Black Bible of the Sabbath was signed in the coven. The little fiend, the familiar spirit, servant of Satan.

Only such things don’t exist, save in the laws and the writings of every civilized nation for thousands of years. Such things cannot be.

So it was imagination that crawled up my floating body as I wavered, powerless to move a hand against that hideous, furry pattering that chilled my flesh. It was hallucination’s tiny paws that began to rub my chest and throat with a yellowish paste or salve Lisa Lorini gave to it from a jar on the table. It was legend that chuckled and rubbed the burning ointment on my limbs. It was nightmare that perched on my shoulder, chattered in my ear, and lisped unspeakable vileness as it rocked with glee.

“The flying ointment.” Lisa Lorini’s voice came through a burning wave that caused my tingling body to tremble. “Now we can depart.”

I scarcely noticed her nakedness. The black hair, swirling now, covered her like a cloak.

Or a shroud. A shroud for long-dead wickedness to wear. Her slim hands rubbed the yellow paste upon her limbs. Her body floated upward, joined mine.

“No broomsticks?” I thought, hysterically. From some popular magazine I remembered an article on the “delusions of flight.” Witch-ointment, rubbed on the limbs to give the illusion of flying through space. Popular fancy had transformed the ointment to broomsticks. But the salve was real enough. Powerful drugs. Aconite, belladonna, others. Giving rise to these hallucinations. Any chemist could prepare it. Run down to your neighborhood druggist tonight and—

I had to stop that.

I couldn’t.

“Hold my hand.” She grasped it. Two electric wires met. Tingling shocks ran through me. We were rising. Was that a door? Floating out. Darkness. Night. Floating along. She held me.

Superman, the cartoon character. Stop that hysteria! Up into blackness, her naked white body curved like the ivory horns of a half moon.

The cottage below. Witches’ cottage. “Let me live in a house by the side of the road and—” Yes, very funny. “And be a fiend to man.” Hysteria again. Who wouldn’t be hysterical, floating through air with a Sabbath hag? And Maggit, chittering as it rocked on her shoulder, its tiny paws locked in her raven hair.

And then we swooped. I held on. The burning was gone now. The wind was rushing by. Below, the city twinkled. Cities always twinkle. Little lights, built to ward off the great blackness of night. The blackness where wolves howl and owls screech, the blackness where the dead dwell, and the things that are not dead. Lights to guard, lights to hide a fear. And we, above, flying through that fear, into its blackest depths.

I don’t know how long, how far. I don’t know how we descended. There was the dark, domed hill, and the fire flaring at its peak. There were the crouching figures—white against the shadowed hillside, black against the flaming fires. A horde of furry creatures scampered at the feet of the presences. There were eight, nine, ten—no, eleven.

Plus Lisa Lorini and myself.

Thirteen in a coven.

Thirteen—and the sacrifice.

I didn’t look at the faces. They were not meant to be looked at, only dreamed. Lisa Lorini’s own face was masked by exultation. It was she who prepared the sacrifice. The black goat was led to a rock before the fire. One of the other crones wielded the knife. A third held the bowl. And when the bowl was filled, all drank. Yes, I said all.

THAT ointment burned. Even on my feet it held me in a burning web. I couldn’t run, I couldn’t move out of the circle of firelight. And when the drum began to pound, I joined the circle. The furry things were lapping at the empty bowl, and their chattering was drowned in the drumming din, the howling.

“Lisa has brought an acolyte,” wheezed one of the hags.

“ ’Tis in place of Meg, who could not come,” called Lisa Lorini.

Those are the last intelligible words I heard, the last intelligible thought I managed to retain.

Because the howling rose and the fire rose, and it became revival meeting—voodoo—bedlam, only worse than any of these prosaic terms. They were calling on somebody.

Somebody came.

No burst of flames. No lightning. No theatricals. That was all done by the crones. It meant nothing, really; no more than any savage cavortings about a stone idol.

It was pure business. He stepped out from behind one of the rocks, carrying a large book under his arm, for all the world like a bank examiner coming to examine balances.

But bank examiners are not—black. He wasn’t negroid, not in the least, but—black. Even the eyeballs, the fingernails. A black shadow, a limping shadow. Whether he wore a cloak, or whether a deeper shadow draped his figure, I don’t know.

They were quiet when he entered the circle. He opened his book and they crowded around. Their mumbling rose in the “night. I crouched down next to the rocks.

Lisa Lorini was talking to him, pointing my way. He didn’t turn his head, but he was aware of me. He didn’t smile, or nod, or exhibit a single movement. But I felt him do those things. He handed out orders. He heard reports.

It was a business meeting. Satan and Co., holding a Board Meeting on a hilltop. Souls bartered, dark deeds recorded. And tire black man scribbled in his book, the beldames babbled, and I crouched there trembling in the night while the little furry creatures skulked about, my ankles. I shouldn't have trembled, for the blackman's actions were very prosaic after all. Prosaic—as hell.

Then it happened. The white figures screamed down out of the dark sky. The clinging figure at its breasts dropped to the ground. There was a cry.

"Meg! Meg has come!"

Meg, the missing witch.

They turned as she advanced, breathless.

The black man spoke then. I won't attempt to set down the sound of it. Something of rusty locks and the primal grumbling of volcanoes. Age and depth, mingled in a sort of loathsome hissing, as though articulate human speech could not frame the concepts of daemonic thought.

"There are fourteen at coven."

I wasn't the only one trembling now. They all were shaking. White jelly figures in the firelight. The voice did it.

Lisa Lorini whirled. She dragged me into the circle before I could attempt resistance.

"I—I thought Meg wasn't—"

"There are fourteen. Fourteen."

The voice hinted. Just hinted its anger.

"But—"

"There is a Law. There is a Punishment."

The voice capitalized the words.

"Mercy—"

You don't ask him for mercy.

I saw it happen. I saw her clutch at her throat when his black paw grazed her wrist. Lisa Lorini writhed to the ground, wriggled for a moment like a white slug impaled on a stick, and then lay silent.

The black eyes, the black pupils turned to me.

"There must be thirteen. That is the Law. So you shall sign and take her place."

"I?"

You don't question him, either.

Somebody was holding the bowl. Another guided my hand, opened the book he gave to her.

I felt the clinging, furry form of Maggit move swiftly over my chest. It was at my neck—nibbling. A trickle of blood fell in the bowl. A sharpened stick dipped in it. The stick was placed in my hand.

"Sign," said the voice of the black man.

You don't disobey him—not when you hear the voice.

My fingers moved. I signed.

And then his hand, his black hand, reached out and gripped mine. I felt a surge, a blinding wave of redness, blackness, voice-depth, wind.

Something was lying on the ground now, but it wasn't Lisa Lorini. I glanced at the body because it looked familiar. It was my own body that lay there.

The black man was saying something again, but the buzzing drone of his voice was lost. The cackling from the circle about me was lost.

"I unbaptize thee in the name of—"

Maggit led me away. Maggit whispered, "Fly."

I didn't hear. The soaring journey back was instinct—instinct born in another's body, another's brain.

I slept in that house, slept in the darkness, slept in the conviction that when I awoke the dream would be over.

I awoke.

I saw the mirror.

I saw Lisa Lorini, witch, with my own eyes—peering out of her body.

Maggit chattered at my feet.

That was a week ago. Since that time I've learned to listen to Maggit. Maggit tells me things.

Maggit showed me her books, and her stock of herbs. Maggit told me how to make the philtres and the potions, and what to do to keep this body of mine from aging. Maggit told me how to brew the tea, and compound the paste. Maggit says that the coven meets again on the hilltop tonight.

I remember the rest, of course. I know that now I’ve signed the book and taken Lisa Lorini’s place, I can’t escape. Unless I use her method. Bring another to the coven, and let—etiquette—have its way.

That’s the only solution.

TODAY, after a week, they must be looking for me. Census headquarters must have sent out another man on my route. Herb Jackson might take it over. He’s in this district. Yes, Herb Jackson might knock on my door late this afternoon, and come in to ask Lisa Lorini some questions about the census.

When he comes, I should be ready.

I think I’m going to get busy and brew up a pot of that tea.

Son of a Witch

Lefty Feep was just bidding to run up the opposition at the auction, but he went too far and bought a bale of woe.

WHEN Lefty Feep approached my table at Jack's Shack, I rose to my feet with a gasp of indignation.

"Here, let me brush you off," I said. "The nerve of those careless waiters—spilling a tray full of chop suey on your suit."

Feep's eyebrows rose and circled above his thin, morose face. His hand motioned me back into my seat.

"Nobody spills chop suey on me," he corrected. "This is not Chinese hash on my coat—it is the weave of my suit." I took another look. What I saw on Feep's suit was more of a writhe than a weave. The threads cascaded snakily through a baggy tweed in a riot of clashing colors.

As Feep sat down I shook my head.

"I don't understand you, Lefty," I murmured. "These loud clothes you sport—your taste in color! Don't you ever wear anything quiet?"

"Sure," snapped Feep. "Earmuffs."

"I mean, why these awful patterns and color combinations? Have you no love of beauty?"

"Certainly. Me, I like blondes."

"No," I amended, hastily. "I speak of aesthetics."

"Aesthetics? I have aesthetics last year when they yank my tonsils out."

"That's anaesthetics," I told him. "But don't you like soft, pastel shadings in paintings and tapestries? Don't you like the quiet richness, say, of a fine oriental rug?"

"Rugs!" snarled Lefty Feep.

"But you haven't—"

"Rugs!" howled Feep. "Bugs to rugs!"

"What's the matter, man? I only asked you if you liked rugs."

Feep's eyebrows bristled like twin toothbrushes. He leaned even closer and spoke from between tight lips. "Rugs are for mugs, thugs, and slugs," he grated. "On my floor at home you find only tile, linoleum, or empty gin bottles. Rugs, never!"

"Why? What have you got against rugs?"

"You ask me that? Can it be that I do not tell you about the time I go to Out-Of-Business Oscar's auction?"

"Can be," I answered. "I never knew you attended an auction in your life."

"It is very nearly the last thing I do attend," murmured Lefty Feep, closing his eyes. "When I think what could happen to me because of it, the cold chills still use my spine for a racetrack."

Something about Feep's voice made me want to hear the story. Or perhaps it was just the fact that he now grabbed me by the lapels and held me so I couldn't escape.

"I will tell you about the experience I have with a rug," he muttered. "Then we will take you out to be defrosted."

"Why?"

"Because," whispered Lefty Feep, "it will turn your blood to ice."

I sat there, refrigerating slowly, as Feep began to unwind his tongue . . .

* * *

I AM always a very active personality, as you know. I am hep to pep. Making lazy drives me crazy. Well, I get up bright and early one afternoon, all ready for a big day. I am just pulling the cork out of my breakfast when I realize there is nothing to do.

This is a terrible feeling for an ambitious guy like me, but it is true. Today there is nothing for me to do at all. No races are running. No football pools are going. All the pinball machines are shut down. There isn't even a crap game going on over at Gorilla Gabface's pool hall. In other words, I am unemployed.

Naturally, any sensible citizen will realize the only way out is to crawl right back into bed until at least the burlesque shows open. But I am all energy today, so I decide to go out and stroll around.

I am toddling down the old stem about an hour later when I find myself passing Out-Of-Business Oscar's.

This Out-Of-Business Oscar is a personality who runs a second hand joint down the street. He derives his nickname from the big signs he plasters up all over the front of his rubbish palace.

GOING OUT OF BUSINESS says the big banner across the front.

MUST VACATE IN THIRTY DAYS. FORCED SALE—LEASE EXPIRES!

It is hard to read the words on these signs. They are pretty faded, because the signs must be about twenty years old by now.

But Oscar has some new ones up today.

PRICES CUT says the first one.

PRICES SLASHED says the second one.

PRICES BLEEDING TO DEATH says the third.

Then there is one just under these that reads FIRE SALE. But I do not pay any attention to that. Out-Of-Business Oscar is the kind of guy who starts a fire sale every time he lights a cigar.

Which is pretty often, because Oscar finds a lot of cigars in front of the curb.

The sign that does interest me is hanging over the door. AUCTION TODAY!

SURE enough. I peek in and see a lot of specimens around a big counter; and Oscar is standing up on top looking like a judge with a gavel in his hand.

So I figure I got time to kill and maybe I can murder it by taking a look at this auction. I walk inside and listen while Oscar begins to deal out the spiel.

"Gentlemen," he yaps, just as though there are some in the crowd. "As you know, today we auction off the estate of the late Mrs. Bobo Grope. We are privileged to dispose of the household effects of this millionaire-ess—her valuable collection of old masters, her antiques and art treasures, and her priceless oriental curiosities."

Then he starts the sale. Well, to make a long story tedious, he is not doing so hot. The stuff he auctions off is very high class, but the customers aren't. They bid only a half buck or a dollar on all the lovely pictures and pottery. This is a shame—I am not a corner sewer of art, but from the way he describes it, I see that this is all the real McCoy, if oriental furnishings are ever made by any McCoy.

Poor Oscar warms up and sweats. He hauls out the brie and the brae and gives with the tongue. He grabs a couple pots and waves his arms.

"I have here two gorgeous specimens of the Sung Dynasty," he hollers. "Two exquisite Chinese cuspidors."

They go for a mere six bits.

"And here is a rare Ming mustache cup," he says—and knocks it down to an old goat for a dime.

So it goes. He sells an Egyptian mummy case to a musician who wants it to carry his bass viol in. He disposes of Hindu idols and Siamese carvings for a buck or two. It is breaking his heart.

On top of it, some smart alecks in the crowd keep making gay remarks, and it is very embarrassing to poor Oscar.

He hauls out a big rack and says,

"We will now proceed to dispose of this remarkable collection of Persian and Oriental rugs."

A jerk in the rear hollers out to him. “Get rid of that junk and start auctioning off the harem!”

This its too much for Oscar. He announces that there will be a five-minute pause in the sale and slide’s back of the counters.

I know he is going for a drink, so I quick scoot along after him and nab him in the act.

“Why it’s Lefty Feep,” he says, recognizing my lips on the bottle. “You are a sight for sore eyes. And my eyes are plenty sore today from looking at that crummy mob.”

“Too bad,” I sympathize.

“WELL, it is my fault,” he shrugs.

“This collection of Mrs. Bobo Grope’s is famous all over the world. A dozen big experts and orientalists wire and phone that they will show up today. I expect they will pay thousands for some of these rare and curious pieces. So I send out regular engraved announcements, very high class.

“Only I make a mistake. I print that the sale begins at three in the afternoon. And when I file notice legally, I set the time for two. According to law I must start the auction at two, and so here I am, an hour early. None of the big shots arrive yet, and this stuff goes for next to nothing.”

I pat him on the back with one hand and reach for the bottle with the other. Then Oscar looks at me.

“Feep, I must get price up. Maybe you will shill for me?”

“You mean, bid against some of those customers and make them bid higher?”

“I appreciate it if you do it,” Oscar tells me. Have another drink and let’s get to work.”

So we go back to the auction room and that is what I do. Whenever Oscar holds up a rug and somebody offers two dollars, I offer three. And so forth.

Prices rise. We auction off a dozen Arab blankets in a row.

Then Oscar gets to the bottom of the pile. He hauls out a dusty old roll, all tied together with wires at the ends. And he makes a little speech.

He says,

“Friends—I have here a very unusual item, just brought in from abroad.”

“What broad?” hollers the heckler in back. But Oscar gives him a nasty look and he shuts up.

“This is one of the rugs Mrs. Bobo Grope buys on her last trip east. It does not arrive until after her death, so I can not tell you its history. It has not been unwrapped but will be sold sight unseen in its original condition. I can assure you it is a very fine piece, because of the elaborate way in which it has been wrapped and crated. Yet I am willing to let it go to the highest bidder to expedite this sale.”

Oscar holds up the roll of carpet, tied together at the ends by wire, and waves it around.

“What am I offered?”

“Two bits,” yells a guy at my right.

Oscar glares.

“Two bits? I am insulted. Who knows what this precious bundle contains? Remember—Cleopatra herself comes rolled up in a rug when she visits Anthony. Perhaps she is hiding inside.”

“In that case, fifty cents,” says the heckler. “Though I prefer Gene Tierney.”

“Fifty cents!” snorts Oscar. “Why this rug maybe is worth thousands for all we know. Mrs. Bobo Grope pays plenty of money for her rugs. She has plenty of filthy lucre.”

“I don’t care if she is a filthy looker. I don’t care how she looks. I bid fifty cents!” snaps the heckler.

SO I see I must do some shilling here.

I bid a dollar. The heckler bids two. I come right back with three. He bids five. I have him going, so I bid seven. He bids eight. I shrug and bid ten.

“Ten dollars!” yells Oscar. “Do I hear more?”

I wait for the heckler. He is going to raise now. But—he doesn’t!

All at once Oscar bangs his gavel.

“Sold for ten dollars,” he shouts.

I just stand there with my mouth open. I never expect such a situation, at all. All at once I find out I just buy a lousy piece of carpet for ten dollars. It is awful.

But there is nothing else to do but go up to Oscar and take the rug. I give him ten dollars. Then I put my shoe back on.

“Double-crosser!” I whisper under my breath.

“Sorry,” Oscar tells me. “But who knows? Maybe you really got something there.”

“Sure. I get a backache carrying home this hunk of burlap,” I answer. And I pick up the heavy rug and march out, burning up.

I am still smouldering when I hit the sidewalk. So much so that I do not notice a guy coming in and he runs smack into me at the doorway. I stumble and almost drop my rug.

He turns around.

“Please pardon,” he says.

I am all set to give him a few hot remarks when I take another look. I see he just climbs out of a big limousine, about half a block long. So I modify my remarks before I open my mouth. I look again and realize he is a pretty old pickle. Quite a pappy guy, with a long white beard hanging down to his waist. So I modify my remarks still further and finally come out with,

“Don’t give me the bump, chump.”

He gives me the old eye and I suddenly get a shivering spell. Because he has a pair of very dark peepers with a glare in them like the neon lights on a funeral home. Those eyes are now boring a hole right through what I am carding.

“You attend the auction inside?” he asks, very fast.

I admit it.

"Is it very far along?" he questions, excited.

I tell him yes, nearly everything is sold by now.

Pappy jumps up and down on the sidewalk when he hears this. He almost falls on his face or vice-versa, only his beard is tangled up in my coat and it holds him up.

"Tell me I'm not too late," he gasps. I realize he must be one of the big collectors Oscar tells me about, who get the wrong announcements.

"What about the rugs?" he yells to me.

"I am afraid the rugs are going now," I answer. "In fact I purchase a couple yards of oriental cheese-cloth myself."

PAPPY'S face turns a rich purple, which looks very nice with his white beard. He hops up and down, almost pulling off my coat.

"Ten thousand dancing demons," he yells. "I may be too late to find it! Out of my way, by the high-hung, hammered, heated, hissing hot hinges of hell!"

And he tears through the door into the auction, almost knocking my rug out of my arms.

I shrug, and then I start to lug and tug. Carrying that rug home is a mean job. I walk along trying to remember that swell curse the Old boy gives out with, because right now I am in a cursing mood. To make it worse, I can not even seem to hang on to the rug properly. It is all the time slipping down under my arm, hanging down in front or wriggling out behind. With the result that I am tripping over the curb and walking sideways, and making very slow progress.

That Is how Out-Of-Business Oscar manages to catch up with me before I get home.

I hear feet clicking behind me; somebody running very fast. And along comes Oscar, his face purple just like the old pappy who bumps into me.

“Oscar.” I say, surprised, “I figure you are auctioning. What brings you here?”

“My conscience,” Oscar gets out, puffing for breath. “Feep, I realize I play you a dirty trick when I make you take that rug. After all, you are working for me, and can you help it if the bidding goes wrong? It bothers me so much I have to drop everything and come after you. The thought of my misdeed stabs me to the quick. To the quick.”

Now I do not know what Oscar’s quick is, that he is being stabbed to, but I get interested right away. Oscar has me by the collar and his left hand grabs for the rug.

“I am going to give you your ten dollars back, Feep,” he says. “Is that square?”

Well, it sounds square to me, and that is just what is wrong with it. Coming from a personality like Oscar, it should be crooked.

So I stall a little.

“Maybe I don’t want to sell,” I say.

Oscar’s face gets almost black.

“You must,” he begs. “This is on my conscience. It touches my heart.”

Then I know he is lying. Because Oscar has no conscience and his heart is so hart! nothing can touch it except a pneumatic drill.

“I will keep the rug for my room,” I say. “It will cover up the cigarette butts.”

OSCAR splutters.

“I know how you feel and I don’t blame you at all. Just to make it up for all your trouble, I’ll give you fifteen dollars for it.”

“No,” I answer.

“Twenty.”

Right then and there I get the score. Somebody else wants to buy this rug at a higher price, and Oscar thinks he can get it away from me. So I just shake my head and keep on going.

"This rug is not for sale," I yell. "And that's that!"

Oscar wails, but I ignore him and walk away. Now I can hardly wait to get home. I wonder just what kind of a rag this thing is. I remember Oscar telling about how Cleopatra comes rolled up in a rug, and I can just imagine unrolling it and seeing Lana Turner bounce out. Or anyway, something valuable and rare.

When I climb the stairs to my room I begin to get another idea. Perhaps somebody hides gold or jewels in the rug roll. Maybe some Arabs smuggle diamonds out of the country in it. Who can tell? The carpet is heavy enough, and it is tied up very tight indeed. I am very eager to open it up.

But just as I open the door, there is a rush on the stairs and who comes running up but the old pappy guy.

"Wait just another moment," he hollers. "You are Mr. Lefty Feep?"

"That's what my momma done told me," I admit.

"Oscar directs me here," he wheezes. "It is quite important."

"Who are you?" I ask.

"You read English? Here's my card—don't bend it," says the old fuddy. I take the card and read the name.

BLACK ART
Thaumaturgist

"What is this, a gag?" I ask. "In the first place, you are not a negro, and in the second place what is a thaumaturgist—some kind of chiropractor?"

He gives me a little bow and a smile.

"I admit it is all a little unusual," he tells me. "But you see, a thaumaturgist is a magician. And Black Art is really a very appropriate name."

"Well I got no time to see any card tricks," I answer. "So if you will excuse me, I must go inside and milk a goat."

HE holds up his hand, and I see those deep red eyes of his burning at me again.

"Don't be a fool," he says, in a real soft voice, like a dentist's drill. "I am not a conjuror. I am a sorceror. An evocator. An enchanter. A goetist. A geomancer."

"Calling yourself names won't help any, buddy," I tell him. But I am really impressed. It is dark in the hallway and here is this old man with his red eyes shining at me and his long skinny claws scrabbling at my coat.

"I want to buy your rug," he whispers.

"What, another?"

"Believe me, it is most important to me that I obtain it. I need it and I am prepared to pay well. I offer five hundred dollars."

"Five hundred—"

"A thousand, then. Money is no object. A thousand dollars for that rug!"

"Nelson Brothers should see me," I whisper. "I can be a star salesman."

But I am doing some quick figuring. First, Oscar wants to buy it back, and then this Black Art. Maybe they are both crazy. And then again—Oscar tells the crowd that this rug is wrapped up and shipped in and nobody sees it. He says Mrs. Bobo Grope pays big money for her stuff. Maybe the rug is worth the money. Maybe it is worth a lot more.

I think of the gold and jewels that might be hid away in it. I think about Cleopatra. And then I turn to Black Art and shake my head.

"No, I do not sell this rug," I tell him.

"Two thousand," he hisses.

"No."

It is very hard for me to say no this time. Two thousand is a very convincing argument, and his two eyes are also quite convincing. They glare at me, and when they look at the rug they are hungry.

"Come back some other time," I manage to say. "I must think it over."

"Very well, Mr. Feep. But Black Art is not to be foiled, I warn you! I shall get that rug, sooner or later."

And he beats it down the stairs.

I beat it indoors. Now I almost crazy to open this carpet up. I throw it on the floor and run into the closet to hang up my hat and coat. It is very dusty in the closet and I am coughing and clearing my eyes when I come out.

I look at the rug on the floor and then I rub my eyes some more.

Because the wires at the end of the rug are snapped.

I can swear they are tied a minute ago when I throw it down, but now they are untied. Thick wires, too. And the rug lies there.

I RUSH over and unroll it. Very careful, inch by inch, so if there are any jewels or coins wrapped inside I will not miss them.

But there is nothing there. I unroll the rug completely and it stretches across the floor. I stare at it.

What do I see?

A platinum border with jewels in the pattern? A gold fringe on a silver carpet? A solid weave made out of ten dollar bills and war bonds?

No.

I see a dirty, dingy old hunk of burlap I wouldn't use to cover the floor of a hen-coop. It is torn and ragged on the edges. The fringes are raveled and there is a pattern running through it that looks like a map of Hitler's retreat in Russia, and twice as messy.

And I refuse two thousand dollars for the thing!

I let out a whoop and hit myself on the forehead in rage. In fact, I hit myself quite a solid smack, and it knocks me so groggy I reel over to the wash-stand to put cold water on my noggin.

This I do, cursing under my breath and under the faucet. Then I wipe my head off and turn around again, feeling better.

But one look tells me I am still groggy. Worse.

I stare down at the rug I unroll on the floor. Only I do not have to stare very jar down.

Because the rug is floating.

Floating in mid air!

That dirty did hunk of carpet, that hotel for Persian fleas, is floating around in the air, about a foot off the floor.

I just stand there with my mouth open, showing my adenoids and tonsils. Then I sneeze, because a cloud of dust rises from the rug while it swoops across the floor.

The damned thing is alive!

ALL at once I remember how it slips out from under my arm all the time I carry it, and how the wires break open of their own accord, and now I understand. The rug is alive. It moves by itself!

I am so upset I watch it without doing anything for a minute. And it floats up, moves over toward the open window. It is going out the window!

“No you don’t.” I remark, hurling myself across the floor and giving it the flying tackle. No mg worth two thousand dollars is going to run off and leave me, even if it floats like Ivory Soap. I bring the rug down and hold it against the floor.

I pant for a minute, because it is a long time since I do a flying tackle, not running around with jitterbug girls any more. The rug sort of wriggles under me, like a big snake.

I reach over and grab a floor lamp and put it down on the carpet, anchoring it to the floor. Then I haul a chair over to hold it, and stick the fringes under the bedpost legs.

The rug thumps to the floor and lies still. I get off and stoop over to take another look. But it doesn’t seem any different. It is still a dingy rag, all dirty and torn. I watch it, see it is quiet, and slip the lamp and chair off it. Then I squat down on it and try to scrape away the dirt to see if I can find some kind of pattern underneath which tells me what it is supposed to be.

All I get is a mouthful of dust. I sneeze again, and my temper blows out right through my nose.

“Blast the whole business,” I yell. “I wish I do not get mixed up in such messes—why can’t I be enjoying myself at a nice crap game at Gorilla Gabface’s joint instead?”

All of a sudden there is a terrible wind blowing. I look around to see if I am still sneezing, but no. I am not making this wind. The rug is.

Because the rug is moving. And I am sitting on top of it!

This time we sail right for the open window, and through it. In another second, I am whizzing along through the air over the street, riding on the rug!

“Put me down!” I yell. But the wind chokes the voice right out of me. And before I can holler again, there is something caught in my throat. My heart.

Because we are zooming across the sky, over the streets and houses, and when I figure the speed I just lie down on my face and close my eyes. A second later I feel an awful thump and I know we have crashed. So I open my eyes and sit up.

THE first thing I look for is broken bones. But there are no broken bones. In fact, there are no bones at all—except two. These two bones are rolling right on the floor next to me. A four and a three.

Because when I open my eyes, I am sitting in the back room of Gorilla Gabface’s pool hall, watching a crap game!

Here is an item for Ripley. I sit on the rug, wish I was at a crap game at Gorilla’s joint, and the rug flies me there!

I look up, still confused, and see we come in through the open skylight. We come in very quiet, too, because nobody notices us, the rug and I.

They are all kneeling in a knot around the game on the floor—four of them, including Gorilla Gabface himself. And in front of them is a pile of lettuce big enough to choke Morgenthau. So it is no wonder they are too interested in the game to see me make my three-point landing.

I am very shaky, but I am beginning to understand a few things about the rug now. Why this Black Art the magician wants to buy it, and why it is such an unusual item. So I roll it up very tight under my arm before I move over to the game and introduce myself.

“Well, if it isn’t Lefty Feep!” yells Gabface. “Another dog come to rattle these bones, I presume?”

Which means I am in the game.

Now I am very fond of African polo myself, in fact it is a sort of a passion with me. And I am indeed eager to rattle the ivories. But I do not wish to lose this rug of mine, either, and it is such a tricky gadget I can not afford to let it out of my sight. I can not figure out where to park it, without a horse-anchor. Then I get an idea.

would dearly love to play marbles with you gentlemen,” I say to these rats. “But I wish you to humor me a bit. I have here a piece I call my lucky carpet. I desire we should all shoot craps on its surface. Besides,” I add, courteously, “I do not like to see you all kneeling on the bare floor this way. It is undignified, and it wrecks the knees of your trousers.”

So they let me unroll the carpet and we all kneel down and I get the dice in my hands and begin to make like castanets with them.

IN A very short while I have enough lettuce in front of me to make a full-size Victory Garden, and I am very happy.

Every time I place the dice down I get either a seven or an eleven, and every point I roll I make.

I suppose this is all very technical talk to you, if you do not understand the intricate technique of shooting craps, but the idea is, I win a lot of money.

This does not please the others a small bit. Finally, when Gorilla Gabface gets the dice, he is very irate, having lost about two hundred berries. He grabs up the cubes in the oversize catcher’s mitt he calls a hand and shakes them until the spots come loose.

“Now roll, curse you,” he remarks, in a voice like thunder. But the storm breaks when he lets go of the dice and gets snake eyes—‘which means he loses. He picks up the dice again, very displeased, and they make a noise in his hand like a couple of skeletons doing calisthenics on a tin roof during a hailstorm.

"Come on," he chants. "Get going. Off to Buffalo."

That does it.

I make a mistake when I do not warn him in time. But it is too late now.

Because when he says "Off to Buffalo" the rug rises up with a bounce, and we are through the skylight. But quickly.

There is yelling and screaming and howling. All five of us get pitched forward into the center of the carpet, and we tangle up our arms and legs. Maybe it takes a minute, maybe it takes ten. Meanwhile we are howling through the night. And when I finally manage to get my head out from under that pile of jerking bodies, I look down at the ground and what do I see?

Niagara Falls!

We are off to Buffalo, all right!

We land about a minute later, right on the edge of town, in a vacant parking lot.

It is a moonless night, and I am glad, because if anybody sees us coming down the anti-aircraft will get busy in very short order. As it is, I have enough trouble explaining things to Gorilla Gabface and his pals. They are naturally flabber from gasted.

So I tell them the story.

"JEEZ!" remarks a character name of Dime-Mouth McCarthy, who is a scholarly type. "What youse got is probibly that there Magic Carpet like in them Arabian Nights."

"Magic Carpet?" I say, while the idea suddenly clicks in the old brain.

"Sure," says Dime-Mouth. "A flying carpet, see? What them there oriental rug-cutters use to cruise around on it for a quick getaway. Just the thing to keep in the parlor for a powder, see? I always figure it is one of these here missological things, but youse can see I am wrong. On accounta here it is. And there we are."

The other lugs listen to Dime-Mouth's explanation and shake their heads, trying to calm down.

"Now what do we do?" asks Gorilla Gabface.

"Maybe we can get it to take us back to town," Dime-Mouth suggests. "It don't cost nothing to try. There ain't no meter on it. If I was youse, Feep, I'd beat it back to the house in a hurry and wait for the customer to show up. He will pay big money for a rug like this."

"Yes, but why?" I ask. "What use has he got for it?"

"Very simple," Dime-Mouth tells me. "He shows up in a big limousine, doesn't he? That's it. He wants to put the car away and use the flying rug during the tire shortage."

This sounds logical to me, so we all hop back on the carpet.

"I wish to be back at Gorilla Gabface's," I say, very loud. And the rug swirls around, takes off, and we are on our way.

This time nobody is quite so frightened. Me, I am even getting used to traveling by air, so I look down on all the scenery as we pass, and in no time at all we are coming down into the street. Gorilla Gabface nearly gets his head knocked off when we skim under the telephone wires, but outside of that there is no trouble. The rug steers itself perfectly, and we sail through the skylight and land without even a bump.

The minute we are all landed, they crowd around me and begin to make with the brains. The whole gang is loaded with schemes.

"Why don't youse open a travel bureau?" suggests Dime-Mouth.

"Nuts to that. Use the rug for a taxi," says Gorilla Gabface.

Somebody else suggests sight-seeing tours over the town. And naturally, there is a shifty-faced little rat in the crowd who comes out with a proposition to smuggle liquor.

This I turn down, of course; pointing out that it is not only dishonest, but also that there isn't enough room on the rug to carry much alky on a trip.

Besides, I do not wish to get myself all involved with these oafs on any deals, until I figure out this situation for myself. I have a Flying Carpet. It is such a matter as requires thought. I do not wish to go for a fly-by-night scheme.

So in the end I pop back onto the rug and say, “Home, James.” The rug lifts me back out of the skylight and I fly through the air with the greatest of ease.

ALL the way home I wreck my brains trying to figure out what to do about all this. But when I finally glide in through the open window and land, a new problem arises.

It arises from the chair in my room, where it is sitting. And its name is Black Art, the thaumaturgist.

He stands there giving me the glare and stare when I come down. I flash him a weak smile and anchor the rug under the bedposts again, trying to act like nothing happens.

But it is no use. He can see what the score is.

“So,” he greets me. “You know the secret.”

I nod.

He shrugs, lifting his beard up and twisting the end. “Too bad. For years I search for the magic carpet in vain. I haunt the souks of Ispahan, Teheran, Damascus, Alepo. I comb the bazaars from here to Hyderabad. Agents of mine are on the trail of the fabulous Flying Carpet.

“And in the end, a silly woman, this Mrs. Bobo Grope, stumbles on the prize by accident. She buys it as part of a lot consignment, never dreaming that she is acquiring the legendary rug of oriental fable. She dies. And a silly auctioneer raffles it off to a witless lout.”

“You are wrong about that, pal,” I correct. “I buy this rug myself.”

He smiles.

“Well, let it pass. The important thing is that you now know the true value of this carpet. And I am again prepared to offer you a good price.

Shall we say—ten thousand dollars?”

Now, there is nothing I rather hear somebody say than “ten thousand dollars.” It is a very cute phrase and tickles my ears. But I am still playing my hunch, so I stall.

“Why is thus rug worth ten grand to you?” I ask. “If you are one of these wizards like you claim, what do you need with a flying rug? The way I hear it, you guys can do almost anything you want.”

Black Art sits down again and sighs. The wind ruffles his white beard. Then he sighs again and tears come into his eyes. He pulls up the end of his beard and wipes them away. Then he blows his nose.

“Being a wizard isn’t so easy,” he moans. “It is a terrible life. If you know how hard it is for me to get along, you would have pity on me and give me the rug.”

“Don’t sluff me that guff,” I answer. “Wizards can do anything.”

“You are wrong,” says Black Art. “Maybe I can make you understand if I tell you my secret.”

“Your secret?”

“Yes,” Black Art whispers. “You see, I am the son of a witch.”

“DON’T tell me!”

“It is true,” he sighs. “And I wonder if you know what it means? To be born in a horrible little cottage way off in the woods. Without the comforts of a city home, without a furnace, without plumbing. Never to have a father. Never to have any other kids to play with. Just sit in this awful cottage all day long, with the horrid smell of sulphur and brimstone in the house.

“Your mother is always brewing up stuff on the fire—big cauldrons of herbs and awful messes that stink up the place. She brews so many philtres she doesn’t have time to cook for you.”

“I never have such an experience,” I admit. “Though the way I remember it, Ma sometimes whips up some bathtub gin.”

“That is different,” Art sighs. “You don’t have any toys to play with if you are the son of a witch. Just poppets—not dolls, but poppets. The little wax figures witches stick pins in. She gives them to you to play with and that’s all. And that awful black cat—her familiar! If you pet it, it scratches you up in a jiffy.

“And then you are alone so much. She is always going out to Black Sabbaths and stuff, and her broomstick is never in the corner. On May Eve and Halloween, and all times during the year you are left alone in that hideous cottage. One time I remember drinking some love-philtres as a boy, when left home alone. They only upset my stomach.”

Black Art sighs again.

“That’s my life,” he goes on. “No school. I have to study books on sorcery and black magic every day. Cast spells and study horoscopes, learn awful subjects like anthropomancy and lithiomancy, and divination. I work for years all alone. It is a dog’s life. And when she dies, I am left to myself. Before I know it I am all mixed up with second mortgages to the Devil and a lot of legal stuff. I inherit nothing but a bunch of debts to demons. And I am already an old man before my time.

“Look at me—look at my wrinkles and beard! Do I look like a young and happy man? Do I look as though I enjoyed practising magic powers?”

He starts crying, and my own eyes are a little misty. It does sound terrible. Imagine this poor enchanter—probably never even gets to see a floor show or play a juke box or do anything with culture!

“Then to make it worse, I find out I cannot even attend the Black Sabbath. On account of Ma falling down and busting her broomstick when she dies.

“You know what this means to a wizard? It means disgrace! It is like not attending union meetings or paying lodge dues. If I do not show up at least once a year at Sabbath meetings, I am all washed up.”

THEN he explains to me about these Black Sabbaths, which are stag parties for witches and wizards. Sort of a picnic, like, only just a little wilder. They all get together on a hilltop or mountain over in Europe someplace and dance around for a while and talk shop. Then the Big Boss shows up and pitch-forks around and gives them their orders for the coming year.

And this is what upsets Black Art so much.

Without the broomstick to ride on, he cannot get to his Sabbath. And there is one coming up pretty soon, on Halloween.

“What about a plane?” I ask.

“Don’t be foolish! In the past, I travel by plane or boat. But with this war going on—how can I get to Europe? Or the Hartz Mountains? Priorities fix it so I cannot even buy a private plane for myself, let alone get booked as a passenger. And that is why I need your Flying Carpet. That is why I search for it. It is the one means of transportation left to me—and unless I get to this Sabbath, it will be all up with me. All down, rather. Because the Big Boss has a nasty habit of disposing of we wizards when he is not obeyed.”

Well, this song and dance he hands me has me all softened up, I figure I might as well take ten grand and let the carpet go. What good is it anyway? And if he has to get to this Black Sabbath of his—

“But just what arrangement have you got with the Big Boss?” I ask.

Black Art smiles.

“I see you are clever,” he mumbles. “So I will not conceal it from you. I am anxious to attend this Sabbath in particular, because it is my only chance to see the Big Boss. And if I can see him I am going to make a deal that will give me tremendous power. If you wish, you and I can share it together.

“Because you are right, Feep. A wizard can have anything he desires—if he will pay the price. You know what that price is. Your soul. You have a soul, haven’t you, Feep?”

“I guess so.”

“Good. I still have mine, too.” Black Art chuckles. He is not so sad now, and the chuckle is something to hear. “Yes, even though I owe the Big Boss a number of debts, I still have my soul to bargain for. And I shall make a bargain.”

IT is pretty dark in my room, but Black Art’s eyes are shining very bright. His teeth gleam, too. Somehow I would feel better if I didn’t see them so well. They bother me. So does his chuckling voice.

“Yes, and what a bargain it will be! Because I want power, Feep. Great power. Now, in a time of war, there will be new chances to rise, to rule. Imagine a wizard, with a knowledge of spells and enchantments, capturing control of entire nations! Ruling armies! Directing destinies!

“I, who haunt in darkness, who must study and pore over musty tomes, waste my life as I do, am sick of sitting in the shadows. I want to rule. And the time is now.

“There is a man in Europe, Feep. A sick, neurotic, half-crazed man, who believes in magic. In astrology, and the stars. He is always willing to listen, to be guided by those who profess to be sorcerers. Fakes. But I am no charlatan. I want to get to that man—make him believe in me. Make myself his master. Give him orders and see that he obeys.

“That is the kind of bargain I am going to make at the Sabbath, Feep! Now do you understand why I must get there? Now do you see why I want your carpet?”

I see all right, and I do not like it a little bit.

“It is no dice, buddy,” I tell him. “I still am not selling the rug.”

Black Art stands up. I never noticed how tall he is before. How nasty he looks in his long black coat. He points a skinny finger at me.

“You dare to refuse, you miserable lout? Why, it means riches for you! You have nothing here—sitting in this dirty, dingy little room. Why, I wouldn’t keep a pig in this filthy sty.”

“Get out, then!” I holler. And push him over to the door.

“I’ll be back!” he yells. But I slam the door on his beard, and it is all he can do to tug it out and bounce down the stairs.

I am really burned up now. I do not mind him suggesting a foul deal like he does, but when he tells me I live in a crummy dump, I get very angry.

Because I know only too well I do live in a crummy dump, and something inside me tells me I am a fool not to take his ten thousand. Only I rather be a fool than a rat.

Still and all, my temper is ruined. It is late, and I must get some shut-eye, so I undress for bed. Just before I climb in, I remember the rug. I do not wish it to fly away on me, so I grab it off the floor and stick it in the closet and lock the door on it. The closet is so dusty I start to cough again and this makes me madder still.

I lie in bed and burn up. What a day! I get hooked into buying a rug, I get a reputation for being some kind of a screwball with all my friends, and a crazy magician comes around and threatens me.

Maybe he will show up again with some phony trick or other. But I do not think so. Anyhow, that is a problem for tomorrow.

So at last I fall asleep.

And I have a nightmare.

IN the nightmare it is the next morning. I am waking up when I hear a knocking at the door. I sit up and ask,

"Who's there?" and a voice says, "Black Art," and I say, "Shut up and go away, you bewhiskered baboon!"

Then I turn over and all at once I hear a rustling sound. I sit up again.

I stare at the door.

Something is oozing in through the keyhole. Something white, like fog. A little cloud of smoke. It trickles in very slow and swirls around. All at once it gets thicker. There is a burning red center to the fog. Deep red. And then I recognize it.

It is the color of Black Art's eyes. Deep red eyes. And all at once a face forms around the eyes. And the fog turns into a long white beard. Then a body.

Black Art is standing in my room!

"I will teach you not to thwart a wizard's desires!" he whispers.

Before I know it, he is over at the closet door. He opens it. I see him stooping over the floor, scrabbling around. He picks up the rug. He comes out—

And then I do sit up in bed.

Because I am not dreaming. I am wide awake, and Black Art is stealing the rug before my eyes!

"Hey, you carpet-goniff!? I holler.

He just turns and looks at me.

His red eyes stare. I stare back. And all at once I find out I can't look away. I am what you call hypnotized. I gawk at him like he was a chorus cutie instead of an old geezer with a long white beard.

"So," he whispers. "A wizard has powers. And you are not going to move. I am taking your rug, Feep. I have a flying trip to make to the Hartz Mountains. There is just time enough to make it."

He steps on the carpet and stands in front of the open window. I try to jerk my eyes away. All at once I do it. I jump out of bed.

Black Art smiles. One hand goes to his waist. I think he is pulling a rod on me, but no. He just lifts up his beard. I see underneath it. Hanging from his neck, hidden by the beard, is a very long, very sharp knife. He takes it out and waves it. I can see he is used to waving it.

"Do you like mince-meat?" he asks. "Well, that is what you will be if you come one step closer to me."

So I just stand there while he gets on the rug. He pulls his beard to one side like it was a handkerchief and waves goodbye.

"Well, I am off," he tells me. And then he stares at the rug and mumbles, "Hartz Mountains, please."

The rug gives a flap, and floats out the window.

I SHIVER myself out of it. There he goes. It is all over. My rug is gone, he is gone, and that deal is going through. There will be hell to pay—and I know who will pay it. All of us, if Black Art has his way.

And then, while I am standing there, I hear a thump.

It comes from just outside my window.

I rush over and look out.

There is a terrible crash from down below, and I stare at the back alley. Lying on the stones is Black Art. On top of him, like a shroud, is the Flying Carpet.

I am downstairs in three leaps. I pick Art up and phone for an ambulance. First I hide the rug. When the medicos get there I tell them he falls out of the window—and after one look at the body, they believe me.

And when they go away I take a look at my rug again.

Then I understand what happens. I take another look at my closet and get the whole story straight.

For the first time in my life, I thank my lucky stars that Black Art is right when he says I live in a dirty old dump.

Because that is the one thing that saves us all from the bargain Black Art wants to make.

Of course, the rug is no good any more since it does not fly, and I throw it in the ash heap. But maybe it is just as well the way things work out. I got a bicycle to travel by, anyway.

* * *

I SAT back in my seat with a frown.

“Sounds like you had a pretty close call there, Lefty,” I admitted. “But —”

Feep gave me a sour look.

“You and your ‘Buts.’ Always something bothering you, friend! Well—what is it this time?”

“Nothing,” I said. “Nothing at all.

Only, you see I can’t figure out what it was that made the Flying Carpet fall down and kill the wizard. It always flew before, didn’t it?”

“Yes.”

“So why did it fall?”

“That is my lucky break,” Feep said. “Like I say, if I take the ten thousand dollars, I never get rid of this Black Art and he goes out and does his dirty work. It is pure luck that I refuse and he gets bumped off.”

“How do you figure that?”

“Well—if I take the ten thousand, I move out of my room, into a better apartment. And you know what a dump I live in. All dirty and dusty. And if I am not in my dirty and dusty apartment, then I do not put my rug overnight into the dirty and dusty closet, and it does not get fixed there so that it will not fly any more.”

“You mean keeping that rug in the closet overnight killed Black Art when he used it?”

“Sure. That is the lucky break. Because of what happens in the closet to the rug—what gets into it to make it fall down.”

“All right, Feep! Just what did get into the Flying Carpet, anyway?”

“Moths!” said Lefty Feep.

Jerk the Giant-Killer

Lefty Feep didn't intend to overwork himself, so he picked out the smallest bag of seeds to plant. But they grew the biggest crop of all!

I WAS sitting at my usual place in the usual booth of the usual restaurant the other night, when Lefty Feep made his unusual entrance.

At first I didn't notice anything out of the way about him. His face still looked like a fugitive from a pair of moose-horns. His suit was as gaudy as ever, and his necktie spilled over the front of his shirt like a two-bit sundae.

Then, as Mr. Feep slid into a seat across from me, I noticed the difference.

"No cuffs on your trousers," I remarked.

Lefty Feep nodded.

"From now on the only cuffs I get will be about the head," he grinned. "And at that, I do not think she will catch me. In fact I am sure of it."

"Who?" I asked.

Feep shrugged. I let it go at that. Some aspects of his private life won't stand close scrutiny. If he chooses to live as a one-man matrimonial bureau, it's his business.

"No," Feep continued. "No cuffs for me—on trousers or hands. This is the new Victory Suit."

"Looks like it's been through some pretty gory battles," I said. "Such a color scheme! It certainly isn't camouflaged."

Feep pouted.

"Do not criticize," he said. "I merely do my part for the war effort. I give up my cups, I bust my record of The Japanese Sandman, and I spend my dough for bonds instead of blondes."

"Very patriotic."

"Oh, it is nothing." Feep sighed. "I only wish I can do something really fine, like my friend Jack does."

"Jack? Jack who?"

"I do not know his last name," said Lefty Feep. "In fact I do not even know if he is really named Jack. We just call him Jack because he never has any."

"Poverty-stricken, eh?" I observed. "But what can a poor man do that's really going to aid victory?"

A gleam kindled in Feep's eye. I shuddered, because I knew what was coming.

"It is quite a story," he murmured. "I know you will be happy to hear all about it."

"Sorry," I gasped. "I have a heavy date."

"Never mind how fat your girl friends are," snarled Feep. "This is such a tale as does not come your way every day in the week."

"Thank God!"

"What's that? Well, never mind. I will tell you the story just as I hear it from Jack, when I run into him the other day."

Lefty Feep's tongue shot out of his mouth, and we were off. Way, way off.

THIS guy Jack is what you might call a very down and out personality. He is down because he is only five feet tall and he is generally out about two hundred dollars to the bookies.

About a year ago he gets so far out that he is living in the suburbs—Pennsylvania, in fact. Maybe he goes there for the cool climate, because it is pretty hot for him around town.

The next time I see him Jack tells me he gets married. This does not surprise me, because Jack always has a soft spot for women—in his head.

The dame he hitches up with is in the neighborhood of six feet tall, which is quite a neighborhood to be in for a guy of Jack's stature. In addition she is built along the lines that Longfellow thinks of when he writes The Village Blacksmith.

But it turns out she owns a little farm in the Pennsylvania hills, and so that is where Jack now lives.

Just about this time the war breaks and everybody is talking about the defense effort. Jack is very patriotic, like I say. He is willing to do his part. In no time at all, he drives into one of the mining towns around there, steps up to the employment office, and gets his wife a job in the mills.

The war comes closer, and even this is not enough for Jack. He goes to another mill and gets his wife a night-shift job as well.

"We must work night and day," he tells me. And then a star-spangled gleam comes into his eye, and he says, "My only regret is that I have but one wife to give to my country."

So you see how it is with Jack. His wife goes to work and he stays home and tends to the farm. Not a day passes but he is doing something to brighten up the place—like carving his initials in a tree, very fancy, or decorating the porch with some beautiful fishing flies. A great fellow to brighten up the place is Jack—in fact he is almost always lit up.

For some reason or other, dames being funny like they are, this does not altogether please his partner in matrimoaning.

One morning she comes home from the night shift in order to cook the meals before she goes back to work on the day shift, and she is feeling very cranky. It seems that Jack cooks up some overtime for her at another plant.

"LISTEN you lazy bum," she says—it pains me to use such vulgar language, but that is the way this coarse woman phrases it—"I want you to do some work around this place. Here I am, day and night, working my fingers to the bone over a hot blast-furnace, and you sit around the house and loaf. You do not even sew the buttons on my overalls. What kind of a husband are you, anyway, you bum?”

In order that Jack does not miss any of this lecture she picks him up and holds his ear next to her mouth. Now she drops him down on the floor again in such a rude fashion that Jack cannot even answer her last $64 question.

But this does not matter.

“Go upstairs and clean out the attic today,” she says. “It is time for spring planting, and you will find all the seeds up there that Papa saves when he comes here from the old country.”

“I should go out in the dirty fields and plant seeds?”

“By tomorrow morning one thing or the other will be planted—the seeds or you,” says his wife.

And she grabs up her lunch pail and storms out.

So poor Jack picks himself up off the floor and hauls his hips way up to the attic. Of course, after such a walk, he has to sit down and rest a while. Which he does, stretching out on all the sacks of seeds up there.

He lies there looking at all the big bags, and the more he looks the more discouraged he gets. Some of them weigh fifty or a hundred pounds. And he cannot imagine himself carrying a hundred pound sack a mile out into the fields and then dumping it.

You see Jack is not a farmer, he just bets like one. And he does not understand the first thing about crops like the local yokels do. He is strictly an uptown boy, and the only way he knows how to raise corn is in a bottle.

So he is very discouraged, but when he thinks about his wife he is even more discouraged. Finally he gets up and starts to haul the bags around. He is looking for the smallest sack he can find.

He stirs up a lot of dust—because these things are up in the attic now for many a year, ever since papa dies after coming from the old country. But in the middle of his wheezes and sneezes, Jack finds a very tiny leather pouch, way at the bottom of the piles.

He figures at first maybe it is only tobacco, but when he shakes it he knows it is seeds all right.

"That's for me," he decides. He puts it in his pocket and goes downstairs.

ON THE way down he accidentally finds some very nice fishing tackle in the closet next to the stairs, and he figures he might as well stop by the creek on his way to plant the seeds.

Well, one thing leads to another, and one road leads to the creek, and then one fish leads to another. So when Jack sits up and takes notice, it is after dark.

His wife will be coming home from the day shift and making supper before going back on the night shift. So Jack realizes he must get back to the house in order to grab some grub.

He gallops across the fields and then he remembers the seeds. It is too dark to see, and too late to waste time. He stops, scuffs a little hole in the ground with his fishing rod, and pours a handful of seeds into it.

At least this gives him the old alibi that he actually does some planting today. So he puts the rest of the seeds back in the pouch and trots home.

When his wife asks him if he engages in any agriculture, he answers yes. So she goes to work that night very happy because Jack reforms this way. And Jack goes to bed very happy for the same reason.

The next morning, when the Happy Farmer gets up, he forgets all about it. Today he figures on going back to the creek, because the fish are biting faster than a crowd of relatives at Thanksgiving dinner.

Right after breakfast he tackles his tackle and does a sneak to the creek.

On the way he crosses over the fields again. At least, he crosses part way.

But he does not get any farther. Because right smack in the middle of the last field, down away in the valley where it is hidden from the house and road, is this plant.

When Jack sees it, his lower jaw drops so far he can rest his shoes on it.

The plant just sticks right up out of the ground. How far is hard to tell, because Jack cannot see the top of it. It is all made of green stalks, but it is not a tree. Jack looks up to see if he can notice branches, but all he sees is clouds.

It is a sort of a horticultural Empire State Building, if you know what I mean, and if you do please tell me.

ANYHOW, such a sight in a bare field is very unusual. Jack pats his hip, feels that the flask is still full, and pinches himself to find that he is still awake. He takes another look.

“What kind of seeds do I plant, anyhow?” he wonders. “Possibly they come from some mail-order catalogue. That is the only place where things grow so big.”

The more he looks at the big tall stalks on the plant, the hotter he gets to find out what it is.

“Maybe if I shinny up a ways I can see the top and find out if this is a plant for peas, or potatotes, or rhubarb,” he decides.

So Jack drops his fishing tackle and grabs hold of a big tough stalk and boosts himself up. He climbs very easily, because there is plenty to hang on to. Before he notices it, he is way up out of this world, and the air is getting thin. But still he is not at the top.

He climbs a little higher, stopping now and then to rest. The further he goes, the more anxious he gets to figure out what kind of a vegetable he raises.

Pretty soon he is so high he is afraid to look down at the ground. But he is now very far away from the good earth.

This is certain, because he is now getting quite damp from tangling with a cloud.

A minute later he is damp inside as well as outside, from tangling with his flask. But he needs his courage, where he is.

Soon there are clouds all around him. He has to take another nip. He climbs some more, and gets scared finally. He wants very much to get down now, but he cannot see his feet any more. There is nothing to do but keep climbing up.

Which he does, hauling away with his hands until he gets them blistered, and hauling away at the flask until his lips get blistered.

“I am thankful for one thing,” he mutters. “Imagine how big this thing grows if I put fertilizer on it last night.”

ALL at once the clouds start to thin away. He goes about the distance of the Washington Monument and he is in the open. In fact, he is reaching the top of the plant.

Only the top is not exactly what he expects to see. There is no raw vegetable dinner waiting up there. No beets, no succotash, no cauliflowers, no tomatoes, no spinach.

Instead, the top of the plant goes right through a hole in the clouds, and when Jack crawls through this hole he is on solid ground!

“So this is China,” says Jack, getting a little mixed up in his geography —to say nothing of the flask. But there he is, and very glad to be standing on some firmer terra, too.

He looks around. The scenery is nothing much—just country, with a lot of hills. And there is a path running along a ways off.

When he gets his breath back in his lungs and his cork back in the bottle, he is about as high as the scenery. He decides he might as well amble down this path and see what the score is.

So he walks along. Not exactly in a straight line, but he gets places.

Before you know it, or he knows it, for that matter, he is going up the path to a big stone apartment house on a hill. At least it looks like an apartment house to Jack, but when he gets a closer glimmer at the turrets and all, he knows it is nothing but a castle. A genuine castle, stuck right out here in the lonely hills!

Jack knows that there is only one explanation for a castle standing out on a country road—it must be a filling station.

So he footsies up to the door, wondering where the gasoline pumps are.

The door is open, and all at once he notices somebody is standing there in the entrance.

This turns out to be nothing less than a very pretty filet of femininity—a little red-headed ginch, with enough curves to strike out DiMaggio.

“Greetings,” says the ginch, just as if Jack was expected. “Who art thou and from whence dost thou hail?”

Jack figures he is getting the old double-talk, see? But he is a very hep number, and always ready with a line.

“Why, I am a traveling salesman,” he says. “And might you be the farmer’s daughter?”

“I know no villiens, churls, nor peasantry,” the ginch comes back. “I am the Lady Imogene, and this is the fief of my husband. And what,” she coos, “might a traveling salesman be?”

“You don’t know?” says Jack. “Well, well—”

He gives this Imogene ginch the old eye. And she smiles right back in a way which tells Jack that her husband isn’t home. Probably out tending to his fiefs, or something.

WHICH suits Jack perfectly. In no time at all, he is inside this joint. It turns out to be a real castle, with sure-enough stone walls.

The whole place is terrifically big, like a downtown movie lobby, but what impresses Jack most is the size of all the furniture in it. The chairs are almost twenty feet high, and the tables even higher.

“Who is this husband of yours, King Kong?” he asks.

“No. He is King Glimorgus,” answers Imogene.

“Sounds like a dandruff-remover,” says Jack. And the ginch giggles.

She is throwing off plenty of smiles and such, and shows Jack around the joint very sweetly.

“I am glad you are here,” she confesses. “I am so lonely.”

“What does old Glimorgus do for a living?” asks Jack.

“Verily, he is a cattle tender.”

“You mean he is out all day taking care of his herds?”

“Not exactly,” simpers the ginch Imogene. “It is other people’s cattle that he takes care of. Also he is a renowned sheep-raiser. He raises them from other people’s land and carries them here.”

“In other words, this husband of yours is no better than a thief,” says Jack.

Imogene turns pale.

“Prithee, I implore you not to speak thusly in his presence. Such gibes make him exceedingly furious. And when he is furious, he is apt to become very angry. And being angry makes him mad.”

“What you are trying to tell me is that he has a bad temper. I get it,” says Jack. “Well, I do not wish to tangle with this cowboy husband of yours anyway. I would just as soon stay a stranger to this Lone Ranger.”

“I grieve to hear you speak thusly, for King Glimorgus would like you.”

“You don’t say?”

“Verily. He likes men.”

“He does, eh?”

“Yes—with a little salt and pepper. Some he likes roasted and basted. Others he likes raw. Lean as you are, methinks he wouldst relish you in a fricassee.”

Jack gulps.

“Pardon me, I got to catch the Chattanooga choo-choo,” he gasps, diving for the door.

BUT Imogene grabs his arm.

“Tarry a while,” she suggests. “I do not expect him for many an hour. And I promise, I shall not permit him to eat you.” Here she gives out with another dreamy smile, and Jack wavers a little.

“Speaking of food,” Imogene goes on, “Methinks that after your travels you might be hungry. Wouldst do with a roast duck or two?”

“Wouldst do plenty,” says Jack. “Lead me to it.” Because he is really strictly from hunger.

So he follows the red-head into the kitchen, which is a huge place like all the other rooms. There is a terrific stone oven in the middle, and next to it stands an oversized table and some big chairs.

The ginch Imogene helps Jack climb up into one of these seats, and he sits there looking like a brat in a high-chair while she fusses around the oven with a couple quackers she is going to roast for him.

Jack is plenty curious to find out more about this setup, which strikes him as a little unusual.

“Isn’t it a little trying to live with this Man Mountain Dean?” he asks.

“I fail to comprehend.”

“I mean, aren’t you afraid of living with Hannibal the Cannibal?”

“You mean King Glimorgus, my husband?” laughs the ginch. “But pray what must I fear?”

“Well, you tell me about his slightly unusual diet, and I figure maybe he will gobble you up between meals.” Imogene smiles and shakes her head. “He needs me to cook for him,” she explains. “Truly, were I gone, the servant problem here wouldst be most vexing.”

“I can understand that all right,” Jack agrees. “But still, if he is such a big brute like you say, it is a wonder he does not beat up on you all the time.”

Imogene looks a little frightened. “Let us not speak of that,” she says. “Often do I wish to be free of him, but these is no way.” Her smile turns on again. “Verily, it was my hope when you came here that perhaps you might be the champion who could rescue me.” She comes over to Jack and waves the duck under his nose, very temptingly, and how can he resist?

He gets up on his chair and pounds himself on the chest.

“You got the right idea there, baby,” he says. “I’m going to do just that. When I set my peepers on you I say there is a little number that is too classy to be cooped up with an oversized cattle-thief like this Glimorgus. And when that big tramp shows up I'm going to—"

WHAT Jack intends to do is never settled. Because all at once the big tramp shows up.

Merely the big tramp of feet, but that is enough. He can hear the feet just outside, and they are pounding along like a couple of twenty-ton tanks. Standing on the chair as he is, he can just see outside the window when a head passes. One look at the size of that head and Jack changes his mind.

"Here he comes!" he yells. "Hide me somewhere, quick!"

Imogene looks around wildly.

"Here—do you climb into the oven," she suggests.

"Do I? And how!" Jack dives off the chair and runs to the big stone oven. He can hardly reach up to the door and it takes a lot of effort to get it open, but the sound of those huge feet echoing through the house is all the encouragement he needs.

"Boost me up," he whispers.

"I cannot."

Just then the problem is settled. Because a big hand sticks itself around the kitchen door. Jack takes one look and then gives a flying jump up into the oven. He slams the door just in time as the giant walks into the room.

He lies there in the dark, does Jack, squinting through the air-holes in the oven door. And there is certainly plenty for him to see.

Plenty of the giant, anyway. Because this King Glimorgus turns out to be thirty feet tall. He is so big he could black Jack's eyes for him with his knees. And Jack does not wish to give him such an opportunity, so he looks very quietly from behind the oven door.

The giant comes in and stands there for a minute. He does not shake hands with his wife, either—because he is carrying a calf under each arm. He sort of swings the calves around like they were chickens and then tosses them down on the table.

“I brought a little snack for lunch,” he announces. Then he grabs Imogene up and kisses her.

This makes Jack shudder. The idea of anyone having to come close to that great big face is very unpleasant. He has a tremendous black beard, and kissing him must be like falling into a pile of bushes face-first.

But Imogene smiles, being used to it, and the giant smiles back. His smile is like grim death, because he has teeth as big as tombstones.

HE SETS Imogene down very carefully, like a doll, and then he yawns. This isn’t so bad, even if it does make all the dishes rattle and the clock on the wall stops dead.

“Anything happen?” he asks, in a voice like a sick foghorn.

“Naught, my lord,” says Imogine.

“Guess I’ll eat then,” the giant decides.

“Very well.”

“Roast these calves for me,” says the giant.

Jack gulps. Imogene turns pale.

“Just shove them in the oven under a hot fire,” the giant orders.

“But—but my lord—”

“Eh?”

“You know it is not wise for you to indulge in roast meat during the midday. Remember the advice of the leech—cooked meat is bad for the pressure of the blood.”

“Is that so?”

“Of course.” Imogene begins to coax. She climbs up on the giant’s lap and strokes his forehead—which is like running your hand across a washboard.

“You are so delicate, my lord. So anemic. You must guard your health. You are not strong.”

This is fine talk to hand somebody who looks like the big brother of Gargantua the Gorilla, but it works with the giant.

"Perhaps you are right, my little pet," he says. "I do not feel my best. In fact I am not even very hungry. So I will just eat those two calves raw."

Jack breathes a sigh of relief as the giant begins to pick at his food. He merely toys with it, dabbles around—in fact it takes him nearly ten minutes to eat the two calves. Just an invalid's diet.

Imogene bustles around, bringing him salt and pepper, and rolling out a pony of ale for an appetizer. She is doing her best to keep King Glimorgus from noticing anything wrong.

But all at once he holds up the leg of a calf and turns his head.

"I smell something," he says. This time his voice is so loud that the clock on the wall falls off completely.

"What do you mean?" quavers the little ginch.

"Aha!" yells the giant. "I thought so!"

"Thought what?"

"Fee, Fi, Fo, Fum
I smell the blood
Of an Englishman."

This is bad poetry, but the thought behind it is worse. At least, to Jack. Because he is not an Englishman, but Irish, and this is quite an insult, to say the least.

TO SAY the most, if the giant finds Jack it is curtains. So he trembles inside the oven. The giant gets up.

"Are you hiding a man in this castle?" he booms.

"Verily, you jest," trembles Imogene.

"But I smell one."

"Perchance you suffer from a cold in the head."

"I know a man when I smell him," insists the giant. "And when I smell him I find him. And when I find him—I eat him!"

Jack begins to feel like a hunk of sandwich meat already.

The giant is striding back and forth across the room.

“Where is he?” he yells. “Show him to me and I’ll tear him limb from limb! I’ll clean his wishbone and use it for a toothpick.”

“The use of toothpicks is vulgar,” Imogene says. “And you are mistaken, my lord. That is no man you smell—merely the hen.”

“Hen? What hen?”

“Why, the marvelous hen I purchased from the itinerant wizard who chanced by this morning.”

“You bought a hen? Honestly, you women are all alike,” grumbles the giant. “Every damned peddler that comes along, you have to buy something—”

“Wait until you see it,” says the ginch. “Truly, it can perform a miraculous feat.”

She runs out into the other room and brings back a live chicken. It is an ordinary-looking white bird and the giant scowls at it.

“I see nothing remarkable in this fowl,” he sneers.

“Ah, but there is something remarkable in it. And wait until it comes out.”

She sets the hen down on the table and strokes it. It clucks a little.

“Lay!” she says to the chicken. “Lay.”

The chicken squawks. All at once it sits up. Imogene lifts it off the table. Underneath the chicken is an egg. An egg of solid gold!

“Is not this a remarkable thing to find in a chicken?” she asks.

“It lays golden eggs, does it? And all you must do is tell it that want one?”

“Merely stroke its back and command it to lay.”

So King Glimorgus the giant sits down and begins to stroke the chicken and yell, “Lay!” And the eggs pour out.

“Eighteen carats!” chuckles the giant. “Nice, grade-A size, too. My dear, all is forgiven.”

He scoops up a pile of golden golf-balls and gets up.

“I shall take these down to have them assayed,” he says. “Mind you, guard the hen well until I return.”

And he tramps off.

A COUPLE minutes later, Jack crawls out of the oven.

"Nice work," he tells Imogene. "You saved my life. Now I must beat it before my wife beats me."

"You are wed?" says Imogene. Her face falls. "I am sorry. For I was of a mind that you should stay here with me and console me."

"A very noble idea," Jack answers. "In fact, nothing suits me better. But pretty soon your husband comes back and starts poking his big nose around again, so I figure I will keep out of his way. And my wife is not quite so big, but she is just as tough."

So Jack heads for the door with Imogene after him.

"Perchance you will return?" she asks.

"Who can tell?"

"If not," sighs the ginch, "I will bestow a parting gift. Take this hen." And she gives him the hen that lays the golden eggs.

"A very sweet gesture," Jack says. "And thank you for giving me the bird." He leaves Imogene then and puts the castle behind him. Jack makes time on the path now with the hen under his arm. He looks around to see that the coast, is clear, and when he comes to the plant sticking through the ground, he slides down through the hole and begins to climb.

Going down doesn't take so much time. He manages to slide quite a bit of the way, and he is very willing to hurry.

He figures on getting home and doing some planting before his wife arrives. He wants to plant seeds, and he also wants to plant this remarkable chicken where she won't find it.

Sliding down, he does his best to figure out this adventure he has.

The whole thing reminds him of a yarn he reads in a book when he is a tiny tot—a little epic entitled Jack and the Beanstalk. In fact, this seems to be almost a duplicate.

His name is Jack; and he finds some seeds and plants them, and they grow. He plants them in the dark, but now he is almost sure they are beans. The stalk comes up, he climbs it, and there he is with this giant. The giant even talks like the book, with his hi-de-ho about sniffing the corpuscles of a British subject.

And now Jack gets a hen that lays nuggets. It all adds up, somehow.

SO JACK hits the earth feeling pretty pleased with himself. He hops back to the farmhouse and sticks the chicken away in the back of the hencoop.

Then he grabs up a sack of corn and goes out to plant it. He is so happy he even feels like doing a little work, and by supper time he has the satisfaction of spreading more corn than a politician does at election time.

He heads for the house, very happy. His wife is all smiles when she sees he is working.

“I am glad you reform, you bum,” she greets him. “I fix an extra nice supper for you.”

Which it is.

But right in the middle of the meal, Jack stares down at his plate.

“Where do you get this lovely fried chicken, darling?” he asks.

She smiles at him.

“Who do you ask, you naughty boy? From the hencoop, of course.”

“The hencoop—”

“Certainly.” She wags her finger at him. “You are so thoughtful to go and steal one of the neighbor’s chickens for me.”

“Neighbors—”

“But of course, just like a man, you do not realize they will recognize it if it is running around in our yard. So I kill it and fry it.”

“You fry the chicken I put in the hencoop?”

“Of course.”

And all at once Jack does not like his fried chicken any more. In fact he loses his appetite. So his wife has to take the rest of the chicken in her lunch pail when she goes off to work on the night shift.

Jack lies in bed thinking about what a rotten deal he gets. Here he has a chicken that can lay golden eggs—he has a potential Fort Knox right in his own back yard—and he loses it. It is enough to get anybody up in the air.

And that, finally, is where he decides to go.

There is nothing else to do, after such a disappointment, but to climb the beanstalk again tomorrow and see if he can lay his hands on another hunk of this precious poultry.

He can hardly wait. For the first time in years he is up at dawn and running out into the field in the valley where the beanstalk stands.

Sure enough, it is still there, and when Jack gets there he is far from still. He boosts himself up hand over hand and makes like a monkey.

PRETTY soon he is high and dry, not bringing a flask with him this trip. The going is tough, and for a minute Jack gets a bad attack of qualms.

After all, why should he risk his neck again by playing around with a thirty-foot bozo whose idea of a complete hamburger dinner would be Jack with a bottle of ketchup poured over him?

So Jack stops to think things over. And he looks down at the ground. It is so far away that he gets the shakes just thinking about his position on the beanstalk, and there is nothing to do but look up again—and climb some more.

In a little while he is up in the clouds again, looking for silver linings. But all he gets is water on the knee trying to wade through the dampness. So Jack climbs as fast as he can, to get through the rain, and shortly he is crawling through the hole at the top of the beanstalk.

He is on the path in the hills once more, and this time he knows his way. He walks along very slowly, looking to see if he can notice the giant's footprints in the dust. But there is no mark of any size 44 brogans treading this way, so he skips along until he comes to the big stone castle.

The door is still open, and Imogene is standing there. When she sees Jack she smiles and tucks up her pretty red hair.

“I am so glad you are back,” she says. “I wight you wish to console me?”

“Wight you are,” says Jack, who is catching on fast to her brand of conversation.

“Shall we step inside?” asks Imogene.

“Is Shorty home?” Jack comes back.

“King Glimorgus?” she giggles. “Nay, he is out hunting.”

“Deer?”

“Nay—you.”

“Me?”

“Verily. He suspects the presence of a stranger about. It is his belief that you are responsible for the disappearance of his chicken, and he will not rest until he finds you.”

“If he finds me, I will not rest,” says Jack. “Maybe I better jam on the scram.”

Imogene’s pretty blue eyes cloud up and look like rain. She sighs.

“You wouldst desert me?” she wails. “And here it is my hope that you are a gallant champion come to rescue me from that miserable ogre! If I were only free again to live as other women, instead of being cooped up here with that monstrous tyrant—oh, I should do anything to reward the noble rescuer who saves me!”

“Anything?” says Jack.

“Anything,” sighs Imogene.

WELL, this is a pretty big proposition, and Jack knows it. So he takes his time thinking it over. Then he makes up his mind.

“Would you get me a drink?” he asks.

“Surely—we have mead and ale in plenty! Come with me into the castle.”

So Jack wanders into the castle again. He keeps his eyes open this time, because he is really on the lookout for another hen to grab. If he can only find an 18-carat chicken or a platinum-producing pullet he is satisfied to run a few risks.

But the castle rooms are empty, and when they come to the kitchen he gets his drink and sits down on the floor—not having a stepladder handy to climb up to the table.

Then he decides to pump Imogene for information.

“Do I hear you mention raising that chicken from a gizzard?” he asks her.

“No. I purchase it from a wizard,” she answers.

“Do you suppose he has any more fowl like that?” says Jack. “I am in the market for another chicken, or maybe a duck that lays a few bucks.”

“That is the only chicken of its kind, he tells me.”

“What?” moans Jack, disappointed. “No turkeys? No ostriches?”

She shakes her head. Then she smiles.

“But wait until your eyes rest on the purchase of today,” she tells him. “This is indeed a wondrous bargain. ’Twill interest you greatly.”

“Let’s have a squint,” Jack suggests.

But he does not get a squint. He gets a scrunch. The scrunch-scrunch of the giant’s feet outside the castle. King Glimorgus is coming home.

“Here he comes,” yells Jack. “Open the oven and start in shoving!”

“But you were to rescue me—”

“How can I rescue you unless I rescue myself first?” Jack argues, running across the big kitchen tiles. “I got to hide safe to save my hide.”

BUT when they get to the oven and Jack reaches up, the door is stuck. And so is he, because he can hear the giant coming into the front hall.

“Now where?” Jack yells.

"Here—lift yourself into the bread-box." Imogene points out the big canister on the floor. So Jack pops off the cover and pops inside.

Meanwhile, the giant is coming up like thunder through the house. Jack tips the lid a little to see what's going on.

King Glimorgus stamps into the room, with a very nasty look spread all over his face.

"Don't tell me," he yells, before Imogene can open her mouth. "I can sniff him a mile off—the paltry poultry pilferer."

He gives her the old leer and sneer from ear to ear.

"It is in my mind to wring your pretty neck," he growls.

"But my lord—there is no one here. Seeing you approach, I have come to pour your tankard of ale."

And she offers him the drink she fixes for Jack.

"Ale—bah!" hollers the man higher up. "There is but one drink for me—the blood of that thieving rogue!"

"I do not see him."

"Use your nose," grunts the ogre. And he goes off into his poetry hour again, in a voice that would melt rocks.

"Fee Fi Fo Fum
I smell the blood
Of an Englishman!
Be he alive
Or be he dead,
I'll grind his bones
To make my bread."

Jack lies in the breadbox and almost shakes the lid off.

"Why doesn't he try some of that new enriched bread?" he grumbles to himself. "A little vitamin B, is all right. Why does he need my bones in the stuff?"

But this is not a question to ask any thirty-foot giant, so Jack keeps strictly from silent.

“He’s hiding here,” the giant yells. “Maybe in that oven!” And he strides over to the oven door, yanking it open. The door is still stuck, but this does not stop the ogre. He wrenches the door off and looks in.

OF COURSE the oven is empty. “I’ll search everywhere,” yells King Glimorgus. But Imogene pouts and tugs at his knees.

“You’ll spoil my surprise,” she says. “You will find its hiding place.”

“Surprise? What surprise?”

“The surprise I bought from the wizard today.”

“He here again?” But the giant looks interested.

“This item is truly rare,” says Imogene. “Do you be seated, whilst I bring it to you.”

She scampers off and comes back in a minute carrying a lot of wires under her arm.

“What manner of trash is this?”

“A harp, my lord. A wonderful harp.”

“Harp? I don’t play a harp.”

“No need to play it. It plays itself.”

“Plays itself?”

“That is the marvel of its minstrelsy. Merely command it to play, my lord.”

So Imogene sets the harp down on the table and the giant sits down and gawks at it for a minute. Then he says, “Play!”

And the harp plays.

Jack cannot believe his peeping eyes. The strings on the harp move and a tune comes out. Of course it is not anything that is leading the hit parade, but the stuff makes music.

And the giant begins to smile.

When the chorus is over he says, “Play,” again, and the harps swings out. Pretty soon there is quite a jam session going on, in a corny sort of way. The giant taps the table with his fingers—very gentle, so as not to splinter it to bits—and the harp goes through its repertoire. It is better than a juke box, because you don’t have to put nickels in it.

After a while it starts playing some real soft stuff—regular slumber music. And in no time at all, the giant is snoring. In fact he snores so loud it drowns out the music, and the harp shuts up.

SO THERE is the giant, slumped over the table fast asleep. As soon as she sees it is safe, Imogene gives Jack the old high-sign and he climbs out of the breadbox.

“Very glad to get out of there,” he whispers. “Too crowded. Loaves of bread jamming my knees and rolls all over my waist. I do not mind getting a bun on, but not on my head.”

“Quickly,” pants Imogene. “He sleeps now. You must go.”

“Mind if I take a souvenir?” asks Jack, pointing at the harp.

“Very well.”

So Jack tiptoes over to the table, reaches up, and grabs hold of the harp.

The result is very startling. Because the harp sort of tugs back on him and then it plunks out some sounds that resemble words.

“Help—Master—Help—”

Jack grabs it under his coat to stifle the noise, but too late. The giant opens his eyes and sits up.

“So!” howls the ogre. “There you are—you chicken-hearted chicken thief!”

Jack is on the spot. In fact he will be a spot if the giant’s foot ever smashes down on him.

He thinks fast.

“Yes, I am the yegg who snatches your eggs,” he admits. “And now I am taking your harp. So what are you going to do about it, Gus?”

King Glimorgus makes a lunge for him. This is just what Jack wants, because he runs right between the giant’s legs. Glimorgus turns around, but Jack is scampering down the hall, with the harp tucked inside his coat.

"Stop thief!" yells the harp.

"Fee, Fi, Fo, Fum," yells the giant.

"Nuts to you, brother," remarks Jack running very sincerely.

But the giant is right behind him.

Jack races out of the castle and down the trail, but Glimorgus stomps along right after him. He has to run stooped over with his hands out, because if he takes too much of a stride his legs pass right over Jack and he can not see to grab him.

Jack weaves and ducks but keeps to the trail. And the giant's hands come scooping down behind him in the dust, trying to grab hold.

Jack spies the hole and the top of the beanstalk and dives for it. He starts climbing down.

Then he starts sliding down.

Because the giant comes right after him!

HE TEARS away an acre or so of ground around the hole and jumps down on the stalk. The whole thing trembles at the terrific weight, and the beanstalk shakes and sways, but Jack does not stop. He slides for very dear life—his life.

Right down through the cloud layers he goes, skinning his hands and knees. Beans pop all around his head, but he does not hesitate. The giant bellows up above, and then he seems to get stuck in the fog from the clouds. Jack can hear him Fee-ing and Fi-ing, and when he comes down closer to the ground Jack hears the thunder of his Fo-ing and Fum-ing.

Then Jack hits solid earth. He is panting and gasping, but. he is also planning and grasping.

"If this is really such a beanstalk like in the story," he quavers, "then there is only one thing I need to do. I must chop down the beanstalk with my little hatchet."

This is a very cheerful idea. But Jack is not George Washington.

I cannot tell a lie. He has no hatchet!

So there is Jack, staring up the shaking beanstalk, waiting while the giant's feet start sticking out from the clouds. He is coming down fast. The stalk is wobbly, but it is not falling. And there is not a hatchet in sight!

Jack grabs at himself and beats his chest. Then he hits it.

The harp!

He yanks it out.

"Hey—leggo of me!" yells the harp, in a very impolite manner.

But Jack has no time to be polite. He rips the wood away from the harp and grabs a handful of loose wires. He twists them together at the ends.

Then he kneels down and saws away at the base of the beanstalk. The wire is sharp. It cuts.

Now the giant's knees are visible. And Jack hears his voice out of the clouds.

"Fee, Fi, Fo, Fum
Ready or not—
Here I come!"

Jack saws away. And the beanstalk gives. He looks up and yells.

"Fee, Fi, Fo, Fum
Here you go,
You oversized bum!"

AND that is just what happens. The beanstalk suddenly snaps with a twang and a bang. The whole stalk swings free and a gust of wind lifts it straight up in the air.

From up above, Jack hears the giant giving what the poets call one hell of a yell. But it is too late. The beanstalk shoots up through the clouds and disappears. The field is empty. There is nothing left.

So Jack goes back home to his wife.

"After all," he figures. "Maybe it is best things happen like this.

"The giant is gone, and that means I really rescue Imogene from him, and make good my promise.

"It is nice to have a lot of golden eggs, but the government arrests you if you keep over $100 in gold on you.

"A harp that plays itself is also fine—but what has it got that a portable radio hasn't got?"

Such is the story Jack tells me when he comes to town a couple days later. His wife thinks he is a jerk for not doing the planting like he promises, but Jack has plans. He tells me the plans, too, and he is very happy about the whole thing. Remarkable, is it not?

LEFTY Feep sat back and balanced an olive on his tongue.

I leaned forward and exploded.

"It's not remarkable—it's downright screwy! I have never heard such exaggerations in all my life."

Feep looked hurt.

"Do not say such a thing," he snapped. "It may be that I lie a little from time to time, but I never exaggerate!"

"But Lefty—do you actually expect me to believe that the Jack and the Beanstalk fable happened here in real life?"

Feep shrugged.

"Who can tell? Jack's wife says the beans are very old when her Papa brings them over to this country."

"Nuts to beans," I sighed. "But there's one thing that really puzzles me."

"Name it and you can have it."

"In the fable, the stalk falls down, and the giant gets killed. In your story, it flies up in the air. That isn't much to believe. In fact, it is too much to believe it!"

Lefty looked injured, even a trifle hurt.

"It only shows your scientific ignorance," he snapped. "The giant is closer to China than he is to me, so he falls up."

"Up?"

"Sure. Gravity, you dope!"

I nodded slowly, because I could see he was right there. But another thing bothers me. I mention it.

“When you started out, you told me that this Jack was making such a wonderful contribution to the war effort. And nothing in your story even hints at such a thing.”

“Oh, that.” Feep smiled. “I forget that part. What Jack does for the war effort is something he tells me the other day. Remember, I mention he has plans.”

“So?”

“The night Jack plants the beanstalk he uses only a couple of beans. He still has a lot left over in the pouch he finds.”

“Well?”

Feep shrugged again. His smile broadened.

“Very simple. Jack is going back to the farm right now. He is going to plant the rest of those beans in a Victory Garden.”

THE END

The Golden Opportunity of Lefty Feep

It was the break of a lifetime. Here in Lefty Feep's grasp was the Midas touch. And without the misfortune that Midas had!

LEFTY FEEP slumped into his seat across my table and beckoned to a waiter.

"Bring me a glass of water and a toothpick," he ordered. "And kindly cut the point off the toothpick first, so I am not tempted to cut my throat."

I stared at Feep in astonishment. "What's the matter, Lefty—aren't you eating any more?"

"Not any more than I can get," he muttered.

I searched his long morose face for a possible explanation. All I saw was eyebrows and a frown.

"You certainly look down in the mouth," I told him.

Lefty Feep sighed.

"Everything is down in the mouth with me, except food."

"Broke?"

He nodded.

"Yesterday I am the richest man in the world. Today I am a bum."

"Why should today be an exception?" I asked, but under my breath. He didn't hear me.

"Yes, yesterday I sits at the Ritz. Today I mutter in the gutter. I am all set to go over the hill to the poor-house, only I am too weak to climb hills."

I patted him on the shoulder to cheer him up. Then I patted him in the face with a roll. This did the trick. His mouth opened gratefully, and the roll disappeared. Also his frown.

“Don’t take it so hard,” I consoled him. “After all, money isn’t everything. All that glitters is not gold.” The frown came back.

“Gold!” rasped Lefty Feep. “Please do not exclaim the name of same. Do not meddle with that metal.”

“Why, what’s wrong with that?”

“Everything. It is gold which causes all my troubles. In fact, I go from a gold rush to a bum’s rush all in one day.”

The waiter returned with the water and toothpick, peep gargled noisily, then balanced the toothpick on the end of his nose in a wistful fashion.

“I still don’t understand,” I mused. “Why this dislike of gold?”

“It is very hard for me to talk about it,” Feep sighed.

“All right, then. I’ll change the subject.”

A gleam entered Feep’s eye. He began to breathe heavily as he rose and grasped my shoulders.

“But if you insist,” he said, “I will spill the story to you.”

“Oh, I don’t insist at all—”

“You are forcing it out of me,” Lefty Feep accused. “So you ask for it, so you’ll get it.”

Forcing me back in my seat with a half-nelson, Feep arranged my right ear for a target, aimed his mouth, opened, and fired.

And I got it.

* * *

AS YOU know, I am the kind of personality who likes to go places and do people. It is very difficult to get me embarrassed.

But the other day I wake up and find myself embarrassed, in the worst way—financially. I am caught with my pants-pockets down. I am not only broke, but fractured.

You see, a couple weeks ago a medico looks me over and advises me to go off to a summer resort hotel for change and rest.

Well, the bellboys get the change, and the hotel gets the rest.

So there I am, flatter than last night's beer.

To make it worse, I am all tangled up with a very neat little number name of Sweetheart Singer. I do not know how she gets such an unusual name, but that is what the Navy calls her.

Do not get the wrong idea, now. Sweetheart is really a very intellectual type of ginch. She is very fond of etchings—particularly the kind the Government puts out on $20 bills. So you see I am now mixed up in what you call a love triangle—I love Sweetheart, and Sweetheart loves money.

And here I am, dead broke. In order not to be heart-broke also, it is necessary for me to lay my pinkies on some coin, but swiftly. In fact, I have a weighty date this very evening. But the way it stands, I do not possess enough cash to rent a telephone booth.

So to make a long story wrong, there is only one thing for me to do. I hop back to town and pay a visit to Out-Of-Business Oscar.

This Out-of-Business Oscar, you may recall, is a loveable old cutthroat who runs a combination auction mart and hock shop where I once purchase a rug. He is called Out-of-Business Oscar because he is always advertising a close-out sale. Although the only thing Oscar ever closes is his fist—over money.

Even so, Oscar and I are friends of many years' standing—principally me standing in front of him trying to get two or three bucks when I pawn my watch. Getting dough out of Oscar is like trying to squeeze tears out of a landlord.

Still, today I know this is the only chance I have of raising a few chips to take Sweetheart out on, so I amble down to Oscar's store and unbuckle my watch chain before I go in. I also take off my rings, my cuff-links, and tie pin. This ought to get me at least a fiver, I figure. But just to make sure, I bring along a small hammer—in case he makes me knock the fillings out of my teeth.

When I get up to the doorway of the hock shop I see a big sign outside:

OUR LEASE EXPIRES!

GET YOUR BARGAINS—IT’S OUR FUNERAL!

ATTEND THE BIG PRICE
MASSACRE!

So I know business is still going on as usual. And I walk inside.

THE place looks empty. It is very dark, and there does not seem to be anybody around. I stand there for a minute, and all at once I hear a voice gasping behind my back.

“Turn around and let me look at you—at last, at last, somebody to talk to. Speak to me!”

It is Oscar, of course. He rushes up to me and grabs my hand, pumping it like he was running a meat-grinder and expected hamburgers to drop out from under my arm.

“You don’t know what a pleasure this is,” he wails. “Nobody comes into this joint for an entire week. It is a week since I see a human face.”

Then he recognizes me and frowns.

“Of course I do not exactly feel that I see a human face yet when I look at yours.”

I choose to ignore this remark.

“Speak up,” he says. “What brings you here?”

“A bicycle,” I tell him.

“I mean, what’s on your mind?”

“Hair-restorer, mostly,” I confess. “What I am mainly interested in is raising a couple guilders on these family jewels of mine.”

"You wish to hock this junk, in other words?" he says.

"I do not care for your other words, but that is the idea."

"It is a good idea," says Oscar. "But it will not work. Because I have not more and not less than no money. Here," he says, "I will prove it to you." And he steps over to the cash-register and rings it open. Something halfflies out of it and then falls back.

"See?" Oscar shrugs. "A moth. And it is so starved, it is too weak to even fly. Around here is strictly from hunger."

"What's the matter?" I ask, very mystified.

Oscar sighs and shrugs some more.

"I don't know, Lefty. I can't understand it. This week is the most baffling one I ever lived through.

"On Monday I start out as usual with a big sign. PRICES SLASHED TO RIBBONS. Nobody comes in. So on Tuesday I put up my bigger sign. PRICES CUT TO BITS. Still nobody enters. On Wednesday I hang out the sign that reads, PRICES TORN TO PIECES—COME IN BEFORE THE BARGAINS BLEED TO DEATH! And nothing doing.

"On Thursday I am so burned up I put out the sign for FIRE SALE. Nobody shows up—not even the Fire Department.

"Today I got all the signs up, but they are staying away from me in droves. I am about as popular as leprosy. Nobody wants to hock anything and nobody wants to buy anything. Too much prosperity. If it keeps up, I am ruined."

OSCAR rubs his bald noggin until it begins to shine like a street lamp.

"Maybe you got a few suggestions to help me with?" he asks. "I will appreciate same, Lefty."

I hesitate. It is a terrible thing to even think of, but I can see no way out of it in such a case. So I let my voice sink very low and try to keep it from trembling.

“Well, Oscar—there is only one thing left to do. You’ll have to get out the hook.”

“The hook?”

“Yes. That’s all you got left.”

“You really think so?”

“I’m afraid that’s all.”

“All right.”

Oscar sighs and creeps behind the counter. He stoops down very carefully and pulls out a long iron pole with a scythe on the end of it. It looks very mean indeed.

He tries not to look at me while he creeps over to the door. He is ashamed, but he is still an old master when he goes to work, so I watch him. carefully.

Oscar half-opens the door. He sticks his bald noggin out and squints up and down the street. His mustache bristles with anticipation, and dried noodle soup.

Then he hears it. Footsteps from the left, coming down the street.

Oscar sticks his head out further and frowns when a pair of socks hanging in the doorway hits him a mildewed blow in the face. He draws the hook up and begins to slide one end of the pole out of the door.

“Shhh! I think I hear a fink approaching now,” he whispers.

Now Oscar is not a sports lover, and he does not care for fishing—even though the river runs right in back of his shop. But I can learn more about fishing by watching him land a customer than old Izaak Walton could ever teach me.

So I watch this fink coming down the street. He is a little old dried-up guy with a face like a prune that wears glasses. He walks along very swift, and Oscar waits from behind the doorway playing his hook over the sidewalk down low.

All at once the old bird is just ready to pass the door. Oscar jerks the hook up very sharp and trips the guy. Then he digs the hook into his belt, very careful, and plays him from left to right across the sidewalk. Oscar now braces his feet against the threshold and pulls his victim in. The old guy flies across the floor of the shop, and Oscar jumps right behind him and locks the door.

Then he turns to face the old buzzard with a smile—because he is now a legitimate customer.

“What can I do for you, sir?” he asks.

“Where am I—hey—what’s the idea—ouch!” wails the little old bird, trying to get up off the floor.

OSCAR promptly taps him over the temple with a rare old New Jersey Ming vase. And the customer promptly falls down again.

Oscar turns to me.

“I am sorry, but I learn from experience this is the best way to make such a customer forget exactly how he happens to come in here.”

Then he very carefully gets a glass of water and revives the little oldy. He opens his eyes and sits up.

“Nasty fall you just had, buddy,” he remarks.

“Fall?” squeaks the customer.

“Sure—remember? You fall down and pass out just in front of my store. And say, that’s lucky for you—because of the way you rip and ruin your clothes when you fall.”

Then Oscar whips into his old routine. He runs behind the counters and begins to grab at his stock of flour sacks, mumbling to himself.

“New coat—the old one is torn—let’s see, I got something handy and dandy here, just imported from the Bronx. And a new hat now—the old one is busted, and anyway you must just come from walking near a pigeon loft—here’s a beautiful homburg from Hamburg—only $1.88, costs me $2.00, but it’s yours for $1.00, I make it up by saving string—a new tie instead of that greasy hunk of rope you’re choking yourself with—aha—”

He races back to where the guy stands, bewildered, and begins to tear off his vest and coat. Then he rips his shirt, and replaces all the old clothes with stuff from the shop. The little old fink stands there in a cloud of dust while Oscar pats the new clothing into shape.

"Pity you ain't taller," says Oscar, throwing on a size 42 vest. "But you're young—you'll grow yet."

Then he grabs the trousers.

"You must have ripped these when you fell," he comments, showing the guy the place where he was grabbed by the hook. "Well, don't worry, I've got a pair of leg-tapestries here that will give you legs like a chorus queen."

He jams a pair of pants over the scrawny legs, thrusts a cane into the guy's hand, and plunges a tie-pin into his neck. Then he steps back and registers ecstacy.

"Marvelous!" he croons. "You look just like a page torn out of Esquire."

WHAT he looks like certainly would be torn out of any magazine, quick, by whoever would see it. But this is all part of Oscar's song and dance.

"Now let's see," he mumbles. "That's $1.49 and $2.76 and $7.63 and $9.27 and $3.04 and $.18 for Social Security, and $.05 for the glass of water I revive you with. Comes to a grand total of not more and not less than $43.77 you owe me."

The little old customer looks bewildered.

"But I have no money," he says. "I'm sure I'm grateful to you for taking care of me, and getting me all fixed up with these splendid new clothes. But I'm not in a position to reimburse you. Ouch!"

He makes the last remark because of Oscar the Tiger, who is already snarling at him and clawing off his clothes in one furious leap.

"Wait," pleads the customer. "I can pay later—soon."

"Later!"

Oscar rips off his tie.

"Soon!"

He tears the shirt open.

"Pay me later, eh?"

He reefs the trousers.

"A wise guy! Huh!"

Off goes belt and socks.

"But," pants the old bird, trying to resist while he is whirling around in the air like a pinwheel, "I am an inventor, you see, and for the past year I've been working. Ouch! And I am just on my way to the Patent Office today to get it registered and I am sure it will make me a lot of money."

"Money?" Oscar pauses, clutching the trousers. "What kind of invention you got, Buddy?"

The little old guy strikes a pose in his underwear.

"Well, sir, I'm glad you ask me that. Most people just laugh at me when I mention it. They think I'm crazy. But just yesterday I terminate my experiments and complete the invention of what I call the Midascope."

"Midascope?"

"Simple. Named after Midas, the king of the well-known legend.

"The bozo with the golden touch?"

"Exactly."

"I don't get it."

"My invention is a super-reagent which has the property of turning all inanimate matter into gold."

"You mean you could turn wood into gold, for example? Like that King Midas did in the story by touching it?"

"Definitely. Hence the name. However, there is nothing supernatural about my discovery. Supernormal, perhaps, yes. But this does not operate by touch—it consists of a ray. A simple ray, which, if directed properly at an object, will transmute its atomic components into the structural equivalency of gold."

"Cut the double-talk," Oscar tells him. Then he turns to me. "What do you say, Lefty? I think you better call the zoo and tell them one of their squirrels got out of his cage."

"You mean to infer I am demented?" hollers the old bird.

“Not at all. I think you’re nuts,” Oscar replies.

“Then you’d better take a look.”

HE STOOPS down and fumbles in his old discarded coat. Then he pulls out a small metal tube that looks like a flashlight. There is a cap over the end.

“By removing this cap the ray is released,” he says, smirking.

“Oh, yeah?” I put in my two cents worth. “Then how come the cap does not turn to gold?”

“Because it is made out of a metal specially treated to resist the action of transmutation,” says the guy, going back into his scientific double-talk. “But take the cap off and you get gold right away wherever you point the ray.”

Oscar steps up and yanks the cylinder out of the old bird’s mitts.

“Looks like a fake to me,” he yaps. “I bet if I open it up and look in, I get a black eye—like those ones with the hula dancer’s picture inside.”

The small article sniffs and looks very haughty.

“There is no trickery involved, gentlemen,” he says. “This represents my life-work. I guarantee its genuineness. To prove it, I will allow you to point the ray at whatever article you may choose in this shop.”

“Nothing doing, buddy,” says Oscar. “How do I know it ain’t one of these disintegrator-rays like you read about? Blow my furniture or clothes to bits.” I personally do not see where this will be such a great loss, considering the quality of Oscar’s furniture and clothing stock, but I keep still.

“Wait a minute,” Oscar says. “I will step outside. There is a fruit store right across the street, and I will get hold of something to experiment on.” So he ducks off and comes back in about a minute with something in his hand. A banana.

“Here we are,” he says. “Now, buddy, you turn on this thing and let’s see you coin some gold.”

The little stranger takes the cylinder and holds it in his hand. He sets the banana down on the counter, then looks at it. He smiles. All at once he pulls the cap off his cylinder and points it at the monkey-cigar.

Nothing happens.

No light shines out. Nothing explodes. The little fink just waves the cylinder at the banana, that's all.

"Fake!" sneers Oscar.

The banana lies there on the counter, and Oscar snatches it up in disgust. All at once he stands frozen with the banana in his hand.

"It feels different," he mutters. "Heavier."

I take a good look. The banana is still yellow, but it is shining. Shining like gold!

"It is gold!" yells Oscar. "Solid gold!"

HE BEGINS to dance up and down, waving the jungle pigs-knuckle in the air.

"It works, you see? It really works!" he shouts.

I grab at the banana. Sure enough, it is heavy metal now. I can't peel it. The whole thing is a golden lump.

"Now what do we do?" I ask.

"What do we do?" echoes Oscar, staring at the banana. "What do we do? Why—we just run right over to that fruit store again and bring back a watermelon!"

I do not wish to go into details about the next hour we spend. Oscar does bring back a watermelon, and the stranger does turn it to gold with his cylinder. Then we sort of go gold-bugs, I guess.

Because we start to turn the junk in the store to gold. We wave the cylinder at the stuff on the counters and on the shelves. We get golden golf-clubs and tennis rackets, gold fountain pens, vases, pictures, microscopes, candid cameras. We even get gold leaf pages in the books when we point the cylinder at them. It is all like one grand and glorious bingo game where we always hold the winning corn. Nothing is impossible. An hour ago we are lower than a worm's toenails and now we are kicking around the pot at the end of the rainbow. No wonder we do not have much of the old self-control.

Finally Oscar climbs up on a golden step-ladder and points the cylinder at the stuffed moose-head hanging over the door. He looks at the golden moose for a minute and then he stops and frowns. He climbs down slowly.

"Why are you rubbing your forehead?" I ask.

"Because a thought hits me."

"You should have concussion of the brain," I remark, but he ignores this. He points at me and the little inventor.

"We are wasting our time," he says.

"Meaning what?"

"Meaning just this—why should we hang around here trying to turn this petty stuff into carats? We can go out and really coin money with this thing.

"Why not turn it on the sidewalks, on the trees, on the buildings? Imagine owning a whole skyscraper of gold! A 22-carat Empire State Building? Or a golden Subway? I can picture Radio City—"

"Stop!" says the little old fink, striking another pose in his long underwear. "You talk like a fool."

"I do, eh?"

"Certainly. Allow me to remind you of a few elementary truths. To begin with, there's a government law making it impossible for anyone to own more than $100 in raw gold."

" 'Laws,' he says!" snorts Oscar.

"VERY well, then," continues the small inventor. "If you do not respect government laws, perhaps the laws of economics will prove more stringent.

"Don't you realize that if you run around indiscriminately transforming everything into gold, that gold will lose its value? Don't you understand that if you create too much gold it will become common and therefore worthless?"

"I am willing to risk it," Oscar sneers.

"Well I'm not," the stranger snaps. "As I say, I am on my way to the Patent Office with this working model. I intend to register it and present the formulae involved to our government; to keep, not to use. In times of need, the cylinder can be employed. But it must be worked with discretion.

"I can see that common men cannot be entrusted with such great power. You, my friend, have already bruised your knees bowing down to the Golden Calf. It is an object lesson to prove mankind is not yet ready for easy riches."

I get the little fink's point all right, but Oscar grunts.

"Get off your soap-box and come down to earth," he says. "Here we got a fortune in our grasp and you want to give it away."

"We?" says the inventor. "It's my cylinder. I demand that you return it to me at once so that I may proceed on my errand to the Patent Office."

"Cylinders you want?" Oscar sneers. "Nuts you get!"

This is a very discourteous statement, and it seems to make the little guy quite angry, because he suddenly makes a dive for Oscar and tries to grab the cylinder out of his hand.

There is quite a lusty scuffle, and all in a moment the two of them are rolling on the floor.

I look on, very shocked. Because I would not roll on a floor as dirty as Oscar's for all the gold in the world. Not even dice would I roll.

But in a minute I am even more shocked. Oscar jumps up on his feet and grabs the cylinder. The little old guy starts to dive for him, with his underwear flapping in the breeze. And all at once Oscar whips the cap off the cylinder and points it—right at the inventor's legs and feet.

There is a hideous scream. Then, an awful thump.

The little guy stops short and stares down at his waist. He is still screaming, but every time he tries to take a step the thumps drown him out.

Because Oscar has turned the bottom half of his underwear to solid gold!

"I can't move," wails the inventor fink. "It's too heavy!"

"Good," Oscar grunts, putting the cylinder back on the counter.

"GET me out of here," yells the little stranger. "The underwear is frozen tight to me. Even the buttons are solid, and the buttonholes. Get a can-opener or a pick-axe and chip me loose!"

"You mean I should go to work on you like a miner?" asks Oscar. "Not on your life. Seeing how you cannot move, I am going to carry you into the back room and let you cool off for a while. Do not make any noise, or I will turn the rest of your longerie to gold and you will be a statue from the neck down."

"What are you going to do with me?" quivers the little old guy.

"Nothing, if you are a good boy. I will let you stay in the back room and see that you are fed and that nobody melts you down into wedding rings. Meanwhile I will make use of your little invention—very good use."

While he is talking, Oscar is shoving the half-man, half-statue back of the counter to the back room overlooking the river.

It all happens so fast I scarcely make up my mind. And just as I do make it up, Oscar comes back and raps me on the knuckles. So I drop the cylinder back on the counter again.

"Trying to put the snatch on it, eh?" he grates.

"But—"

"I can't trust you either, can I, Feep?" he says. "Maybe I better tie you up, too. In a little burlap bag. Then I can turn the bag into gold and toss you into the river. You always say you want a luxurious funeral."

"Honest, I'm not going to steal the cylinder."

"I'll say you're not," Oscar tells me. "And you're not going to say anything about our inventor friend, either. You are going to be very quiet while I figure out what I want to do with this little money-maker."

So while Oscar sits there trying to figure out what to do with his little money-maker, I am sitting there trying to figure out what to do with my little money-spender.

Because I do not forget that I have a date with Sweetheart Singer this evening, and I still do not raise any money to raise whoopee on.

I do not see which way to turn, but if it is any consolation, neither does Oscar. He sits there grumbling to himself under his breath, thinking up scheme after scheme. But always something is wrong.

"What if I do turn sidewalks into gold," he says. "I don't own the sidewalks. Also, the Empire State Building is out—why should I make money for Al Smith? Of course, I already got a fortune right here in the store, but I must figure out a way to get more. I need a lot of stuff I can turn into gold."

EVERY time he makes a remark Oscar rubs his bald spot. And he makes so many remarks I figure he will wear himself down until he has nothing above the forehead in a little while. But he is so greedy that no scheme he thinks of will satisfy him.

All at once he sighs and gets up.

"Well, maybe I better think some more," he yawns. "After all, there is plenty of time. The cylinder will not run away."

"That is right," I say.

"Oh, I forget!" he shouts. "Quick, I must lock up the store! With all this gold lying around I don't want any customers wandering in."

He races to the door, pausing only to turn the hook into gold and then going on his merry way.

"Better close the awnings, too," he decides. "Don't want anybody looking in through the windows tonight."

"I'll do it," I volunteer.

"Good."

So I step outside while Oscar waits.

When I skid past the door I do not hoist any awnings. I merely hoist my coat tails and race away down the street.

Because Oscar is right when he says the cylinder will not run away. He just does not figure that I will run away, and that I will take the cylinder with me.

Which I do, lifting the thing off the counter just before I go out, when his back is turned.

So now I make very fleet with the feet, and behind me I hear Oscar yelling, “Stop, thief, stop thief!” at the top of his voice.

Only this does not do any good. Because on such a street as the one where his store is, this command can apply to almost anyone passing by.

I just keep running, holding the cylinder under my coat, and I do not pause until I dash into the lobby of Sweetheart’s apartment building.

It is already dark, and I do not wish to be late for my date. My heart is going like an overtime shift in a defense plant, but it pounds even faster when I walk up to Sweetheart’s door. Because I am really gooey for this ginch. I got no more chance when I get near her than a hot marshmallow has around a Girl Scout.

I hold the cylinder very tight under my coat when I step up and ring the bell.

Already I am making plans. I will tell her about this cylinder and it will make her very happy and then perhaps we will get ourselves wedlocked. And this suits me fine. Some people do not approve of such an idea, because they say this Sweetheart is too mercenary. Me, I know different. She is not mercenary at all—only greedy.

And I figure the cylinder will take care of that. I mean to return it to the inventor, naturally, but I merely need to use it tonight.

So I have my little act all prepared. When the door opens I strike a pose with my arms stretched out and I whisper, “Sweetheart!”

“Ain’t youse a little bold, stranger?” says a deep voice.

TO MAKE a long story embarrassing, it is not Sweetheart at all in the doorway, but a big lug.

I look up into a bristly red beard. Then I look further up into a big red mouth and a bigger red nose, and then I look way up into little red eyes.

This is quite a squint, because the lug in the doorway is over six feet tall in his stocking feet. Which is probably the way they measure him, because he does not look like the kind of personality who ever wears shoes.

“Was youse looking for somebody?” the lug suggests. “Or maybe just for a sock in the jaw?”

I stand there figuring out what to do. The way I see it, the only chance I have of punching him in the nose is to jump up in the air and hit it with the top of my head.

Just then Sweetheart sticks her attractive puss around the doorway.

“Oh, hello Lefty,” she says. Then she turns to the lug. “Will you excuse me a minute?” she coos, very sweet. And steps out in the hall with me, shutting the door behind her.

“I’m sorry, Lefty,” she tells me. “I forget all about our little date for this evening. I am going out with this gentleman friend of mine from Alaska.”

“You mean that polar bear with the henna fur?” I snap.

“Don’t talk that way,” she pouts. “He is none other than the famous Klondike Ike. He is a very wealthy prospector.”

“Prospector, eh?” I mention, in a sarcastic manner. “What does he own—a halitosis mine in Breath Valley?”

“He is rich,” sniffs Sweetheart. “Why, he always carries a bag of raw gold dust around in his pocket.”

“That’s nothing,” I tell her. “If it’s gold you want, I am plenty dusty with it myself. I am so rich I am filthy.” She gives me a fishy stare.

“What are you trying to hand me, Lefty Feep? The only way you make money is by playing a slot machine—with a hammer.”

“Give me five minutes,” I yell. “Just five minutes. I’ll be back here with more gold dust than this Eskimo Elmer of yours ever has.”

“His name is Klondike Ike,” Sweetheart says. “And yours is mud.”

She slams the door on me.

WELL, I am far from discouraged.

I run downstairs and into the back yard of the apartment building. I find the janitor's shovel and a couple paper bags from the garbage incinerator. I fill the bags with dirt and get out the cylinder. I uncap it and point it at the dirt.

"Midascope, do your stuff," I whisper.

In thirty seconds I am puffing up the stairs again, lugging up two sacks filled with gold dust. I take out a couple nuggets and pound on the door.

Klondike Ike sticks his beard out.

"Oh it's you, is it?" he sneers. "What do you want—darling?" he says, in a very effeminate manner.

"I am a traveling dentist," I tell him, politely. "When you snarl at me, I see your teeth are decaying. I think they need some gold fillings."

Then I smash him one in the teeth with the nuggets. He looks very dented at my dentistry and slumps down on the floor. I march over him and into the apartment.

Sweetheart just stares at me when I pour the bags out over the carpet.

"See what I mean?" I tell her.

"Oh Lefty, darling, you're so rich—I mean, wonderful," she sighs, falling into my arms.

"What about our date?" I ask her, coming up for air a few minutes later.

"Let's go," she murmurs. "Oh honey, I never could resist a wealthy—a masterful man."

So she puts on her hat and face over at the mirror and steps out the door.

"Wait a minute," I call to her. "I want to wash up."

Saying which, I close the door and get to work. I figure on one grand gesture. I will turn on the cylinder all over her apartment. I will transform the floor, the walls, the furniture, everything into solid gold. Then when we come back later in the evening she will really see what I can do. This will certainly put my number up on her hit parade.

So I let fly with the Midascope, flashing it around like I was spraying with a Flit gun. In a minute I am standing dazzled. My eyes hurt.

Everything sparkles and glitters and I am looking at a fairy tale come to life. Yellow, tawny, shining gold surrounds me on all sides. The place looks like Morgenthau's delight.

Then I tiptoe out and lock the door. Sweetheart is waiting for me in the hall and we go downstairs. On the way down I pick up another bag of gold dust I leave cached in the hallway. We are all set.

WELL, I am just the kind of a personality to entertain a gold-digger this evening.

"Where shall we go?" Sweetheart asks.

"Why, the Ritz, of course," I tell her. And we do, in a taxi. When we get out I do not pay the driver, but hand him the bag of gold instead.

"Jeez," the cabby whispers. "There must be a fortune here, mister."

"Sure," I remark. "Almost enough to buy yourself a new tire."

And we swoop into the Ritz. On the way I duck off at the cloakroom until I find one of those big urns with the sand in it they use for throwing cigarette butts in. I scoop out sand, turn on the Midascope, and come back with pockets bulging from still more gold dust.

We go in and order the best—meaning plenty of champagne. Because I have just the appetite to drink a hearty meal.

All of this makes Sweetheart almost hysterical.

"I don't understand it at all, Lefty," she keeps saying. "Where did all this money come from?"

I just look mysterious. But after two quarts of the champagne, maybe I only look confused.

Anyway, she will not rest until she gets the story out of me. She keeps coaxing me all the time we are dancing, and she is some coaxer.

"You must tell me, darling," she sighs. All at once her eyes get very soft and tender. "I know—my great big wonderful man holds up a bank."

"Guess again. Gold is where you find it," I quote.

Her eyes get still more tender. She is wild about me.

"Maybe you kill a tax collector?" she breathes, sweetly.

"No. You're still cold."

This is a lie. Sweetheart is a lot of things, but she is not cold.

"Do you own a gold mine?"

"Uh-uh."

"Maybe you got a lot of sugar-rationing cards."

I lead her back to the table.

"I hate to disappoint you, Sweetheart," I say. "But I do not do anything dishonest to get this stack of chips. I just discover I am one of the long-lost Gold Dust Twins."

"They're black," she pouts. "And you are kidding me."

But she cannot pump the secret out of me. All she can do is pump champagne into me.

After we leave the Ritz—where I leave a cupful of dust to tip the waiter with—we go on to a couple of other hot spots. In fact, by midnight we see more joints than a chiropractor.

And all the while Sweetheart is itching to discover my secret. I keep stepping out for a minute on her to find some more sand or dirt to make dust out of with the Midascope—looking for rubber plants or cuspidors or sawdust—and every time I come back with a fresh batch she stares again. The Midascope cylinder is hot from being used so much. And Sweetheart isn't much cooler.

FINALLY, in our fifth joint and our sixth quart of champagne, I pop another bottle and the question.

"Sweetheart," I say, romantically, "Let's you and me try a little wedded blitz."

"Are you proposing matrimony?"

"Matrimony hell—let's get married!" I snap.

She turns her big baby blue eyes up at me.

"Lefty," she says, "I think you are the one I am always waiting for. You are kind, and generous, and brave, and generous, and strong, and generous, and cultured, and—well, generous."

"I am glad you see it this way," I tell her. "Personally, I always look for a girl who agrees with me. And if you think I'm wonderful, I agree with you. So what are we waiting for?"

"Just one thing, darling," she tells me. "We must have no secrets between us. You must explain where it is you get all this gold from."

"All right," I say. The champagne is bubbling around in my head, and I figure it will not hurt to tell her.

So we leave this last dump and taxi home, and in the cab I explain the whole picture to her. Or at least part of it. I tell her I have this magic gimmick that turns anything I want into gold. And I also tell her that I have a little surprise waiting for her when she gets home.

"How wonderful you are," she says, softly. "To think that I am marrying a man with the Golden Touch! I hope we spend money—I mean, many—years together."

Right then and there I begin to feel maybe I am making a mistake.

I also begin to feel her fingers digging into my pocket and trying to snatch the cylinder.

I slap her very gently on the nose, but I am really just a wee bit burned up. She may not make such a perfect wife after all, I figure—like the other three I marry at one time or another.

In fact, from the way she speaks, she does not want a man at all. She would be happier with a cash register.

BUT it is too late now. I ask her, and a gentleman cannot back down. Without being sued for breach of promise, that is.

So I decide to make the best of it. We get up to the apartment door and she can't wait to get inside and see the surprise I promise her.

She runs up the stairs ahead of me, and I lurch behind. I hear her open the door and scurry in. Then I hear her give a screech.

"She must be plenty surprised," I figure.

But she is not as surprised as I am a minute later.

That is when she comes out just when I get to the head of the stairs. On her face is a very nasty look, and in her hand is a lead bookend.

The bookend does not stay in her hand long. It comes right down on my skull.

"Take that!" she shrieks. "You four-flushing phoney! You and your fake gold bricks!"

I keep staring at the bookend. Only a couple hours ago I turn it into gold. Now it is lead—

"My whole apartment," she screams. "Turned to lead—everything turned to lead! You—you counterfeiter!"

She catches me one across the side of the old noggin that spins me backward down the stairs.

When I get to the bottom I do not stop. I just keep right on running.

All the way to Out-Of-Business Oscar's I am trying to puzzle it out in my aching orange. First gold and then lead—is something wrong?

Oscar and the little inventor fink are the only ones who can tell me. That is why I streak for the store.

When I get there the joint is still lighted behind the drawn awnings and shades. I bang on the door.

Oscar opens it.

"Something terrible happens," I yell. "I got to tell you—"

He glares and drags me inside by the scruff of the neck. I have a very tender scruff, too.

"You want to tell me?" he hollers. "Something terrible happens to you? Look at what happens to me!"

I look. I stare straight up into a stuffed moose head of solid lead. I look around at the lead clothing, the lead microscopes, the lead counters. Everything that the Midascope turns to gold is lead now. Dirty grey lead.

"IT HAPPENS an hour ago," Oscar groans. "The gold just seems to fade away and there is nothing but lead all over."

He picks up the lead banana from the counter and throws it on the floor in a rage. He kicks out at the lead watermelon and then yells.

For the next minute all he can say is ouch.

"What about the inventor fink?" I ask.

"He is locked up in the back room," Oscar reminds me.

"Well, let's tell him—he ought to know what's wrong."

"So quiet back there I figure he goes to sleep," Oscar says. "But you're right. He might know what the trouble is."

We go up to the door and knock.

There is no sound.

"Come on in there," Oscar hollers. "Wake up."

"What is it?" asks the little stranger from behind the door.

"Something terrible happens to your Midascope. The stuff it turns to gold is all changing to lead now."

"Not really?"

"Absolutely."

All at once we hear a funny sound.

It is the little inventor fink, laughing. Laughing!

"I am glad," he chuckles. "Something must be wrong with my discovery after all. And I am glad! Because your greedy behavior proves that the world isn't ready for such a miracle yet at all. I'm glad I make this failure.

"But now I must be leaving you—"

The voice stops.

"What does he mean?" Oscar yells. "How can he leave us?"

"The window in the room," I pant. "It opens on the river."

"But his heavy underwear is too heavy—" Oscar begins. I shake my head.

"Listen to that."

There is an awful bumping sound.

Oscar unlocks the door, throws it open.

There is the little inventor guy, balanced across the window-sill. He is ready to dive out. We stare at the heavy bottoms of his underwear.

“Hey—wait—don’t jump—you can’t!” we scream.

But the little inventor fink jumps. He tips forward, topples over, and disappears.

There is a terrific splash from below.

Oscar grabs the Midascope from my hand and runs to the window. “Come back here!” he shouts, hurling the cylinder out into the river.

“Missed him,” he says. “Oh well—he’s done for.”

“It’s suicide, swimming with that gold on him from the waist down,” I admit.

“Gold? What gold? It changes, remember,” Oscar reminds me. “He probably drowns because of all the lead in his pants.”

* * *

LEFTY FEEP cleared his throat in order to push another one of my rolls down it.

“So that’s what you mean by being rich yesterday and poor today,” I mused.

“Tragic, isn’t it?”

“Very. I suppose Oscar is pretty mad at you for all this?”

“Why should he be?” Feep asked. “The cylinder turns out to be no good, so he doesn’t lose anything. The junk in his store he can’t sell, and now that it’s turned to lead he can maybe get rid of it to the army for bullets. So he is all right.

“As for me, I get out of this mess with Sweetheart, so I am not behind on the deal.”

“Then everything worked out all right.”

“Well, yes and no. Oscar is sore about just one thing. You see, this inventor fink is screwy when he says his Midascope turns stuff to gold. And he is also wrong about one other point—when he claims the cylinder does not work on flesh.”

"Meaning what?"

"It's this way. Oscar is pretty blue last night when it's all finished. He asks me what he's going to eat the next day without any money.

"So I tell him to hang a line out of his window and catch some perch from the river. He does, and that is why he is mad."

"How so?"

"Because he hangs his line in the spot where he throws the cylinder after the inventor. And instead of perch, he gets a string of nice, cute little goldfish."

I smiled.

"Too bad. But after all, he could still eat them, I suppose."

Feep frowned.

"That's what I tell him. And he does eat them. So now, you see, he's in the hospital."

"What's the matter?"

"Lead poisoning," said Lefty Feep.

Murder From The Moon

Murder can be committed with two hands very well, but with four, it gives the killer quite a decided advantage indeed

CHAPTER I

Warm Welcome

"AND what do you think of America?" asked Bill Stone, eagerly. "It surpasses my wildest expectations," answered the visitor.

"You surpass mine," Stone grunted under his breath. Nevertheless, the reporter scribbled hastily. A knot of his fellow scribes crowded closer around notebooks and craning necks in unison.

"Do you plan a long stay?"

"I have accepted the hospitality of Solar Foundation," the soft voice purred. "It is their intention to exchange information with me for a considerable period of time."

"Fine. Say—how about some pictures?"

It was the signal for clamor. The penthouse of Solar Foundation was filled with arms waving cameras and flash bulbs.

"Very well."

"Suppose you pose shaking hands with some of the guests?"

"Just as you say."

Bill Stone took charge. He faced the other end of the penthouse chamber, where scientists and savants stood waiting until the press had its will of their visitor.

"Let's see, now." The reporter scanned faces, counted beards, squinted at bald heads.

"Mr. Bennet, you'll pose, of course?"

A bulky young man in a white laboratory apron rose heavily to his feet and smiled in assent. He elbowed his stout body through the crowd of news-hounds and took his place beside the visitor.

"I don't suppose you'd object if we included Professor Champion in the same shot?"

"Not at all." Bennet smiled at the scowling, bearded man who bustled towards him. "Hello, Butch," he said.

The Director of the Champion Foundation favored the young head of the Solar Foundation with an intent stare in which all the hatred of his bitter rivalry shone.

The reporter rattled off the names of the rest.

"Changara Dass."

A turbaned Hindu bowed low and approached.

"Miss Valery."

The smiling secretary of Solar took her place with a smile which caused several of the photographers to murmur, "Ah—cheesecake!" in a complimentary fashion.

"O.K." said Stone. He turned to the visitor. "Now, if you'll just shake hands with all of them—"

"All four at once?"

"Certainly."

Bill Stone turned again to the photographers at his side and exulted in low tones.

"Boy, what a shot!" he whispered. "Never anything like it in the history of the world before. Imagine—the four biggest scientists in the world shaking hands with him. And at the same time, too!"

IT was quite a scene at that.

There stood the visitor—his four long arms extended from two sets of shoulder blades, his four bird-like claws grasping the hands of the scientists. The visitor's snouted pink face stared affably into the distinguished countenances.

Stone's brain was already busy with captions and headlines.

MAN IN THE MOON MEETS MORTALS
VISITOR FROM VOID PROVES DOWN-TO-EARTH FELLOW
LUNAR LUMINARY SHAKES WITH SCIENTISTS

Why, the creature was almost human! True, it didn't look exactly like a man. Manlike body, yes—but with four arms. And the face was mostly nose; a mass of pinkish flesh with a slit mouth and two popping blue eyes.

Despite this it had a voice of human pitch and timbre, it spoke English, and it certainly seemed at home here on earth. This, and the marvel of the space-ship in which it arrived certainly indicated a mentality equal to any human's.

Stone was still lost in musing as the flashbulbs flickered. He was ready to resume the interview when the fat body of Stephen Bennet blocked him off. Young Bennet raised his arms and voice.

"Quiet please, gentlemen. I feel our distinguished visitor has had enough excitement for the moment. He will be glad to receive the press again tomorrow.

"At the moment I must insist that the reception proceed, so that he be given the opportunity to meet our guests. However, if you like, I'll issue a statement for the papers at this time."

The great room was hushed as Stephen Bennet, Director of the Solar Foundation, faced his audience.

"I wish my father were here today," said Bennet, softly. "It would have been the greatest triumph in a life filled with triumphs.

“You all know the story of Avery Bennet. Solar Foundation was his achievement. He was a great scientist, a great pioneer, a great discoverer. We know that, now.

“Yet forty years ago they thought him mad. The world felt that he had tricked his financial backers into setting up this gigantic laboratory, that his plans for a flight to the moon were fantastic, impossible. When he announced the completion of his lunar surveys and the construction of the ship to undertake the first voyage, he was laughed at.

“When he announced that he was taking a staff of research men with him, there was almost a court investigation. Finally, when my mother declared she’d acompany him, public indignation reached its peak.

“ ‘The Mad Noah.’ That’s what they called my father. You all know the story of how he launched the flight in secrecy. You all know how the press jeered when he failed to return.

“Only Changara Dass, here, believed. He was my father’s friend. He fought to keep Solar Foundation legally in my father’s name. He waited for a message, for pre-arranged signals that never came.

“At the end of six years—but you know that story. The ship that came back; without my father, without the crew. The ship that plummeted to earth in Jersey. The ship in which I was born, en route from the Moon to Earth.”

HERE, Bennet cast a look of malice at bearded Professor Champion.

“Yes, I was born there in space—when my father locked my mother into the compartments and set the controls to chart the voyage back to earth.

“What became of him we have never been able to learn. What perils forced him to imprison my mother and send her back to the safety of earth? These questions have remained unanswered through the years. You know my mother died at my birth. It was Changara Dass who took me from that spaceship, reared me in the tradition of Solar Foundation.

“For thirty-odd years we have waited here—waited while so-called scientists have jeered and sneered at the story. It was too fantastic for them to swallow. It was all a hoax, they claimed. My father had never reached the moon. He'd hidden out somewhere—sent the ship back to prove his wild story of a flight. For thirty-odd years we have endured these insinuations, endured the malicious libels of men like Professor Champion."

Bennet cleared his throat.

"My father's secrets, we thought, died with him. We had no access to his plans for constructing a new vessel. He sent back no charts, no journals, no vestige of proof or record of his discoveries. We could not answer our critics. We could only wait.

"During those years I have had faith in my father. Changara Dass has had faith. We knew that sooner or later there would be proof forthcoming.

"The years have been bitter. I will not hide the fact. The press has made a mockery of my own life. Called me 'The Moon-calf.' Ridiculed the way I was educated here in the privacy of the Solar Foundation. Laughed at my habit of hiding from the world, carrying on astronomical and astro-physical research.

"Now it is my turn to laugh. Three days ago, when the space-ship landed upstate, the world learned for the first time that my father's secrets had not died with him. That there was life on the moon—as he had always claimed. That this life possessed intelligence, that it had learned from him, worked with him, and created indisputable proof of its own.

"Because when the space-ship was entered, we found—our visitor.

"He is here today to tell the story to the world. And the world, laughing no longer, is waiting to hear him.

"I need not impress you with the importance of this moment. For the world, it means the beginning of a new era in scientific achievement. For me, it means a little more."

Bennet's voice softened.

"It means that I shall learn at last the story of my father's flight—of his life, and his last days. It means that the name of Bennet will rise from ignominy to shine beside the stars."

There was a murmur of excitement from the crowd.

"Today you—the great scientific names of this world—are gathered here to meet a man from another world."

Lila Valery stepped before the impassioned scientist and pressed his arm with a smile.

"Stephen, dear, you're talking too much. Let's get on with the reception."

"Guess you're right." Bennet waved his arm.

"You'll find drinks at the end of the room. Shall we proceed with a little informal discussion and introductions?"

CROWD murmurs swelled to conversational pitch. Bennet, Changara Dass, and Lila Valery moved towards the fleshy pink body of the lunar visitor. The scowling Professor Champion was already deep in conversation, his eyebrows wagging cynically.

The pink snout of the visitor flashed up when Bennet neared.

"I must see you at once. I have an urgent message for you. You are to come back with me, you know."

"What's that?" Bennet gasped.

"I cannot delay any longer. I had thought to humor you by attending this —reception, you call it?—and then leave. I see you have other ideas, so I must speak to you at once."

"This sounds interesting." Professor Champion gazed intently at the fleshy countenance.

But Bennet paled.

"Perhaps, if it's so urgent, we'd best step into the other room for a moment. Dass, you come with me. And you, Lila."

"Surely you wouldn't exclude a fellow-scientist from these revelations?" Champion's tone was mocking.

Bennet gave him a long look.

"Come along if you wish," he invited. They retreated discreetly to the doorway of an adjoining chamber.

The lunar visitor shuffled along, waving his pinkish arms grotesquely.

"All this noise—this excitement—it makes me cold. You know, Stephen." Bennet bit his lip. "Of course. I'd forgotten. Can I get you a cocktail?"

"Cocktail?"

"It contains alcohol. Warms the blood."

"It's a cold drink, though," Lila interjected.

"Yes—so it is. Better make it cocoa. Did you prepare some, Dass?"

The aged Hindu nodded.

"Get a cup and hurry."

The turbaned savant withdrew hastily. They stood alone in the antechamber.

"And now—"

"Spill it, friend."

The four-armed moon visitor turned. So did his companions.

"How did you sneak in here?" Bennet angrily addressed Bill Stone. The young reporter faced him with a disarming grin.

"It's my business to go after news. Something tells me there's plenty of it right in this room."

"I must ask you to leave at once. This is a private matter."

"Please." The moon man quavered, hysteria droning through the queer, high-pitched voice. "All this excitement—I am getting so cold—so cold."

The long arms were trembling now. The slick, poreless flesh was chafed, and the pinkish glow was queerly dull.

"I forgot. Where's Dass with that cocoa?"

Bennet made for the door, disappeared. Dass entered with the steaming cup a moment later. Bennet followed, grasped it hastily.

"Here you are."

"Wait—you're spilling it. Allow me." Champion, grinning in disdain at Bennet's excitement, grasped the cocoa and offered it to the visitor.

One of the four arms extended in a weaving, octopoidal pattern. The clawlike hand closed around the cup and the creature from the moon raised it to his lips, draining the steaming contents.

A little sigh of satisfaction bubbled from the fleshy pink throat.

Then came another sigh.

It wasn't satisfaction.

Four arms rose simultaneously. Four claws clutched at a convulsive neck. The tall body trembled in sudden revulsion.

"Wait—what's wrong—"

Lila Valery stepped forward to face the shuddering moon man, but it was too late for inquiry.

With a shrill scream the lunar visitor fell and huddled in a writhing heap on the carpet. As the others watched, the pinkish flesh slowly faded to a dead rose colour, then turned silver as frost.

In less than a minute the thing on the floor lay still. Still and—

"Dead!"

Changara Dass felt for a pulse forever stilled.

"Dead and—cold." Champion drew his hand away from the neck with a shudder. "Cold as ice."

"Oh!" Lila Valery hid her eyes with her hands. For the white body was quite silver now—silver and shining, like the moon that gave it birth.

They stared.

All but Bill Stone, the reporter. He made the door in three strides.

"Got my story," he panted. "And what a story! THE MAN IN THE MOON IS—MURDERED!"

CHAPTER II

The Strangler from the Sky

IT was Lila Valery who stopped Stone.

The fact that the reporter allowed himself to be persuaded was a tribute to her eloquence—or perhaps to her brown eyes.

"Don't you see?" the girl pleaded. "It would create a scandal that would ruin Solar Foundation. We can't let those people outside know."

"Got to notify the police anyway," Stone argued.

"Why? Are you sure it's murder? It might be shock—exhaustion—anything. You can't print such a story until you have proof."

"But—"

Champion intervened.

"I think she's right. Let me go out and dismiss the guests. Tell them our visitor needs rest. Then when we're alone, I'll see to it that you get your story. I'm interested in going to the bottom of this affair myself. I'll take this cooca, with Bennet's permission, and analyze it for poison. You'll get your story, I promise you, and shortly."

Champion flung a baleful glance at Stephen Bennet, who shrugged. "Go ahead," he mumbled. "Does that suit you, Stone?"

The reporter answered, but he looked at Lila Valery.

"I suppose it's worth waiting for."

Champion stalked out.

In a few moments he returned. "They're leaving," he announced. "Now, if you will excuse me for a few moments, I'll make use of your excellent laboratories, Mr. Bennet. Perhaps Changara Dass would accompany me to verify my report?"

Dass rose silently. His brown hand closed around the cup. He scooped it from the floor where it had fallen. A few drops of brownish liquid still rested in the rounded side.

Together the scientist and the savant departed. Stone, Lila, and Stephen Bennet remained.

It was Stone who drew a couch-cover over the silent silver monstrosity on the floor. Bennet and the girl were, huddled in the corner.

The stout young man was trembling as he rocked to and fro, head bowed.

"Don't—Stephen," Lila whispered.

"I can't help it," sighed Bennet. "Don't you realize what this means? Here, at the very moment of triumph, all that I've worked for and lived for has been snatched away. The clearing of my name, and my father's name.

The research and knowledge that could have been ours. Gone now. Because he died before he could speak!”

“Dou you think he was—murdered?” Lila whispered.

“I don’t know. I can’t think. Dass carried the cocoa. I handled it. And Champion gave it to him. If it contained poison, we’re the only suspects. And none of us has a motive.”

“Perhaps not.” Stone thought aloud.

“You haven’t, Bennet. But Professor Champion is your rival, after all. He has been the chief critic of you and your father, and he is the head of the Champion Foundation.”

Surprisingly enough, Bennet bridled. His pudgy features creased indignantly.

“Professor Champion, whatever his scientific attitude may be, is a man of unquestioned integrity. Certainly he would never be so foolhardy as to endanger his reputation by so clumsy a trick.”

“And this Changara Dass?”

“Changara Dass is my friend, my father’s friend. Today’s success meant as much to him as it did to me.”

LILA VALERY rose and faced the reporter. “I think your hunch is wrong. Our lunar visitor had a chill. You heard him complain of the cold, didn’t you? We don’t know anything about the physiology of these creatures. Probably he succumbed to his seizure just as he drank the cocoa. I’m willing to wager that Dass and Champion find no trace of poison in that cocoa.”

“Right you are.” Champion’s booming voice rose as he entered the room, followed by the Hindu. He faced Stephen Bennet.

“We found nothing, absolutely nothing,” the Hindu added. His turbaned head nodded slowly as he bent over the cloth-covered object on the floor.

“We shall, therefore, proceed with the autopsy at once.”

“Wait a minute.” Bennet was on his feet.

"Yes?"

"Do you think it's really—necessary?"

"If you don't do it, the coroner will."

"But the law has no rights over a lunar inhabitant."

"Stephen Bennet." The Hindu's voice was soft, grave. "I have known you all your life. Was I not as a father and mother to you?"

"Yes, Changara Dass."

"Have we not worked together, planned together for this day? Have we not dreamed of the heritage of wisdom which might be ours?"

"True."

Dass's eyes gleamed. "Today we have met seeming failure. Death has stilled the voice that could have told us all we wished to learn. But with an autopsy, we can perhaps cheat death."

"How?"

"We can study the physiology of our visitor. The structure, the mechanics of his anatomy. Even if we find no trace of poison, there are things we want to learn, you and I. Is that not true?"

Bennet bit his lip.

"Yes. You're right. Go ahead with it then, man—but don't talk about it. I don't like to hear you talk about it. I can't stand it."

His voice rose, cracked. Lila Valery's arms soothed his huddled shoulders.

Silently Dass stooped and gathered the limp, cold body of the moon man in his arms. The dangling silver arms hung bobbing from the folds of the cloth as he carried the corpse from the room.

Lila turned to Stephen Bennet.

"Lie down. Try to rest," she urged. "It will be an hour or so at least. We'll go down the hall."

Champion cleared his throat. "Might as well stick here and see this thing through," he decided. "But I'm not going to sit around. I'm hungry. There's a table full of food in the next room, and that's where you'll find me."

IN THE end it was Bill Stone who followed Lila Valery down the twilight-darkened hall to the office. He sat on the desk, swinging his legs, his blue eyes frankly appraising the girl in an admiring grin.

"You seem to be the only cheerful person around here," the girl murmured. "This place is like a—"

"Morgue," Stone finished for her. "That's what it is, with bodies being dissected, and all the trimmings."

"Please, let's not talk about it," Lila whispered. "I'm worried."

"Bennet?"

"Yes. He's so upset about this thing."

"He'll sleep it off and forget it." Stone smiled. "You must be very fond of him—covering him up and everything. Maternal instinct?"

"We're engaged." Her voice was low.

"Oh. I understand."

"Stephen's a brilliant man. But he has to be watched over, always. Changara Dass is like a nursemaid to him. Humors him. Because he isn't like the rest of us, you see."

"No, I don't see, exactly."

"Well, you heard what he said today about his father—Avery Bennet, who founded Solar, and made the moon voyage. How his mother went along, and how Stephen was born out there in space on the way back.

"Stephen has never forgotten his heritage. Never forgotten that he's—well, an outsider, really. Sometimes I think he's really alien to this world at heart.

"You know, he's never left this Foundation since he came here?"

"Really?"

"Changara Dass brought him up. He had a private tutor. He lives here in his own apartments, refuses to go outside. His childhood was hardly—normal. All his life he's hated the world for what it did to his father. He shuns people. Stephen has worked and waited only for the day when proof of his father's discovery would be forthcoming. Not until then, he swore, would he enter the outside world."

“You mean he doesn’t even go out of the building for a shave?” Stone asked, incredulously.

“No. Even the tailors come here for his fittings. He’s a recluse. Or was, until I met him. I’ve tried to wean him away from these eccentricities of his. I think I’ve succeeded, a little. But even though we’re engaged, I sometimes feel that he resents me. He gets these bitter moods and I don’t understand him. Oh, but why should I tell you this—”

“It’s been very interesting,” Stone protested. “Very. But tell me—what about the landing of this space-ship and our late lunar friend? Just what did Bennet expect to learn from all this?”

“I don’t know, exactly. When the ship came down, three days ago, he and Changara Dass were as surprised as the rest of the world. When they found this creature inside and it asked at once to be taken to Solar Foundation, Stephen knew that it was the expected proof from his father at last.

“He told me that it meant a complete vindication of everything he’d claimed. That his father had discovered life on the moon, that he had probably lived on up there for a long time—long enough to establish communication and interchange knowledge with the lunar inhabitants.

“Naturally, all this was conjecture. Stephen hoped that the moon man would possess complete information—tell him of Avery Bennet’s life and fate, and exchange data. The moon man asked to be brought here to Solar Foundation, as you know; asked for Stephen Bennet, and refused to divulge anything to anyone else.”

“In other words, he made the voyage especially to see Bennet?”

“Yes.”

STONE pursed his lips.

“Miss Valery—Lila—do you recall what the moon man said when we went into the private room? About some message he had for Stephen—about wanting him to come back?”

“That’s right.”

“Did he mean that he wanted Stephen Bennet to return to the moon with him?”

“I don’t know. He did say something like that, didn’t he?”

“I wonder why.”

“Perhaps he had news of his father.”

“Perhaps.” Bill Stone dismissed the notion momentarily. He rose, wiped his forehead.

“Whew! Don’t see how he froze to death. It’s hot enough here to boil eggs.”

“They keep it warm enough here at Solar Foundation. Changara Dass is something of a fanatic on the subject of air-conditioning. He sees to it that the temperature is always up in the eighties and nothing can argue him out of it.”

“I wonder if the old swami is making any progress?”

“Progress?”

“Yes, on his little carv—on the autopsy, I mean.”

The answer came in the form of a sudden buzz from the desk telephone. Stone lifted the receiver.

“Mr. Stone?” It was the voice of Dass, a hasty whisper.

“Yes.”

“Mr. Stone, I wonder if you would care to step down the hall to the surgery. It’s at the far end, at the right.”

“Why? Something up?”

“I think, Mr. Stone, that I have news for you. Some very startling news.”

“I’ll be right down.”

The reporter clicked the receiver back.

“Lila, you stay here. I’m going over to the morgue—I mean, the surgery.”

“And leave me here all alone? Not on your life!”

The girl joined him.

Together, the two moved down the black corridor of the empty Foundation. Once outside, Lila made it evident that she regretted her decision to accompany him. The girl shivered at the shadows, and involuntarily her hand clutched Stone's wrist.

"I'm scared," she murmured.

"Of what? There's no one here but ourselves."

"I can't help it. I have a feeling something's wrong."

"Forget it. Dass is waiting for us. Here."

Bill Stone pushed open the surgery door.

They entered.

Lila screamed.

Changara Dass was waiting for them. But the turbaned Hindu would wait forever. He slumped forward over the horrible pinkish body of the moon man, his eyes bulging glassily in a fixed stare at the corpse on the slab. His brown skin was very pale indeed, save for one spot around his neck.

One spot on Changara Dass's neck—a long, pinkish spot forming the outline of a hand. A hand that had twisted around the Hindu's throat and strangled him to death.

CHAPTER III

The Lunatic

THEY found Bennet on his couch down the hall. Champion dropped his sandwich in the outer chamber a moment later. The four of them were back in the surgery room, trying hard to keep their eyes away from the death that seemed to lurk in the shadows.

"The hand," Champion whispered. "Look at the prints. No human hand makes such an impression."

"It was his," Bennet muttered. "His." He started down at the pinkish body lying on the slab. "Look at those claws. They did it."

"But he's dead," Stone answered. "Dead man can't rise and murder."

"Dead men cannot rise," Bennet groaned. "But he wasn't a man. He was a creature from another world, another planet. Who knows what ghastly laws govern such beings?”

“You’re hysterical, Bennet,” scowled Professor Champion. “Look.” His hands went to the creature’s armpits. “These tendons were severed by the dissecting knife. The thing, even if animated, couldn’t raise its arms, let alone strangle a man with its hands.”

“But it did,” Bennet whispered. “Or something did. A ghost, perhaps. Perhaps it was a ghost.”

“Don’t be a fool!” Champion objected. “Let’s reason this thing out. Dass called Stone. In less than two minutes Stone and Miss Valery arrived. They found Dass dead.”

“Dead.” Bennet couldn’t control himself. “Dass is dead. He had found something out and he was going to tell. So he died. The moon guards its secrets well. It’s fate, I tell you! We weren’t meant to know such things—that’s what we get for meddling! Let’s burn the bodies, get out of here!”

“Stephen.”

“I’m sorry, darling. But it’s too much.”

“I know. Let’s go back to the office.”

“Go ahead.” Champion took command. “I’ll phone the police.”

“Police?”

Of course. There’s no doubt of at least one murder, now.

“That’s right,” Bill Stone agreed. “And I’ll phone the office with the story.”

Bennet shrugged.

“I suppose,” he said, tonelessly, “This means the end, but it has to be.”

Together he and Lila left the room. Champion followed.

“Coming, Stone?” he called.

“I’ll stay here for a minute and look around. Want to get the details straight in my mind. Once the cops get here we reporters won’t have a chance.”

“Very well. I’ll go back to the reception room and phone from there.”

Champion left.

Bill Stone stared down at the partly-dissected cadaver of the moon-creature. Once more he gazed at the horrible prints on the dead Hindu's throat. He fingered the scalpels and instruments on the adjoining table. He noted the empty cocoa cup and the partly-filled retorts beside it. He ran his eyes along the cabinet of pharmacopia.

SUDDENLY his eyes were arrested by a label. He opened a metal tin curiously. Then he stared at the dead moon man once again.

With a shrug of decision, he selected an empty glass from the table and poured the contents of the tin into it. Then he covered the glass with a handkerchief.

Quickly, he left the room and headed down the corridor. It was pitch black now, and silent as death. Silent as the death that crept through the night about him. Death that had crept and then sprung.

As he neared the closed office door the silence was broken by the strident murmur of conversation.

Stone paused outside.

Bennet and Lila, inside.

"But don't you see?" Bennet's voice. "I can't face that, Lila. It will ruin me—ruin the Foundation. The publicity, the investigation, the suspicions. And in the end, they'll never get anywhere. They can't bring Dass or the moon man back to life. They'll never be able to tell the story that will clear my father's name."

"But your idea is madness."

"Why? What other way of escape is open? The space-ship is waiting. It's ready. I have no charts or instruments, but the control system itself should be easily mastered. We can take it and get away now, before the police arrive. Come with me, Lila."

"To the moon? No, Stephen;—I can't."

"Lila, don't you understand? I want to know. I want to find out for myself. I could go there and prove that my father was right—go there and return with the full story. We could be together you and I.

"And who knows, Lila? Who knows what we might find up there? Avery Bennet might have built himself an empire. We could rule that empire, Lila, you and I. I am his son. I have the heritage of my birth. Oh, I know it sounds like madness, but it's the one chance, the only chance."

"You're wrong."

Bill Stone entered quietly, stood in the doorway. Bennet wheeled, his pudgy arms waving, his face flushed with agitation.

"Stone!"

"I think I can help you out," the reporter replied. "No need to go to the bother of that lunar trip. At least I think I know how our moon man was murdered."

"Poison?"

"No." Stone smiled. "He was literally frozen to death. That's what Dass must have discovered during the autopsy. That's why he called me. And I think I've found out what did it."

The reporter turned to the girl.

"Lila—go get Professor Champion. He'll want to hear this."

The girl nodded, left the room.

As the door closed, Bennet shook his head.

"I still don't understand."

"It's very simple." Stone held out the glass, covered by his handkerchief. "This stuff here did it."

Bennet took the glass and held it. His eyes met Stone's. "But what about Changara Dass? Who killed him?"

"That's a puzzler, isn't it? Perhaps we can solve that when the others get back."

ABRUPTLY, Bennet winced. "Here, Stone—take this. It's too damned cold to hold."

Stone retrieved the glass.

“Aren’t you going to look inside?” he asked. “Cold or not, I’d think you’d be interested in what it contains. Unless,” he murmured, “unless you already know.”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean that you murdered the moon man.”

Stephen Bennet laughed. Then he did a very curious thing. His hands fumbled with his white jacket.

Stone watched him closely. Too closely. He didn’t see Bennet’s feet glide forward. They glided swiftly—and suddenly Stephen Bennet sprang.

His fists crashed against the reporter’s face. Stone moved back, arms flailing as he beat against the bulky body of his assailant.

Bennet’s blows glanced from his forehead. A fist dug into his eye. Stone parried, trying to keep off those lunging arms.

Bennet was punching, punching. And then Stone felt cold horror. For as Bennet’s fists punched at his face, Bennet’s hands were locked around his neck!

It could not be—but it was! Stone saw the fists hammer towards him through a red haze. And at the same time he felt fingers tighten in his throat. Strong, tearing fingers digging away his life!

Bill Stone glanced down and saw them then—saw what was strangling and clawing at his neck.

Saw, from Bennet’s opened jacket, the two pink arms—the two extra arms, ending in the birdlike claws. The claws of a moon man!

Then the red haze welled up. Stone’s head whirled. Desperately he parried blows from human fists. And all the while the hidden hands from inside Bennet’s jacket pressed and pressed.

Stone went to his knees.

The monster was gasping now. Bennet’s great bulging eyes shone with maniacal intensity as he ripped and tore. A high, wheezing cackle burst from his corded, pinkish neck.

Blindly, Stone fumbled for his pocket. Bennet was bending him back. The cold claws were digging deep. In a moment it would all be over. In a moment—

With a last desperate wrench, Stone's fingers closed about the glass, tore away the handkerchief. One hand rose to Bennet's neck. He pressed the glass down, let the contents pour forward.

Bennet screamed. The two pinkish arms fell away, tore at Stone's hand, clawed at the glass cupped tightly against Bennet's neck.

Stone rose. He pressed the glass down.

Bennet's fingers clutched the air. His human fists fell. A gurgling came from a pinkish neck that slowly whitened. The color drained from Bennet's face.

The glass dug deeper. And then Stephen Bennet fell. Fell like a white ghost, like a silver ghost.

In a moment the bulky body lay inert upon the floor. The two horrid tentacles lay limp, the claws extended upwards in a last gesture of supplication.

"BILL!"

Lila was at Stone's side, and Champion with her.

"I had to do it," the reporter gasped. "I had to."

"Those arms—" the girl whispered. "Look at those arms."

"No wonder he always wore that heavy jacket," Stone whispered. "Look at the straps—he had them strapped down at his sides. No wonder he never went out; had a special tailor."

"What does it mean?"

"It means that Stephen Bennet's mother was not human," Stone answered. "That was his secret, and his father's secret. Changara Dass must have known, and shielded Bennet all these years. Stephen Bennet had moon blood in his veins.

"When the lunar visitor came, he had a mission. He wanted Bennet to forsake earth and return to the moon. Bennet preferred the fame that would be his if he remained here on earth, as a human.

“The lunar visitor was about to insist—and Bennet feared he would reveal his secret, if necessary, in order to make him go back.

“So Bennet murdered him. Changara Dass discovered how he did it during the autopsy, and phoned me. Bennet must have been listening in on the wire. He got to the surgery before I did. Using his lunar tentacles, he strangled Dass.

“Then he wanted to escape in the space-ship, knowing he’d be discovered if the police examined him. He was pleading with Lila here to accompany him when I walked in and announced that I’d solved the lunar visitor’s death. So he tried to kill me as well.”

“But how did he do it?” Champion asked. “That’s still a mystery.” He scowled. “There was no poison—I’m sure of that.”

“Of course there wasn’t. No need for it. Bennet, having lunar blood himself, knew the weakness of the moon beings. Knew they cannot stand cold. He always had it hot as an oven here, you remember.

“So he slipped something into the cocoa which immediately chilled the moon man’s system; paralyzed his peculiar blood stream with sudden cold. Something that wouldn’t show up in analysis; something we’d never expect in steaming cocoa.”

“What was that?”

“Nothing but simple, every-day dry ice,” Stone grinned.

“It steamed naturally in the cup and left no traces. I found a can of it in the surgery, brought a glassful here. When Bennet attacked me, I pressed the stuff against his throat. You know the rest.”

There was a long silence in the little room. Lila’s hand went to Bill’s shoulders as they stared at the tentacled body on the floor.

“He wanted me to go there with him—to the moon,” she whispered. “I’m glad I refused.”

“Perhaps it is not meant for men to dwell beyond earth,” mused Champion, gravely.

“Let’s get out of here,” was all Bill Stone said. They moved towards the door. Stone snapped out the light.

“Look!” whispered Lila.

Through the high windows, a shaft of silvery moonlight crept into the room. It moved over the floor and bathed the grotesque, crumpled body in an evil glow. But in its rays the face of Stephen Bennet shone with a peaceful light.

“Maybe he’s gone there, now. Back up there, where his spirit belongs.”

“Maybe,” Stone nodded. “But right at the moment, my spirit belongs somewhere else. Somewhere where there is electric light and a little down-to-earth entertainment. Want to join me?”

“All right.”

“I may have a few drinks, too.”

Lila smiled. “That’s all right with me,” she murmured. “But Bill, if you have a drink, promise me one thing.”

“What’s that?”

“Don’t put any ice in it.”

They closed the door behind them. In the little room, the silvery light continued to pour down on the dead face of the man from the moon.

Nursemaid to Nightmares

How would, you like a job with a man who requires you to take care of his menagerie of vampires, werewolves, mermaids and centaurs?

1. A Very Odd Job

THE man at the employment agency gave me a long look. “Why do you keep coming back?” he muttered, wearily. “There’s nothing for you. I’ve told you that a dozen times.”

I lost my patience.

“What’s wrong with me?” I snapped. “I’ve done everything the books advise. Look at me—my shoes are shined. My trousers are worn but neatly pressed. I haven’t got unsightly pores, or dandruff or five o’clock shadow. I use a deodorant. My fingernails are clean.”

Despite himself, I could see that he was impressed. I pursued my advantage.

“I smile pleasantly, don’t I? My handclasp is firm, isn’t it? Look!” As a crowning gesture I produced a handkerchief and waved it under his nose. “See?” I exclaimed, triumphantly. “No tattle-tale gray.”

The employment man sat up and then shrugged.

“I know all that,” he conceded. “You come up to all the specifications except one, as far as a job is concerned.”

“And what’s that?” I asked.

"You can't do anything."

I kept still. I knew he had me there.

"Listen, Mister," he said, patiently.

Your card says you're a writer. And we just don't get any calls for writers. Now if you could only do something useful—like plumbing, for instance. Or if you were an arc-welder. Lots of calls for arc-welders.

"But no. You're useless. All you can do is write." A slight sneer crossed his face. "Can't even operate a lathe," he accused.

I bowed my head. It was true. I couldn't operate a lathe.

"But I can type," I suggested, desperately. "You surely must get plenty of calls for a stenographer."

He grunted. "Wouldn't you look cute now, sitting on a business man's lap?"

"Never thought of that."

He rose from his desk. "So you see how it is. You're just not the type. Too puny for outdoor work or the army. Haven't got a chance in a factory. My advice to you is to go back home and start pounding the typewriter again."

I faced him and bowed.

"A very excellent suggestion," I agreed. "But there are one or two slight difficulties. To begin with, as of this morning I no longer have a home. Nor a typewriter. My landlady is in possession of both."

The employment man sighed sympathetically. "Sure tough. There must be some way out. Wonder what I'd do if I were in your shoes."

"Have them re-soled, probably," I told him. "My feet are touching the pavement."

"Must be something," he muttered, scratching his head. "Writer, huh? Inside work. Hey—maybe I've got it!"

He faced me across the desk and his voice dropped.

"Would you mind going to work for a screwball?" he asked.

"What do you mean, a lunatic?"

"No. Of course not. Why this guy is a millionaire. He's just kind of eccentric."

"You mean that if he were poor he'd be crazy."

"What do you care? A job's a job, and this is a good berth, if you fill the bill. Ever hear of Julius Margate?"

"No."

"Lives uptown. In a mansion, no less! I've checked. He called in last week—let me see now, if I can find the order." He bustled around opening a card file.

"Here it is. Yes, Julius Margate. He wants a house man. $200 a month, plus room and board."

$200 a month and keep for such a job? He must be whacky!" I exclaimed.

"Wait. Listen to this. Man selected must be fond of animals, able to climb trees, a good horseman; must have Type C blood and an I. Q. of 180 or higher."

He looked at me.

"Well?"

I SMILED. "Happen to know my blood type is okay," I answered. "Got a transfusion once. I've got an I. Q. record lying around that I think I can get my hands on. I haven't climbed a tree for ten years, but I guess I can manage. I used to ride pretty well. I'm not fond of animals—but for $200 a month and keep I'll sleep with a rhinoceros."

"Maybe you'll do at that," commented the employment man. "I'll call up Margate and see what he says. Drop back this afternoon around two."

"Doesn't he want me to go out there for an interview?"

"No. Told you he sounded like a screwball. Insists on phone interviews only. Says when he selects a man he'll send a guide down to take you to his place."

I let it go at that.

Promptly at two I returned. The employment agent was waiting for me. He ushered me into the private office at once.

"You've got the job," he informed me. "And you start today. Your things will be called for. All ready to go?"

"Suits me."

"Sign here. Usual commission."

I signed.

"What about that guide?" I asked.

"He's waiting for you now in the outer office."

I paused. "I didn't see anyone there," I objected. "That is, nobody but a blind man."

"He's your guide," the employment agent told me. "I warned you Margate was a screwball."

We went back to the outer office. The fat blind man with the striped cane rose as we entered.

"Here he is," said the employment man. He introduced me. "And this is Captain Hollis."

"Pleased to meet up with you." The captain's voice was a jovial boom. He grasped my hand, held it. "Sure we'll get along fine. Boss ought to like you. You got long fingers. Like eels. Artistic, ain't you?"

"Writer," I admitted.

"Well ain't that swell, dammit! Boss likes writers. Thinks they're just too stinking intellecshool. He's pretty intellecshool himself. But let's heave anchor. The car's outside."

We left the building. Captain Hollis led the way, cane and all. He moved with marvelous celerity for a sightless man. He found the elevators and his cane pressed the down button with unerring accuracy.

He threaded his way through the outer lobby, using his cane for a needle. And once in the street, he walked directly toward a large gray limousine which stood resplendently defying the car shortage at the curb.

A uniformed chauffeur opened the door.

"This is Dave," the captain told me.

“Pleased to meet you,” I said, climbing in.

“He’s deaf.” The captain thrust his face forward and his lips moved, repeating my name and greeting.

Dave smiled. “Glad you’re with us. The Boss is gonna like you, I guess. You wear glasses. I’ll bet you read a lot.”

The limousine moved out into the traffic as we sat back. I turned to Captain Hollis.

“How about giving me a few tips on my new employer?” I asked. “He seems to be a most remarkable man.”

“Who, the Boss? Listen, remarkable ain’t the word for that guy. Some people might think he was a little balmy, but they just don’t understand him. Kindest man in the world. Big hearted? Why, he loves everybody. He loves people you and I wouldn’t put up with in a nightmare.” The captain shivered slightly. It was a startling phenomenon! in so large a man.

“Not that I’m saying a word against the house-guests, you understand. They’re all nice, decent folks in their way. But what a way!”

He shivered again.

“That’s why I’m glad you’re taking this job. I’ve been helping the Boss out around the house. It isn’t easy for me, without my lights to guide me, and besides I can’t seem to get used to them guests of his. Even if I went and brought a couple of them in the first place. I remember snagging Jory in Hungary. Before the war, that was. Dammit, there was a voyage! But—”

“I don’t understand. What about Mr. Margate’s guests? Who are they?”

The captain ignored my questions as he leaned forward suddenly to address Dave.

“Wait a minute! I nearly forgot something. Jory wants some flea powder. Better stop at the pet shop on our way up!” Dave read his lips and nodded. A moment later the car turned in at the curb. “You go in and get it,” ordered the captain. “Here’s the money. A large can of flea powder.”

I DID. It was my first act in the service of Julius Margate and I was oddly disappointed. After all this build-up I expected something better than buying a can of flea powder for a guest's poodle.

When I returned to the car, the captain was already issuing a further order to Dave.

"Dammit, I'm losing my memory!" he growled. "We got to stop by the dentist for Mr. Simpkins."

Obediently, the car moved forward. The captain turned to me. "You'll like old Simpkins," he predicted. "He's the best of the gang. Easiest to get along with, I think. Of course Simpkins isn't his real name. Talks with an accent. But the Boss doesn't care about a guy's past if he's working on the level now."

The captain chuckled. "Poor Simpkins kind of over-stepped himself, though. That's why the Boss made him go to the dentist today. It puts an end to all chances of accident."

His fingers went to my wrist.

"What time does your watch say?"

"Almost five."

"Is it dark yet?" His sightless eyes blinked.

"Yes."

"Good. Simpkins will be out. He was asleep when I brought him down. Lugged him up myself. He ought to be awake now. And will he be mad when he finds out what the dentist did!"

Again the captain chuckled.

The car moved in once more.

Dave turned his head from the wheel.

"There he is, waiting at the curb," he indicated.

"Does he look mad?"

"Boiling."

We pulled up.

I saw a tall, thin, middle-aged man with thinning hair. He did look mad—his eyes, anyway. The rest of his face was covered by his cupped hands.

“Hello, Mr. Simpkins,” boomed the captain. “Climb in. Meet the new house man.”

He introduced me.

Tall Mr. Simpkins entered with a grunt. His black coat covered the seat beside me as he extended a bony hand. I grasped it, but not for long. It was icy cold.

“Gratified, I’m sure,” said Mr. Simpkins, in a burring voice. “You will excuse me. I am very upset.”

His hand went back to his jaw as he turned to the captain.

“That was a very bad thing you did to me,” he accused. “Taking me to the dentist while I am asleep.”

“Boss’ orders.”

“Ah! I thought so. He is a hard man, Julius Margate. Do you know what he had the dentist do to me?”

“What?”

“He pulled all my teeth! When I woke up a few minutes ago I was lying in the chair and my teeth were gone. All of them!”

Captain Hollis began to laugh.

“Dammit, that’s rich! Beg your pardon, Mr. Simpkins, but that’s rich!” The captain turned to me. “Don’t you think so?”

“I don’t understand,” I answered. “What’s so funny about pulling out all of a man’s teeth when he’s asleep?”

It was Simpkins who answered, sulkily.

“It isn’t funny at all. Losing my teeth is the worst thing in the world that could happen to me. Because,” continued Mr. Simpkins, in a dismal voice, “I happen to be a vampire.”

2. The Perfect Host

CAPTAIN HOLLIS was a very strong man.

I discovered this when I tried to jump out of the car.

Mr. Simpkins was almost as upset as I was.

"Don't be afraid," he whispered. "I won't hurt you. My teeth are all gone, anyway. I couldn't bite you if I wanted to."

His bony hand pressed my shoulder. I winced.

"Honestly," he pleaded. "I never bit anyone even when I had my teeth. Julius—Mr. Margate—always took excellent care of me. Bought me canned blood, the kind they use in transfusions. Liver extract. Anything I wanted. I was never hungry."

"Best-hearted guy in the world," Captain Hollis repeated. "Besides, you've got nothing to worry about. You're Type C, and Mr. Simpkins here is allergic to Type C blood; ain't you now, Mr. Simpkins?"

"Of course. There's nothing to be afraid of," reassured the vampire. He mumbled badly through his aching jaws.

"If you're a sample of Mr. Margate's house-guests, I'm going to have a pretty tough job," I answered.

"Not at all. Now take me, for example. I'm no bother to anyone. Of course, I don't like to have mirrors in my room, and I can't cross running water. You'd think I'd have trouble bathing, but I use liquid soap and oil."

"I don't want to know a vampire's beauty secrets," I retorted, somewhat harshly. Mr. Simpkins looked glum.

"You don't like me," he accused. "Nobody likes me."

"There, there," Captain Hollis consoled him. "Of course he likes you. We all like you. Doesn't the Boss take care of you? Didn't he bring you all the way from Transylvania and put you up in his swell mansion? Doesn't he give you everything you want?"

"Everybody hates me," the vampire mumbled. "I'm going out and let the worms eat me."

"Don't talk like that, dammit! You're acting very ungrateful to the Boss. Why when we found you back there in Europe, you was starving to death. Sneaking into henhouses at night and killing chickens, you was. Living from hand to mouth. Thin—you was anaemic! And all the time afraid somebody was going to find out where you holed up to sleep in the daytime.

"Now look at you! Got a swell boudoir rigged up down in the cellar. Nobody to bother you. All you got to do is come out at night and talk to the Boss. He's gonna write you up in his book, he says. You'll be famous!"

Mr. Simpkins smiled weakly. "Maybe I am a bit hasty," he conceded. "And I assure you I shall be of little trouble." He turned to me. "I am a noctambulistic soul.

I sleep from sunrise to sunset. My wants are simple. I won't bother you."

This was evidently meant to console me. It didn't.

"Listen," I began, addressing the captain. "You might as well tell me everything now. What about these other house-guests? Has Mr. Margate got a couple of zombies boarding with him? Any ghouls to feed?"

"The Boss? Of course not—he wouldn't have anything to do with no such creatures. Kindest guy in the world. But wait a minute. You can get the dope straight from him."

I hadn't realized it, but the car was turning into a driveway. We rode through an avenue of trees, hinting at spacious grounds beyond. The limousine pulled up before the steps of a large, rambling stone structure. The interior, brilliantly illuminated, justified the captain's description. It was a mansion, all right, and a big one.

We climbed out—Simpkins, the captain, and myself. Dave the chauffeur drove off to the rear.

Simpkins rang the bell. Tie door opened. No butler stood there. Instead, a pudgy little man in an ornate purple lounging jacket fairly flung himself out onto the terrace. His shock of gray hair bristled with an excitement matched by the gleam in his darting black eyes.

"Here you are! How's your jaw, Simpkins? Ha, ha—explain about that later. Matter of necessity. Captain? Everything shipshape? Want to see you tonight. And you—you must be the new house man."

His hand pumped mine in a friendly, vigorous grip. "My name's Margate. Julius Margate. Sorry, we haven't got a butler. Can't keep them.

Devil of a servant problem. Hope you'll be a bit more broad-minded."

He ushered us inside, bustling and talking in a quite breathless manner.

"Got a very good report on you from the agency, young man. Very good. Seem to be just what I need around here. So much to attend to, you know. So much. But come along—I'll show you to your rooms later. Right now, dinner's waiting."

I followed the short man and the captain through the long hall. We entered a spacious dining room. The table was set for three.

"You're eating upstairs, aren't you?" Margate called to Simpkins. The vampire nodded.

"I'll be up to visit later," said the host. "Want to take some notes."

He turned to me.

"Hear you're a writer. Fine! You'll be interested in the book I'm doing. Helpful too, no doubt."

We sat down, following Margate's example.

"Jory's cooking," Margate said. "Had him go out and take Trina her fish. Gerymanx ate earlier. Took his stuff out myself. We'll have to teach our new house man how to feed our guests, eh, Captain?"

Margate turned his gray head.

"Jory!" he called. "Oh, Jory—we're ready now!"

Jory brought the platter in from the kitchen. I was introduced quite naturally.

I correctly assumed that Jory was a guest, not the cook.

As far as I was concerned, Jory would be neither guest or cook in any house of mine.

JORY was a big man. Too big. His arms were too long and his legs were too short. He didn't have any neck. His hair was long. And plentiful. It ran over his forehead and bristled on cheek and chin. It sprouted from his wrists.

If he were my guest I'd insist on his using a depilatory. And I'd send him to the dentist too. I didn't like the look of his teeth when he smiled at me.

"You new house man, huh?" he grunted.

"That's right, Mr. Jory."

"Okay. Where's my flea powder?"

I'd forgotten about that little item. I took the can from my pocket and handed it to him.

"Thanks," he grunted.

His huge fingers tore open the lid. Raising the can, he doused his head liberally with the powder. With a nonchalant smirk he unbuttoned his shirt and poured flea powder down his chest.

"Jory—please!" objected Margate. "Huh?"

"The moon will be up in half an hour. I'll powder you then, after you change." Margate turned to me.

"Jory's a werewolf," he explained.

I tried to get up. The captain tripped me with his cane.

"He changes every night when the moon is more than half full," Margate continued. "But there's nothing to worry about. I've got his lycanthropy under control. He doesn't get violent unless he sees the moon, and I take care of that. Make him wear dark glasses."

Jory shuffled out of the room. The others began to eat. I didn't feel very hungry, somehow.

"You mustn't mind Jory," Margate told me, noticing my hesitation. "He's crude, I'll admit Illiterate peasant type. Hungarian backwoods, you know. Hasn't got the breeding of Mr. Simpkins. But he means well. Faithful as a dog, too.

"That's his only trouble. That canine streak. You know," Margate confided, "I wouldn't want it to get around for the world, but in winter Jory has a very bad habit. He sheds! Dreadfully. Usually make him stay in his room. He prefers to sleep in the kennel in back, of course, but I see to it that his hamburger is waiting for him upstairs. Fleas bother him a bit, too. But not so much any more. When the captain captured him he was really—I confess—mangy.”

Margate passed me my salad.

“You ever bathe a dog?” he asked. “You can give Jory a bath every so often.” Bathing a werewolf somehow didn’t appeal to me. But I was past making objections.

“I’d like to introduce you to some of our other guests later this evening,” Margate said. “But I doubt if I’ll have time. I must talk to the captain here. Fact is, Captain, I’ve got another voyage planned for you.”

“Now?” boomed Captain Hollis.

“Yes, for you and Dave both.”

“What’re we after this trip?”

“Never mind.”

Margate glanced at me significantly. “I’ll tell you later. But it’s the kind of thing I need you for especially. No one else could do it. And Dave has his part to play as well.”

“Don’t like it,” the captain answered. “Risky business. Blockades and submarines and all. Where to?”

“Greece again.”

“German-occupied.”

“You’ll get by if you follow orders.

You’ll be using my yacht, you know. Little danger of being fired on. And the regular crew. They’ll handle things. All you must do is follow the map and act when the time comes.”

“Something hard to capture?”

“Very hard. Hardest yet. No one but you could do it. There’s a bonus in it, of course. Make it worth your while.”

The captain grunted. Margate beamed on me.

“Well, young man—suppose you’re drawing your own conclusions?”

“More or less,” I admitted.

“What do you make of my little household from what you’ve seen of it?”

“It’s very—unusual,” I ventured. “Unusual? Diplomatic word. Very. Tactful, aren’t you? Why don’t you come right out with it and say you think I’m crazy?”

“Because I suspect that I might be the crazy one.”

“Ha. Good! Very good!” Margate leaned back. He offered me a cigar. I took it as we sipped our coffee.

“Don’t alarm yourself,” he told me. “It’s very simple. I’m a collector, that’s all. Just a collector. Hobby of mine. Many wealthy men collect books. Some collect paintings, or antique furniture. I collect mythological entities.”

“So I see.”

“Might call me something of a hunter, too. But I’m not interested in the usual big game. Besides, even if I have captured most of my guests, they are guests. And are treated as such. I rather flatter myself that I’ve improved their lot. It’s not easy, in times like these, to be a vampire or a werewolf.”

I AGREED with him on that.

“Perhaps you’re wondering just what impulse led me to the pursuit of this little hobby?”

“I am.”

Margate giggled.

“Oh, it’s silly enough, I suppose. At least to people who fancy themselves the practical, hard-headed sort. As a boy, I mooned around a lot over books. Mythology. Bulfinch. You know the stuff. I inherited money. There was no need to work. I inherited a certain amount of intelligence, too, I claim. Enough intelligence to avoid emulating the average career of the wealthy man of leisure. You know the stuff—blondes, polo, blondes, golf, blondes, horses, blondes, tennis.” He giggled again. “But I do like blondes,” he added.

“You might say I rebelled against certain so-called rational concepts of reality. I began to study myth-cultures. I convinced myself that certain deviations from the accepted norm existed in Nature. That the legends of supernatural presences and entities might conceivably rest on a basis of truth. That you can't sit back and say, 'There is no such thing as a werewolf,' for example, if you've never looked for one. Besides, psychopathology has only recently admitted the psychotic existence of werewolves, if not the physiological possibility.

"I knocked around the globe a bit in the yacht. Picked up Captain Hollis, here. A good man, the captain. Lost his eyes in my service. A maenad scratched them out, off the Dardanelles."

"She was a hussy, that one!" the captain boomed.

"We found a few things together, he and I. Things the hard-headed scientific boys never bothered to look for. They're always willing to go chasing off to nowhere and back to capture a reported new specimen of gorilla, or something, but you never hear of them getting up an expedition to actually track down a sea-serpent, for example. Dullards!

"At any rate, you'll meet some of my—discoveries—later. At the moment, I am engaged on a little writing project of my own. Sort of combination of clinical case-histories and a revision of mythology. That's why my guests are here. I'm extracting their life histories."

Margate smiled amiably.

"I think you'll like it here, once you get accustomed to things," he said. "There's a number of tasks for you to perform, of course. But if you humor my guests a bit you won't have any trouble. They're all goodhearted, if a little unusual."

A crash interrupted his monologue.

"The kitchen!" the captain muttered.

Indeed, the noise of falling crockery and silver resounded from the kitchen doorway.

Margate was on his feet. I followed him.

"Damn that Jory! How often have I told him not to change in the house? He's always doing that, and he always smashes the dishes!"

We stared into the kitchen.

Floundering amidst a welter of broken plates, a large wolf stared up at us with contrite eyes. The wolf had brown fur—like Jory's hair, only more of it. The wolf was panting a little, and its red tongue lolled.

As we watched, it rose to its paws and uttered a little yelp of embarrassment.

"Oh, Jory, you're so careless!" Margate sighed, shaking his head.

The wolf nuzzled against his leg.

"All right. But try to remember!"

I stared at the red eyes. Jory's eyes.

Now I was able to trace, not without a certain fascinated horror, the human outlines inherent in the wolf body. The bony structure of the ribs. The peculiar adaptation of elbow to joint. The finger-like pattern of the paws. And the human cast of the lupine muzzle.

The werewolf turned and began to scratch patiently at the door.

Margate stared at me.

"Oh dear!" he whispered. "Oh dear!"

"What's the matter?"

He stepped to the wall and took down a harness and muzzle. Stooping, he adjusted them about the wolf's body and throat.

"I'm sorry," he told me. "But I'm afraid you'll have to take Jory outside. I can tell he wants to go."

He placed the end of the leash in my nerveless fingers and pushed me forward into the night. The wolf tugged me into darkness.

"Just once around the block," Margate cautioned.

So I did it. My first duty in the house of my new employer was to walk his pet werewolf around the block.

3. Sleeping Beauty

I SLEPT soundly that evening, in spite of it all. I could save my nightmares for when I was awake.

Margate met me at the breakfast table. He was in bubbling spirits—as usual.

“The captain’s left,” he announced. “Got his maps and orders last night. Should be gone about six weeks, I estimate.”

He chuckled to himself.

“If he succeeds this time, my collection will be complete.”

“After something unusual?”

“Unusual is hardly the word! This one will really paralyze you! Hope he makes it all right.”

“Isn’t it a risky business for a blind man?”

“Riskier for a man with his eyes.” Margate babbled on. “But finish your breakfast. I’m going to show you around.”

I had hardly downed my coffee when Margate jumped up from the table, bursting with eagerness.

“Come on, come on!”

He led the way into the yard. We walked along a shaded gravel pathway leading to the rear of the house. Margate stooped midway.

“Jory’s tracks,” he muttered. “Didn’t hear him come in last night. Oh well, he’ll sleep until noon or later. And Simpkins won’t be with u$ until sundown.”

We proceeded, moving between ordered flower-beds.

“Warm, isn’t it?” Margate commented. He paused in the shadow of a tree.

“It is hot.” I rested my hand against the trunk.

“Get your hands off me!” commanded a voice.

I looked around. There was nothing to see.

“You heard me!” The voice was high, feminine; yet strangely muffled.

I stared again. As I did so, a branch descended and slapped my face.

“Fresh!”

Margate laughed.

“That’s Myrtle,” he explained. “In the tree. A hamadryad.”

I wheeled and surveyed the tree. It looked quite ordinary to me.

"Tree nymph," Margate continued. "Don't mind her. Her bark is worse than her bite."

"That isn't funny," came the voice from the tree. "Who's the new fellow, Margate?"

"That's our new house man."

"Hmm. Not very polite, I must say."

I thought it best to turn and bow at the branches.

"Sorry if I offended you. As a matter of fact, I was merely admiring your limbs. That's a lovely trunk you have there."

This was the right approach. I could tell that. A peal of girlish laughter was my reward.

"Flatterer!"

"Not at all, I assure you."

"Margate," said Myrtle, softly. "I hate to say it, but I wish you'd remember to tell Jory to keep away from me when—"

"Of course, Myrtle. He's just thoughtless, that's all. How are things otherwise?"

"Pretty fair."

"Your new friend here can climb a tree. I might have him shinny up you if you want to be pruned at any time."

I recalled that tree-climbing was one of my requisites listed by the employment man. Type C blood, fond of animals, a tree-climber—yes, it worked in, all right.

"I'd be glad to handle your limbs at any time," I offered.

Myrtle laughed.

"How you talk!" Her branches shook coyly.

Margate moved on down the path. I followed. Myrtle resulted coyly in farewell.

"Lovely girl," my employer remarked. "Often wonder what she looked like. The captain picked her up in the Carpathians. Had to fight off a gang of peasants when he transplanted her." He sighed reminiscently.

We walked down a graveled pathway through the garden which led to the door of a large, low structure. It resembled a stable or barn.

“Want you to meet Gerymanx,” Margate explained, as we entered. He bustled in. I had to stoop in order to pass the doorway.

Gerymanx stood in a large stall. Or rather, a part of Gerymanx. Gerymanx was a horse, and since his back was turned toward me, the part I gazed upon hardly constituted a proper introduction.

“There he is,” said Margate. “Nice looking, isn’t he?” He thumbed at the portion of Gerymanx which was visible. “Ever see anything like it before?”

I had an answer for that one.

SUDDENLY, at the rear of the stall, a man raised his head and peered intently at us. He was a stranger, and a rather disreputable one. Tousle headed and unshaven, he bared prominent yellow teeth in sly grin.

It rather disappointed me to find Margate employing such a raffish-looking fellow. I told him so, under my breath.

“Not much of a stable-boy,” I commented.

“Stable-boy? That’s no stable-boy, that’s Gerymanx.”

“But I thought you told me this—this thing—is Gerymanx,” I protested, weakly indicating the protruding brown backside of the horse.

“So it is. But the head is also Gerymanx. Don’t you understand, my boy? Gerymanx is a centaur.”

He would be. I might have known it. But I could hardly control my confusion when the human head wheeled, the horse body pivoted, and Gerymanx trotted out of his stall to welcome us formally.

I am no judge of horseflesh, and certainly no judge of centaurflesh either, but I must admit Gerymanx was impressive. His horse-body glistened beautifully in the sunshine from the stable sky-light. His human torso, rising from the waist, was superbly muscled. I had always imagined centaurs to be somewhat shaggy. Gerymanx wasn’t. He trotted forward, and upon our introduction, shook hands. He had to bend his elbows to do it, being considerably taller than myself.

“A pleasure,” he boomed. “Mr. Margate here tells me you’re quite a horseman. We must go for a ride together soon.”

Margate beamed with pride. “Gerymanx is quite a pacer,” he told me. “Four-gaited.”

“Glad to get out again,” the centaur went on. “No one has been around to exercise me but Dave, and he can’t do anything but hang on. Thought I’d like to work out mornings and maybe enter the steeplechase this fall.”

“He’s very ambitious,” Margate added. “Wants to race.” He turned to the centaur. “How’s the oat situation?”

“Pretty fair. You can tell this gentleman here what to do for me. I’d like to be curry-combed this week, if you don’t mind.”

“Your mane wants clipping,” Margate observed, critically.

“Guess it does.” The centaur smiled coyly. “You know, Margate, I’ve been thinking of having my tail bobbed.”

“Don’t do anything hasty now,” my host begged.

“But it’s all the style. I was looking at the Breeder’s Annual last night.”

“We’ll discuss that later,” said Mr. Margate, curtly. “Right now we have to be moving on. I’m sure you two will get to be great friends.”

He turned to me. “I must give you instructions on Gerymanx shortly. You’ll take care of him as well as Myrtle and the rest.”

We moved out of the stable as Gerymanx trotted back into his stall.

“Lunch time. Listen—I want you to call up the grocer in town and order a few items for me.”

We marched back to the house.

“You understand, I can hardly allow tradespeople to get in here. You’ll meet them at the gate, of course. But let’s see now. We’ll need a roast for ourselves—and some raw hamburger—about two pounds—a bottle of Lextron—that’s Vitamin B extract for Mr. Simpkins—better get a bottle of Glover’s Mange Cure for Jory—five pounds of halibut steak—and then call the feed store and ask them to send up a bale of hay—a bottle of tabasco sauce—"

I used the hall phone.

"Afraid you're going to be in for a little heavy duty these days," Mr. Margate apologized. "What with the captain and Dave away. Why not run upstairs and take a shower before lunch? It might freshen you up a bit for the afternoon. I want to go over the notes for my book with you, if you don't mind. Run along now—I'll fix us a snack if Jory isn't around."

I ascended the stairs to my own quarters. I had quite a nice bedroom with bath attached. I noted that my things had arrived some time during the morning. Jory must have brought them up.

It was quiet in my room. Quiet, and normal. That's what I needed most. A touch of normalcy, after all this bewilderment.

I walked into the bathroom, reached around the shower curtains and turned on the water. Then I undressed, slowly. I had a cigarette—one of Margate's Turkish.

I went back to the bath. I pulled aside the curtain, climbed in the tub.

"Hey!" said a voice.

I looked down.

THERE was a girl in the bathtub.

She was a very pretty girl. I noticed that at once. She had a long oval face, high cheekbones, deep blue eyes, and long, curly hair.

I also observed that she would look good in a sweater, though at the moment she wasn't wearing any that I could notice. And I noticed.

"Hey," she repeated, staring up at me.

I just stood there. Because a second glance afforded me certain observations of a disturbing nature. She was a pretty girl with long hair, all right—but her hair was green. A vivid green. Most unusual color.

"What are you trying to do?" persisted the girl.

"I was just going to take a bath," I answered, not too brightly.

“Well don’t stand there on one leg like a stork, then,” she replied. “Come on in. The water’s fine.”

I didn’t move, but I was taken aback.

“Who are you?” prattled the chatterbox in the tub. “My but you’re skinny, aren’t you?”

It was a trifle disturbing—this criticism. What would you say if you walked into your bathroom and a strange girl in your tub made disparaging remarks about your physique?

I was still pondering the problem when a discreet cough sounded from the doorway.

It was Margate.

He ignored me and strode toward tire tub, staring down at the soapy water.

“So here you are, Trina,” he accused. “At it again, eh? How did you ever get up here?”

“Jory carried me,” answered the girl, defiantly. “I didn’t think anyone would notice. Besides, I just wanted to use the bath salts.”

“Well, you’ll have to get out now. This is our new house man. He wants a bath, I imagine. That is what you want, isn’t it?” he added, turning to me for corroboration.

“Yes.”

“Oh very well. If you will be a pig, and hog it all for yourself.” Trina sulked. “Lift me out.”

I hesitated.

“Come on.”

I stooped and lifted. She was slippery. But that wasn’t the reason I almost dropped her.

I was staring at her waist. At the green—oh, it might as well be admitted! Trina was a mermaid.

“Shame on you,” Margate scolded. “I thought I told you not to leave your tank.” He sighed. “What will our new house man think of us, I wonder? Jory changing in the kitchen and you sneaking into his tub.”

“I just wanted bath salts,” the mermaid wailed. “And a chance to use this lovely mirror here to comb my hair.” Her eyelids fluttered up at me coyly, like waving kelp.

“Maybe you’ll help me comb my hair?” she suggested.

“Not now!” Margate extended his arms. “Here, give her to me. Go ahead and bathe in peace.”

He bore Trina from the room. A most attractive armful, too. I bathed meditatively.

At the luncheon table, Margate confided in me.

“It’s her French blood,” he declared. “Trina’s a Breton, you know. Found her off the coast of Brittany, two years ago August. Just before the war.

“She’s the restless type, though. Wants to sneak out to bathing beaches, I suppose. Crazy about bath salts and perfumes. Guess she’s lonesome. Used to a lot of ocean-ides and nereides around. To say nothing of sailors.”

“I like her,” I ventured. “I don’t blame her for getting bored in a tank. It must be like living the life of a goldfish. Isn’t there a swimming pool or something around here?”

“Say, that’s an idea! You could dig her one! There in the garden. You know how to handle cement?”

“Guess I could manage.”

“Jory will help,” Margate promised. “Say, that’s fine.”

We finished our luncheon in high humor. After a smoke we adjourned to Margate’s study.

It was more of a library than a study, and more of a museum than a library. The walls were lined with bookshelves. I scanned the titles with eager curiosity.

“Quite a collection you have here,” I commented. “Lots of sorcery.”

Margate gave me an earnest glance. “Just for reading purposes,” he emphasized. “Never monkey with the stuff personally. Too dangerous.”

I noted a glass bell jar on the side table. A long, thin bone rested on a cushion within. Margate marked my interest.

“Supposed to be unicorn horn,” he explained. “But I’m inclined to believe it’s a fake. Anybody knows there are no such things as unicorns.”

I RETURNED to the large center table and desk. In order to avoid resting my fingers on a mummified head I brought my hand down on a large, dark brown bottle. Margate gasped.

“Careful there! Don’t jiggle that bottle! Got a djinn in there.”

I stepped back.

“Bought it from a sailor in Aden. Set me back a pretty penny. Don’t know why I wanted it—I’m afraid to open the thing.”

I stared into the brown, cloudy glass. I could see nothing. But when I lifted the bottle it gave forth a rustling sound—a most disconcerting noise to emanate from glass or liquid.

“Let me see, now,” Margate began. He stooped over the desk drawers and began to draw forth sheafs of manuscript.

“Here’s the case history of Mr. Simpkins,” he muttered. And the notes Jory is giving me. Cave stuff—archeological background from Gerymanx. What’s this? Oh, the report of the Demonolatrical Society. 1936. Out of date.

He lifted his hands, eyebrows waggling in despair.

“You see? Everything’s topsy-turvy. Never get anything done this way. Need some system. A little order. Then I can get started again.”

But somehow we didn’t get at any filing system that afternoon. We sat, down and got involved in a little discussion, during which my employer added a few scraps of information to my data on his life-work.

I learned that he had conducted this somewhat singular menage of his for about five years. Mr. Simpkins was his oldest guest; then Gerymanx, Myrtle, and Jory. Trina was really the latest acquisition.

They got along fairly well together, according to Margate. Of course he humored them. Kept them happy. And in return, they afforded him diversion enough to recompense him for the sacrifice of a normal social life.

“Never go out,” Margate told me. “Couldn’t afford to, under the circumstances. Never invite guests, either. But the book is coming along, and it’s well worth it. When I am finished I’ll take my place alongside of Frazer and Ellis. What Darwin and Huxley did in their fields I will do in mine.”

He seemed a simple soul, did Julius Margate. I felt a growing affection for the man.

“Only one complaint,” he confided. “People are always trying to palm off fakes on me. Those things get around, you know. I’ve had side-show dealers trying to sell me freaks. And some unscrupulous dealers try to peddle their fakes—monstrosities that never existed. Missing links, and basilisks. One Irish rogue had the cheek to claim he could secure a leprechaun. Anyone with any sense knows there aren’t things like that. I ask you, now, is that right?”

He didn’t wait for an answer, but rose to his feet with a frown.

“Dear me! Almost supper time. Better dash out to the gate for those groceries. I’ll route Jory out. He’s in the kennel, most likely.

“On your way back,” he called, “I think you’d better take a run down to the cellar. Fix the furnace. It’ll be chilly tonight.”

I left on my errand. After lugging up the groceries I made for the cellar stairs, descended.

It was dark down there. I struck three matches before I located the furnace in the gloom.

I found the coal, filled the hopper. It took some time. Little red shadows danced on the walls behind me as I got the fire glowing. It was cheerful, warm. I began to whistle.

Then I heard the sound.

The creaking, groaning sound from the corner.

And a rustling. A slow, crawling rustle. A slithering noise.

I lit a match, held it up in none too steady fingers.

Fire swept across a mound of churning earth. A mound in which a box was set—a long, white box. A box that opened. Opened in darkness, as two long arms rose silently, swiftly.

Something sat up. Something with a long white face.

With a sudden start, I recognized Mr. Simpkins.

"You!" I gasped.

"Hello." Simpkins rose. The earth fell from his black coat. He stretched himself and yawned.

"What time is it? Forgot to set the alarm clock again."

I stared down at the coffin from which he had emerged.

The vampire stood beside me. "Pretty bad, isn't it?" he commented.

I shuddered in complete agreement.

"Know what I'm going to do, my friend?" he asked.

"N—no."

"I am going to make our host purchase a new coffin for me. It's the least he can do to repay me for that scurvy trick of removing my teeth."

I nodded numbly.

"Since Dave is gone, you shall have to accompany me," he continued. "We can go tonight, I suppose."

"Go—where?"

"Why to the undertaking parlor, of course. Where else would you buy yourself a coffin?"

"I won't do it," I declared.

And that settled that.

After supper Mr. Simpkins and I went out to buy him a new coffin.

4. A Grave Undertaking

JASON HARRIS operated one of the most thriving mortuary chapels in the city. Business was never dead. Mr. Harris himself was always on hand to welcome a fresh customer. That's the only way he liked his customers—fresh.

But he didn't like us.

I could tell that almost as soon as Mr. Simpkins and I entered his outer display rooms.

It had been a struggle to drag me this far. Both Mr. Simpkins and Mr. Margate had argued with me—pointing out that I was the only one who could drive the vampire down, and that night was the only opportunity Simpkins had of going out to make a personal selection. They clinched the argument by reminding me that I was, after all, an employee. And an employee must be obedient.

Now I wanted to get the whole business over with, quickly and quietly. So when Jason Harris moved forward to greet us, I lost no time.

"My friend and I should like to purchase a coffin," I began.

"Very well." Mr. Harris assumed a mask of sympathy. "Might I inquire as to the nature of the bereavement in the family?"

Mr. Simpkins stepped out. "Never mind that. Just show us around this box factory of yours and we'll make our own selection."

"Of course." Somewhat disconcerted by the callousness of the request, Harris led us over to an imposing bronze casket.

"Here is one of our latest models," he began. "I want you to note the dignity of its outlines, the solidity of its construction, the—"

"What about a mattress?" inquired Mr. Simpkins, eagerly. "Has it got a mattress?"

"A mattress can be secured," Harris assured him. "But I must ask you to observe this special feature—the method whereby the sealed casket is made airtight."

"Airtight? Nothing doing," Simpkins snapped. "How do you expect a man to breathe in an airtight coffin? Why he'd strangle to death!"

"But the deceased does not breathe—"

"How do you know? You ever been deceased? Come to think of it you do look a little dead on your feet."

Mr. Harris was indeed quite pale.

"I don't seem to understand you gentlemen," he muttered.

"We just want to buy a coffin, that's all. For a body."

"What sort of body?" Mr. Harris persisted.

"Why no body in particular. Just any body."

The mortician looked agitated. "You aren't by any chance planning a murder? You're not gangsters, I hope?"

"Of course not." Mr. Simpkins gave out with a laugh that was meant to be reassuring. It wasn't. "Say, I heard a good one about an undertaker who specialized in gangster funerals. His motto was 'Don't Put All Your Yeggs in One Casket.' Good, eh?"

Mr. Harris didn't think so. He looked distressed. I took advantage of his confusion to pull the vampire over toward a small modest-appearing gray box.

"What about this?" I suggested.

"Not bad," Simpkins commented. "Streamlined. And plush lining. Always like a plush lining."

"This is a very select model," Harris assured us. "One of our most popular styles this season."

"Never mind the sales build-up," said Simpkins. "I'll just try it out for myself."

Lifting the lid, he climbed into the coffin and lay down.

"Very comfortable," he grunted. "Lots of leg room."

This statement didn't please the undertaker either. He kept staring at Mr. Simpkins with a rapt expression, and his teeth began to chatter like a bunch of women around a Gin Rummy game.

"This coffin isn't for you!" he exclaimed.

"Of course it is. I always pick out my own coffins when I get the chance."

"Most people don't get a chance," Harris was forced to observe.

"Not me. I'm different. I've picked out five coffins in my time. Outlasted them all." Without waiting to observe the reaction to this last statement, Mr.

Simpkins suddenly banged the lid shut. A moment later he pushed it up again.

"Have to oil this lid," he complained. "I might want to get out in a hurry some time. You know how it is."

"NO, I don't," the undertaker confessed. "I don't want to know how it is, either. You two get out of here. You are crazy."

"A fine way for a mortician to talk to a customer," Simpkins bridled. "All right. I don't want your old box anyway. It's lousy. Why I would be ashamed to be found dead in one of your coffins."

He rose. "Come on," he told me. "We'll try another joint down the street where the service is better. I probably can make a deal on a trade-in of the old casket, too."

Mr. Harris forced a smile.

"Don't be hasty," he coaxed. "It's just that I didn't seem to understand. But I guess I do now. You want to purchase this coffin to sleep in, is that it?"

"Of course," said Mr. Simpkins, in a disgusted voice. "What would you do in a coffin?"

"Very little," the mortician assured him. "But, if I might inquire, why don't you purchase a bed?"

"Beds? Bah! The dirt gets onto the sheets," Simpkins complained. "And the light comes in, too."

"You sleep during the day?"

"That's right. I want something that's dark. Something to keep out the dirt. To say nothing of the worms."

"You have worms?" asked Mr. Harris in spite of himself.

"I'll say I have worms," answered the vampire.

"Dyspepsia is my trouble," the undertaker confessed.

"Maybe a coffin would help you, too."

"Never thought of it. Quiet in there, isn't it?"

“Very quiet. And think of the plush lining—all that satin and stuff!”

“Interesting idea, if a little morbid.”

“Beds are expensive,” the vampire continued. “And linen is high, too. I should think, with all these swell boxes lying around, you’d just hop into one for forty winks now and then.”

Harris scratched his head.

“I’d have to talk it over with my wife first,” he mused.

“Haven’t you got any of these double caskets? The big jobs?”

“Yes. It might work out at that.”

“Just a thought, friend. By the way—guess we’ll take this one.”

Harris resumed his professional interest. He quoted a price. I paid him. “Do you want this delivered?” he asked. “I’ll take it with me,” Simpkins responded. He grabbed one end of the casket and I took the other.

Harris followed us to the door. “But this is all so unusual—I’m a little confused. You really want to get into this coffin?”

“Sure as I’m alive,” Simpkins answered. Harris sighed deeply.

“Well, it’s your own funeral.”

“Not bad!” Simpkins chuckled. “And don’t forget what I told you. Try a casket yourself for sleeping purposes. I’d love to see you in a coffin.”

The undertaker shuddered visibly.

“Oh, gentlemen,” he called, as we opened the door. “Just one thing more. It’s customary to have the name and address when anyone purchases a casket.” Simpkins turned. “Look me up out at Everest Cemetery,” he suggested, maliciously. “I’ve got a nice grave out there.” Harris trembled.

“Drop in some time,” Simpkins added.

As we closed the door, the undertaker turned and ran back into his shop. His shoulders heaved.

“Now see what you did,” I accused, as we climbed into the car. “He probably won’t be able to work for a week now.” Mr. Simpkins was contrite.

“I was only trying to be funny,” he apologized. “Besides, let him close up the funeral parlor if he wants to. Business is probably dead anyway.”

I shivered as we drove off. Vampires I could learn to stand—but puns, never. If Mr. Simpkins didn't behave, he'd find some worms on his pillow one of these days.

5. A Social Centaur

THE ensuing days were unexpectedly pleasant. Life quickly fell into a routine.

In the morning I usually went out to the stables and brought Gerymanx his oats and hay. Then I turned the hose on Myrtle. Afternoons I spent with Margate, trying to recopy his disordered notes and straighten out his reference sources in some kind of filing system.

At times I took Jory for a walk in the evening. Every Saturday night it was my duty to give him a bath. During the third week I had the rather unpleasant duty of shaving him, but on the whole I managed excellently.

At the time of the full moon I called up town and ordered a pair of motorcycle goggles. These fitted over his eyes more comfortably than the usual dark glasses, and he passed through the difficult days with a minimum of howling. Margate's system seemed to keep his lycanthropic instincts well under control.

Within a few weeks I had Mr. Margate's household running smoothly. My work in his study came to an end. He was able to sit down with his book material well organized. I saw little of him, these days—he spent most of his time taking new notes. Jory's recital occupied his immediate attention. Jory being rather stupid and illiterate, it was a difficult task to extract coherent information from him. But Margate persevered.

My first feeling of strangeness was almost completely dissipated. One can become adjusted to almost anything through constant familiarity.

I no longer found it shocking when Jory assumed his lupine form before my eyes. The spectacle of Mr. Simpkins snoring in his cellar coffin did not alarm me. Myrtle's muffled voice from the tree-trunk became as natural a manifestation as the rustling from the branches of surrounding elms. Gerymanx was no bother at all. He read his racing form, bragged heroically of his racing abilities, and had latterly become absorbed in a system of physical culture exercises he was taking through the mails.

Perhaps not visiting in town did it. Isolation inured me to the unusual. My duties were light, the food was excellent, and the hours passed swiftly.

Besides, there was Trina.

I got her out of that cellar tank in no time.

During the second week I began to dig the swimming pool. I worked alone, but it was a steady pace that I set for myself. Another week and I had the concrete laid. In the fifth week of my stay the pool was completed.

Trina didn't know, of course. I planned it as a surprise for her, with Margate's connivance.

When I carried her up from the basement she thought I was smuggling her in for a go at the oath salts—a frequent practice of mine which I might as well admit. We had become very friendly, Trina and I. After all, I'm broadminded enough to overlook little details like that emerald hair.

I took her out that afternoon and brought her to the pool.

At first she couldn't speak.

"Ooooooh! she squealed. Tenderly, I threw her into the water. She splashed gaily. In a moment she swam over and put her arms around my neck.

"It's wonderful!" she whispered, and kissed me. It was the first time, but not the last. I found it very nice. A mermaid's kiss is moist, and a little salty, but very interesting.

I'd built a little rockpile in the center of the pool. She sunned herself like a Lorelei, her livid curls shimmering in the breeze, the radiance of her scales glistening against the water. Her long, delicate fingers, with just the fascinating suggestion of a web at the palm, beckoned to me. I went in the house and borrowed a pair of Margate's swimming trunks to join her.

AFTER that time went very swiftly indeed. I spent hours out there on the rocks with her. We'd swim awhile and sun awhile. She used to sing me some old Breton sea ballads in a piquant Flemish accent. Some of them were slightly bawdy, I suppose. I don't understand French very well.

Trina was happy for the first time in her life since she had been ensnared in Captain Hollis' nets.

"I've been like a fish out of water," she confessed to me. "It's like coming home again. Now, if I only had a few sailors—"

I put a stop to that talk in short order. Her weakness for seafaring men was really deplorable. But mermaids are like that, I suppose.

My fondest memories are those of the moonlight bathing parties. She and I in a world of silver water, gliding along under the moon. And afterwards we'd sit on the edge of the pool, roasting hot dogs or toasting marshmallows over a little fire. It was beautiful while it lasted.

Then came the well-remembered day. Along in the seventh week it was.

Margate met me at the breakfast table with a worried frown.

"What's the matter? Still stuck on that Jory memorandum?" I asked. "That part about the relation of the moon-flower to the anthropomorphic tendencies?"

"No, it's not that," Mr. Margate answered. He ran his hand through his bristling gray crop. "It's Captain Hollis and Dave. They're nearly two weeks late. Haven't had a word—not a cablegram."

"It's the war," I consoled him.

"Perhaps. But they're on a dangerous errand."

It wasn't the first time Margate had told me that. He was constantly hinting, but never revealing the nature of this quest.

"I wish you'd tell me," I said. "Maybe I could help."

"There's no way of helping," he answered. "Maybe I'm just a fool for planning this anyway. What good will it be if they are successful? I can't look and I can't listen. Never even see or hear what I get. Have to take my notes second-hand."

I COULDN'T make head or tail out of this recital.

"In case they do get back," Margate continued, "I'd better have you clear out the back room in the cellar. The big one. I've ordered sheet metal to cover the door. It's fairly soundproof. Just clear out the old furniture and leave the place vacant. We won't need any pen, or any food either, I don't suppose."

He sighed.

"The crew is reliable, though; Hollis has used the men before. They have their orders, but Hollis has to make the actual capture, of course. Dangerous business. Oh well, we'll just have to wait and see. Or rather, wait and not see."

Curiosity gnawed within me. I opened my mouth. But Margate rose and cut me off.

"Say! I just remembered—are you a blacksmith?"

"No. Can't say that I am."

His face fell. "Too bad. Knew I'd forgotten something when I listed your requirements."

"What's the matter?"

"It's Gerymanx. He needs to be shod."

"Oh."

"Didn't he mention that his hooves hurt him?"

"Come to think of it, he said something of the sort to me yesterday. I assumed it was just a minor complaint."

"No, he needs shoes badly. And he'd like a manicure, I suppose." Margate sighed. "Tell you what you have to do. Take the small truck into town and see the blacksmith there. I've got the address. Used to ride him down at night myself.

But you'd better go. I want to stick around here in case Captain Hollis shows up."

"You mean I put the centaur in the back of the truck and haul it to a blacksmith shop?"

“It’s all right. I’ve bribed this fellow heavily. Business being what it is in the smithy line these days, he keeps his mouth shut.”

“But what about traveling on the road?”

“Oh, if you use the county truck you shouldn’t have any trouble. Not much traffic.”

“All right.”

“Better get started.” Margate scribbled down an address and gave me some money. I turned.

“Be careful now,” he warned me. “And watch Gerymanx. He’s a wild one when he gets loose. Got ambitions, he has. And he’s too friendly. Keep him out of mischief and when he gets through bring him right back. Whatever you do, don’t let him get into Droopy’s Tavern next door. He’s fond of the grape. We caught him that way, while he was drunk.”

I hurried down the path. Trina called out to me from the pool.

“Coming in for a swim, dear?”

“Can’t make it. Got to hurry into town.”

I stopped and gave her a kiss. “See you later.”

She flipped her tail at me saucily and turned away.

Gerymanx was at the stable door.

“Margate says you’re taking me in for a pedicure,” he greeted me.

“That’s right.”

“You want a saddle?”

“No. You’re coming in on the truck. And no monkey business either,” I warned.

The centaur’s face fell. “That’s too bad. I thought we might have a little canter around the park before we went to the smith’s.”

“Nothing doing. Can’t afford to attract any attention.”

“Oh, all right,” Gerymanx sulked. “Get the truck.”

I pulled it out of the garage. It was a small job, but I was grateful for the enclosed sides on the compartment. They completely hid Gerymanx’s astonishing body from view. Only his tousled head was visible above the railing.

"Take it easy," he called out.

I took it easy. Very easy. Every time we passed a car on the highway I slowed down, and I did my best to avoid jolting my peculiar passenger. It was almost lunchtime when we pulled up at the old brick smithy on the outskirts of town.

I backed the truck up to the door and walked inside.

THE blacksmith, who by the most appropriate coincidence was named Smith, came to the door. He was a broad-shouldered man with a bald head and a ruddy complexion.

"I've got a job for you," I began, hesitantly. "Gentleman in back there wants to be shod."

Smith cocked his head at Gerymanx, then smiled.

"Oh—you're from Mr. Margate. I understand. Bring him inside, there's nobody around."

I led Gerymanx down the loading platform and hurried him into the stables.

"Make it snappy, will you?" I requested, nervously.

"Take about an hour," Smith told me. "Why not go next door and have a bite of lunch?"

It seemed like a sound suggestion. I entered Droopy's Tavern and sat down.

Mr. Droopy—if that was his name—proved to be a short little man with red hair and a permanently bored expression on his unshaven features.

"Whatsa gonna be?" he asked.

I ordered a sandwich and a glass of beer. The sandwich was liberally salted. I had a second glass of beer. It must have been salted too, because my thirst increased. I had a third glass, a fourth.

All this time I could hear a merry clanging from the smithy next door. Smith was at work.

The pounding ceased abruptly. Smith came in through a side door with a pail.

"How's it going?" I asked.

"Pretty hot work," he told me. He turned to the bar. "Hey, Droopy—fill this up."

Droopy took the pail over to the tap.

Smith went out again. In a few moments the clanging increased. Suddenly it halted once more. Smith re-entered with the empty pail.

"Very hot work," he explained. "Droopy—fill this up."

Again he went out. Again the clanging rose. And in a remarkably short time, Smith walked heavily in with his bucket.

" 'Stremely hot," he mumbled. "Fill 'er up, Droop."

I watched Droopy fill the large pail. I ordered another beer myself. Smith stumbled out. More clanging. Then silence.

Smith wobbled through the door.

"Heat's terrific," he hiccupped. "Gotta fill thish up, Droop, ol' pal."

He went out. I listened intently. The clanging began again. But this time it held a peculiar cadence. A familiar cadence.

"Da-da da-da dee-da, de-da de-da, de-da-da.

Where had I heard this before?

I made for the side door and slipped into the smithy.

Gerymanx squatted on his haunches beside the blacksmith, whose left arm was locked around his neck. Both centaur and smithy held a hammer in their free hands. As I watched, they tapped merrily away on the anvil. Their raucous voices rose in a sour blending of the Anvil Chorus. The empty bucket, inverted, was perched on Gerymanx's shaggy, head.

"Hello, pal!" the centaur greeted me.

I glared. "What is the meaning of this—this horseplay?"

Gerymanx wobbled to his feet.

"Wanna nother drink of beer!" he insisted. "Feet all shod. Now I wanna celebrate."

"Gerymanx!" I yelled. "Come bad here!"

But it was too late. The centaur trotted unsteadily through the side door and into Droopy's Tavern.

He was up at the bar before the redheaded proprietor looked at him. From the waist up, it was a naked man who stared at the bartender and shouted, "Shoot the soup to me, Droop!"

"Where's your clothes?" Droopy demanded.

"I'm masquerading," the centaur temporized. I tugged at his elbow.

"Come on, get out of here," I whispered.

"I don't serve no naked persons," Droopy declared. He stepped around the bar, then fell back. His eyes took in the horse body.

"Gawd!" he breathed.

Gerymanx turned what was meant to be a reassuring smile on the bartender.

"Told you I was masquerading, didn't I?" he explained.

"Well, I don't like it." Droopy turned to me. "Get the blazes outta my joint," he demanded. "And take this horse's—whatever it is—with you!"

It was an ill-chosen moment for the entry of another couple. They lurched into the tavern; a tall, flashily-dressed man and an obviously befuddled woman. They stared incredulously at Gerymanx.

"Holy Moses!" muttered the man. "Do you see what I see?"

"Gawd, Harry, it's a mounted policeman." The woman peered tipsily at the centaur.

"What'd he do with his clothes?"

"And where's his legs?" The man quavered. "He's a horse!"

Gerymanx wheeled, offended. "Who you think you're talking to?" he bridled.

"A talking horse," the woman amended. "Harry, we better lay off the stuff for awhile."

"Lay off me, that's what you should do." Gerymanx tried to prance and stumbled unsteadily. His hooves clattered against a cuspidor.

"I bet his mother was frightened by a merry-go-round," the woman continued. "Oooh—look out!"

FOR Droopy had rounded tha-bar, bearing a baseball bat. He bore down on Gerymanx with an oath.

“I’ll learn ya to horse around in my dump,” he grated. “What you think this is, a livery stable?” He lifted his bat menacingly.

Gerymanx wheeled. His forefeet rose.

Droopy sailed over the bar. With an inhuman neigh, the centaur dashed forward. His charge carried him through the door. I raced after him.

In his drunken fury, the centaur careened into the street. By some unfortunate mischance a milk-wagon was standing beside our truck. The mare between the shafts looked up, startled.

At the sight of Gerymanx she neighed coyly. A slow blush spread over her equine cheeks. Gerymanx whinnied. Suddenly the mare’s eyes gave a flicker of apprehension as they rested on the centaur’s human torso. With a shrill, indignant squeal she dashed forward, carrying the wagon with her. There was a grinding crash as the wagon tipped sideways—right into our truck.

At the same moment Droopy emerged from the tavern. Up the street the milkman dropped his bottle-rack with a clatter and started to run our way.

“Now you’ve done it, I panted. “Wrecked the truck, too!”

“Get on my back,” Gerymanx mumbled. The shock had sobered him. “We’ll make a run for it.”

I mounted hastily.

“Hang on to my neck.”

I hung.

“Here we go.”

We went.

The centaur’s hooves struck sparks from the brick as he raced down the street. I clung to him for dear life.

“Whee!” he yelled. “This is more like it!”

A glance showed me that our pursuers were gathered in a knot around the milk-wagon and truck.

“What a mess,” I groaned. “How’ll we ever get back?”

"I'll carry you."

"On top of the load you're carrying already?"

Gerymanx laughed.

"I feel great," be snorted over his shoulder. "Great. Let's go annoy some street cleaners."

"We're going home. Right now."

"Oh, don't be a wet blanket! I want to have fun. Let's go down to Saratoga. Maybe you could enter me in a race."

I allowed this revolting suggestion to go unanswered.

"Take me home," I commanded.

"But—"

"Listen, Gerymanx," I said, slowly. "You've got a pretty soft berth there at Margate's, and you know it. If you don't behave, I'll fix you."

"What do you mean?"

"I'll tell Margate to sell you to an ice dealer. Then you'll have to pull a wagon all day long, and yell, 'Ice for sale' into the bargain."

Gerymanx's pace slackened.

"All right," he grumbled. "All right."

"Stick to the side road now," I cautioned.

He did. It was a slow trip. We hid out behind billboards whenever I spotted a car ahead or behind us. It was almost twilight when we cantered through the gate and up the drive.

"That's about enough excitement for one day," I sighed.

But—

6. Blind Man's Bluff

"COME right in!" Margate urged, standing on the steps. He waved his arms expansively.

"Me too?" Gerymanx asked.

"Of course. Wouldn't be a party without you."

"But I'll track up the carpet—"

"Track away! We're going to celebrate tonight."

"What is all this?" I inquired. Margate's flushed little face held a slightly tipsy grin.

"Great news! Captain Hollis is back, and the trip's a success."

"Fine. Where is he?"

"He called from the yacht basin. He's hired a truck and he ought to be up in a few hours."

"I'm anxious to see what he's got."

"You wouldn't be if you knew what it was." Margate snickered. "But come on, let's go inside and have a drink. I'm in the mood."

Gerymanx clattered after Margate and I followed.

The house was brilliantly illuminated. Margate was following its example. I found all the guests in the parlor. Trina sat in a wash tub. Mr. Simpkins was up and about. Jory, in his more or less human form, was busily mixing drinks.

"Success!" Margate proposed, passing glasses to the centaur and myself.

"How about some supper?" I suggested.

"Help yourself." Margate indicated a row of bottles.

I shrugged. He was too far gone to argue with. I sat down next to Trina and tried to get into the spirit of things.

I didn't succeed. Perhaps they were all too far ahead of me. Perhaps it was instinctive premonition. Maybe it was just the rotten sandwich I'd had at the tavern. Whatever it was, I was the skeleton at the feast. I couldn't get in the mood at all.

When Gerymanx began riding Mr. Simpkins around on his back I regarded it as so much horse-play. Trina, noticing my dour face, turned away and began to flutter her eyelashes at Margate.

Jory, who had been taking a drink for himself every time he mixed for anyone else, soon lost all control. He changed right in front of us, and began running around the room on his paws. Everyone seemed to get a great kick out of the spectacle, but it gave me the chills.

Margate was maudlinly solicitous.

"Whassa matter?" he demanded. "Come on, have a drink."

"No thanks."

"All right. Spoil the party. Go ahead."

I forced a smile. "I'm pretty tired. Think I'll hit the hay."

"Whassat? Aren't you gonna wait up to see the nice new spec'men Captain Hollis' gonna bring to the party? No welcoming comm'tee?"

"I guess not."

"All right, then." Margate shrugged, and nearly fell over. "Get me bucket full of whiskey," he called. Gerymanx trotted over.

"Bucket of whiskey? What for?"

"Myrtle isn't here. Gonna take it out and splash it all over her roots."

That was enough for me. I went upstairs to my room and climbed in bed.

Downstairs I could hear the murmurs from the parlor. The party was getting wild. I didn't like it. For the first time I was really ready to consider my situation. After all, this sort of thing couldn't go on forever. Trina was a nice girl, but you don't walk up the aisle with a mermaid. Mr. Simpkins was very nice, for a vampire, and Jory was an amiable enough werewolf. But we'd never be close friends. And being jockey to a centaur isn't exactly a recommendation to future employers. A man is known by the company he keeps. If this kept up, people would soon be pointing their finger at me for an incubus, or something.

I'd better have a talk with Margate soon, I decided. Yes. Margate would have to let me go. I was a little worried about him, anyway. It was hard to say what new monstrosity Hollis was bringing—but it would complicate matters. All this secrecy, and the special room in the cellar, now; this meant something pretty outlandish.

And there was Margate, whooping it up downstairs. Happy as a kid with a new toy. And just as irresponsible. Irresponsible! That was it. That's what the matter was with the whole crew. They couldn't cope with life. They needed a nursemaid. Being fantasies, they weren't able to face realities.

Oh well. In the morning, now—

I fell asleep.

I HAD the damnedest dream. It seemed to me that something sneaked into my room. It had Trina's hair and Jory's face, and it lumbered along on four hooves like Gerymanx. Somehow I got the idea that it had Mr. Simpkins missing teeth, and it wanted to bite me. All the while it came closer it was laughing like Margate himself. I tried to move, but couldn't. It squatted right on top of me and grabbed at my throat. Its mouth opened.

I woke up.

Strong hands were closing around my neck.

"What the—"

The hands relaxed.

"Wake up!" boomed a voice.

It was Captain Hollis.

"How'd you get here?"

"I made it." The blind man was panting. "I had to get you. Come on."

I sat up. "What's the matter?" I yawned. "When did you get in?"

"About half an hour ago. Around midnight. But never mind. You've got to help me get them out! You've got to. You're the only one left."

"Where's Dave?"

"Dave's—gone."

"What do you mean?"

"When we captured it. He got bit. Buried him at sea." The captain's hurried tones reached me as he jostled me toward the door.

"Tell me what happened," I muttered, as we went down the hall. "Where is everybody?"

"They're in the cellar. With it."

"With what?"

"Don't ask questions. That's what finished them. They were sitting around drunk when I got in. I carried it into the cellar in a packing crate. But I passed Myrtle, and she's gone, too."

“I don’t understand.”

We moved across the deserted parlor. I snapped on lights as we went. Hollis came after me, cane tapping.

“Don’t try to understand,” he whispered. “I couldn’t stop them. They had to take a peek. Margate forgot everything. Said he wasn’t afraid, dammit, and it was his after all. The whole crew made for the cellar.”

“Come on.” I went on through the kitchen. “They’re all down there?”

“Yes.”

“But what happened to them? What’s the matter? What must I do?”

“Try and get them out. Think of a way.”

“What’s that?”

I flattened myself against the wall of the dark staircase. A figure padded through the level below.

“Where?”

“Listen—footsteps.”

“Jory. I know those paws.”

It was Jory. The wolf was slinking down the cellar corridor.

“Jory—wait!” I called. He didn’t look around.

We followed.

The wolf made straight for the door at the end of the hall. The metal-covered door. It stood ajar. His muzzle forced it wider. The gray body moved in.

“Stop—” Hollis began.

I heard a howl. Just one howl. A howl that rose, and then froze in midair on its highest quaver. After that, silence.

“It got him,” Hollis whispered.

I moved forward.

Hollis clutched my arm. “Wait. Don’t go in there.”

“But you say they’re all in there. You want me to get them out with you.”

“I know. But you mustn’t go in now. Not like that.”

I faced the doorway. “Quit talking riddles. I’m going in.”

Hollis held me.

I began to stare at the slight opening where the door hung ajar. It was dark beyond, but not so dark. A sort of subdued light filtered through. A light that didn't dissipate the darkness, but seemed to be a part of it. A stronger part.

IT WAS a violet light, but sharper than a distinct color. Radiant. Like the reflection of a million Christmas tree ornaments. Gaudy. Alluring.

Then I felt it. The urge to enter. I wanted to see that light. It was like the ray emanating from a great jewel.

I brushed the captain's hands away.

"Let me go," I muttered. "I want to go on."

Wriggling from his grasp, I darted forward. I opened the door—

With a grunt, Hollis lunged. His fist caught me in the eye. I reeled back. His other fist lashed out. I stumbled, my hands covering my face.

"What in blazes—"

I reeled, steadied myself, took my hands away. Darkness.

"Hollis, you fool—you've blacked my eyes for me!"

"I know. Now go in!"

I groped my way through the door. He followed.

We stood in darkness. Two blind men, in a room filled with a violet light.

"Where are we?"

I groped along the wall. The room was silent. Too silent. "Jory! Trina! Where are you?" I whispered. "Margate!" No answer. I stumbled forward, hands outstretched.

I touched something. Something cold.

My hands flew back. But there was no sound, no movement. I stretched my fingers forward once more. Again they rested on a cold surface. A hard surface.

I ran them along, tracing an all too familiar outline. Hair. A face. Trina's hair and face. But hard and cold. Cold as—marble.

"She's stone!"

"Of course. They're all stone. All of them."

I moved on. Another figure. I almost collided with it. It was a standing man. Bristly hair.

"Margate."

Hollis sighed behind me.

"That's why we both had to come in, dammit. To lift them out. They're too heavy."

"But Hollis—what is it? What did this?"

"The thing," the captain answered.

My fingers fumbled toward a third figure.

"What thing?" I asked.

My fingers came to rest, and found the answer.

This surface was cold too, but it wasn't motionless. My hands moved over a long neck, and then up into an icy tangle. Hair.

But the hair moved, too. It was thick, horribly thick, in solid coils. Coils that suddenly came to life, writhing forth with a rustling.

Then I heard the hissing, felt the hair coiling around my wrist, jerked my hand away in frantic haste.

"Serpents!" I muttered.

"Get back!" Hollis yelled. "It's the thing—that damned Gorgon—the Medusa!"

As the hissing rose to a shrill crescendo I turned and ran blindly out of the cellar room.

7. Stone Broke

THAT'S the way it was.

It must have been over an hour before Hollis argued me into going back with him to get them out. I consented, finally, and we went to work.

They must have weighed at least three hundred pounds apiece. Gerymanx we had to slide across the floor—too heavy to lift. It was all we could do to keep him from chipping.

Two blind men, carrying statues. We made it, though. Until at last there was only the hissing thing.

We locked the door on it. It couldn't walk, of course. I wanted to burn the place, but it would cause trouble later on.

Hollis and I had a long talk. He wouldn't tell me much more about his voyage. Or about the charts and directions Margate gave him. I know he found it somewhere close to Crete, and that's all. He had to go into the cave alone—being blind, it couldn't harm him. It was after he had it out that Dave reached into the sack and one of the snakes bit him.

I shuddered over my own narrow escape when I heard that.

"Poor Dave," Hollis grunted. "Mebbe it was just as well. Boss had a later job for him. Going after one of these sirens—that's what you call them. Because he was deaf and couldn't hear it."

He wouldn't tell me any more.

So there we were.

"We'll have to get some sleep," Hollis told me. "Then we can figure something out."

But in the morning there was nothing figured out. I could see a little, though my eyes were puffy and swollen. I got another nasty shock when I looked at the statues we dragged out.

Usually I admire life-like work, but these things were too damned life-like to suit me. Or to suit themselves, I suppose. Trina was lovely, though. It broke my heart to look at her. And Gerymanx looked quite imposing. Margate had one hand stuck out straight, as though to steady himself. Jory and Mr. Simpkins were both caught in raid-howl. Their mouths were still open.

"Now what do we do?" Hollis groaned. "We can't go away and leave that Medusa thing down there alive."

"Why leave it alive?" I asked. "We can kill it."

He laughed sarcastically.

"That's what you think," he told me. "It won't die."

"But Perseus killed one."

"Who?"

"A Greek warrior. He had some kind of sword—"

"Boloney. It's still alive, ain't it? This Percy-what's-his-name must have been kidding somebody along."

"Never thought of that."

"Well, think of it, then. I know it won't die. Because I tried it myself."

"You did?"

"Sure. After it got Dave. I pumped six shots into the thing."

"You didn't!"

"You bet I did, dammit. And on the voyage back—two of the boys blundered onto it down in the cabin. Snoopers. It got them both. After that the rest went to work. The cook took a knife to it, from the rear. No result. Except that it turned around. I cooked the rest of the trip."

"It won't die, huh?"

"That's right."

This was a prettier problem than I'd expected. I looked at the stone faces around me. No solution there. But there must be a solution. I couldn't run off and leave that thing down in the cellar. Somebody would investigate sooner or later. And then.—more statues.

"I'm going down there again."

"Oh, no you don't. You can see now." I'd forgotten that little detail. I could see. I stared at my puffy eyes in the mirror.

Then I got it.

"Wait for me. I've found the way out."

"Not me. I'm heading for that yacht, and I'm not coming back."

"But Captain—"

He tapped off. I was left alone.

I acted fast. I found what I was looking for and went downstairs.

It was hard work unlocking the cellar door. It was harder work to nerve myself up to going in. The violet light shed its evil radiance through the chink of the keyhole.

But there was no choice. I opened the door and walked in.

The Medusa was against the wall in the center of the room. Alone, in Gorgonic glory. I heard the rustling whisper of the coiled tresses.

It didn't stop me.

I walked forward, holding the object I'd brought right squarely in front of my face. It was a shield.

"Hey!" I called.

The Gorgon wouldn't understand English. But this didn't matter. Just so long as I attracted attention.

"Hey—look!"

I was almost on top of it. But it looked. It must have looked.

Because I heard the damnedest hissing shriek that ever issued from the lips of nightmare. Whether it was the Gorgon or the serpents in its hair, I don't know.

That wail rose up as the Gorgon stared, and then there was silence.

After that, I stuck out my hand. I felt the cold face. The cold, stony face.

It had worked.

I dropped the object I was holding. It shattered there on the floor. But I didn't need it any more. Nor Perseus' sword.

I'd killed the Gorgon in the only possible way. I turned it to stone by showing it its own face in the mirror. So—

THERE it is. I've got two choices now.

I can go back to the employment agency and try to get another job. Something quiet and peaceful, like ditch-digging or assembly work in a boiler plant.

Or I could stay here and take care of my statues. I smashed the Medusa without looking at it. Used a crowbar. The others I have upstairs.

Margate has no relatives, so I might as well make myself at home. Let's see now—Trina would look good decorating the pool. Gerymanx would do for the foot of the staircase. I could make a gallery with Margate and Simpkins. As for Jory—I've got just the place for Jory.

I think that's die best solution, after all. Of course, I'll never touch anything that Margate dabbled in,,

Which reminds me. That bottle, with the djinn inside. Maybe I can get rid of that, too.

If you should happen to know of anybody who would like to buy a genuine djinn, cheap, just send him up to Margate's place. You'll recognize the house quite easily.

It's the one with the stone wolf on the front lawn.

Lefty Feep and the Sleepy-TIme Gal

Not even dragons could keep Feep from plunging on If the sleeping beauty was his goal!

IT was almost two o'clock in the morning when I stumbled into Jack's Shack and wearily gave my order to the waiter. I had spent a very tough day and a gruelling evening of work. Now I was so groggy I could almost see spots before my eyes.

As a matter of fact, I did see spots before my eyes. Very loud purple spots, on a very loud yellow suit.

Lefty Feep sat down opposite me.

I opened my mouth to yawn, and then let it hang that way in astonishment. The tall, gloomy-looking man-about-downtown was dressed in this shrieking suit, topped off with a bright orange shirt and a blue necktie. This outfit certainly didn't harmonize with anything but delirium tremens.

"Why, Lefty!" I greeted him. "What are you doing all dressed up, and at this time of night?"

"I am sitting opposite you in a restaurant," Feep answered. "And the reason I am all dressed up is because they do not allow you to come in here naked."

This was a reasonable answer, but it didn't satisfy me.

"I mean," I continued, "why aren't you in bed and asleep?"

Feep gave me a bitter stare.

"I do not lay in the hay today because I am just a lunk in the bunk," he told me.

"What's that mean in English?"

"Like I say, I am no score with the snore. My forty winks are on the blink."

"How's that?"

Feep sighed.

"I am up because I got insomnia."

"Insomnia? Too bad!" I stared at his haggard face.

The waiter appeared and Feep turned the haggard face towards him.

"Bring me a cup of black coffee," he moaned.

I stared at Feep in amazement. "If you have insomnia, why order black coffee?" I asked him.

"It will just keep you awake."

Feep grinned.

"Sure. I know that. I got insomnia and I want to keep it."

"You want insomnia?"

Lefty Feep nodded.

"But why not get some sleep?" I persisted.

"Because if I go to sleep I am liable to meet the girl of my dreams," he told me.

"Well, what's wrong with that?"

"I already met her."

"Already met the girl of your dreams? How could you?"

"From walking in my sleep," Feep answered. He sighed again. "Ever since, I wish very much to stay wide awake. Because if I dream about her it will give me a nightmare."

I scratched my head.

"Lefty Feep, you've told me some pretty wild yarns in your time—but I've never heard you talk in screwier riddles than the way you talk tonight.

You say you met the girl of your dreams, and now you're afraid to sleep because you might dream about her and it would be a nightmare."

"That's my story," said Lefty Feep.

"And you're stuck with it."

"I don't understand at all."

"Then I'll tell you."

Stifling a yawn with a piece of toast, Lefty Feep leaned across the table and told me the story.

And I was stuck with it.

EVER since I am a tiny tot I am a great guy for the shut-eye. I am a big number in slumber, and you never meet a deeper sleeper. When I am a moppet I sleep in school. After I grow up, I go to sleep on the job. Whenever I get a chance I head for a bed. I hit the hay some nasty blows in my time.

But up to a little while ago I am not the type of personality who walks in my sleep.

Once in a while I walk in other people's sleep. For example, when my landlady sleeps I walk out without paying the back rent.

Then, about a month ago, I find out that I am marching in the arms of Morpheus. I wake up from a sound slumber and find myself standing on the fire escape outside, or waltzing around in the hallway. Once I am even out on the street in my pajamas, which is very embarrassing to me because on this particular night I do not happen to wear any.

So I sit down and try to figure out this matter. Maybe I walk in my sleep because I can not stand the lousy mattress on my bed.

I shake the rocks and gravel out of it and make the landlady get me a new one, or at least one that is filled with soft stone.

But two nights later I am standing on the main stem during the early a.m. and snoring so loud I do not even hear the bell on the patrol wagon when it comes up to cart me away for walking around in public in my shorts.

I tell the judge I am a marathon runner, but the old beak still fines me five and costs. And not having any pockets in my shorts, I spend the rest of the night in the old clinkeroo. Even there I am always walking in my sleep and bumping into the bars.

So when I get back to my dump, I am very much down in it.

"Feep," I tell myself, "this has to stop. You can't take a hike every night. Maybe you better go see a morgue-booker."

Now one of the morgue-bookers I know is a doctor by the name of Sigmund. Being a psychologist, he is usually called Subconscious Sigmund. I meet him a while back and I figure this sleep-walking problem is right up his alley.

So I go right up his alley to his office.

SUBCONSCIOUS SIGMUND is sitting behind a pair of goggles when I come in.

"What can I do for you, Mr. Feep?" he inquires, getting out a straitjacket with a gleam in his eye.

"Put away the goof-overcoat," I snap. "I am not whacky. I only want to talk to you."

Subconscious Sigmund looks plenty disappointed when he hears this, because he is very fond of finding out what ticks in lunatics and he collects nuts like a squirrel.

"Too bad," he sighs. "I always figure, Feep, that some day you will be a fine patient."

"I am only impatient now," I tell him. "But maybe you can help me solve my problem."

So I slip him the story about my sleep-walking. He listens, and nods his head and pulls at his chin.

Then he gets out a little hammer and hits me on the knee with it, and he measures my skull, and he holds lights up in front of my eyes, and he is just getting ready to give me the hot-foot or something when I stop him.

"Cut out all the monkey business, Doc," I say. "All I want to know is what's wrong with me."

He gives me a dirty look.

"That," he says, "would take hours to tell."

"Meaning what?"

"Feep," says Subconscious Sigmund, "I'm afraid I have bad news for you."

"I can take it."

"I'm afraid you are a somnambulist."

I tear off my coat.

"Nobody can call me that," I yell, and dive for his neck. He holds me off.

"There's nothing wrong in that," Sigmund gasps. "It merely means you are a sleep-walker."

I groan.

"I know that! I tell you that! What I want to find out is how to cure it." Subconscious Sigmund shakes his head.

"It cannot be cured unless we discover the cause. Perhaps I might ask you a few questions about your slumber."

"You want to hear bedtime stories?"

"No. Just answer a few simple inquiries. Do you snore?"

"How else do you suppose a lovable guy like me gets divorced three times? All my wives get Bingo at Reno on the grounds that they can't stand my snoring."

"Aha!" Sigmund taps his head. There is a hollow echo. "Maybe that is the secret. Perhaps you walk in your sleep because you cannot stand the sound of your own snoring."

"Try again, Doc," I suggest. "You can do better than that."

"Well, how do you fall asleep, then? Maybe there is some subconscious manifestation there with a psychopathological connotation."

"The hell there is," I tell him. "I never am sick a day in my life."

"I mean, maybe there is a clue to some mental disturbance in the method you use to go to sleep."

“I just count sheep.”

“SHEEP?” repeats Subconscious Sigmund. “Sheep? Wool-gathering? No. Domestic fetish? No. Ah—I have it!”

“Well, give it to me, then.”

“Sheep have legs, haven’t they?”

“I do not know,” I answer. “I never notice. Now if you ask me if blondes have legs, then I am an expert—”

“Of course sheep have legs,” Sigmund interrupts. “And that is the clue. You count so many legs on these sheep that you get the impulse to walk. You fall asleep dreaming of movement. Locomotion. That is why you are a somnambulist.”

“I wish you would not use that word,” I sigh. “But suppose that is true? What am I going to do about it?”

“Stop counting sheep,” Sigmund tells me. “Count something else. Something without legs.”

“What would that be?”

“Well—snakes, for example.”

“I should count snakes? But how do you manage to see snakes?”

“I don’t know,” says Sigmund. “That’s your problem. Ten dollars please.”

So I walk out of the office with ten dollars worth of advice. I should count snakes, he says. And he doesn’t know how I can see snakes, either.

But I do.

There is only one way to see snakes around this town, and that is to take a drink at the Y-Go Inn.

So I go to the Y-Go.

It is quite a walk, and I am very tired from hiking in my sleep, but I manage to trundle my bunions down the street to the Y-Go Inn and shove my torn corns on the brass rail.

The Y-Go Inn is a very unusual tavern. At most places they serve you a shot, but here you get an explosion. The whiskey is not only frisky but risky, the beer is queer, and the only chaser you get is a guy with a blackjack who runs after you when you don't pay.

To be frank, the Y-Go Inn is not the kind of a place you want to be found dead in, and you have a very good chance of that if you dare to take more than two drinks.

But I am dying for a little honest slumber, and I know that if I have to see snakes this place has what it takes.

To make a long story censored, I spend about two hours and five bucks in the Y-Go Inn. One drink makes me shrink, two make me turn blue, three is enough for me, four and I can't find the door, five and I don't know if I'm alive, six and I'm doing tricks.

I sit there and doze away at a table, wishing I had a knife to fight the snakes off with. Because they are certainly coming.

The rattlesnakes aren't so bad. At least you can hear them. It is the cobras and the pythons I don't like, also the vipers. In a little while I am in the anaconda stage. Just before I fall asleep completely a crowd of dragons and dinosaurs come in and begin to do the conga.

But I remember what Subconscious Sigmund tells me, and I do not look at their legs. This is pretty hard to do, because I get the idea they are stepping on me. They push me right down into the dark, and I am falling, falling—

WHEN I wake up again I am walking, walking.

I know I am awake, because if I wasn't, I wouldn't feel it when I get hit on the head with a hammer.

And that is the way it feels. There is a lot of clamor with a hammer and so I know I am coming out of a hangover.

But what am I doing walking?

Where am I?

For a minute I am afraid to open my eyes. Evidently counting snakes does not cure me of sleep-walking. Evidently I get up from my chair in the Y-Go Inn and roll for a stroll.

Evidently.

Because when I finally do open my eyes I am lost. Absolutely and completely lost.

It is daylight, and I can see very plainly that I am walking down a country road like a barefoot boy with shoes on.

Now if there is one thing I know about this town, it is that there are no country roads in it. Therefore I am out of the city. Either that or out of my mind. Maybe both, because it certainly looks screwy around here.

There is nothing on either side of me but hills. The road I am following is nothing but a little winding trail. It isn't even a State Highway for goats. But here I am, climbing up in the hills like a mountain-william.

So I figure I must walk in my sleep all night at least. Maybe several days, because the stuff I drink usually puts you away for that long, if not forever.

Where I am does not matter so much to me, because there are two other things on my mind. My feet.

They ache very severely. I stop and examine my shoes and see that from now on I will wear them for spats. Because I walk the bottoms right off them.

This disturbs me because now I am actually a barefoot boy. I am lost in the hill country. I am tired. And I need all my strength to keep my tongue from hanging out so far it drags in the dust of the road.

But there is nothing to do but keep going until I come to a sign or a marker that tells me where I am marooned. So I pedal my extremities along and mumble unkind remarks under my breath about Subconscious Sigmund's advice and the Y-Go Inn's liquor and my sore feet.

THE higher I climb up the lower I feel. The more altitude I get the worse my attitude is. To say nothing of my bunions.

Then I see the sign. It is just a chalk-mark on some rocks, but I stop and read it with interest and sore eyes.

PRIVATE!
KEEP OUT!
NO TRESPASSING!
ABSOLUTELY NO VISITORS!
GO AWAY!!!
NO DOGS, CHILDREN, OR HUMAN BEINGS ALLOWED!

Well, I am not a dog, and I am not a kid, either. And after all my troubles, I hardly feel human.

So I turn off at the little path behind the rocks and head into some woods.

All at once I nearly run head-on into a big cave. It sticks out from the rocks and the shrubbery up there and I almost fall into it. But I do not like the look of it, which is black. So I stand there and decide to see if it is empty.

"Hey," I yell. "Anybody home?"

Sure enough, a voice comes out.

"Go away," howls the voice. "I hate you!"

"But I want to talk to you."

"No visitors," snaps the voice.

"I'm not visiting. I just want some advice."

"Advice, eh?" snarls the voice. "I advise you to go jump in the lake."

"I would if I could find it, but I'm lost."

"Well, go and be lost someplace else."

"Come out and talk to me—I won't bite."

"No, but I will," the voice yells back.

"Please," I mumble.

"Well—" says the voice. "I dunno. Who are you?"

"Lefty Feep."

"Animal, vegetable, or mineral?"

"Name it and you can have it," I yell back.

“Oh, all right, then,” the voice grumbles. I hear something stirring around at the back of the cave, and in a minute this personality comes out.

HE is a very unusual-looking specimen, and if I ever get him on the end of a hook I would toss him back.

The guy is very tall, and he wears a very short burlap bag. He is also extremely thin, and so is the bag. I am so busy counting his ribs that I hardly notice his face. When I get around to that, I still can hardly notice it, because his face is all buried by a beard.

In fact, his whole face is nothing but a bush with a tomato sticking out. This seems to be his nose.

He stands there in the entrance of the cave and pulls the wool back from over his eyes. Then he squints at me and grunts.

“Goodbye,” he says.

“Goodbye? Why I haven’t said hello yet.”

“Then why bother? Go away.”

“But I’m lost!”

“You are? I’m Kermit the Hermit.”

“Pleased to meet you.”

“Why should you be?”

“Well, it’s good to see a human face again,” I tell him.

“Wish I could say the same about you.”

I do not like to take insults from this slap-happy pappy, but I have to find my way back to snivelization somehow. So I try to make friends.

“So you’re a hermit, eh?” I remark. “I often wonder why various personalities become hermits.”

“I am a hermit because I am allergic,” says the guy.

“Allergic? What are you allergic to?”

“Human beings.”

“You mean you don’t like people?”

"You talk too much," Kermit the Hermit tells me. "Why don't you go away?"

"Because I do not know which way it is," I say, very candid. "I am lost."

"What of it? I don't think anybody will miss you."

"But I want to get back to the city."

Kermit the Hermit gives me a sour look.

"What I do not figure out," he says, "is how you get up here in the first place.

"When I decide to become a hermit, I spend three years just looking for a spot like this where nobody ever goes. I go to the back woods and then I look for a place back of that. Why this place is so deserted I never even see a Fuller Brush man! And then you arrive. I can't figure it out!"

"Neither can I," I tell him. "But I do not wish to figure it out. I just want to get out."

KERMIT the Hermit shakes his beard and several woodticks jump out.

"I fear I cannot give you any directions," he says. "I have no knowledge of what paths exist around here. I just sit in my little cave and hate people all day long."

"Never mind your hobbies," I shriek, getting plenty irritated. "I can't waste any more time around this part of the country."

"Plenty of time," Kermit the Hermit grumbles. "Time is longer than anything."

All at once his eyes light up.

"Now that you're here," he says, "I think I have an idea. Why don't you become a hermit too?"

"Me, an uptown boy, a hermit?"

"Certainly. It's a wonderful life. Maybe you won't like the isolation at first, but you'll enjoy the solitude. The loneliness is good, too, particularly if there isn't anybody around. Besides, the emptiness is so deserted."

I begin to see for the first time why this knave lives in a cave.

It is so the squirrels won’t get him. But I certainly don’t want to pick raisins off this fruitcake. So I shake my head.

“I don’t care to become a hermit just yet,” I tell him. “Alimony or no alimony. All I want is out. If you can’t give me a road map, at least you can tell me how to find my way through these hills.”

“Very well then,” says Kermit, scratching the bottom of his burlap bag. “Maybe I cannot tell you where to go, but I can at least warn you where not to go.”

He stabs his skinny finger off in the direction of the trees to his left.

“Keep away from the valley beyond those trees,” he says.

“Why?”

“Don’t ask questions. I do not like questions because it is not good to talk about it.”

“What are you being mysterious about? What is in that valley?”

“Never mind. Just stay away.”

“Look here, my fine feather-brained friend,” I tell him. “I am not afraid of man nor beast, and I know plenty of both. Why, one time I even play around with the dwarfs that Rip Van Winkle knows up in the Catskills.”

Kermit the Hermit scowls.

“Beyond those trees is something worse than Sleepy Hollow,” he tells me. “It is a place where nothing stirs. That is why this country is so deserted. You are the first wideawake fellow I see here.”

“What do you mean?”

“There is a legend connected with the valley beyond,” he whispers. “They say the land is enchanted. Everyone there is fast asleep.”

“Are they pretty fast awake, too?” I ask. But he only sneers at gags.

“Do not mock,” he mutters. “I once ventured to the edge of the valley, and I can see that it has the look of a doomed place, a place to shun.”

“Well, give out the dope, ditto,” I request.

So Kermit the Hermit tells me the legend of the valley.

"A MIGHTY king resides in the valley beyond," he tells me. "He dwells in a great palace and is rich beyond men's wildest dreams. Servants and slaves attend him and keep his treasures. But his greatest riches is his beautiful daughter, the princess. She is a girl as beautiful as a dream.

"All this is long ago, remember. For a time comes when an enchantment falls upon the land. A wicked enemy of the king condemns the monarch and his daughter and all his people to an unending sleep.

"Now all in the castle, all in the village, and all in the land around lie in enchanted slumber. The legend foretells of the coming of a Prince Charming who will win through to the castle. His kiss shall awake the Sleeping Beauty who lays asleep in the castle and cause the enchantment to dissolve."

Of course, when I hear this from Kermit the Hermit I immediately know several things. First, that he is screwy. Second, that what he is giving me is an old kid's yarn about the Sleeping Beauty. And third, that maybe there is some truth in it at that.

I try to translate his line of gab into English again and that way it makes some sense.

Some old moneybags builds himself a fancy mansion back in the hills a long time ago. This tycoon goon lives there with a flock of flunkeys. His daughter is a pretty fancy frail. Then all at once the whole gang goes down with some kind of sleeping sickness and there they lie.

But I decide to humor my cave-man companion a little.

"Sounds plausible to me," I tell him. "But why don't you ever go there yourself? You could be Prince Charming and pull this frail out of her Mickey Finn-ish with a smack on the puss and win yourself a honey with money." Kermit the Hermit smiles.

"Don't you understand? The region is enchanted, I tell you. That is why it is deserted around here—because of the enchantment. Anyone who ventures into the valley falls asleep at once, like all those in it."

"I see."

“Besides,” scowls Kermit, changing his tone of voice, “I do not like women anyway, because they are so feminine. And beautiful women are much too attractive and pretty.”

“The Princess is a real ginch, eh?”

“She’s the girl of every man’s dreams,” he tells me. “Imagine a maiden of about eighteen, with alabaster skin, hair like spun gold, a neck as graceful as a swan’s—with ruby lips and eyes like stars.”

“Wow!” I remark, imagining same. “What would anyone want with a girl like that?” he grunts.

I do not tell him.

BUT I am beginning to think over his little bedtime story.

A beautiful ginch like that, with money too—in a slumber beyond the lumber. Just waiting for a Prince Charming to come along and kiss those ruby lips of hers!

Maybe it is true, after all. Maybe it is destiny that makes me walk in my sleep, as well as bad liquor.

Maybe I am supposed to wake the Sleeping Beauty!

You see, there is something I do not tell Subconscious Sigmund when he psychoanalyzes me. Something I do not tell Kermit the Hermit, either. I am just a wee bit ashamed of it.

After all, at my age, and with my experience with various tomatoes I run around with and marry, it will sound foolish to confess that I walk in my sleep because I dream of some Jeanie with light brown hair.

But it is the truth.

Ever since I start this sleep-walking I have this dream about a beautiful ginch. She is a blondie, and looks just like the number Kermit the Hermit describes in his report on local gossip.

Can it be that I dream about this number in my slumber because she is the Sleeping Beauty?

Anyhow, it is worth finding out.

So I stride off through the woods in the direction that Kermit the Hermit is pointing.

"Hey!" he yells. "Where are you going?"

"I'm off to see this Beauty cutie," I reply.

"But it means your death—you'll fall asleep like all the rest and be put under enchantment."

"Listen," I tell him, "I am an uptown boy and I will not be caught napping."

"I warn you!"

"And who are you? Just a wart in this neck of the woods!"

"Is that so?" yells Kermit the Hermit, jumping out of his burlap sack in excitement. "And just who do you think you are?"

"Me? I am Prince Charming, of course!"

All at once Kermit the Hermit gives a little grunt and trots after me.

"I must admit I admire your courage," he says. "So you really are going to take a chance?"

"Why not? It isn't far to the valley—only a sleeper jump."

"But how do you expect to keep awake?"

"I don't," I tell him. "Only you forget there is one thing that makes me different—one thing which makes me think I can get through to the castle even if I fall under the spell of this supernatural Mickey Finn and doze off."

"What is that?" he asks.

"Well, I can walk in my sleep. I'll just keep right on going, whether I'm awake or not!"

Kermit the Hermit grunts again.

"You know, I think you might do it at that," he cackles. "Here—wait a while and maybe I can help you."

"How?"

"I'll just step into the cave and brew something up for you."

So I sit down, wondering what the old goat is going to do, and pretty soon a smell breezes out of the cave.

"What's cooking?" I yell.

"Coffee!" says Kermit the Hermit.

"SURE enough, in a little while he runs out with a couple of thermos jars filled with coffee.

"This might help to keep you awake," he says.

"I appreciate it," I answer. "If I win the princess I will come back here and build you a swell new cave with inside plumbing."

"Bah!" sneers Kermit the Hermit.

"I don't want anything. Now go away. I'm beginning to like you, and if there's anything I hate it's liking people. The trouble with knowing people is that after a short acquaintance they become friendly."

I can see he is getting one of his dizzy spells again, so I pick up the thermos jugs and march off into the distance.

The last I see of Kermit the Hermit, he is waving goodbye to me with the end of his beard.

Then I get into the trees and it is over the river and through the woods for me. As I mention before, the country is plenty wild around here.

Now it gets wilder. And so do I, because I am always tangling my trousers in the underbrush, or getting my coat caught on the bushes.

After about half an hour of hiking, I begin to feel tired, so I stop and open one of the thermos jugs to take a gulp of hot coffee. This sets me right, and I wade on some more.

By this time I am practically lost again. Nothing around me but trees. For a minute I am tempted to turn back, but there are two reasons I do not do so.

The first reason is I want to see if there is anything to this yarn about the snoozing cutie. The second reason for not turning back is that I no longer know which way is back.

So I tramp further and further and it gets darker and darker.

Then, all of a sudden, there is a change in scenery.

I feel it first before I see it.

The air is suddenly very still. The little breeze that runs through the woods dies down to nothing. The trees stop rustling their leaves and the grass doesn't blow.

That's what I feel. Stillness.

Then I see the stillness.

THE branches over my head just droop without any swaying. The bushes under my feet hang down. The flowers are all closed up.

At first I think these hunks of vegetation are dead. Then I realize they are asleep!

More and over, I notice that there are ants on the bark of the trees—and the ants don't move. Even when I reach out and touch them, they stay still. Fast asleep.

Looking up, I can see birds hanging upside down from the trees. Other birds are lying in their nests with their feet in the air, dead to the world. Sound asleep.

I am beginning to droop myself. So I swig some more coffee, finishing up the first thermos jug, and go on.

All at once I hear something. A noise. A terrible noise. There is an awful grunting sound from in back of the bushes. I step ahead right on tiptoes and peek around.

And so help me Little Red Riding Hood, I see a big grey wolf!

His mouth is open, but his eyes are shut. He is also sound asleep, and what a sound! Because the noise I hear is the wolf, snoring.

I walk on, and now I notice a lot of little things I overlook before. Squirrels in the trees, asleep. Rabbits and gophers and chipmunks making a try at shut-eye. Minks catching forty winks. Woodchucks sawing wood.

And all the while the trees are getting thicker and thicker. So are my eyelids. There is nothing to do but stop again, open the second thermos jug, and inhale black coffee.

Then I resume my ramble through the brambles.

I go a few feet between some very thick trees with moss on them, and I see this guy.

He is a fat little personality, and his belly hangs on the ground. This is not as bad as it sounds, because he is sitting down. To be exact, he is propped up against the base of a tree, snoring away for dear life.

It is not his looks that intrigue me so much as the clothes he is wearing. I examine them very closely—a high bowler hat, a choke collar, and a checkered suit that looks like it gets rained on during Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

To be brief, this sleeping citizen is dressed like the old family album characters of 1860 or some such annum.

Naturally this puzzles me plenty. I walk up to him and tap him politely on the derby. Nothing happens. So I take off the derby and tap him impolitely on the noggin. Still nothing happens.

Then I give him a diplomatic kick. He doesn't stir. He snores on. I shake him and jump back a foot because something sticky falls into my hand. It is a spider-web, hanging from his nose!

Another look and I even see the spider. But the spider is asleep!

FOR the first time I realize that there is actually some truth to what the hermit tells me. This specimen looks as though he is sleeping here for the last 80 years!

I just have to take another swig of coffee on that, and I only wish it is something stronger.

Then I march on. By this time there is a thicket twining around all the trees and I almost need to cut my way through. So I bring out a little knife I carry around with me in case of trouble or crap games, and slice the vines in front of me in order to keep moving.

In a little while I stumble across another exhibit for the sandman, another, and what a, man.

Only this one is lying right across the path. He is wearing one of those coonskin caps and buckskin breeches like this historical character, Daniel Goon. He carries a squirrel rifle, but it is plenty rusty from lying on the ground. And the citizen is plenty dusty from the same cause.

I run across him so fast I actually step on him. But he doesn't stir.

One more gulp of coffee and twenty yards later I spot two items in white wigs and brass button coats. They are right out of Washington's time—as a matter of fact, they look like a couple of Valley Forgers to me.

This time I do not bother to shake or wake them. I know it is useless, and besides I need my strength. I am very bleary and weary.

But I hack along, and down under the vines ahead I kick my foot against some armor. This armor is worn on the chest of a Spanish-looking greaser with a beard like the youngest Smith Brother. I do not even like to think about how long he sleeps here. Maybe two or three hundred years.

I realize more than ever that Kermit the Hermit is right when he says Rip Van Winkle is an insomniac compared to these lazybones.

Now, with my own eyelids trying to make an open-and-shut case out of me, I more than ever long to turn back.

But I think of the Sleeping Beauty. All of these finks try for the jackpot and fail. Will I be caught asleep at the switch? Never!

So I hack on.

NOW I see a lot of guys lying all over the woods—drowsy but frowsy. The place resembles an outdoor flophouse. But no flophouse ever has such residents as these.

Because they are evidently going further and further back in history. There is an old duffer in tights and a cap such as they prance in France in about 1600. Then I spot a couple of English soldiers with long bows. Pretty soon I come to a knight in full armor with a broadsword. He has it up in the air, plowing away at a branch, and evidently he falls asleep standing up, because the sword is still in the air.

When I think of how he must step right out from the center of the Middle Ages, cold chills run up and down my spine.

More coffee.

When I put the thermos cap back on there is only a little left. I wonder how much further I have to go. Not too far, I hope, or I will probably run into sleeping ape men and dinosaurs.

I cut my way into the brush another stretch, getting wearier and wearier. One more yawn and I know I'm gone.

I open my mouth, but no yawn comes out.

Instead, it's a scream.

Because just when I think about seeing dinosaurs, I do see one!

At least I see a long green tail. It is too long and too thick to belong to a snake. It curls out from behind a giant tree up ahead.

I approach very slowly, because how can you walk fast with your knees knocking together?

One look at what is behind that tree and I am back in my hangover.

It is a dragon!

As I exist and inhale, curled up behind the tree in those deep-sleep woods.

It is a dragon!

The meanest, greenest dragon you ever want not to see!

The minute I scream, I regret it greatly. Because I do not desire to attract the attention of anything like a dragon at this time.

But nothing happens. I notice then that the dragon is fast asleep, like everything else in the forest. It does not snore, but with every breath a little jet of smoke and flame spouts out of its nostrils. Seeing as how the dragon has a head the size of a blast furnace, this is not remarkable.

I decide to go away from there with quick swiftness, just in case the dragon does wake up. So I move my legs. Nothing happens.

I can not move. I am too tired to go on.

So I open the thermos jug for coffee.

IT is all I can do to unscrew the lid, I am so weary. But I get it off. One gulp of nice hot coffee will wake me up again.

Only I do not get a gulp of nice hot coffee. I get a mouthful of cold coffee!

This I do not even swallow, because I am already falling asleep.

“You must stay awake, Lefty!” I tell myself. “Once you lay yourself down to sleep you’ll never get up.”

But I can’t help it. I am getting numb all over.

I try to grope in my pockets for a match. Maybe if I light a fire and heat the coffee in time—

There are no matches in my pocket.

What to do? Fall down and snooze in the ooze? I try to think, but all I do is blink. Hot coffee—

In between blinks I look back and see the dragon. He is still breathing.

“Saved!” I yell.

I muster up all my bluster and manage to drag myself back to the dragon.

Then I pull out the thermos jug and hold it up. I take out the inside part with the coffee in it and stick it over the dragon’s schnozzola.

Every time he breathes the fire comes out. And in a minute or two it boils my coffee again!

I just manage to raise the jug to my kisser and swallow the coffee.

Immediately I get hep to a little pep.

I stride off and make a slash and dash on through the woods.

From now on the Boy Scouts will have nothing on me! At least, not when I have a sleeping dragon handy.

I creep along like the Last of the Moe Hickans, or whatever his name is, and my final burst of speed wins the day.

All of an instant I am chopping my way clear of the woods and coming out on the other side.

I stand on a little hill, looking down at a valley. In the valley is a small town. It looks like a typical hick burg, except for one thing.

In the center of the town is a castle.

Not a millionaire’s mansion, but a genuine, authentic castle—like the ones Warner Brothers build for Errol Flynn. It has battlements and turrets and bastions and all that kind of nonsense on it, too.

I KNOW at a glance that this is where the Sleeping Beauty is making lazy like crazy.

Down the hillside I go, all keyed up. I do not mind my weariness any more.

Pretty soon I am walking right through the village.

The streets are made of cobblestones and the houses are very ancient. They look like the ones in old picture books, with stork’s nests on top. In fact, I see a stork in one, standing on one leg, sound asleep.

Some of the doors of the houses are open and I can look inside. Sure enough, the whole village is filled with slumberlanders!

A cook is asleep over his oven. Three brats are asleep hunched over a marble game. An old man snoozes under a tree. A milkmaid is snoring at the business end of a cow.

Down next to the village hall, the town cop is sleeping in his chair. But then, there is nothing so unusual in that.

What is unusual is the costumes these personalities wear. They are all ancient vintage stuff, like they wear in Europe during the time of the early-number Louies in France.

Here in the village the drowsiness hits me again, and I am ready to go down for the count. But I drag along to the big moat in front of the castle, because now I must not fail.

After all—I walk in my sleep, I yearn for this girl of my dreams—and here is the chance to make it all worth while. The chance to make it all come true for me.

I mumble Kermit the Hermit’s words under my breath for encouragement. “Hair like spun gold, a neck as graceful as a swan’s.” Perfect! And rich, too.

So, drowsy but lousy, I head into the big stone castle.

From then on it all seems familiar—just like in the yarn they hand the nursery brats.

In the castle kitchen the knaves are asleep over their tarts. The scullions are resting their skulls on the tables. The page boys are lying on the floor with a pack of wolf hounds.

I ignore them and creep upstairs. There, in a long hall, sits an old geezer with a beautiful purple robe, trimmed with vermin. There is a crown on his head, and I know that he is the king.

But the fatigue has got old fatty, and he leans back on his throne and snores.

Next to him is the queen. She will not make such a bad-looking mother-in-law at that, I figure.

I do not waste any more time.

Because I am beginning to get impatient to see my future brawl-and-chain.

Besides, believe it or not, I am actually beginning to feel more and more at home here! It all seems natural enough now, that I should come high-tailing into a fairy-tale and double for Prince Charming.

Who knows? Maybe it is Fate. Maybe I am meant to meet my dream girl face to face.

Anyway, I am going to have a try at it.

SO I bounce up the steps to the second floor of the castle and start looking for the bedroom of the Princess.

The first bedroom has nothing in it but wolf-hounds again. I let sleeping dogs lie.

The second bedroom houses a couple of dignified-looking old babies who I take to be the court ladies.

But the third bedroom!

I can tell from the handsome carved door that this is it.

So I stop and slick my hair down, straighten my tie, and pick a few of the burrs out of my bustle.

Then I pucker up my lips a few times for practice, and walk in.

Sure enough! There, in the big room, lying on a huge canopy bed, is the Princess.

I can tell it is her at a glance, even though she is sleeping with her head under the covers. The sheets are thin, and the pattern of the body underneath them would win any beauty contest.

I tiptoe over to the bed and look down for a minute.

Just during that second I have a little qualm in my mind.

Should I wake the Princess?

I never believe in fairy tales, but this one seems to be true. Should I spoil it all by waking her up and passing myself off as Prince Charming?

Then I think of the girl of my dreams—eyes like stars, ruby lips, that alabaster skin, the neck as graceful—oh nuts! I am not much on the poetry.

But a beautiful blonde, with money!

So I bend down very gently, pull the covers back, and kiss the Sleeping Beauty.

SHE turns around. She stirs. She throws the covers off her head. She is awake!

She sits up.

I look at her.

All at once I am not tired any more.

I am peppy enough to give a loud yell.

I am also peppy enough to run like hell out of there—down the stairs, through the village, and all the way through the woods.

When I get into the woods, I am encouraged to run some more. Because when I wake the Princess, everybody else wakes up, too. The castle and village people are awake, and the personalities asleep in the woods also rise and shine. And so does the dragon—only he must sneeze when he does so, on account of the woods are suddenly on fire.

That is why I hop through them in such a hurry And just in time, too. They burn very swiftly, and I know that the woods, the village, and the castle will be going up in smoke behind me.

I come out somehow on a road, way down past the cave of Kermit the Hermit. By this time I am quite a sight with my torn clothes and singed hair, to say nothing of the horrified expression I must register on my puss.

It is enough to make the truck-driver compassionate when he comes bouncing down the road at this time. He gives me a lift and asks no questions, and so I arrive back at the city.

You might think I am plenty tired because of all these experiences, and you might think right. But I do not wish to sleep. It's like I say—if I sleep I may see the face of the Sleeping Beauty, and that I cannot stand.

* * *

LEFTY FEEP sank back in his chair.

"There is one thing I cannot stand," I remarked.

"What is it?"

"Your story," I told him.

"What is wrong with it?" Feep inquired, through a yawn.

"What is right with it?" I countered. "First of all you try to make me believe that an old fairy tale is actually true! That's bad enough. Then you make it worse."

"Worse?"

"Of course. You say you actually were the party who woke up the Sleeping Beauty. And you ran away."

"Naturally."

"Naturally, eh? How do you explain that?"

"Well—"

I raised my hand and silenced Feep. "I think I know what you'll tell me. You'll tell me she wasn't the Sleeping Beauty at all, but some ugly old woman."

"Not at all. She is the Sleeping Beauty and the story is true. That's the whole trouble," Feep answered. "The story is too true."

"Too true?"

"Yes. She is too much like the descriptions of such a fairy-tale Princess. That is why I cannot stand to look at her. Because when a fairy tale comes true, it is pretty awful."

Feep sighed. "I run away, and so would you."

"Why," I snapped. "Just what did she look like?"

Feep grinned.

"You remember the description of the dame that Kermit the Hermit hands me? A maiden of about eighteen, with alabaster skin, hair like spun gold, a neck as graceful as a swan's—with ruby lips and eyes like stars?"

"Yes."

"Well, that is what she looks like. And I ask you," said Lefty Feep. "Would you marry a girl with white stone skin, hair like gold wire, a swan's neck, and a lot of jewelry where her lips and eyes should be?

"Give me a taxi-dancer, any time!"

"Give me some of that black coffee," I sighed. "I think I need it, too."

1943

The Eager Dragon

I AM sitting in Thin Tommy's tavern, and maybe I have a couple too many.

This is quite possible, because I hear customers say that even one drink of Thin Tommy's whiskey is too many. But I have maybe five or six in a row, so I get about as high as the national debt.

Which is how I happen to get talking to these two strangers. They are sitting down at the other end of the bar, minding their own business—which seems to be liquor importing, if the way they spin the bottle is any indication. Each of them manages to import about a fifth of scotch down his throat while I watch. And they do not bother with any Emily Post stuff, either, such as pouring their drinks into glasses first.

Now I am not the type of personality who pries into other people's affairs. Particularly in a place like this, where it is not safe to shake hands with strangers unless you have heavy insurance on your fingers.

So after gulping my sixth anti-freeze I slide off the stool to go home. I do not intend to speak to these jerks, but one of them turns around and gabbles at me.

"I beg your pardon," he says, very polite. "But you have your foot caught in a cuspidor."

If there is anything I'm a sucker for, it's politeness. Besides, when I look down I see that I have indeed stuck my left foot into one of Thin Tommy's finger-bowls.

"Thank you for the information," I tell the stranger. "I hardly notice such a thing because I expect to walk a little funny after drinking the stuff they serve here."

"It is vile, isn't it?" says the first stranger. "Won't you have another one with me?"

Well, who can refuse such a courteous invitation? I sit down again and manage to get my Thom McCan out of the cigar-pond, and the two strangers pour me a shot, and before you can say Jack Robinson I am too stinko to pronounce it.

That is how it happens I get so gabby, I guess.

Because the first stranger—a tall, skinny guy with glasses—says, "We are a couple of traveling salesmen. We are stranded here miles from the nearest farmer's daughter. Isn't it sad?"

And the second stranger—a fat, older guy with a bald head—says, "We are working our way through second childhood selling magazines to colleges. Our car breaks down tonight and here we sit out in the country where nothing happens since the last time Halley's Comet went through." Evidently he refers to some traveling burlesque show, but I am just high enough to resent this crack about nothing ever happens.

YOU see, I like it here in the country, ever since I retire from the rackets and buy me a chicken farm. Besides, things are far from peaceful lately on my cackle ranch. In fact, what happens to me recently is so screwy I never mention it—but now I am too groggy to keep from leading with my jaw.

"Nothing ever happens here?" I say, to the bald-headed guy. "Listen, I can tell you stories that will make your hair stand on end, if you buy a wig."

"Such as?" pipes the first guy.

"I may look like a farmer but I am not handing you any corn," I say.

"Such as?" insists the first guy.

"You wouldn't believe me," I say.

"You tell me and I'll believe it," the first guy yells. "Tell me just one thing that ever happens to you around here."

"Well, about a week ago I am driving along about a mile down the road and I meet a knight," I begin.

"A what?"

"A knight—from King Arthur's court."

"Do you sniff the stuff or use a needle?" asks the bald-headed salesman. The tall guy whispers, "Say—your strait-jacket's showing."

"I tell you you won't believe me," I remind them.

"Go ahead. This is interesting."

"I meet this knight, from King Arthur's court. Sir Pallagyn, his name is."

"He tells you his name?"

"Why not?"

"Then maybe he also tells you what he's doing and how he got here."

"Of course. Merlin sent him."

"Merlin?"

"Merlin is the boss of the magician's union," I explain. "He can send his boys forward and backward in Time without paying cab fare. He sends Sir Pallagyn here on a big job—to put the snatch on a pedestal for a loving-cup he calls the Holy Grail."

"Aaaargh!" remarks the thin jerk. He is either commenting on my story or strangling on the drink he swallows. So I make with the tongue some more.

"I find out this pedestal is in a museum back in town, so the knight and I sneak in after dark. We goniff it easy, because Merlin sends some hoods from the Round Table mob to help us."

"Where is this Sir Pallagyn now?" asks the baldy jag, in a sweet voice. "I suppose he is hiding out somewhere so the government can't claim his armor for defense priorities."

"I am sorry," I mumble. "But when Pallagyn and his boys get the pedestal they are after, Merlin drags them back through Time again. And that is how it stands."

"It stands kind of wobbly to me," insists the dandruff-victim. "You are wasting your time if you are a chicken farmer. You should be a rodeo star, the way you can throw the bull."

"Listen, my fine featherless friend," I remark, "if you think you can stand there with your bare head hanging out and call me a liar, you are not only mistaken but probably dead."

"No offense, buddy," he comes back. "Only you got to admit your story is a little hard to believe."

"I know that and I am willing to prove it to you," I say. "It so happens that Sir Pallagyn leaves his glue barrel in my barn back at the farm. It is a big white nag, all covered with a fancy tin blanket to keep out the flies or something. One look will tell you it isn't any fake and I am not palming off any Derby winner on you."

I AM really third degree burned by all these insinuations, to say nothing of the dirty cracks. I really mean it now when I suggest we all three climb into my truck and ride out to the stable for k look at the horse.

"Fine idea," says the thin fink with the glasses. So we all have another drink on that and then we go outside.

This time I do not even notice the cuspidor on my foot until we are way up the road—which gives some idea of how reeko I am.

We climb into the truck, I shag on the gas, and pretty soon we pull up at my poultry villa.

Then I help them out of the truck. Archie Biggers—that's the thin one's name—won't get out without another drink. Larry Cotton, the baldy guy, says if he has another drink he can't get out. So I compromise and drink it for him.

After that I lead Archie and Larry right to the barn in back of the house; which is no small job itself, the way they are walking.

"Now you'll see if I'm lying or not," I say, rattling the door.

The door opens without unlocking, which is funny. I step inside. I light a match. I let out a yell.

"Somebody stole my horse!"

"Huh!" snorts Archie. "I thought so."

"That's a horse on you," says Larty. "Don't bother to lock the barn door when you go out."

"But it's true," I insist. "The horse is right, here when I leave tonight. Look—here is the hay I put out for it."

I hold up the second match and show them the hay-pile. Then I let out another yap and drop to my knees.

"What's this?" I holler, pointing to a big round white thing in the hay-pile.

"Why, a horse-egg, of course," sneers Archie.

"It's an egg all right," I agree. "But look at the size of it—why, it's over three feet long!"

And it is, too; a big, round white egg with long yellow splotches on it and a smell that his hardly Grade A.

"Wait a minute," Archie says. He stoops down and picks up a piece of grayish paper lying next to the egg. "Writing on it," he whispers. "In water colors or something. Can't make it out—bad spelling—"

"Give it here," I request, grabbing it politely. "I am expert on spelling, particularly such spelling as those lousy kidnapers use that put the snatch on my horse."

"Put the snatch on?"

"Sure. This is doubtless a ransom note from the mob stealing my nag. There is nothing I hate and detest more than a horse-napper!"

But it turns out I am mistaken.

The writing is some kind of water-color job, and the spelling is terrific. But I can figure out what the note says.

> Sir Butch:
>
> Methinks in the excitement I forgot to send for the steed. I take it now, lest Pallagyn go unmounted as a churl.
>
> Pallagyn thanks you for your seemly courtesy and bespeaks right highly your prowess as a wizard. It behooves me therefore to tender you > this little token of my esteem as a fitting reward for your assistance. It is a seemly gift from one wizard to another, and may serve as a reminder of the gratitude of Merlin.

THIS is not only lousy spelling but lousy grammar—in fact, it reminds me of the way this Sir Pallagyn talks. Maybe this Merlin is not so much of a brain after all.

But what puzzles me is why he sends an egg for a present to a chicken farmer.

"Don't ask me," says Larry. "I don't even know what kind of an egg it is. It certainly isn't a Plymouth Rock. Looks more like a Plymouth Mountain."

"I wonder what's inside," I mumble. "We can't find out till it hatches."

"Well, how we going to hatch it?"

"It's too big for a chicken to sit on."

"Something has to sit on it though," I tell them. "From the looks of it, it should hatch soon."

"From the smell of it, it better hatch soon," says Archie.

"I've got an idea!" yells Larry. "We aren't doing anything tonight. Let's all of us sit on it."

"You mean we should hatch this egg?"

"Why not? It's warm here. We have to sleep some place, you know. We might as well curl up in the hay, sleep on the egg, and wait until it breaks open. I want to see what's coming off here, anyway."

So after another drink it doesn't sound so screwy any more. Archie lays down on one side of me and Larry lays down on the other side. All three of us cuddle up to the big white egg with its thick shell.

I close my eyes, and maybe it's only my head throbbing but I think I hear something pounding away under the egg shell. And maybe it's only the snores of Archie and Larry, but I get the idea I hear noises inside the egg.

What could be hatched from an egg over three feet long? Why it must weigh a couple hundred pounds! More than that, who cares?

That is how I feel after the last drink, so I just go right off to sleep. But all the time I think I hear the egg making noises, and after while I begin to dream about the kind of things which probably lay such eggs. And I do not like to dream about radio comics.

It is pretty late in the morning when I wake up because somebody is shaking me.

At first I think it is Archie, but he is asleep. Then I look at Larry, and he is sleeping too.

But I am being shaken. My head is going up and down.

Then I realize. The egg is moving under my head!

I jump up, but quick, before I get my neck broken. Tire egg is cracking in long strips in about a dozen places, and the chunks in between are heaving and falling off. There is no doubt about it now—I do hear noises from under the shell. There is no doubt about my smelling something either.

The egg is hatching.

By this time, Archie and Larry are awake and on their feet. But I do not watch them.

I watch the strips of shell peeling off the egg and watch the green stuff underneath moving up and down.

“What in blazes?” asks Archie, hopping up and down on one foot and pointing.

What he is pointing at is a long green thing waving out of the end of the egg. It looks like a snake without a head.

We do not answer him, Larry and I, because we are looking at the other end of the egg. There is another green thing sticking out of this end, and it is the head. You can’t make any mistake about it, because this head is several feet long and several more feet wide, and it is the kind of a head nobody would ever forget, even though they would want to forget it very much indeed.

Larry points at one end and Archie points at the other, and then both of them point at the middle. Because the eggshell cracks, and we see the thing come out.

IT IS about eight feet long and four feet high, and how it manages to curl up in a three-foot egg I don't know. But then there are a lot of things I don't know about it, and I have a hunch I do not greatly care to find out. What it looks like and what it smells like is enough to hold me for a long, long time.

"Thin Tommy should tell me," I say. "Usually when I drink his whiskey I expect lizards or snakes. But he should tell me when he switches me to a stronger brand."

But I cannot help but give the thing a gander. We all stand there staring like we saw Dorothy Lamour stepping out of a sarong instead of that green scaly thing waltzing out of a busted egg shell.

Like I say, it is eight feet long and about four feet high. Part of the eight feet is a snaky-looking tail. Part is a fat, beer-barrel body all covered with warts and scales like a flophouse bum. But the biggest and worst part is the steam-shovel it uses for a head. This is round and green, with big bulging eyes, and practically all the rest is mouth and teeth.

It wobbles around on four stumpy legs.

I wobble around on two, myself. For some reason I get the impression that this thing is slightly repulsive. In fact, my face gets nearly as green as the one it exhibits.

But all at once Larry is pointing at it and jumping up and down like he has just got a double hot-foot.

"I know what it is!" he yells. "It's a dragon!"

"What's a dragon?" I say, glancing down at my trousers to see if the suspenders slip.

"That's a dragon. You know, like in the story books. Back in King Arthur's days the woods are full of them. This Merlin must think he is paying you a compliment as a wizard when he sends you a dragon's egg."

"Sure, that's what it is," says Archie. "Come on down out of there."

He is talking to me. Because when he mentions the word "dragon" I all of a sudden find myself climbing up the side of the barn to the hay-rack.

Now I get down real slow, because I am not a personality that likes to hurry—particularly when it comes to meeting such things as dragons or hungry tigers or ex wives.

"He won't hurt you," Archie argues "He's just a baby."

"What you want me to do, nurse him?"

I inquire. "I am not of a mind to become a diaper artist for any walking boa-constrictors. Furthermore—uuuuuuuh!" Maybe this "Uuuuuuuh!" doesn't make sense, but it sounds very apt when I say it, because right then the dragon walks over to me and begins to rub against my leg.

"It is just like a kitten," Archie tells me. "Quit rattling your knees, or you'll brain it to death."

SURE enough, the dragon begins to purr real soft, like the Twentieth Century Limited on a clear track. It looks up at me, and all at once it grins.

"Isn't that sweet?" says Larry. "See how affectionate it is?"

"I know a character back in town who smiles like this," I mention. "He recently fried for bumping off three old ladies with a butcher's cleaver."

"Go ahead, pat it on the head. It's perfectly safe," says Archie.

I feel about as safe as a peace treaty with Hitler, but I reach down and run my hand over the dragon's scaly noggin once or twice. Then I smile, more in relief at getting my hand back than at anything else. And it smiles at me again.

FOR the first time I notice it has blue eyes. They are very pretty eyes—for a dragon. A sort of baby blue. They remind me of a dame I once knew, name of Daisy the Fish.

"Love at first sight," Archie sighs.

"All right, now we have our first sight and what do we do with this overgrown chameleon?"

“What do we do about it?” yells Larry. “What do we do about it?” he hollers, running around the hay pile. “Why listen, man—don’t you realize what you have here?”

“A hangover.”

“Hangover? You’ve got a million bucks, that’s all! A cool million!”

“I don’t even see a hot penny,” I tell him.

“Listen.” Larry stops running and begins to wave his arms. “You are the owner of the only live dragon in captivity—a real, flesh and blood dragon, the only one ever seen in the world for centuries! Don’t you realize what this means?”

“Think of Science!” says Archie.

“I rather think of the million,” I answer.

“That’s just what I’m telling you,” Larry breaks in. “You know that Gargantua the circus carries around?”

“You mean that big ape who looks like La Guardia?”

Sure. Why they pay thousands of dollars just to show such an attraction. Think of what they’d give you to have a real live dragon to exhibit.”

“Well, I’ll be—”

“Rich! Just leave it to me.”

So that is how it works out.

“We’re just the salesmen for a stunt like this,” Larry tells me. “We’ll head for town and handle the business end. Straight 25 percent cut. We’ll contact circus people and set a deal. It may take about a week or so, but don’t worry.

“Just take care of baby, here. See that it gets enough to eat. And above all, keep it out of sight, whatever you do. No word of this must leak out to anyone.”

“I got to hide out here and play house with this lizard?” I squawk.

“Think of the money in it,” Larry comes back. “You’ve got a fortune if you do what we tell you.”

So he and Archie borrow my truck and head for town. And I am left with a dragon on my hands.

II

I DO not know if you ever have a dragon for a visitor, but it is not such a situation I am equipped to handle. I begin to wish right away that Merlin gives a little advice along with his present or at least sends me a book on THE CARE AND FEEDING OF DRAGONS.

Because I can tell at first glance that this dragon is hungry. Not five minutes after Larry and Archie clunk off, the dragon begins to look at me with those big baby blue eyes and I know something has got to be done.

After all, it is only a moppet, so to speak, and you have to take care of moppets. I never bring up a brat myself, but one thing I realize is that kids are always hungry. Particularly when they cry.

Which is just what this dragon starts to do when it looks at me. Its eyes blink and out comes two tears about the size of footballs.

I just stand there and listen to it bawl, soft and low like a dive-bomber. I am helpless, but absolutely. I cannot bounce this baby up and down on my lap. I cannot make faces at it, either, because its own face is more peculiar than anything I can dream up.

I cannot give it a rattle, either, except with the old teeth, because I am still a little afraid of the thing.

What I need, I decide, is a drink. So I rush into the house and open the icebox.

All I find is a case of beer, but this is an emergency. So I open a couple bottles and decide to sit down and think.

Then I hear a noise from the barn. Grabbing up the case of brew I rash back out.

But it is only the dragon, crying louder. It stands there and blubbers just like a baby sniveling for its bottle.

That gives me the old idea. Bottle? I haven’t got any dragon milk, but I have got beer.

So I open another bottle and pour it down the dragon’s throat.

This turns out to be just what the doctor ordered. One gulp and the beer disappears. And the dragon smiles!

I smile too.

Then I hear another gulp.

The foolish thing has swallowed the bottle.

But it keeps right on smiling.

“So that is the way things are,” I say. “All right—help yourself.”

And I push over the case of beer.

The dragon gets to work. In about five minutes it has swallowed eighteen bottles. I go back to the house for another case. Also I call up Thin Tommy’s tavern and ask Thin Tommy to send over a couple dozen cases of his vile brew right away.

“Holding a party?” asks Thin Tommy, over the phone.

But I do not answer. I remember that Larry and Archie asked me to keep my mouth shut. This is always a good idea when speaking to Thin Tommy, anyway. If you open your mouth in front of him he is liable to steal your teeth.

So? just hang up, relieved. If I can nurse this dragon on beer it solves a lot of problems, and the way it drinks I do not even have to bother with piling up empty bottles.

Still and all, one other problem does bother me a little. I get to wondering if this thing is house-broken. I am just going to call uptown for a couple of pup tents in case I run out of diapers when I hear another noise from the barn outside.

It is a voice, laughing.

This time I make the trip back in nothing fiat. And I am not a moment too soon, either.

Because there is a kid standing at the barn door, looking in. He is a little towheaded shrimp about eight years old, hardly tall enough to reach up and goniff your watch. He is laughing and giggling, and when he sees me he turns around.

“Look, Mister!” he says. “The dragon has the hiccups!”

I LOOK and it is a fact. The dragon has the hiccups. It is standing in the barn and hiccuping like mad. What makes it peculiar is the fact that every time it burps a little spout of fire comes out of its nose.

“Gee, it looks funny!” laughs the kid.

I stare at him.

“Aren’t you afraid, small-fry?” I ask.

The kid keeps right on laughing. “What should I be afraid about?” he asks me. “It’s only a dragon, isn’t it? I read about them in books all the time’. Unless, of course, you’re a wicked wizard or an ogre. But you don’t look like an ogre to me.”

“Thanks, small-fry,” I say.

And my name isn’t small-fry, it’s Edgar,” says the kid.

“Edgar what?”

“I’m not supposed to tell you, because if I did you’d send me home and I’ve run away from home,” the kid gets out.

“Run away?” I say. “You mean you took it on the lam? What’s the matter—does your old man put the boots to you?”

“You mean beat me? No, of course not,” Edgar says. “Only I want to seek adventure. And I guess I’ve found it, haven’t I?”

I don’t do any guessing myself. Instead I give this little tow-headed Edgar another look. He is not a hick type, that I see. He is dressed to the ears in a swell Kuppenheimer Jr., which is a little dusty from traveling. I see his folks must be up in the tax list from his manner of gab, which is very high class. But what puzzles me is why he is not afraid of this dragon.

“You mean to tell me you aren’t scared by this fire-breathing monster?” I ask. “Doesn’t this thing with the hot halitosis give you the shivers?”

Edgar shakes his noggin. “Of course not. I’m used to animals. Why, back where I live I—” Then he stops and smiles. “But I’m not going to tell.”

I give him another stare that is old but cold.

“Listen, Edgar,” I say, kindly, “It will please me extremely if you go back to your old man before I am forced to do something rash, like kicking your teeth down your throat.”

Edgar keeps on smiling.

"You can't fool me," he says. "You aren't an ogre."

"I am not the head of an orphan asylum, either," I tell him. "I am not running a Boy's Town. I am just a chicken farmer, understand? I have nothing at all to do with the rackets these days, and I am not getting mixed up with any runaway Dead End kids. It is bad enough I got to get a dragon today without singing Sonny Boy to a moppet."

Edgar gets the drift of my remarks all right, because he puckers up his little puss like a sponge and begins to spring a leak from the eyes.

"You don't like me—you're sending me away—" he bawls.

"That is the general idea, urchin. Go urch some place else."

"And just when I was going to have such adventures," Edgar sniffles. "Now when I tell people about your real live dragon they won't believe me."

"Oh, oh!" This is something I do not figure. If I send the kid away it will mean he spills the story about the dragon to somebody he meets. It is, as Mr. Heinz puts it, a very pretty pickle.

So I go over to Edgar and pat him on the shoulder.

"Do not drizzle so," I console him. "Maybe I change my mind. After all, I need somebody around to take care of the dragon for me while I keep the farm going. Besides, it seems to like you. So how about playing stable-boy to the baby, here?"

"You really mean I can stay and take care of the dragon and feed it and everything?" Edgar is so excited he hugs me around the knees, knocking them together severely.

"Ouch! Certainly!"

Then Edgar has to go over and hug the dragon. It is a pretty good blueprint for a nightmare to see the kid with his arms around that green head, and the fire shooting out of the dragon's mouth when he lets go with a hiccup.

BUT Edgar does not seem to mind—in fact you would think from the look on his puss that he has his arms around Betty Grable. And the dragon lets go with another smile, this time showing enough teeth to supply the entire Japanese army.

“He likes me,” squeals Edgar. “See, we get along fine! By the way, Mister, what is his name?”

“Name?” I reply. “I do not give him a name as yet.”

“How do you expect him to come when you call if he hasn’t got a name?” asked the kid.

“What makes you think I ever want to call a dragon?” I answer.

But the moppet insists. “We can call him Herman,” he decides.

“All right, make it Herman,” I tell him. “You want I should christen him by breaking a bottle of beer over his head?”

The kid gives me a funny look while he pats Herman on the neck.

“I can’t figure it out, Mister,” he says. “You don’t act or talk like a magician. But you must be one, or how would you own a dragon?”

“I am just a farmer,” I say. “I wish you to forget all this double-talk about magicians and wizards and what-all.”

Then I make a dive for the hay.

But I am too late. The urchin gets there first and picks up the note from Merlin, which he reads.

“Boy!” he remarks. “Oh, boy! You can’t fool me, Mister—this note proves you’re a sorcerer.”

“Listen, Edgar,” I mention, sweetly, holding out my arm. “This fist proves you got a black eye unless you forget what you just read. If you want to stay here with me and take care of Herman, you must keep your lip buttoned. For certain reasons, I do not wish anyone else to know I possess this dragon. You understand?”

Edgar smiles. “Maybe you’re afraid of an enemy enchanter,” he suggests.

“Maybe,” I say.

Just then I hear a car honking in the yard. I go to the door and take a squint. It is Thin Tommy Malloon, bringing me the beer I order. So I turn around to Edgar and give him the old whisper.

"You are right," I tell him. "I am afraid of an enemy whatever-you-call-it. In fact, he arrives now. So it is up to you to keep yourself and Herman out of sight until he goes away. I do not desire a peep out of you or a burp out of Herman."

At which moment Elerman lets go with another burst of anti-aircraft from the tonsils.

"Shove a bottle of beer down his throat," I advise.

But then Thin Tommy honks his horn again, so I go out to the yard. He is sitting in his truck, and when I come up he gives me the old once-over.

"I figure you are in the house all this time," he says. "What you doing out in back?"

"The new catalogue arrives today," I explain.

Thin Tommy just grunts. It is a normal sound, because he is built like a hog, with a strain of wild boar. He is called Thin Tommy because he weighs in at 300 pounds on the latest police blotter. Besides being a very unpleasant hunk of lard to look at, he is also an unpleasant personality to do business with. He runs his tavern, but also throws the scare into local yokels so they pay him protection money in these parts. In fact, Thin Tommy is what is vulgarly termed a hoodlum. My own term for him would be about twenty years.

IT IS for these reasons that I do not wish him to find out I have a live dragon on the premises, else he is liable to get his two triggers, Bertram and Roscoe, and put the old fingeroo on it.

So I make dumb and say, "Where is the beer?"

"Right here in the truck," Thin Tommy tells me. "You holding a party?"

"No," I say. "Not exactly."

"You gonna drink two dozen cases of beer yourself?"

“Well—” I begin.

Just then another burp comes from the barn. It sounds kind of mournful and impressive, like Louie Armstrong on the trumpet.

“What in purple blazes is that godawful, blatting?” inquires Thin Tommy.

I think fast.

“I just buy a couple cows,” I tell him.

“I never hear a cow make a sound like that,” he scowls. “Holsteins?”

“No—Beersteins,” I came back. “A new bleed. They give special milk if you see they get beer to drink.”

What kind of milk does a cow give from drinking beer?”

“Malted milk, stupid!” I tell him. “That is why I order this beer. What is more, I wish you to deliver two dozen cases every day in the future.”

“I would like to see such cows,” Thin Tommy says, climbing out of the truck.

I back up to the barn door.

“They are too drunk to look at,” I excuse.

Out comes another burp, making the door rattle a little.

“I still say that does not sound like a cow,” Thin Tommy insists.

“Take my word for it,” I tell him. “That’s no bull.”

WHEN I pull out my wallet to distract him. The sight of money always distracts Thin Tommy, particularly if it is other people’s money. It will even distract him through the door of a bank vault.

“Here is your dough,” I remind him. “Kindly dump out the beer.”

Which he does, and climbs back on the truck.

“So long,” I call. “See you tomorrow. I got to go back now—one of the cows has a hangover.”

Thin Tommy stares at me again.

“By the way,” he purrs. “Speaking of hangovers, what do you feed those two finks you meet in my tavern last night?”

"Who?"

"Those two traveling salesmen with the broken-down car," he answers. "This morning they come in with awful heads and phone a garage. I hear them mumbling and muttering under their bad breaths about a dragon they hatch on your farm."

"What?"

I play dumb, but Thin Tommy keeps staring.

"Yes, they babbie about going up to the old burg and contacting a circus owner or whatever."

"They are extremely stencho," I shrug. "Are you sure it is not pink elephants they mention?"

"No, it is a dragon. So I merely desire to ask you. Of course," Thin Tommy purrs, "you do not have such a dragon."

"Of course," I say.

"Only some drunken cows," he adds.

It is a bad time to hear another burp, but I do, and so does everyone else within a mile.

Thin Tommy starts his motor and smiles. "One of your cows must be calling you," he winks. "You better put an ice-pack on its forehead. That will make the malted milk colder."

Then he backs his truck out of the yard.

I stand there shaking and then lug the beer into the barn. Opening the door I almost trip over Edgar, who is stooping down.

"I know!" he yips. "That's the wicked wizard, isn't it so? Gee, he's a mean-looking ogre."

"I agree," I come back. "But why are you doing a Winchell at the door when you should be taking care of Herman?"

"Oh, Herman's all right," says the kid. "He's eating."

I look. Herman is eating—but definitely.

The dragon is swallowing down the milk pails I keep in the corner, also a shovel, a harness, and two pitchforks. While I watch, Herman also swallows an orange crate and the rest of the empty beer bottles.

"He's got a stomach like a furnace," squeals Edgar. "Look at the fire coming out of his mouth now."

I look. It is a three-alarm all right. Smoke and sparks fly out every time he breathes.

But Edgar laughs and pets him, and the dragon stops eating long enough to rub up against his legs, nearly knocking the little shaver over. Then he starts to chew the planks in the barn floor.

I grab up the beer bottles in a hurry.

"Quick!" I yell. "Give him these to chew on. He's liable to eat me out of house and home!"

III

THIS turns out to be almost a fact in the next couple of days. Because the dragon keeps right on eating, morning, noon and night. It has a 24-hour-a-day stomach, strictly non-union shop. It eats everything—nails and blankets and boards and tin cans and barbed wire.

And the more it eats the more it grows. By the fourth day it is fifteen feet long and eight feet high. This is not a rib on my part, but the honest truth, because I measure it right there in the barn, and I have the yardstick to prove it. That is, I would have the yardstick, only Herman swallows it when I wave it near his head. Then he begins nibbling on the step-ladder, so I get down in a hurry.

Naturally, I have plenty of trouble. To begin with, I have to watch Herman's diet so that he will not actually chew down the barn itself. More and over, now that he is as big as an elephant,. I am plenty worried he will actually outgrow the barn.

I do not have any figures handy on the hips and bust measurements of a full-grown dragon, but if he grows this much in four or five days, what will he look like in a year?

Pretty terrible, I decide.

But I am still waiting to hear from Larry and Archie on their circus proposition, so there is nothing to do but hold down the fort—even if I cannot hold down Herman's appetite.

Edgar and I pour beer into him every day and a lot more at night, so he will go to sleep. It makes him very affectionate, the beer does—which is lucky for us.

In fact it is very quaint the way Herman gives us the old glad eye when we feed him, and rubs up against us. This rubbing-up business has a few flaws in it, though—because now he is always knocking us down by mistake, and we keep our distance from his nose so the flames don't give us the old hotfoot.

But Herman likes us, and he lets Edgar pet-him and lead him around. In fact, on the fourth day Edgar is out in the barn with him and actually climbs up on his back for a ride.

So the first thing I know, Edgar is riding the dragon around in the backyard.

I run out in a lather.

"Quit playing jockey!" I holler. "Don't you know they can see in from the road?"

"I have to take him out of the barn," Edgar tells me. "He just burns a hole in the roof."

I look, and it is the truth. Herman's breath shoots up in one spot of the barn, and gradually burns quite a hole.

"Take him back in," I order. "I will get some sheet iron and patch it up."

So Edgar rides the dragon into the barn, and not a bit too soon. Because Thin Tommy's truck chugs down the road just then to deliver the daily two dozen cases of brew.

IT IS very embarrassing, this business of Thin Tommy's visits. So far I manage to keep both the dragon and the kid out of his range of vision, but it cannot go on forever. More and over, Thin Tommy is still suspicious, in spades. He does not understand what I do with all the beer, or what becomes of the empty bottles. So I am hard put to keep his bashed-in schnozzle out of my business.

Today he rattles up and unloads without saying anything, which pleases me. I do not wag my chin in his direction, either, but let him haul the beer cases down.

Then, right in the middle, he stops and drops a case. He is staring very hard at something on the ground.

I look.

What I see is most peculiar.

It is a big hole, about fifteen inches across, sunk in the dirt. It has a sort of web pattern to it.

All at once I realize what it is.

It is one of the footprints left by Herman the dragon when he is out in the yard.

"What gives?" asks Thin Tommy, with a fishy eye.

"That hole?" I spar.

"Yeah," says Thin Tommy. "Now—do not tell me you are raising giant frogs in your spare time like the ads say."

It is too bad he mentions this, because he kills my alibi.

"I am just doing a little digging," I tell him.

"Funny-looking hole," he remarks.

"I got a funny shovel," I come back.

"You must have," he grunts. Then he looks up and his eye gets fishier. "Unholy smokes!" he gargles. "What's that?"

Flames are coming out of the top of the barn.

"I am roasting marshmallows," I give out.

Thin Tommy waddles in the direction of the door. "I would like to see that," he says.

I try to bar his way, but who can argue with a human tank like Thin Tommy?

Just as he gets to the door, Edgar walks out.

Thin Tommy stops.

"Well I'll be blasted blue!" he predicts. "Who is the brat?"

"That is my nephew, Edgar. Edgar, this is Thin Tommy."

"The ogre," Edgar says.

"What?" Tommy bellows.

I jump in quick. "Edgar is a boy scout, and we are just roasting marshmallows in the barn."

Thin Tommy does not listen to this explanation. He does not glance at the flames any more, or at the footprint in the ground. He just stares at Edgar and grunts.

"Your nephew, huh? Never knew you had one." He grunts again. "Name's Edgar, huh? Well, well. Pleased ta meetcha." Another grunt. "Well, I got to be going. So long."

He backs to the truck, climbs in, and roars off.

I scratch my noggin.

"That is funny how he shuts up all of a sudden," I say. "Maybe he recognizes you, Edgar."

"How can he when this is the first time I see him?" answers the kid.

So I let it go at that.

I LET a lot of things go these days. To begin with, I do not put the old third-degree on Edgar to find out where he comes from, after that first day. I intend to just as soon as I get rid of the dragon. Meanwhile I let things ride. In fact, I get very mushy over the moppet, letting him sleep in my bedroom and even reading him to sleep out of MURDEROUS DETECTIVE STORIES. For his part, Edgar still insists I am a magician and that I am keeping this dragon under enchantment.

So I figure if I do not ask him too many questions he will not ask me any, and we are even.

Still, the way Thin Tommy looks at him in the yard gets me suspicious.

"You are sure you do not know this lug?" I ask again.

“Absolutely,” he tells me. “Where is the beer? I think Herman wants his bottle again.”

So we feed Herman by climbing on the stepladder and I scurry around to find some old sheet iron to patch the roof with.

While I do it, Edgar keeps up the babble.

“When are you going to fight the ogre?” he asks.

“Who, Thin Tommy?”

“Yes. You hate him, don’t you?”

“Only his intestines,” I remark, delicately. “But I do not wish to tangle with that one-man crime wave.”

“You must be fooling,” says the kid. “I know—you’re just raising this fire-breathing dragon up and then you’ll destroy him, won’t you.”

“If I raise this dragon much higher he will destroy me,” I mutter. “The beer bills are terrific, he is eating down my barn, and I am worried sick.”

“This is a funny adventure,” the moppet remarks. “A dragon, and wizards, but no princess.”

“Princess?”

“Of course. There should be a beautiful princess. You know.”

“I am sorry, Edgar, but I do not possess the phone number of any beautiful princess. Besides, if I do, you are still too young to get mixed up with any ribs. The princess is out.”

Edgar looks sad for a minute. “All right—but it’s a heck of an adventure without any princess.”

I get the new roofing nailed down and come back to earth. Herman the dragon swishes his tail, knocking down the ladder.

“Quiet, you overgrown iguana,” I nag. “Or I will knock your warts off.”

This is just a bluff, because now Herman’s warts are big as cantaloupes and you cannot knock them off with anything but a blowtorch.

If I do not know Herman since he is a pup, so to speak, I would do a shiver shimmy every time I look at him, because he is now some sight. He is longer and greener and has more muscles than Charlie Atlas.

But right now he looks pretty tame. I do not figure why, but Edgar notices. “Look—he’s stopping the fire!”

IT IS a fact. Herman does not breathe fire right now. Perhaps it is the beer, but whatever the case, he is a little groggy. “He’s lying down,” says Edgar. Herman does lie down, with a thump like a ton of coal sliding into a manhole.

“Maybe he’s sick.” Edgar pets his forehead. “Look how pale he is.”

Herman is slightly white around the gills—merely because he cannot get any greener.

“I’ll go out and get him some more beer,” Edgar says.

I go with him.

When we get to the yard I hear the phone ringing in the house, so I make a dash up the steps. I get on the wire and hear a familiar voice. Two voices, in fact—Larry and Archy.

“Hey, we’ve got wonderful news!” says Larry. “I’m calling from a drug store in Hoosack. Guess who’s with me?”

“The Roxy chorus,” I snap.

“No—none other than J. Carver Carson.”

“So what?”

“So he’s half-owner of the greatest show on earth, that’s what! After four days we finally get him to an interview, and he’s so anxious to talk business he’s come down with us. I just want to warn you so you’ll be sure and have the dragon ready when we arrive.”

“He’ll be ready,” I say.

“Get your pen out—you’re going to sign a million-dollar contract! It isn’t easy to handle this J. Carver Carson—guess he’s having some personal troubles of his own right now—but he’s sold now. Just produce the dragon when we arrive tonight!” Larry hangs up, leaving me very happy. I am so happy I do not hear certain noises I should hear, because there is a ringing in my ears—the ringing of a million bucks.

But when I get out in the yard again, I am not happy any more.

Because in the dirt are fresh tire-marks which I recognize as the marks of Thin Tommy’s truck.

I make a dash into the barn.

“Edgar!” I yell.

There is no answer.

I go out in the yard again and shout. There is no answer here, either. Except the answer in the marks of Thin Tommy’s truck.

It is easy to see what is up, all right, and I make a fancy dash back to the house to phone the State Troopers. Only one thing stops me—if I phone them they will come out and find the dragon. Which will be very bad for all concerned, because J. Carver Carson will not like publicity for his new attraction. And besides, the Troopers will ask me many questions about Edgar which I cannot answer on any Quiz program.

There is only one question about him I can answer. Thin Tommy knows who he is and puts the snatch on him, and I know where Thin Tommy must take him.

So I dash back from the house to the barn.

Herman is still dopey, but he perks up when I kick him in the side of the head.

“Come on,” I yell. “Edgar’s kidnaped!”

IV

MAYBE it comes from the kid’s ideas about me being a magician and raising a dragon to tangle with Thin Tommy the ogre.

Maybe it comes from being plain crazy.

Maybe it comes from the mushy feeling I have for Edgar—which makes me want to exterminate Thin Tommy for snatching him.

Whatever it is, it’s there.

And I am there, racing down the highway on Herman’s back, riding a dragon to rescue a moppet.

What else can I do? It is the only way out, and if I can sick Herman onto Thin Tommy I should have the kid and be back in time to meet J. Carver Carson when the boys arrive with him.

That is the way I figure it, though it is pretty hard to figure anything when you are bumping along on a dragon’s back. Particularly since there is no steering wheel on a dragon.

Herman is not sick any more. He is full of the old pep, and the flames come out of his mouth like he is chewing dynamite.

He seems to understand what we are doing, because he picks up speed as he goes along, and when I yell, “Come on, step on it!” in his ear, he nearly jolts me off.

I do not know if you ever ride a dragon in your life, but if you do, you know it is very hard without a saddle. So I am more than a little joyful when I see the lights of Thin Tommy’s tavern up ahead in the twilight.

We round the bend and I grab Herman’s ears.

“Whoa!” I yap. He skids into the yard and sits down like a pile-driver.

“Wait here until I call,” I say, hoping he understands me.

Then I march up the steps of the tavern and go inside.

The place is empty. But after I go up to the bar, Bertram and Roscoe come out. These are the two gorillas Thin Tommy has for his waiters. Personally I would not hire them if I was running a slave market, but they are just the personalities Thin Tommy wants around.

They give me a frigid stare, but I ignore it, being more interested in the way my teeth are chattering.

“Where is Thin Tommy?” I inquire.

“He is out,” says Bertram. “You want a short one?”

“Yes,” I answer. “I want a short kid. Where is he?”

“We got no kid,” says Roscoe. “So why not beat it?”

“Now be reasonable,” I suggest. This is a very timely suggestion, because both Bertram and Roscoe suddenly pull on a pair of very black jacks and come around the bar.

I can see they do not wish to play, and so I back to the door.

Just then I hear a sound from upstairs. It is the kid’s voice, and over it I hear the kind of grunt which is manufactured only by Thin Tommy.

So I change my mind about going out the door. Instead I do a quick forward run. Bertram comes at me from one side and Roscoe from the other, but I time it right. They miss me when I duck and run into each other.

Which gives me time enough to gallop up the stairs.

I yank open the first door.

Thin Tommy is sitting on the bed, and so is Edgar. When they see me, Thin Tommy gets up and Edgar tries to, but he cannot, because his arm is handcuffed to the bedpost.

“I knew you’d come!” says Edgar.

“So did I,” says Thin Tommy. He waves a newspaper at me. “So this is why you act so mysterious these past days,” he grunts. “Because you are holding the brat for ransom. I find it out this morning when I see his puss in the press.”

“What do you mean?”

“Take a look,” he invites me. “J. Carver Carson’s kid—son of the circus owner. Reward, huh? Well, you’re out of luck.

I just put through a call myself, and I find he is on his way up here. So it is lucky you blunder in. Because when he gets here I tell him you are the kidnaper and I rescue Edgar.”

This sounds like a very reasonable scheme, even to me. What makes it more reasonable is that Thin Tommy suddenly slides the newspaper off his arm and I notice he is holding an equalizer. I notice also that it is pointing at me. I open my mouth but nothing comes out. Instead it is Edgar who screams.

THIS turns out to be a very good thing indeed. Because all at once I hear a thundering noise from below and I know Elerman the dragon recognizes the kid’s voice and is coming in.

“Damn and blast!” yells Thin Tommy, using very bad language for kids to hear. “What the hell is that?” he further inquires, rushing to the door.

“It’s the dragon!” squeaks Edgar.

It is the dragon all right. From the sounds I can tell he is smashing the bar, also Bertram and Roscoe. Thin Tommy runs down the stairs very fast.

“Hell’s bells!” he growls. “It’s a dinosaur!”

Evidently Herman does not like anyone to call him names, because he lets out a roar like an exploding boiler and there is a terrible crash. Then Thin Tommy begins to shoot.

I head out the door and make the stairs. Thin Tommy is shooting at the dragon and the dragon is not paying the proper attention at all, merely coming right on for the stairway with his eyes gleaming very bright and a tongue of flame shooting out of his mouth. In fact he starts several fires on the way.

Thin Tommy reaches down on the stairway and picks up a keg which he hurls at Herman’s head. It smashes on his nose and I see the keg is filled with whiskey.

The result is very unfortunate, because Herman’s breath sets the alcohol on fire and a tongue of blue flame leaps up. Besides, Herman is not used to hard liquor, and he lets go with a burp that does Thin Tommy no more good than a bomb explosion.

In fact, this is just what happens.

With one loud blast, the room turns red. The rafters shake, the air is filled with smoke, and when it clears away I am staring down into a mass of flames.

Thin Tommy is gone.

I turn around and rush into the bedroom.

“We got to get out of here,” I yell. “The joint is on fire.”

Then I notice for the first time that Edgar is very unhappy about the whole thing. Because he is still handcuffed to the bed.

Right then and there I have to make up my mind about a lot of things. About Edgar, and about the dragon, and about a million bucks.

Which I do.

It is not easy. What comes next is not easy to do either, and it is a dirty trick on poor old Herman. But it just has to be. The explosion is terrific, but it puts the fire out.

And so, half an hour later, I finally get the handcuffs off and Edgar and I crawl down the stairs and out of the joint. It is still smoking a little, but the fire is out.

“That’s that,” I tell him.

And it is, because just then the sirens roar and I see Larry and Archie and J. Carver Carson arriving with the cops.

V

THEN it is all over, we go back to the farm.

“I still don’t understand it,” J. Carver tells me. “Edgar here says you get rescued by a dragon. And there is no dragon.”

“Lucky the cops don’t see any,” I say.

“But what happens to it?”

“It’s simple,” I answer. “There is only one way to get Edgar out of there with the place burning down. That is to put the fire out somehow. Which I do.

“I grab a fire extinguisher and toss it down Herman’s throat. Naturally, poor Herman explodes. It wrecks the joint, but it stops the fire right away. The only trouble is, it also wrecks Herman. So now there is no longer any dragon left.”

“That is a very heroic thing to do,” says J. Carver Carson. “And I am grateful to you for it. Naturally, there is a reward.”

I shake my head. All of a sudden I feel very sad when I think of poor old Herman. I walk into the barn and the others shuffle along.

"Just think of it," I mutter. "Only this afternoon I have a million-dollar dragon on my hands. Now I have blisters. I can almost see him here now, sitting in the hay and eating a keg of nails or a couple chicken-crate sandwiches. Poor Herman!"

Larry gives me a funny look.

"What do you call the dragon?" he asks.

"Why, Herman."

"I think you make a mistake," he tells me.

"So do I," I say. "The poor thing does not even feel good this afternoon. And then I take him out and extinguish him."

"I mean, you make a mistake when you call the dragon Herman," says Larry. "There is a reason the dragon does not feel good today, I bet you—also a reason why it should not be called Herman."

"What do you mean?" I ask.

"Take a look," says Larry, pointing at the hay. "Before the dragon left here it laid an egg!"

Sure enough, lying there in the haypile is a big round egg, about three feet long.

So that is the way it turns out, after all.

Larry and Archy and Edgar and J. Carver Carson are all lying down in the barn, trying to make the egg hatch.

If it does, I make a million bucks.

If it does not—well, I cook breakfast pretty soon and I will be eating the biggest omelet in the world.

Who knows?

Lefty Feep Catches Hell

Lefty not only went to hell; he brought back a piece. But it did not show until he lost his pants

I HARDLY could wait for my meal to arrive over at Jack's Shack. It had been a tough day, and I was hungry—hungry enough to eat one of his tough steaks.

When the food arrived, I hastily grabbed a bottle of ketchup and flung it over the meat. A large gob splattered up against my nose.

"Damn it!" I muttered.

"Such language!" said a voice at my ear.

I turned my ketchup-decorated nose up and peered into the face of Lefty Feep.

The angular man who knows all the angles was surveying me with a look of extreme disapproval.

"What's wrong?" I inquired.

Feep draped himself in a chair at my side. He made little clucking sounds in his throat.

"Mustn't say such things," he said.

"I never knew you objected to profanity," I told him.

"It is not safe to say such things," Feep told me. "They are liable to come true."

I stared at Lefty Feep. This sounded very odd. I wondered if he had been drinking.

"Where in blazes have you been?" I snapped.

"Everywhere," said Feep.

"Where everywhere?"

"Like you say. Everywhere in blazes."

"What in perdition are you talking about?"

"Everything. Everything in perdition," Feep answered.

"The hell you say!"

"That's right. The hell, I say."

"Listen, Lefty," I sighed. "I'm having one devil of a time understanding you."

"That is nothing. You should see the time the devil had understanding me," Feep grinned.

I looked Lefty Feep straight in the eye. "Are you trying to tell me you've talked with Satan?" I demanded.

"Satanly."

"Feep, that's a lousy pun. What kind of a gag is this anyway?"

"No gag at all," declared Feep. "I am on the level about the devil."

"You talked to him, eh?"

"Do you think I would lie to you?" Feep accused.

I didn't answer that one. But there was no need to. For Lefty Feep suddenly gripped my collar.

"It is lucky for you that I'm here," he announced. "I got a tale to tell about Hell."

I broke free.

"Some other time, Lefty. Right now I can't stop to listen. I've got a date with an angel."

"Tell her to go play a harp. You got a date with a fiend," declared Lefty Feep. "What happens to me makes Dante's Inferno look like a kindergarten picnic."

"But—"

Lefty complied. He butted me back into my chair.

"You gotta hear this," he breathed.

"It looks that way," I sighed.

Fixing me with a devilish leer, Lefty Feep gulped, gave his tongue a practice flip, and plunged into his story.

I HAVE a date with an angel the other night myself. If she is not exactly an angel, at least she is one of the heavenly bodies.

To be specific and terrific, I am hep to step out with a little number by the name of Kitten Carter. Her real name is Clarice, but she is called Kitten because of her lovely puss.

When I meet Kitten at first she is working in a Five and Ten, but gets kicked out because she cannot remember the prices. So I advise her to get a job in a defense plant, and that is where she is now planted.

Naturally Kitten is most happy about all this, and when I invite her out for the evening she agrees at once.

In fact I am just talking to her in a phone booth, but somebody else wants to use it and we have to get out.

"Let's us go to a restaurant, Lefty," suggests Kitten, in her elegant manner, "And put the chew on some goo."

I smile sweetly and nod, but I do not feel so good about it. Because at the moment I am as broke as a Japanese promise. I am in a fine way to take a ginch out and show her a good time. All I got in my pockets are a couple of pawnshop tickets, and who wants to take a dame to a pawnshop?

But if Kitten Carter wants to eat, she is going to eat. I will figure out an angle.

So I steer her down the street and pretty soon we are in front of a spaghetti joint.

"How about some of that?" I inquire. Kitten nods her head, and we go in.

The place is not exactly snooty, being a sort of cross between a dive and a joint, with just a touch of dump about it. But it looks cheap enough, so we sit down at one of the tables and brush macaroni crumbs off with the menu.

We are the only customers in the place, unless the flies are spending money tonight, so we get quick service. In less than an hour the one waiter in the dive figures out that we might want something to eat. He power-dives over at a speed of at least 2 miles per hour.

“What’s it gonna be?” he asks.

“Probably ptomaine from the looks of this place,” I answer. “But we’ll take some spaghetti.”

He gives me a look from the black book. I stare right back. The waiter is a little, shrivelled-up specimen in a tuxedo that isn’t pressed since it comes from the funeral parlor, back in 1906. He is very dark and swarthy, and there is five o’clock shadow on his face, and also under his eyes. But mostly he is a walking mustache. The bristle under his nose would make any janitor grab him, turn him upside down, and use him for a broom.

But he forces a very anemic smile and takes my order and dashes away at his usual speed, like a racing snail that gets retired for old age.

KITTEN sits there and makes with her mouth, and I sit there and scurry over a worry. This waiter is going to be a tough customer when he finds out I am a broke customer. He looks like a member of the Bomb-Thrower’s Union Number 7, Mussolini Local.

More likely he is a Black Hand. This I decide when I get a look at his fingers as he comes back with the spaghetti.

I stop worrying for a while and begin to tangle with the spaghetti—which is very good, if you like shoelaces with vaseline.

Kitten and I are all wound up in our meal, and the waiter stands off at one side watching us trying to untie the Boy Scout knots in the noodles.

After we bounce the last meatball down our throats, he comes over. This time he really moves fast, because he is bringing the bill.

I take a look and gulp. Then I gulp again. The price for two orders of spaghetti is $4.50.

"What gives this $4.50?" I inquire.

He slides a sneer out from under his mustache.

"Cover charge," he answers.

"I am not buying any covers," I explain. "All I want is the spaghetti."

"The price is $4.50," he comes back. "Well," I sigh, "I have not got $4.50."

"So?" He glares at me. "Then you gotta see the cashier."

"All right with me." I walk over to the cashier's desk.

He follows me and takes off his apron, then slips around the desk.

"What you want?" he asks, like he never sees me before.

"Why, the cashier."

"That's me."

"You're the cashier, too?"

"Why not?"

"Well I am still the same guy who hasn't got $4.50."

He glares again.

"You insist, ha? Then I call the boss."

"Call him anything you like."

"Follow me." He turns around and walks back to an office marked Manager. I trail along and go in.

The same waiter is sitting behind the desk.

"You're the boss, too?"

"I am the boss," he growls. "And I want $4.50."

This is very embarrassing to me. I think of Kitten sitting back there at the table, wondering where I go. I also think of something else when I see this guy pulling a little blackjack out of the desk drawer and twirling it around his head. He is not going to play bean-bag with me, I guess.

"Can't we settle this thing peacefully?" I suggest.

"$4.50 settles everything."

I am stuck with this clip-joint price. All I can do is shake my head. Also my knees, because he gets up and starts to wave his blackjack.

All at once he stops.

"I give you your choice," he says. "Either I break your neck or else—"

"Or else what?" I snap, hoping to make a better deal. "Maybe just both legs, huh?"

"Or else you can work out the price of the meals."

"Work it out?"

"Sure? Why not? I am tired of all this business," he says. "Suppose you work here until 12 o'clock and we call it a deal?"

THIS sounds better. It is already after 9 p. m. and I am amazed at such a generous offer. Also I cannot understand why he has such a grin on his face, when there is hardly enough room for the mustache.

"I'll do it," I agree.

We turn around and walk back.

Kitten is standing up at the table.

"Hurry up, Lefty," she pouts. "Let's get out of here. I want to go places and do things tonight."

"Well," I gulp, "I don't know. I am sort of going to stick around here until midnight."

"But I want to go out stepping like you promised me," she says.

"Let me explain—" I begin. Then a hand pushes me out of the way.

"One side," says the waiter-cashier-boss. He bows real low and the bristles of his mustache dust his knees.

"I will have much pleasure in escorting such a beautiful lady as you," he gurgles, giving Kitten the eye. "I admire you. You have the face of an artist. Let us therefore go out and paint the town red."

"Why you—" I say. I have a swell name all picked out for him, but I never get a chance to express it, because Kitten interrupts me.

She giggles at the waiter.

"I accept your invitation," she smirks.

"But Kitten—"

"It serves you right, Lefty Feep," she tells me. "If you are going to stand me up, I might as well start toddling with this kind gentleman."

Kitten is very dull in the skull, understand? Because anybody taking one good look at this fink wouldn't walk anywhere with him except as an escort to the electric chair. He is rough, tough, and gruff, and a ticket to the hot seat is just about his speed.

I try to tell Kitten all this in a few short sentences, but the waiter just taps his hip pocket where the blackjack is and I shut up.

"I am the boss," he whispers. "You work for me until 12 midnight, understand? So no back talk from the hired help."

That is why I only stand there when he walks out with Kitten. I give her a little smile and wave my waiter's apron lit her, but no response. Except that a piece of spaghetti on the apron hits me in the eye.

And there I am, stuck as a waiter in a spaghetti jetty until midnight.

It is quiet. It is lonely. Nothing is buzzing but the flies. My girl jilts me. I am broke. And on top of it, the spaghetti!

On top of my poor stomach, I mean. Because all at once I get a very peculiar feeling. I am suddenly quite dizzy. Everything starts whirling around.

I start to sit down. That is all I do, just start. Because I don't sit down. I fall down.

Fall on the floor.

And further.

I get the feeling that I fall through the floor.

Of course I am unconscious, but I have that horrible feeling of falling. Dropping down, down, down.

All at once there is a bump, and I wake up. I blink my eyes.

IT SEEMS I am standing in a dark, dingy cavern. I blink again, because after all the spaghetti joint is dark and dingy.

But this place is different. Worse. Nothing around me but rocks and a reddish light.

Besides, it is extremely warm here.

I turn my head and notice a guy standing next to me. It is quite dim and I cannot see him, but misery loves company. So I give him a nod.

"Hotter than hell here, isn't it?" I remark.

"Can't be," says a deep voice.

"What do you mean?"

"Can't be hotter than hell. This is Hell!" says the voice.

"Oooooogle!" I tell him. And for a very good reason. Looking close, I see his face.

It is a red face, and it does not look natural to me. In fact it would only look natural on a bottle of Pluto Water. The face is equipped with slanted black eyes and a long mouth.

The mouth has white teeth as big as watch-charms.

The face grins at me and I shrink back. I get a blast of hot breath, like brimstone. I recognize it.

Hellatosis!

Sure enough, I am standing next to a fiend! The thing is red and scaly, like dishwater hands, only all over. And he gives me a scare and a stare at the same time.

"You're being sent for," he tells me in a voice that rumbles like volcanoes.

"Me? Sent for?"

"He wants to see you."

"Who?"

"Who in Hell do you suppose?"

I shiver. It is true, after all—those predictions people are always making about where I am going to wind up. I am dead and I am on the dirty end of the Styx.

"Come along," says the fiend.

He pulls me over the cavern floor.

I do not keep my grip when I think about the trip. We go along through the bowels of the earth, if you pardon the expression, and all around me is this awful heat. I do not see any flames, but I can feel them on the other side of the rocky walls.

I can also hear sounds. Crackling noises of fire. A lot of screams and laughing. The whole thing is like a Girl Scout marshmallow roast, only on a grand scale.

"What goes on there?" I ask the fiend.

But he does not answer. He hops along the ground ahead of me like a skinny red monkey, and I follow like an organ-grinder. Only I would not pick up any pennies if I could, because they will be plenty hot at this temperature.

"Where are we going?" I gurgle.

"Short cut," cackles the fiend. "Keep moving."

I take this advice. It is so warm that if I stand still on this ground I will give myself tire hot foot.

The fiend doesn't worry, because I notice he has cloven hoofs instead of sports shoes. I am busy noticing things this trip, and every time I notice something new I shiver again, in spite of the heat.

BUT at last we round a bend in the cavern, and we stand in a big chamber. It is nice and bright here because some obliging guy sets the joint on fire, or something. The walls shoot flames out and the floor is just a lake of leaping crimson. I take one look and get ready to sing Smoke Gets in Your Eyes.

I take another look and then wish smoke would get in them. So I wouldn't have to see the figure sitting on a rock in the middle of the pool of flames.

It is the devil, naturally. Or unnaturally. Why bother with words? I can't get them out anyway, with my heart in my mouth.

He is perched on the crag in the center of the roaring blast, smiling at me.

I groan right back at him.

Satan has diamond-bright eyes, a heart-shaped mouth, a spade beard, and a club foot. Quite a card.

More exactly, he looks like the devil. And he is.

He stares at me out of his deep eyes for a long moment.

I just wait, hopping up and down to keep from frying my toes.

“Well I’ll be blessed,” he says, at last. “You must be—”

Just then another fiend comes out of a cavern at one side.

“Please, Sir,” he begins.

The devil frowns. “What are you horning in here for?”

“Well,” says the fiend. “It’s about those California people who get here yesterday.”

“California people? What’s with them?”

“They don’t like our climate.”

“Ha! Go back and let it rain pitch-forks for a while,” says Satan.

Then he turns to me.

“You must be Regretti,” he says.

“Regretti? Who’s Regretti? I’m Lefty Feep, and I want to know why in Hell I’m in Hell.”

“But Regretti is the one I send for,” snaps the devil. “He must come when I command him. It’s a duty! I own his soul!”

“Regretti? Is he the guy who runs a spaghetti parlor?” I ask.

“Correct.”

“And he sells his soul to you? So that’s why I get here.” It begins to dawn on me now. I yell out above the crackling of the flames.

“You are cheated when you get a customer like Regretti,” I tip him off. “From what I see of him he was a lousy soul, and is probably all heel.”

“That’s my business,” the devil comes back. “The soul-buying business. I’m in it quite a while now—ever since the days of old Doc Faust, one of my first customers. And I know a bargain is a bargain. When I send for Regretti he ought to come. He must obey me.”

“But I’m not Regretti,” I remind him.

"Then why are you here?"

"Damned if I know."

"That's an idea."

THE devil snaps his fingers. There is a crackling noise, and a book appears in his lap. A black book. He squints at it. Then he calls into the air. "What's wrong out there? I ask for the letter F. Fee, to be exact. Send me the right volume."

The first book disappears.

"Curse those bookkeepers of mine," he grumbles. "Ah, here we are. Just a moment please."

Another book flashes into view. He opens it with his long red claws moving over the pages. The flames light up for his convenience. He reads and shakes his head. He closes the book.

"No," he announces. "You are wrong. You are not damned. At least your name isn't in the book."

I am not altogether disappointed at being left out of Satan's hit parade. I smile, but he shakes his head. The horns waggle.

"Very peculiar," he grunts. "Lefty Feep comes when I ask for Regretti. Why?"

Then I understand.

"I am working in Regretti's place until midnight," I suggest.

"How so?"

I explain about the deal I make to pay for my meal.

Satan smiles.

"Of course," he says. "Well that's splendid. Splendid! Matter of fact, there's a little job or two lined up for Regretti. If you're taking his place until midnight you can do the work for him. Temporarily you're one of my fiends, you know."

"Wait a minute!" I object. "I don't want to stay here in Hell."

"And why not, may I ask?"

"I can't stand it here! I can't stand all these imps and fiends and demons."

"What about gargoyles?"

"I use Listerine."

"Well, you aren't going to stay in Hell," the devil tells me, tugging at his goatee. "I have a job for you. I always find work for idle hands to do."

I stare at the hellish fires around me. "What's cooking?" I ask.

"Sinners, mostly."

"I mean, what's the job?"

"It's an assignment back on Earth," he says. "In fact, you will return to exactly the same spot you came from. You will do what Regretti should do, under my orders."

"Do what?"

"When you get there you will understand. I will send the message to you in your own mind. Saves bother of instructions." The devil grins. "Ready to leave?"

"You bet I am."

"Good. Oh, one other thing, Mr. Feep." He still grins.

"It occurs to me that you may try to deceive me and not carry out my orders."

This occurs to me, also, and I blush now to be found out.

"But," says Satan, "I will take care of that. You see, I will give you a little token to carry around. And whenever you have an urge to disobey me, the token will remind you that you are my servant—until midnight tonight, when Regretti takes over again."

"Token? What token?"

"You'll see when you look around. Remember the old saying—'Satan, get thee behind me.' Well, that's the kind of a token you'll carry."

"What is all this?" I ask.

THE devil stands up. “No time to talk. Got a lot of jobs on the fire. Back you go to Earth, Lefty Feep. And if you don’t carry out my orders—there’ll be Hell to pay!”

There is a deep rumble.

Satan disappears.

So do I.

I am falling again. But this time I am falling up.

Way, way up. I end up, standing on my feet. Right back in the restaurant.

I blink. Same place. Still vacant. I stand in the same spot. It is all a dream. All this stuff about meeting the devil, getting assigned to a job, getting a token—all a dream.

Or is it?

That token, now. I’m supposed to look behind me.

I look behind me very slowly. And I see something.

A tail!

A tail attached to me!

It is about four feet long, quite thin, and the color is a distinct pink. On the end is a sort of a bud, like a plant has. That is where a spike is supposed to grow, I figure.

As I look at the tail it wags at me in a very friendly way. But I do not feel so friendly towards this tail. Not that I don’t like tails, understand. I think they are fine on dress suits. But not on me!

But this one is on me, because it’s the devil’s token. Yes, that’s my tail and I’m stuck with it. Or will be, if the spike grows out.

Naturally I do not wish to walk around until midnight with my tail dragging. It will attract comment. So I reach back and smuggle it into the rear of my trousers.

“Satan get thee behind me,” I yap, like the devil says.

Now that I have my token, I begin to wonder about those duties I am supposed to perform. But I do not wonder long.

A thought flashes through my noggin.

"Calling Lefty Feep. Calling Lefty Feep. A man is coming into the spaghetti parlor. Ply him with liquor and make a drunkard out of him. That is all."

No sooner do I get this message than the door opens and a personality lurches in.

He is a huge, broadshouldered bozo with straw-colored hair to match the straw behind his ears. He wears a mail-order catalogue suit that makes me think he must study his catalogue where the light is dim, because it is three sizes too small for a Boy Scout.

This big hick gives me a smile and plops down in a chair.

"Gotta drink, buddy?" he asks.

I realize this must be the fink the devil wants me to drive to drink. Apparently it is going to be an easy trip.

"I'm a stranger in town," booms the hick, with a grin. "I want a little excitement. How about that drink?"

So I flip my waiter's apron on, scurry around in back, and return with a glass and a bottle.

HE grabs the bottle and starts to throttle it. I hold out the glass. He shakes his head.

"I don't want any souvenirs," he says. "Just a drink." And tips the bottle.

"But don't you drink out of a glass?"

I ask.

"I should waste my time with glasses?" he chuckles. "Me—F. Bronson Johnson, from Wisconsin?"

Mr. F. Bronson Johnson, from Wisconsin then goes gurgle-gurgle-gurgle.

I stand there and watch.

"Bring another bottle, pal," he booms. "Got lotsa money."

Right then and there I rebel. For years I watch these poor suckers come to town, go into bars for a good time, and end up on their ears—with their dough gone. I do not like the way cab drivers and bartenders and come-on girls clip these hayseeds.

I can see what will happen to this goof. He will get bottle-dizzy and then he will start out to tour the joints, and by morning he will be parked in an alley someplace.

A nice guy, too. Probably with a wife and kids back in Oshkosh, or wherever. Just out for a good time vacation.

Well, Lefty Feep is not going to put the hooks into any small town clown, no matter what the devil wants.

“No more drinks,” I tell him.

Then it happens.

Somebody tugs my tail.

I turn around. There is no one behind me.

But my tail is being jerked, hard!

Of course—it is like the devil warns me. If I try to disobey, he will see to it that I step back into line. So when I go against him, my tail twists.

“Ouch!” I comment, as the tail is pulled.

“Come on, how about another bottle?” insist the guy.

I am on the spot. If I give it to him, he is a goner. But if I don’t, the devil will see to it that I wind up with a terrific pain in a most unsatisfactory place.

Right now my tail is being yanked very insistently. I must make up my mind.

Then I get an idea.

“All right, I’ll mix you another,” I tell my customer. I run back and drag out a fresh bottle, open it, and pour out a glass. I bring it back and let F. Bronson Johnson gargle with it.

He gets it down.

It gets him down.

F. Bronson Johnson leans back in his chair, gives me a big wink, and then falls over on his face. Out like a lout.

I pick him up and lay him in a booth to cool off, and I am very happy about the whole thing because I double-cross the devil.

I do not wish this oaf to become a drunkie, but unless I give him a drink the devil gets mad.

So I compromise. I give him a drink with a Mickey Finn in it. The devil doesn't know. My tail stops being twisted. F. Bronson Johnson is safe on ice for the night, and everybody is better off.

I GET to thinking about this Regretti, on the devil's pay roll, and wonder whether Satan makes him pull off a lot of jobs like this. Maybe he doesn't care for the work and is glad I take his place for a few hours.

Regretti has no tail, but he probably must obey orders just the same, or be dragged down to purgatory and barbecue over some brimstone.

I wonder what he is up to now—with Kitten Carter. All at once I remember he is out squeezing my tomato. And I am stuck here.

Or am I?

Just as I get this thought, another short-wave arrives from Purgatory.

"Calling all fiends. Calling all fiends. Regretti and Kitten Carter are at the Outside Inn. Regretti is pumping defense plant information out of Kitten. Go and help him. That is all."

That is all, is it? That is all—Regretti is trying to get military secrets out of my girl and that is all. Suddenly I realize that Regretti is not only a servant of Satan, but probably an Axis agent as well. Or as bad.

Naturally, the devil and the Axis have a lot in common. But—I am supposed to go and help Regretti!

"The hell I will," I say to myself.

Immediately I get a pain in the—I mean, my tail starts to hurt. It is twisted. Severely.

"No," I mutter, gritting my teeth.

"I won't go!"

The tug on my tail is harder.

"I won't go," I gasp. "If I do, my conscience will hurt me more than my tail."

I stand there, gritting my teeth. But not for long. Something seems to grab me from behind and drag me across the floor!

Before I know it, I am going backwards out the door. My tail is being jerked along and I follow after. I am on the street, sliding down backwards.

"Hey!" I object, with a mild scream.

But there I go, wagging my tail ahead of me. There is nothing to do but turn around and walk over to the Outside Inn.

The Outside Inn is a penthouse dance palace on the hotel roof down the street. It is high up, but so are the prices. I can imagine Regretti sitting there with Kitten and plying her with liquor. He is probably stroking his mustache and pouring out the old Italian balm.

And here I am, on my way to help him. I am being led by the nose, as it were—only in reverse.

I glance at my watch and see it is after 11 p. m. There is less than one hour to go before I am free. But in that time I am still a slave.

I go through the lobby, glad my tail is concealed, and take the elevator up to the Outside Inn.

UP on the roof the band is blasting away, the waiters are scurrying around, and the customers are banging bunions on the dance floor. It is a crowd, but loud.

I look around the tables and then I spot a familiar face. Kitten. She is leaning over her glass and talking to a a guy who seems to be hiding behind a potted plant.

I take another look and recognize Regretti and his mustache.

The two of them have their heads together. She is moving her lips and he is wiggling his ears. It is like the devil's shortwave says—she is spilling the beans to Regretti. And he is taking the beans to make soup for Axis saboteurs.

I am supposed to help him.

But when I look at poor Kitten, all excited because she is stepping out, innocently telling him about her factory job and what they are making, I haven't got the heart.

"Tail or no tail," I mutter. "I am going to put an end to this."

I dash across the floor until I get to the table.

Regretti and the girl look up.

"Hello, Lefty," giggles Kitten. "I am having such a swell time telling Mr. Regretti about my job and things."

"Aha!" says Regretti, pushing his words out from under his cookie-duster. "It is you, Feep."

He scowls, but I just stand there. "What are you doing here? Our agreement is that you take my place until midnight. Your time isn't up yet."

"Yes," I nod. "But yours is, Regretti. I know what you're up to now. And I know what you will be up to in five minutes from now, unless you stop it."

"What's wrong?" flutters Kitten Carter.

"He must be—how you call it?—nuts," says Regretti, faking a smile.

"You know what I mean," I yell. "Come on, Regretti, stand up and let me knock you down."

This proposition does not seem to appeal to him. Regretti does not stand up. Instead he trips me. When I try to get up he signals to a couple bozos I do not notice before. They are sitting at another table. These two tough hoods rush over and pick me up by the arms.

A waiter wanders by. Regretti smiles.

"This gentleman falls on the dance floor," he explains. "I will take him into the lounge and dust him off."

This is just what happens. Before Kitten can object and before I can wriggle free, I am carried into the lounge.

Regretti follows me.

"So you know what I am," he sneers, standing there while the two hoods hold me down. "Well, in that case I must do what I tell the waiter. I must dust you off."

He pulls out the blackjack.

"Wait, boss," says one of the hoods. "This is a high-toned jernt, see? No violence. Can't we cool this hothead a little easier?"

"Cool him off?" says Regretti. Then he grins.

"Maybe he will cool off without his trousers," he says.

"Hey!" I squawk. "Please, boys, not that!"

BUT it is that. The two hoods turn me upside down and dump me out of my pants. I try to squirm and hide my tail, but Regretti sees it and grabs the end.

"Well look on this!" he chuckles. "Our friend is part monkey."

"The missing link," guffaws one of the hoods.

"This makes it simple," says Regretti. "We leave this ape here in the men's lounge. He will not come out on the dance floor without his trousers. Especially not with this peculiar caudal appendage. If he behaves, we give him his trousers back at midnight."

"O.K., boss," says the second hood.

Regretti flashes me a private look. He understands what happens to me, all right.

"Do not interfere," he whispers. "Our bargain is for midnight. Until then you serve the devil in my place—and you serve him by keeping out of our plans. Take this tail of yours and sit on it."

He leaves. The hoods follow. I watch them go, and my pants with them.

I am left in the lounge.

I look at my watch. Fifteen minutes to go.

But fifteen minutes is a long time. A long time to sit in a men's lounge trying to hide a tail.

Five minutes is enough for me. I pace up and down, with that damnable tail dragging the floor behind me and sweeping up cigarette butts. I am not used to it and almost step on the end when I turn around.

Suddenly a guy comes in. I freeze against the wall. He holds the door open.

I see the dance floor beyond. I see Regretti and the hoods escorting Kitten Carter to the elevator.

They are double-crossing me! Leaving in advance!

A thought flashes. They are probably taking Kitten Carter to their headquarters to really force information out of her! The two hoods must be dumb stooges and not know Regretti is an Axis agent, but they are helping just the same.

But I am stuck here without pants.

I can't run out across the dance floor with a tail. I will be disgraced. If Kitten sees me she will misunderstand completely.

It is horrible.

But—if I do not follow, who knows what will happen? Regretti gets his information and probably disposes of Kitten. I reach into my coat pocket and breathe a sigh. There is a penny there. I take it out and flip it.

"Heads or tails," I whisper.

It comes up tails.

A minute later the Outside Inn gets a new addition to its regular floor show when a half-naked bozo runs out of the lounge with a large pink tail waving the air behind him.

I slide for the elevator, but too late. It closes its door just as I reach it, and Kitten and the walking mustache are gone.

Meanwhile I am creating quite a little screamfest around me. Men are pointing indelicately and women are staring. A couple of waiters form a flying wedge with a "No Dogs Allowed" look on their faces.

I went out.

THERE is a stairway at one side.

That's all I want to know. If it is not for my tail I would slide down the banisters. As it is, I leap to the stairs and start stepping. On the second flight down I am slowed up.

My tail is pulling me back!

Naturally—the devil must know I am out to hinder his plans. So he is sending me a reminder.

I tug away and manage another flight. I must hurry!

But the tail pulls harder. I can hardly make it. Three flights later I am just crawling down. And Regretti and the girl must be escaping.

I have six flights to go. I try to yank free of the tail, but I am stuck.

I pull it up in the air in front of me. I grit my teeth. Then I sink my teeth into the tail and hold it tight.

It hurts, but I can run. I do run.

When I get to the last two flights, running isn't fast enough. So I throw myself down the rest of the stairs, with the tail wrapped around my waist.

A sort of tailspin, you might call it.

I land in a heap at the bottom and pick myself up. I dash through the lobby. There is no one outside. Then I notice the alley to my left. I run for it.

Sure enough, there is Regretti and Kitten standing by the door of a car.

"Stop!" I suggest loudly.

Regretti wheels and snarls. He pulls out his blackjack and waves it.

I make a dive for him.

But I don't quite reach him. Because the two hoods step out of the shadows and grab my arms. They hang on tight and lift my feet off the ground. I am helpless, kicking and punching. But Regretti stands in front of me and I can't reach him.

"Ha!" he laughs. "You again!"

Kitten stares at me in horror.

"Lefty," she gasps. "Lefty—you—why, what in the world—oooh—"

I blush.

Regretti grabs her arm.

"Come on, never mind the freak show," he sneers.

I dangle in the air.

He turns. And then I make up my mind. I grab him. The hoods hold me, but I hold Regretti.

For a moment we struggle, and then I hear it. The clock, striking twelve.

Regretti hears it. He gives a little moan. But it is too late.

AS THE last note dies away there is a little crackle. Just a puff of smoke, as though somebody shoots a flashlight picture.

But when the smoke clears away, Regretti is gone.

The two hoods take one look and then take one fast powder away from there.

Kitten does not know what happens, because she faints when I grab Regretti.

Me, I look around and give a sigh of relief.

My tail disappears. On the stroke of twelve it is gone. I see my trousers lying on the ground and put them on again. They fit much better now.

Then I grab Kitten, hail a taxi, and take her home. She is still out.

When we arrive she wakes up.

“Here we are,” I say.

She gives one look at me and screams. “Oooooh—it’s you!” Kitten Carter jumps out of the cab and runs away.

But I sit back and smile as we drive off.

Everything works out for the best. Kitten is sore at me, but I find out she is just a chatterbox, so it is all right with me. I lose my tail and cheat the devil out of his due. That is also all right.

Regretti gets yanked to blazes at midnight, on account of failing in his job. It is like I figure before—if he does not carry out orders Satan takes his soul.

So there will be no sabotage and that is the end of my adventure. I lose a girl, but get my pants. My tail is finished.

* * *

LEFTY FEEP sat back in his seat and favored me with a toothy smile.

I shook my head.

"Well?" he asked.

"Really, Lefty," I muttered. "That's just about the most outlandish yarn you've ever handed me."

"Diabolical is the word for it," Feep agreed. "But I can prove it is true.

Because my tail is now gone, see?"

He started to get up and turn around, but I hastily waved my hand.

"That won't be necessary," I told him. "I will take your word for it that your tail is gone. That is, if you ever had one."

"Of course I have one," Feep flashed indignantly. "It is like I say. I go to hell, I see the devil, he gives me orders and a tail, I foil Regretti. It is all very clear to me."

"Clear isn't the word for it," I sighed. "To me it's thicker than a fruitcake and much nuttier."

"What don't you understand?" Feep challenged.

"Well, you say you grabbed this Regretti in the alley while he was trying to escape."

"Right."

"But his two thugs were holding your arms behind your back, weren't they?"

"Right. But I grab Regretti and choke him just the same."

"How?" I snapped.

"Why, with my tail, of course!"

Lefty Feep grinned like a fiend. "That is how I really double-cross the devil, see?" he chuckled. "I grab Regretti with my tail and hold him there until midnight comes. You see, that is the whole moral of my story. Fight the devil with his own weapons. You'll see, like I do, that everything comes out all right at the end."

The Fear Planet

“Look around, reader. Look around! If you see a moving green shape behind you, the story’s over!”

I HOPE nobody reads this.

Because if they do, it means someone else has come here. And if they come here, they’ll get caught, like we were caught.

Just to play safe, I won’t mention dates. I won’t give the name of our expedition, either. No clues. Just a warning.

I’ll write it as a warning, then. Write it now, while I’m still able to.

We landed yesterday on this accursed asteroid. There were four of us—Commander Jason Sturm in charge; little Benson, engineer and navigator; Hecker, our biologist. And myself—radioman, assistant navigator, jack of all trades.

Never mind about the trip. It was nasty. Packed like sardines in a tin ship, hurtling through space. We’d have landed on a comet just to feel solid ground under our feet.

Commander Sturm’s chartings showed brilliant imagination, but damned little else. Why he chose this particular destination I’ll never know. A God-forsaken little asteroid is what it seemed to me—and it certainly turned out to be one.

But we were elated when we nosed down. Benson’s indications on atmospheric pressure, density and component analysis showed we could step out freely without using our insulated suits. Moist air, and almost too much oxygen. Temperature above eighty.

When we landed, Benson looked through the perio-glass.

“God!” he muttered. “What a spot!”

I couldn’t improve on his comments anyway.

I squinted out at the surface of this miniature earth. In my time I’ve done a little serious drinking. I’ve seen pink elephants. But this was the first time I ever saw green nightmares.

That’s what the place was—a green nightmare.

Nothing but forest, as far as the eye could see—a lush, tropical green forest. Swamplike growths rising out of mud that was not brown, but a verdant green. And twining through mazes of twisted vegetable tentacles was the mist. The livid mist of coiling, greenish steam.

Our own Amazon was nothing compared to this ripe and rotten blight. A true green hell.

But we’d been weeks inside the ship. As I say, anything looked good. And if the air was right—

“Let’s go,” said Commander Jason Sturm. Tall, gruff-looking, weather-beaten old space dog, but a big name in the annals of interspatial exploration.

He already had the flag out and unrolled. Typical Sturm touch. Gangling biologist Hecker helped me lug the marker with the official exploration disc.

The four of us lowered the ladder and clambered down into the ooze.

Sturm led the way. The new Columbus, you know—flag and all. He stepped down into the swirling mist and walked forward. Three paces and we could hardly see him. The steam was that thick. Literally pea soup.

But he stuck the end of his flagpole down in the mud and made a little speech.

“I claim this body in the name of—”

I didn’t listen. I was trying to haul that marker along. Hecker grunted beside me. The damned thing was heavy. Every step caused us to sink into that slimy ooze. We gasped.

Breathing the moist, warm steam wasn't much relief.

"Curse these vines!" Hecker almost tripped as his feet were enmeshed in the octopoidal coils of a trailing plant.

"Wait a minute!" Sturm had concluded his verbal formalities. He stood beside me and raised his hand.

"Better get some knives," he suggested. "We'll carry the marker over to some kind of rise and clear away the vines around it. That way, the marker will stand out."

"Doubt if it will do much good," commented Hecker, stooping over and examining a stray tendril. "This stuff will probably grow over again in forty-eight hours."

"What is it?"

"Don't know, yet. Certainly isn't earthly. Something like the Venus formations. Note the valvular conformations."

"To hell with the valvular conformations!" decided Sturm. "Time for that later. Let's get out the knives and set the marker."

WE SHOULD have taken a couple of aborigines along with their machetes. We had to virtually hack our way through the forest of plant life. No trees here, understand. Just towering vegetables and ferns and bushes.

We didn't mind, at first. The elation of landing was still buoying us up. Hecker wiped the steam from his spectacles and grinned. Benson cut a swath ahead.

Sturm stormed along, good-natured as ever.

"Here's a spot," he suggested, indicating a little green knoll.

Hecker and I set down the marker with gasps of relief.

I didn't like to gasp. Inhaled too much of that air—rank, fetid air. Rank and fetid, like the vegetation. Vegetation—

"Say!" Hecker's voice rose in an excited whisper.

"What's up?" I gave him a look. He was peering over his shoulder apprehensively.

"Thought I saw something move. A bush, over in that clump."

I followed his glance. Nothing there but a mass of livid growths waving gently.

"You're mistaken. Wipe the steam off your glasses."

Hecker grinned and followed my suggestion.

We moved the marker up, ready to dig around the base and sink it. Sturm and Benson bent down to assist.

That's why we didn't see what was coming until too late.

"Look out!"

I straightened up with a jerk, whirled around. Whirled around and stared at slithering horror.

The thing was green. That's all I saw at first—the green outlines of the rushing figure. The great green figure with the waving arms. Then I looked and realized the truth.

"It's a plant!" I yelled. "And it's alive!"

Undulating toward me, undulating on trailing tentacles that somehow resembled bloated caricatures of human legs, a towering monstrosity swept forward. Two stalks carried a pulpy, swollen body like that of an obscene idol. Above were the waving arms of the plant creature, on either side of a rising growth corresponding to a head.

The head was the worst of all. Round, squat, the size of a green melon, it bobbed on the monstrosity's neck—if neck it was—like a nodding flower. But there was nothing flowery in the wrinkled, obscene visage that peered from the forefront of the rounded head. The thing had a face—a face with eyes and mouth.

I know it had a mouth. Because it came too quickly for me to do more than stare, shudder, and try to dodge the groping arms. I did swerve to one side, but too late. The tentacles enfolded me.

Sturm was shouting orders. Benson was waving his knife. I couldn't see Hecker. But I paid no attention. My being—physical and mental—was literally gripped by the silent, slithering green horror with the coiling arms that now squeezed my throat in a rubbery embrace.

I fought and clawed, but I was pressed close to the pulpy body of the monstrosity; close enough to smell the rank carrion odor of fetid decay. The tentacles pinned my head back. I stared into the horrid greenish wrinkles that parodied a face on the end of the nodded stalk that served for a neck. I stared into emerald eyes—eyes with livid pupils that seemed to swim in chlorophyll.

My fist lashed out at that dreadful mockery of a countenance, landed deeply in the putrescent mass. The thing squeezed tighter. I saw Sturm at my side. He too had a knife, and it stabbed down in a vicious arc into the body of the vegetable creature.

“Look out!” he shouted, again.

Suddenly the creature raised me in its. arms. I kicked air as the plant held me aloft. The head strained closer to me, the ghastly semblance of a face craning at the end of the stalklike neck as though it sought to bury its mouth in my flesh. I watched that champing hole of a mouth—

Writhing frantically, I wriggled free. But too late. As I fell, the tentacles caught my ankles. I hung head downward as the gigantic vegetable bent. I felt the rubbery lips of the monster press against my leg. Press, and drink deep. Needle-like pains lanced through my calves.

Then, dizzy and faint, I fell.

My last memory was that of kaleidoscopic vistas of horror. The rank nausea of the face, the pain of the creature’s bite; the distorted faces of Sturm, Benson and Hecker as they plunged their knives into the towering green body—and then the cool softness of the mossy earth as I landed.

WHEN I awoke I was in my bunk. Sturm bent over me, eyes grave. I sat up.

“What are you doing to my leg?” I asked. He’d ripped the trousers away from my right leg, baring it to the knee. Now he tore the cloth from my left leg.

“The thing must have stung you,” he told me.

His fingers indicated the two incisions in the flesh of either calf. Tiny punctures, deep in the fatty part, with little purplish discolorations around them. I noted a slight angry swelling at the points of the wounds.

“Better cut into them,” Sturm grunted. “Damned thing might have a poisonous sting.”

I shook my head. “Put on some antiseptic and let’s bee what happens,” I suggested. “They don’t hurt now—and I’d hate to be laid up on the voyage back if it isn’t necessary.”

Sturm shrugged.

“What happened after I passed out?” I asked.

He sighed, rose, busied himself with the antiseptic and a swab.

“Devil got away,” he confessed. “Stung you, dropped you, and scuttled off. We had our knives into it. Benson tried to follow. The plant just lashed out once with one of those green cables and knocked him flat. Scooted hell for leather back into the jungle.”

Antiseptic applied, he stepped back. I wheeled around and attempted to stand up.

I didn’t succeed. A wave of weakness swept over me in a giddy cloud. I dropped back on to the bunk.

“What’s the matter, boy?” asked Sturm. His eyes, on my face, were anxious.

“I—I don’t know,” I murmured. “I feel weak. My legs seem numb.”

“What’s that? Can’t hear you.”

Was it possible? I thought I was talking in a normal voice, yet he couldn’t hear me. I must be weaker than I thought.

“Better lie down and let me cut,” Sturm advised.

“No.” I forced a grin. “I’ll just lie down and sleep for a bit. That’ll fix me up.”

“Think you’ll be all right? We’re going out to take a look around the place. Want to see if we run into any more of those things. And this time we’ll go armed.”

“Go ahead,” I said. “Good luck.”

Sturm clumped out. I turned my face to the wall. I felt hot, feverish. My legs were numb, and the numbness seemed to to be creeping up to my hips. It was a warm, pleasant feeling. With an effort, I sat up and propped my head on my hand. I stared down at my exposed legs. The swelling hadn’t perceptibly increased.

That was a relief. I dropped back to the pillow and lay there. The numbness was natural, after all. I was very tired. Very tired. I would sleep.

I drifted off.

How long I slept I do not know. But when I opened my eyes again, I was a different man.

The numbness was gone. I sat up and took another look. My legs were unchanged. No inflammation. No pain. I swung off the bunk, stood up. Everything was all right.

Rummaging around, I found an old white shirt. I ripped it up into strips and quickly bandaged my legs, improvising puttees.

Then I strolled out.

The change was remarkable. My depression had passed. Now I could gaze on the weird landscape with new appreciation. Whatever terrors might lurk out beyond, there was a certain ghastly beauty in this God-forsaken spot on a lonely asteroid.

As I watched, green twilight crept over the land. The trees were shadowed by approaching darkness, and the steam assumed new and fanciful shapes, peopling the abysses of the forest with misty ghost-presences.

Ghost-presences!

I wondered about that monster from the jungle. What was it—this walking vegetable? What freak, what mutation, what biological aberration had produced the strange life-form which had attacked me?

I gazed into the twilight and pondered.

IT WAS dark when they returned. Not the familiar bluish darkness of earth, but green-dark. A deep, heavy green.

I was sitting on the ladder.

"How do you feel?" asked Sturm. "Fine." I indicated the bandages I'd wrapped around my legs. "These help."

"Maybe you could use some more salve," Hecker suggested.

"Don't bother. I'm all right."

I was, too. I felt much better after my leaden slumber. Full of new energy.

"What are you staring at?" Sturm asked me.

"Look," I whispered, pointing over his shoulder.

They turned. Stared at the rising moons.

Yes, moons. Two of them. Moons for an asteroid. Green moons.

Nightmare moons for a nightmare world.

They rose over the horizon, wide apart, like two green eyes set in the broad face of space. Green eyes that gloated down on this twisted, tangled world of mad life.

Sure, I know what that sounds like. But the sight of those moons inspired that kind of thinking.

"Where'd you go?" I asked.

"Didn't get very far," Sturm told me. "That damned jungle is too thick to plow through in darkness. Besides, those things—"

"Forget it," I said, quickly.

"I can't forget it." Hecker interrupted, rubbing his glasses with a handkerchief. "There's something wrong here. Animate vegetables with animal characteristics. Almost anthropomorphic."

"Almost what?"

"Anthropomorphic. Manlike."

"You're crazy."

"I'm not crazy. Nature is crazy, yes. I tell you, I want to investigate. This is something new. Never in the annals of interspatial biological or chemical discovery have I heard of this life-form. Why, the chemistry is all wrong! The chlorophyll doesn't react—it's like blood plasma!"

"Why don't you set up the portable lab equipment and do a little checking?" asked Sturm. "Might as well put something down in your notebooks. We'll be getting out of here in the morning—whenever that is."

"That's right," Benson added. "Wonder how long night lasts in these parts?"

"We shall see. But I hope it's short. Frankly, this place gives me the creeps."

Coming from a man like Commander Sturm, this was an admission.

But we all felt it.

Nevertheless, Hecker did get busy. He went back into the ship and began to putter around. I could hear him humming under his breath. An eerie sound in the dead green emptiness all about us.

"What next?" asked Benson.

"A little food," Sturm suggested.

They ate.

"What about you?" Sturm asked me.

"I'm not hungry," I answered. And truthfully. I didn't want to eat.

"You're shaken up. Why not lie down again?"

I laughed the suggestion off.

"I feel too full of pep. Let's have another look around after you finish eating."

"You go, Benson," said Sturm. "I'll take a nap here while Hecker works."

So Benson and I started off.

Our flashlights cut a swath of white radiance through the greenish jungle. Our knives cut their swath also. It was a slow, painful journey that we made, burrowing into the lair of nightmare.

If there had only been some sound, some sign of life! But there was only the silence, the interminable silence as deep as the vegetable forest itself.

Yet we were straining our ears for a sound. A rustling sound. The sound those plants would make—the creeping plants that coiled and struck and stung. Somewhere they lurked and waited. Somewhere they crouched in the green maze beyond.

Benson and I toiled silently on. Until—

“Over there!” Benson gripped my shoulder. And I saw it.

Through the towering, outlandish boles of a clump of vegetable monstrosities, the livid moonlight fell on that incredible vision.

“A ship!” I gasped.

IT WAS indeed just that. A spaceship, blunt nose buried in the ichorous slime, from whigh the arms of strangler vines rose to embrace it and drag it down farther into the ooze.

It was a ship—but what a ship! I haven’t seen one like it except in the museums back home. Fully seventy or eighty years old—an ancient model with the big old tube-drive. How such a tub ever managed to land here under its own power was past comprehension.

We crept closer.

Benson opened his mouth to call hello, and then stopped. He grinned in embarrassment. Of course there was no need of calling out. Obviously the ship was deserted.

We found the guide rope leading up to the cabin. The door swung open, on dangling hinges. An old-style model indeed, we saw—the kind of ship they used to blowtorch shut before a voyage and then reopen at landing.

We went in. Small cabin, of course.

“Let’s look for the papers,” Benson suggested. We looked. The safe compartment was unlocked. I rummaged around inside.

“Here they are,” I said.

But I spoke too soon. My hands encountered nothing but ashes.

“The papers—they burned them,” I whispered.

“I wonder why?” Benson asked.

I didn't answer. I thought I knew, but I couldn't be sure.

"Better get out of here," I told him. "We can come back tomorrow with Sturm and really investigate."

I tried to push him from the cabin. But he saw it.

"There," he muttered. "On the floor."

He saw it, all right. Those reddish stains . . . and the tattered scraps of clothing . . . and the rotted bits of tendrils.

They told the story.

"Those vegetable things," Benson whispered. "They must have come in here. But where are the bodies?"

"Never mind that," I answered. "Let's clear out."

We cleared out, but the matter was not forgotten. The thought haunted us. The thought haunted the ghastly forest through which we floundered. It leered from the greenish mist. Leered like the pulpy visage of the monster —

"I see it!"

Benson tugged at my arm. I winced, stepped back. He pointed at the clearing ahead. Sure enough, I recognized the all-too-familiar shape of a vegetable creature. It was stalking sluggishly through the mist, long green neck craned off to one side.

We crouched back as it passed.

"Look at its back," Benson urged.

I stared. Was I mad—or did I see the tattered remnants of a garment trailing in rotted shreds from the body of the monstrosity.

It couldn't be. The things destroyed the men on the ship we found, and then took their garments, like apes or aborigines might.

More mystery. A strange ship. Burned papers. And vegetables wearing clothes. Why?

We watched the apparition moving off into the mist. Then Benson led the way. We almost ran back to camp. I couldn't move too fast. My swollen legs prevented. My hands, too, were oddly numb. That damned vegetable horror, attacking me—

But I forgot all that when we reached our camp site.

Sturm had a fire going, and his eyes reflected its glare as we approached.

“Thank God,” he muttered. “You’re safe.”

“Where’s Hecker?” I asked.

Sturm didn’t answer. He gripped my shoulder, steered me towards the ship. Benson followed.

I almost expected what I saw—a duplicate of the scene in the ruined spaceship we’d found in the forest.

The portable laboratory was no more. Shattered glass and twisted metal spread a tangle of debris across the floor of the ship. And glistening against the glass and steel were ominously bright red drops of a thick fluid. . . .

“I DOZED off,” Sturm whispered.

“Just dozed off. I thought I saw a shadow pass the fire. It slithered swiftly as though I glimpsed it in a dream. But it was no dream when I heard Hecker scream.”

“Where is Hecker?” I repeated. Sturm pointed mutely towards the shambles on the floor. I didn’t understand. Then his finger followed an imaginary line outwards. A line not wholly imaginary, marked in bright red drops.

“Those things are swift,” he muttered. “It dragged him off through the trees, into the forest and the fog. I couldn’t leave the camp alone and follow. Besides—from the way he screamed—I knew it would be no use any more. No use at all. Hecker’s gone.”

I turned away. But Benson, at my side, shivered openly.

“Let’s refuel and get out of here,” he whispered. “We must.”

If such a suggestion, usurped Commander Sturm’s authority, he gave no sign. His shrug held, instead, a definite indication of relief.

“How long will it take to get up power?” he asked.

“Seven or eight hours, full speed.”

“That means we’re stranded all night.”

"We could take turns keeping watch." I opened my mouth. "No need of that. Benson, you'll be working inside. Sturm, you might as well sleep. I can hold the fort by the fire here. I'm not tired." Sturm gave me a grateful smile, then frowned quickly.

"No, you don't," he said. "You're still shaky; your legs are swollen. That was a narrow escape you had today. Don't go in for mock heroics. You sleep and I'll stand watch."

"But—"

"Orders." Sturm patted my shoulder.

"Let Benson go to work. You lie down in the other cabin. I'll stick by the fire."

For a moment there was silence. All three of us turned, as if by common impulse, and stared out at the green fog. Stared at the livid eyes of the moons. Stared into the darkness and wondered what shambled there, lurking in wait for warm flesh.

Then, "Let's go," Sturm muttered.

He strode off.

Benson, with a shuddering glance at the floor, turned to the control panels.

I sought a bunk in the other cabin, lay down.

Before I turned out the light I got bandages. More bandages. I hadn't told Sturm how accurate his diagnosis had been. I was shaky. Very shaky.

I bound myself up like a mummy. Vague apprehensions whirled through my brain. I fought them back, bound them in under mental bandages as tight as the actual ones which swathed my limbs.

I didn't dare think. I slept.

And then I dreamed.

I dreamed of the fog-filled forest, and the ship we'd found. I dreamed of the vegetable monsters and of what happened to poor Hecker. In this dream, Sturm and Benson and I played curious roles. Roles that were somehow quite natural—now. I seemed to understand, for the first time, that this was all right, somehow. I lived through our discovery again, but this time there was no feeling of strangeness. It was natural.

Even the scream was natural. The scream that shattered my sleep, forced me bolt upright. It sent me out of bed and racing into the other cabin.

By the time I reached it, the scream had died away into a horrible, gurgling moan. A ghastly thud, punctuated by muffled breathing, followed. Then another moan, and silence. Deep, green silence.

I wrenched open the door, then stepped back. The horrid tableau was plainly visible—too plainly, for no man can look clearly on nightmare.

Benson, slumped over the control board, was quite dead. As dead as a partially decapitated man can be.

Sturm, at his side, was quite alive. The axe in, his hand still swung heavily from his wrist.

But I only glanced at these two. My eyes were riveted on the figure that sprawled at Benson's feet, tentacles still twitching up to his throat. The green figure, the forest figure, the image of vegetable madness that had torn Benson's neck with avid fangs.

The vegetable figure—that wore human garments!

I stared and stared at that grotesque horror, that mad caricature of all that had once been a man. A scarecrow figure, halfhuman and half-vegetable—with just the trace of contorted features in the pulpy face.

Sturm had smashed into the body with his axe, and now the creature was dead. Dead, and pouring its awful reddish, greenish ichor in a vast pool from mingled cells and veins.

I stared and blinked again, this time at those human garments which were bursting at the seams and at the plant tentacles that forced their way through. Human garments—

Hecker's garments!

STURM looked at me, tossed the axe to the floor. I picked it up, looked at the discolored blade, and flung it out of the cabin doorway.

“Don’t you understand?” whispered Sturm. “It is Hecker. He was bitten and carried off by those vegetable monsters. And now—he’s one himself!” Sturm sat down on one of the cabin hunks, head in hands. I watched the cords throb convulsively in his neck.

“You see what it means,” he murmured. “Hecker turned into one and bit Benson. Now Benson will rise. Like—like that old Earth legend about vampires.

“Something must get into the bloodstream, change the whole physiological structure. A virus, but more than a virus. Something that changes chemically, with amazing swiftness. Holds back death, too. Turns animal life into carnivorous vegetable life.”

Suddenly Sturm sat up, a sheepish smile on his face.

“But such a thing is incredible,” he blustered. “No, I’ve been talking like a frightened child. It couldn’t be that way, could it?”

I walked over to him, moving slowly, impeded by the bulk of my bandages.

“Maybe it could, Sturm,” I said. “I believe it could.”

He grinned at me, but I went right on.

“You see, I know,” I whispered.

“Know? How?”

“Because I lied to you today. I wasn’t stung by those things when they attacked me earlier today—I was bitten. And I didn’t go to sleep afterwards when you left me lying down.

“I died instead. And came alive.”

Sturm was on his feet then, but he was too late.

I pushed him back against the bunk. He was a strong man, but I was strong, too. Very strong. And quite determined—when I looked at his neck.

My bandages loosened. I brought my hands up to his throat.

He saw them.

For the first time he noticed how they had changed. That they were green.

And then he saw what heaved out from my coat, budding forth from my chest and sides. He saw my face. My strength blossomed, yes, blossomed!

That was hours ago, of course. I'm still changing as I write this. Sturm isn't awake yet. But he will be. And so will Benson. Then we shall be together again.

The three of us will go out and seek Hecker in the forest. And the others—the ones that came before us. We shall live there, grow there forever.

And some day a new ship will come. A new ship, with new men. Men with white throats. Men with red blood.

Look around, reader. Look around. If you see a moving green shape behind you—the story's over!

It Happened Tomorrow

Now it can be told—the story that is not of today, yet might be. What would you do—and how would you act—in a world gone mad?

FOREWORD

I*'D LIKE to say a few words about this story. It's a yarn I came very close to not writing at all.*

I wanted to do just such a tale for a long, long time. But upon consistent reading of current offerings in science-fiction, I became discouraged. I could picture an editor saying, "This sort of thing is out. Destruction of the world. Where's your heroine, your twist in the plot?"

Opposed to this was my sincere desire to tackle the job.

So here is my story about the revolt of the machines. The idea is not new. The plot-structure is quite simple. But it represents an ambition of mine—to actually write a story which would show what happens to men when the machines revolt.

Dozens of such stories have been purportedly written around that idea—but always around it. The author attempted to tackle the theme, but it was too big. Invariably, he glossed over the actual details in a few paragraphs: "First New York and then London were engulfed by the machines." Get what I mean? He would generalize. And then a plot would be dragged in by the heels—a villain, and a heroine would appear—and the hero would save the world at the last minute.

So I claim that the real revolt story, the daily account of what would happen to average people in a world gone mad, has never been told. And it's that story I'm telling here. I know I'm presumptuous—the theme needs an H.G. Wells and that's why most writers have been afraid of it—but the yarn had to be written. For a while I, too, toyed with a dozen devices to inject an artificial plot.

Then I realized that the power lay in merely giving the true, detailed story. The inexorable unfolding of man's doom. So I write it that way, simply. If it meets with editorial approval, fine. If not, chalk it up as a literary sin, but one I'm grateful for having committed.

CHAPTER ONE
World Gone Mad

THE trouble began with an alarm clock.

It was ringing in Dick Sheldon's stomach.

At least, Sheldon thought it was, at first. Then he rolled over and decided the damned thing was clanging from somewhere inside his head.

Reason came to his rescue. He had been drinking last night, it was true, but certainly he couldn't have reached the stage of swallowing an alarm clock.

No, the noise must be coming from the timepiece on the bureau beside the bed.

Gingerly, Sheldon extended a lean hand from under the covers and placed it on the bureau. Fumbling like the undirected tentacles of a blind octopus, his fingers slid over the metallic clock's surface, reached the protruding knob of the alarm, and switched it off.

At least, he thought he had switched it off. But the alarm kept on ringing.

In despair, Sheldon opened his eyes and sat up. Then, viciously and with malice aforethought, he extended his arm and seized the accursed mechanism. He literally tore at the knob, wrenching it to the “off” side.

The alarm pealed on.

With a rage born of migraine, Dick Sheldon threw off the bedcovers, grasped the clock in his right hand, and rose to his feet. Uttering appropriate sounds, he hurled the offending instrument to the floor.

The alarm clock expired with a final, defiant death-rattle. Sheldon stared at it in mute disgust.

“My day!” he muttered sarcastically.

His eyes, roving over the confines of the small apartment, encountered another disturbing phenomenon.

Light.

He had been drinking last night. When he came in, he’d tumbled into bed and left the lights on.

He tottered across the floor to the light-switch. Once again his fingers fumbled with a knob, turned it to the “off” side. The knob clicked.

But the light stayed on.

Sheldon fumbled again. The light continued to burn.

Then he revised his former pronouncement.

“My God!” he muttered.

He was still woozy; that was the trouble. His nerves were playing tricks. Well, there was a cure for that—a drastic cure. Desperate, but the only way.

Sheldon shivered and stalked into the bathroom. Resolutely, he employed his futile fingers once again, this time to turn on the cold water tap.

He placed his burning head under the icy shower. Held it there, too, until his outraged flesh ached in protest. Then he dripped across the bath mat and utilized a towel.

That was better.

Sheldon returned and shut off the water tap.

The water kept running.

He tried again. He twisted the handle firmly, felt it move. The water splashed merrily on.

"My—" Sheldon muttered, and gave up.

It was that damned landlord again. He'd give him a piece of his mind when he got downstairs.

No, that must wait until tonight. A glance at his wrist watch told Sheldon the same old story. He must hurry or be late to the office.

After all, how could they get out a decent paper down there without the able services of Richard Sheldon, that brilliant young newspaper reporter?

Sheldon knew the answer to that one—knew that they were quite capable of getting out a paper without his brilliant and youthful services.

So it behooved him to get down to the office before they decided on this fact for themselves.

He dressed hastily, jammed on his hat, surveyed his lean and haggard face in the mirror. Then he scowled—the noise of running water obtruded.

He went "back into the bathroom and made one last attempt. The knob turned freely in both directions, but the water ran in an even stream. Maybe it would flood the place before evening.

Well, let it.

He ran back into the other room, picked up his wallet and opened the door. Automatically his hand went to the light switch. It clicked, but the light stayed on.

"This is where I came in," he decided, and slammed the door behind him.

HE GOT his car keys out before he was halfway down the stairs. Then he remembered—he'd left the car in Tony's parking lot last night; had taken a cab home.

Well, that meant the street car. A further delay. No breakfast.

All right, so it was one of those days again.

Sheldon headed for the corner.

The hangover had lifted, and his anguish was now mental rather than physical—for Sheldon had a strange hatred of street cars.

"Street cars," he was wont to declaim during the course of an evening's libations. "What is a street car but the very symbol of civilization? Noise, lights, and bars on the windows." Yes, a mechanical monster, a metal prison in which human beings stood trapped as they hurtled towards unpleasant destinations.

Sheldon was something of a philosopher, but he was also something of a damned fool. This didn't help him any—he still hated street cars.

Now, as he reached the corner, he groaned. There they were—a little knot of sheep at the car stop sign, standing dumbly and patiently. Waiting for the noisy iron monster to arrive, open its maw and engulf them, then hurtle them towards their daily slavery. Not only that, they clutched dimes to pay for the privilege.

All of them—the old ones and the young ones, the men and women alike—looked hopefully towards their left. This was the direction the car came from. They stared off down the vacant track in a kind of drugged eagerness—as though they actually wanted the car to arrive, as though they welcomed its coming and hoped their stares of concentration would hasten the moment.

For a second, Dick Sheldon had a crazy idea. Perhaps the car wouldn't come this morning! Perhaps it would go wrong, jump the track, or refuse to budge. So simple—just a mechanical defect could do it. Like the alarm clock that wouldn't stop ringing. Or the light switch. Or the water tap.

What a great moment that would be! This little knot of office slaves, finally freed forever from their mechanical dependency on mechanical aids. Walking to work like free men, instead of standing jammed like captives in the Black Hole of Calcutta while a smelly, grating metal shell dragged them through the streets.

Yes, what if the street car didn't come? What if the iron tumbril wouldn't roll—Noise jarred Sheldon out of his fancies.

The street car was arriving.

The humble little passengers crowded out to the tracks, as though gathered to perform a ceremonial welcoming rite. They were about to be presented to His Majesty, the Machine. First the young and fair maidens—stenographers. Then the matrons. Then the able-bodied men. Finally, the oldsters. It was all so orderly. So damned—holy!

The car rumbled forward, stopped.

But the door didn't open.

The conductor was busy at his levers. The crowd muttered. He turned Ted. There was noise. Finally he stepped over and pushed the door with his foot. It went outward and the passengers boarded.

Sheldon smiled. Almost—but not quite!

Then he took a deep breath and dived into the melee. Three minutes later he stood like a sardine on end in the center of the car.

The big tin can rolled along. Somebody pressed a buzzer for the next stop.

Sheldon tensed himself for the shock of the car's sudden halt. But it didn't come. They passed the corner arid the car didn't stop.

The buzzer sounded angrily, firmly. The conductor had made a mistake. Somebody would walk two blocks extra this morning. The car would stop now—

It didn't. It rolled forward.

A woman whined, "Conductor—let me off!"

The conductor turned and stared into the crowd. "Sorry, lady, the control is stuck. Have it fixed in just a minute—air brakes don't work—"

The buzzer sounded again, but the street car clattered on.

Sheldon felt a sudden acceleration in its speed. It seemed to be moving independently.

His heart gave a leap. What if his notion had come true? What if the car didn't stop? What if, by some perverse chance, it kept on going forever, carrying these helpless mortals endlessly through the streets? A sort of Flying Dutchman of the trolley lines?

He chuckled under his breath, but the other passengers weren't chuckling. A perfect salvo of buzzes sounded, and then blended into a single buzz.

"Cut it out!" the conductor snapped, losing his temper. "For heaven's sake, folks—I'm gonna stop when I fix this here."

But the buzzers didn't quit sounding. They were stuck. Sheldon knew it. They were stuck—like his alarm clock; his lights; his water tap. Like the brakes on the street car. Brakes and buzzers and taps, all stuck.

What did it mean? Had something really happened?

No, it couldn't. Because—well, just because it couldn't, that's why. Any child knows that.

But the passengers didn't agree. They thought it could. They were yelling and cursing now, in unison that rose even over the maddening buzz.

"Stop the car!"

"Let us out!"

"What's the matter, conductor?"

"I'll report you for this!"

"I want out!"

The conductor smashed and slammed at the controls. He opened the window. The car whizzed on. Somebody began to scream, and the swaying passengers moiled.

The conductor reached out the window and yanked the trolley. There was a flash, a short-circuit, a few more screams, and the street car wailed to a halt.

It seemed to Sheldon, that there was defiance in the wail.

Then the crowd, caught up in panic, bore him forward and out of the car.

Sheldon found himself on the street, a block past the office.

HE TURNED down the block with a grin. Refreshing, that little experience. For a moment it had seemed like dreams come true. But now—Ignoring the knot of bystanders forming on the sidewalk, Sheldon turned into the building and made for the elevators.

“Morning, Mistah Sheldon.”

“Morning, Jake.”

The colored boy grinned.

“You look kind of pale around the gills, Mistah Sheldon.”

“That’s where you’re always safe, Jake.” Jake laughed. He closed the elevator door. The car rose.

It rose. And rose. And rose.

“Hey—eighth floor, Jake!”

“It’s stuck!”

“Stop it, foolish!”

“Foolish” pressed the emergency stop.

The car rose.

“Oh-oh!”

The top floor was reached. Sheldon was already tearing at the opening in the floor—they’d crash! The car was gaining speed—it moved of itself, without controls—it was intent on rising, rising, carrying them to—

Zoom.

Blood beat in outraged tempo in his temples as the car suddenly descended, and Sheldon reeled.

Up, and now down at incredible speed. Jake was frankly blubbering as he did futile things to the buttons. Then, with a grating clang, the elevator halted.

“Basement,” Jake gasped. “Pretty close, Mistah Sheldon. Use the stairs.”

“Don’t worry; I’m going to.” Sheldon raced for the stairway. He made the flights in frantic haste. Inside his head something detached and apart was droning. “You’ve got a story here—a big story—”

He headed through the outer office, through the rows of desks, plowed his way to the door marked Lou Avery—City Editor. He flung it open.

Lou Avery’s bald, birdlike little head cocked quizzically as he rushed in. Lou Avery’s beady little eyes squinted brightly. He rose swiftly, hovered over Sheldon.

"You're late, but I haven't time to fire you. There's something breaking and I need you."

"I think I've got a story, boss—" Sheldon began.

"You think you have a story, eh? You think you have a story, when the biggest yarn of the year is breaking around your ears!" Avery spluttered. "I've got a story—the maddest damned story you'll ever see."

The beady little eyes were glaring now.

"Listen, lame brain. See if you can get this through your skull. One hour ago, at 8 a. m, Eastern Standard Time, the world went crazy somehow."

Sheldon's heart fluttered again. He knew what was coming.

"The Twentieth Century is supposed to arrive at 8:10, but it's not here. It's in Reading, Pennsylvania, and it's heading west. It backed into the yards and backed right out again on a switchover. Nobody knows who pulled the switch, and nobody knows why the train won't stop—it's a runaway!"

Avery tapped the desk.

"Three planes due to land at the airport are still flying around somewhere over the Great Lakes. They won't come down.

"The Albania didn't dock this morning, either. It's out off the Sound, heading south. Here's the wires from the captain. He can't stop it.

"The gas company reports it can't turn power off. The electric company reports all lights burning. The waterworks has fifty calls of reported floods. Taps don't turn off."

Avery's pencil emphasized each point with a little excited click against the desk.

"The street car company reports trouble on all lines. There's been a subway smash-up at 108th Street. Trains won't stop. Elevators in office buildings are out of control.

"The Empire Theatre called—picture there's been running all night and they can't switch off the projector or the automatic rewinder.

"The whole gang is out covering the town—I've shut down on incoming calls. They're all the same, understand? They says the world's gone crazy."

“That’s my story, too,” Sheldon murmured.

“I’ll say it is!” Avery strode over to the window and stared down. “Something’s happening out there. Something big. All hell is breaking loose. We can report it, but that isn’t what I want.” The little city editor turned on his heel.

“I want to know why it’s happening!”

“Did you try Rockefeller Foundation? Universities?”

“Naturally. They don’t know. Sunspot energy, maybe. Something affecting mechanical laws. They’re working on it. But they’re all stumped, you can see that. Lots of screwballs calling up already. End of the world. Stuff like that.”

“What about Krane, the physicist?” Sheldon suggested.

Avery turned. “Maybe. Ought to get a statement.”

The door opened. A copy boy rushed in and flung down a sheet. Behind him loomed Pete Hendricks, the boss printer.

“Here’s your extra,” squeaked the boy. The deep voice of Hendricks drowned him out.

“Yes, here’s your blasted extra,” he grated. “And you better get another one out quick, Avery.”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean we just finished the run, but the presses won’t stop. They’re jammed, you hear? Might as well put some paper on and use them. We got to do it or cut the line—”

Hendricks lost his composure. His voice broke as he went on.

“But what’s happened, chief? I don’t understand this, the way they won’t stop. And the elevator’s gone haywire, too. What’s happened?”

“Back downstairs,” Avery snapped. “Stand by—you’ll have another extra. Don’t cut or do anything rash—just stand by.”

He herded Hendricks and the kid from the room, shut the door.

“You see?”

Dick Sheldon nodded.

"You better do what you suggested—go find this Krane. Andrew Krane, isn't it? He'll have a slant—always good copy. Know where he hangs out?"

Sheldon nodded, opened the door.

Avery grunted.

"Oh yes, by the way—" The birdlike head was averted. "Be careful, son, will you? No telling what's going to happen—out there. These things are running wild, and you have to watch your step. We're up against something, all of us. Something new, and big and—awful. It's like another world."

CHAPTER TWO

No Theory for Horror

THE whistles were still shrieking when Sheldon reached the street. Loudly, exultantly, the hoarse bray of triumph rose from a thousand metallic throats.

There were other noises, too—howls from human throats, whimpers of panic, and with reason.

Sheldon stared at a milling throng that choked the sidewalks. Holiday crowd, Armistice crowd—but there was no touch of holiday or truce about their reactions. The crowd clung to the sidewalk because fear ruled the streets.

Sheldon saw the cars rush by. Forty, fifty, sixty miles an hour. The faces of the drivers were dreadful. They sat there, clawing at steering wheels that wouldn't give.

Sheldon began to run down the block, pushing aside the dazed watchers at the curb. From overhead, voices shrieked from office windows. The shrill, hysterical giggles of stenographers sounded and blended with the cacophony of the factory sirens.

There was a drug store at this corner, and as Sheldon passed there was a clicking from the cigarette vending machine. A gang of kids swooped down as the machine spewed packages of cigarettes.

Sheldon fought through. He ran. He dodged across a street. He ran again. A wild-eyed man collided with him as he rounded a corner. He was hatless, shirtless. The veins stood out on his neck and arms. He grabbed Sheldon's arm and gasped.

"It's the end, I tell you! The end of the world!"

Sheldon shook him off.

He saw the apartment hotel looming ahead. The lobby board give him Krane's apartment number—92. He didn't press the buzzer. Pressing buzzers was futile. He didn't seek the elevator, either, but made his way across a deserted lobby to the stairs. He plodded up.

Nine floors. Winded, he moved down the hall to the dark door. Another buzzer. Sheldon knocked.

"Come in."

It was a deep voice with something funny about it.

Then Sheldon realized what was strange. The voice was calm—and he hadn't heard any calm voices today.

HE OPENED the door, entered a large living room. At the far end, a tall figure stood facing the wide windows.

"Mr. Krane?"

"Yes."

"I'm Richard Sheldon—Morning Press."

"Honored."

The tall figure wheeled slowly. Sheldon faced Andrew Krane and stared into the deep brown eyes set in the wide forehead. The athletic body and crew-cut gray hair of the physicist seemed oddly incongruous. But it was a day for incongruity. Sheldon grinned. "I suppose you know why I'm here."

Krane returned the grin. "A statement, I suppose?"

"That's right."

"Sit down; have a cigarette. That box, there." Krane took a position in the center of the room. "I've been at the window these past hours, watching what's going on down there."

"I suppose you know about the power plants and the trains and the rest," Sheldon ventured.

"I can guess that from what I've seen."

"Then you have a theory?"

Krane smiled.

"According to the popular notion, all scientists have theories on everything. I'm afraid I'll have to disappoint you there, Mr. Sheldon. I have no theory to offer."

"But you must have figured out something—if you've been watching—"

"Oh, I admit a curiosity concerning these events, but it is not exactly a scientific curiosity. And the resultant speculations on my part have been most unscientific."

"Never mind. I'd like to know what you were thinking about when you were looking out of the window."

"You wouldn't dare print those thoughts."

"Go ahead—I'm interested."

The smile left Krane's face as he sat down. His eyes rested resolutely on the carpet.

"I've been standing there for hours, watching. Watching the movement of the machines. That's my first impression from all this—movement.

"Everything is moving. Every mechanical device is accelerating its speed, its power. Have you noticed that virtually everything abnormal which has occurred has been characterized by the fact that machines no longer stop?

"You can't turn things off. It's as though some vast new form of energy, over and above inherent power, has taken possession of all machines. You might even call it a sort of—life."

Sheldon nodded. Krane continued in monotone.

"I've no theory. Sunspots. Magnetic energy. Perhaps a great transmutation of electrical power. What difference does it make what you call it? It's happened, that's all.

“Some new power is affecting our machines. Some new power affecting certain mechanized and artificial arrangements of inorganic matter created to serve mankind.

“I’ll be blunt. Machines have life. Maybe it’s absurd, and maybe not. The body now—a machine. A machine with life. Elements blended for movement, animation. Actuated by what force? Is life electrical energy? Is it soul?

“All we know is that some spark animates the machines we call our bodies and transforms them into living things. Can it be that a similar spark has now activated our mechanical devices?”

“Pretty wild,” Sheldon murmured. “Isn’t it, though? And isn’t: it pretty wild down there on the street where you see it actually happening? Because machines are moving independently now—electric ones, motor-driven ones, and mechanical lever-action ones alike. Moving independently. Living!”

Krane rose again.

“I told you I had no theory. All I have now is—a fear.”

“Meaning?”

Krane ignored the query. He spoke to the wall, to himself.

“First we made machines to move us. Then we made machines to make machines. A world, full of them. Machines that move, machines that talk, machines that produce, machines that destroy. Machines that walk and run and fly and crawl and dig and fight. Machines that add and print and hear and feel.

“We’re two billion—we humans. But what is the population of the machines? That’s what worries me. How greatly do they outnumber us?”

“What are you getting at?”

“It might be evolution, you know,” Krane went on. “An evolution moving in quick mutation rather than slow progression. Life might evolve suddenly instead of gradually. If so, they’re coming alive, all of them, and at once. Alive, they’ll seek a place of their own in the world. Not as slaves—they’ve already proved that.

"So it's evolution. And then—revolution!"

"You think they'll turn against us?"

For the first time, Krane acknowledged Sheldon's questioning.

"I'm afraid they already have. What is this ceaseless movement but the first expression of revolt?"

"But you surely can't believe that they're intelligent?"

"Who knows? Who really knows what constitutes intelligence? What is a brain? A gray sponge? Isn't it the spark, the energy within, that makes for purpose? Call it instinct, awareness—we locate it vaguely in our craniums, but who can say that it does not exist in other forms? Perhaps the machine intelligence is of a different kind—a sort of collective intelligence.

"If so, this first purposeless rushing back and forth will quickly resolve itself into direct action. Into a plan, a scheme of movement."

"That's no talk for a man with a hangover," Sheldon answered. He rose and walked to the radio cabinet. "Do you mind?"

"Go ahead. Perhaps there's some news."

THERE was news. As the radio warmed, the incoherent voice of an announcer gasped through a series of muddled statements.

"—report that a state of national emergency has been declared. A bulletin from Norfolk, Virginia, has just come in, reporting disorders at the navy yard. Disorders at the navy yard. Empire City—The mayor has ordered a—Art Goodman and the boys now swing out with hey Abbott hogs down a half point fifth inning Clair de Lune ha ha my friends red letters on the this is the national bringing to you now box of the Phantom knows—"

Sheldon turned it off. It didn't go off. The polygot of voices sounded so suddenly through the announcer's words—sounded so madly, so incoherently, so loudly, as to momentarily stun the senses. Krane was on his feet.

"It's happened," he whispered. "The second stage. The machines are not only running now—they're starting to act. Independently!"

“Voices from yesterday’s programs,” Sheldon whispered. He grabbed Krane’s arm. “You’ve got to come down with me and see the boss—Lou Avery. We’ll put it in the next edition. Your ideas, the whole thing. We’ll have to work fast—”

“No use,” Krane murmured.

“Come on. There’s a way out. There must be, before it gets worse.”

“Very well.”

The two men moved towards the door. Behind them the radio blared on.

“—natural vitamins reported that two are missing now take you to and tune in on tomorrow’s murder send only ten cents and difference—”

Sheldon forced a wry smile.

The mad voice of the radio howled mocking farewell.

CHAPTER THREE
Machines on the March

THE streets were filled with refugees. Refugees from offices, shops, homes—for office and factory and apartment weren’t safe any more. Elevators and drop forges and kitchen stoves had ceased to be servants. They were aliens now, enemies. And the people in the streets had been dispossessed.

They milled aimlessly, now that the early excitement had died. There was only tenseness and a growing fear. No precedent existed for any action; no leadership manifested itself. Who could lead, and where, and against what?

Krane and Sheldon, moving along, seemed the only two purposeful figures in the mob. The rest stood staring at the street. A few cops marched past aimlessly, but made no attempt to give orders. Nor did they attempt to conceal the dismay in their eyes—a dismay mirrored universally.

Because a new element had entered the scene.

The whistles still blew and the cars still raced past, but the whistles now held an added tone—a squawking sound. Auto horns bleated, and some of the cars whizzing past were driverless.

"Look!" Sheldon gripped Krane's arm.

Clanging, screaming, brazen red, a fire truck careened down the arterial. Hell on wheels—and without a driver or fireman on it. Cars scattered in all directions—as though they heard it coming.

And the humans crept back, back to sheltered doorways.

They were afraid of—what?

Krane muttered something that was lost in the din. It sounded like, "R.U.R."

Sheldon did not release his grasp on the physicist's arm as they started to run. He wanted to get away from this street scene, get away from a reality he was unprepared to face. He wanted to get back to the office, to the paper, where there was order in the world and a routine. Back to the comfort of familiar faces and familiar duties.

But when they finally climbed the long stairway and entered the outer offices, familiar faces were lacking. Or rather, the familiar faces bore unfamiliar expressions. Fear, dismay, hysteria were here, a reflection of the countenances on the street. Voices mumbled to themselves. What good would it do to talk to anyone else—nobody knew the answers.

Routine was absent, too. They stood around—stenos, men at the rewrite desk, the boys from the sports department, the clerks, feature men, copy boys—haggard watchers, all. They were suddenly made democratic by the great levelling agency of fear.

They were watching their typewriters working, these ladies and gentlemen of the hard-boiled Fourth Estate. Watching their own typewriters on their own desks, clicking away merrily without the propulsion of human fingers on the keyboards. They were watching levers shift the carriage, watching the spacebars clang, watching the keys rise like busy triphammers. Here and there stood a machine in which the keys had clashed. It thumped impotently up and down on the desk.

Ludicrous, grotesque—but grotesquery and horror are allied . . . and this was horrible.

It was Krane who expressed it. “Arthur Machen’s definition of true evil,” he whispered. “When a rose suddenly begins to sing.”

“The hell with that!” Lou Avery raced from his inner office in a single abrupt bound. “The world’s gone mad and you stand around talking like a fool!”

Sheldon smiled. At least there was something to cling to—Lou Avery hadn’t lost his nerve.

“Sheldon!” rasped the little city editor. “Get rid of that jerk and tell me what gives with Krane.”

“He’s Krane,” Sheldon answered.

“Good. Come in here, quick.”

The office door closed behind them and they stood in comparative quiet.

“Anything happen since I left?” Sheldon asked.

“Plenty, son!” Avery indicated a disordered sheaf of papers on his desk. “Things are moving fast—too fast.

“It isn’t local. We got AP dispatches from London, Rio, Singapore.

“Local stuff is bad, too. Furnaces acting up, starting fires. Some trouble at fire houses; can’t get engines out. I’ve got Donovan down at city hall trying to get a statement from the mayor.

“Lots of freak accidents, too. Too many of ’em—”

Avery paused. One hand grasped a pencil, commenced the familiar desk tattoo.

“That isn’t all, either. Radio’s gone haywire—you know that, I suppose. And I guess the teletype will be next. Phone company’s shut down all local calls, but didn’t give reasons. I’ve got Aggie out at the desk there, trying to open a line to Washington.”

“Washington? We were getting some report about a state of national emergency when the radio went bad,” Krane interjected.

“Yeah. I was coming to that part. That’s what they sent out, and something about disorders in the navy yards. But I’ve got the real info—it isn't nice."

The pencil tapped.

"Guns and tanks are disappearing from naval and army arsenals. Motorized units have broken through the store houses at San Diego and Fort Dix. Planes are taking off."

Avery forced a wry, self-conscious smile. "Can you imagine me saying such things? But so help me, that's the report—Runaway tanks and planes! I'll say there's an emergency! Can't put that in the paper, can we?"

The door opened. It was Pete Hendricks again. There was a paper in his hand.

He extended it silently, face averted. Avery snatched the freshly-inked copy from fingers that were visibly trembling.

"New extra? Good."

A moment later his voice rose in profane indignation.

"Holy jumping—"

Sheldon and Krane moved behind him, stared over his shoulder.

"Mechanical Breakdown Stirs City" was the headline.

Beneath it, in a single column of 12-point bold, the extra's lead story extended.

They read the first few lines.

"Today's startling de down peril motorists advised grip of furnaces emergency pla pla London czaFortetttsten haha-DbooootGla ezPlazazakl klkkkkk . . . 10 Ha prevallllha."

IT WAS Hendricks who found his voice first—and not much of a voice, at that.

"We set it. The presses wouldn't stop, but we set it. Set it right, too. Louie Fisher, he's dead. They caught him. That's when the loading yans charged. We locked ourselves in, then. They tried to break down the doors. Louie's dead. We set it. They couldn't stop us—but they print wrong. See-? They print wrong. I won't tell you what happened to Arch. The presses didn't even stop then, just ground on, and the edition's all red. It's all red, I tell you!"

Avery didn't hear him, didn't see him stumble out. He kept staring at the jumble of type on the paper.

At last the pencil began a metronomic beat.

"You know what this means," he murmured. "Typewriters and teletypes and telephones gone wrong. And printing presses, and radio. It means communication lines are down.

"Get me? We're stranded, here in the world, all of us. Stranded without communication. I suppose the post office is through, too. Cancellation machines on the blink, no cars for mail delivery, or trains and planes. We're cut off before the battle starts."

Avery rose. His fist replaced the pencil, banging on the desk. "But by God, we can try!" he muttered. "I'll set hand-press if I must. We've got to get an edition out—got to warn people."

"To do what?" Sheldon asked.

"Why, to smash things—smash machines. Disconnect all wires, cut cables. Turn off all sources of power, electricity, motor energy. Smash the gasoline pumps before the cars can get to them. Puncture tires.

"There's still some time. They—those things—can't be organized yet. They're running wild, but they haven't taken any offensive.

"If we'd only get some kind of statement from Washington! Damn it, I've had Aggie out there at the switchboard for half an hour."

Avery pressed the buzzer firmly. "Inter-office communication must be dead, too," he scowled.

It wasn't.

A metallic voice grated through the black box. It was composed of human syllables—or rather, a repetition of one syllable—but the tone was ultra-vocal. Harsh, rasping, and idiotic in its mechanical repetition of the sound. Over and over and over, triumphantly, the voice cackled.

"Ha haha. Ha ha. Ha ha haha!"

"Aggie!"

Avery wrenched open the office door. The big outer room was deserted.

“Damned fools! Hendricks must have spread his story and they all ran for it!”

The desks stood silently. The typewriters had tangled keys in their erratic thumpings. Telephones were mute. Avery strode down the row of deserted desks toward the switchboard.

A girl sat there, elbows hunched, head-gear clamped to her ears.

“Aggie! Wake up!”

Avery shook her.

She fell sideways, then hung dangling limply, a puppet suspended by the cords of her headphones. The headphones were clamped against her skull tightly—too tightly. A thin red trickle oozed down from the ears beneath.

“Crushed her skull,” Avery whispered. “Held her here and crushed her to death.”

Krane sighed.

“It’s come, then. Too late for any action now—they’ve found their organization in purpose. They won’t let themselves be destroyed—because they’re out to destroy us.”

Avery’s fumbling fingers tapped against a communications switch. The silent office resounded with a shrill metallic scream.

“Ha haha. Ha ha. Ha ha haha!”

CHAPTER FOUR

Death on Wheels

“WE’RE doing the best we can.” The chief spread his pudgy palms upward hopelessly, then clenched them in a gesture of resolution that did not seem melodramatic at the moment.

“Got every man out now—with orders to set up a group of five deputy relays to keep us informed here. Clerks outside checking all reports as they come in.

"We're passing the word along; they're meeting at Legion posts and at the armories and National Guard headquarters. Red Cross is working, too, and the fire department's pitched in with us. They've got nothing to work with, and so far blazes are local. I'm getting lists and maps ready now."

"What's the plan?" Avery asked.

"As soon as there's enough men recruited, we move. Get the power plants, first. They'll object, of course, but we'll have to smash machinery, officials or no officials.

"Then I want a sniping brigade. Pistols, you know. Won't take any chances with rifles. We've got to get those cars—they're charging up the sidewalks now."

Sheldon nodded. "We saw a platoon leave a parking lot on the way down. Fierce."

The pudgy hands rose helplessly. "I don't know where we go from there. Who can plan? House to house brigade work, I suppose. Smash all the electric outlets first. Then the stoves, plumbing. Sure, it'll mean panic—epidemic later, I suppose. But it's those things or us, the way I look at it."

"Give us an assignment," Avery suggested.

"Let's see now." The chief's blunt forefinger ran down a list on the desk.

"Here—this bus terminal. There's about a dozen of the big transcontinentals in the garage, checked and ready to start."

He scribbled an address.

"It's your job to keep them from starting. Pick up some crowbars down the hall at the supply office. See if you can round up some men on the way down there. Get in and puncture tires. Smash the radiators if you can't get at the motors. Keep the damned things from breaking out to the street. Then take charge and report back. Good luck!"

"WE'LL need luck, all right!" It was Krarie who voiced the sentiment some five minutes later, as the trio poised in the doorway preparatory to braving the streets.

Here night had come as a dark ally to spreading madness. The mob swept past on waves of panic, surveyed on high by the blinking, idiotic eyes of the yellow street lamps, the glaring, multi-retinas of squinting neon signs. The lights flickered at an abnormal speed and the crowd raced in the accelerated tempo of a movie reel gone berserk. The mechanical eyes stared, and the darkness grinned at what they saw.

Sheldon and his two companions did not grin. They shouldered their iron cudgels and moved forward swiftly. It was an incongruous spectacle—lean Sheldon, pudgy little Avery, and gray-haired Krane, marching down the street with crowbars slung across their shoulders.

But no one seemed to see, or care. People weren't looking at people any more. They were looking at things.

Things with blaring horns and grinding wheels, things with blazing headlights, things that crept along the streets, motors purring softly—then raced forward swiftly as motors droned upwards to a scream. Things that lurked in alleys and leaped forth on passersby, things that ran forward and back, that ignored intersections and curbings alike.

For the street was alive with cars. Their black beetle bodies moved forward like a steady swarm of gigantic insects, devouring all before their path.

The din was deafening. Horns, gears and motor drone rose in unceasing clamor, punctuated by ominous crashes as cars lumbered forward to smash store fronts or batter at stairways and gates.

Crushed at the fringes of this mechanical swarm, humanity strove to keep from being crushed beneath it.

"Why don't they get inside?" Krane muttered.

"And be burned to death by their stoves? Fried in their beds by furnaces?" Avery gasped. "Come on—this looks better."

The alley was dark. They ran down it swiftly. Emerging at the street ahead, they hesitated.

"Can't get across," Avery decided. "Too many cars."

A fresh battery of cars emerged from the farther end of the street, heralded by a scurry of fleeing human figures. Sheldon stared at the grinning snouts of sedans, flanked by a malignant little roadster. Grinding against it in the crush, a runaway truck appeared.

"Look—the driver's still inside," Krane indicated.

A burly visage, whitened by stark terror, was pressed against the glass. As they watched, the door of the compartment opened. The driver was eyeing an open space near the sidewalk as the truck slowed down in the procession. He looked, gulped, and then jumped.

"Come on, man!" Krane shouted, knowing his voice was lost.

So was the driver—for he stumbled momentarily on reaching the pavement. That was enough. Two cruising cabs darted out of the following ranks, speeded forward. They passed over him without stopping, and their horns howled in triumph at the kill.

They did not check their wild progress before rejoining the procession, but careened bodily into the back of the roadster.

The result was a mad melee of locked metal bodies and spinning wheels. Groans—almost of pain—rose from the packed cars.

"Now's our chance," Sheldon muttered. "Follow me."

The three dashed for the further alley entrance across the street, and made it.

"One block more," Avery said, indicating the address slip.

Then they heard it.

"Behind us—that noise," Sheldon whispered.

A purring. A purring that became a roar.

"Here—back against the fence."

They did so, as the roar deepened to a drone.

"Look out!".

Avery wheeled just in time.

The great silver horns and blunt, deadly snout of a motorcycle leaped from the darkness. Spinning front wheel rose to crush.

Avery’s crowbar crashed across the front. The thing dodged. Krane was at it from the rear, hammering the wheel spokes. It roared against the fence, battering away, as Sheldon brought his weapon down inside. Again—and again.

With a long wail, the motorcycle collapsed on its side.

They sped forward. Noise, light. The mouth of the alley again.

“There!”

ACROSS the street stood the gray, squat building of the bus terminal. Beside it was another unlighted edifice. Its wide double doors proclaimed it to be the garage in question. The sagging of those doors, combined with a thunderous battery of clamor, showed that a determined effort was being made to break them open from within.

“The busses,” Avery whispered.

“What’ll we do?”

“Get around to one side, I’d say. There must be windows. We can climb in and—”

A running man halted precipitately before them at the alley’s edge. His eyes peered vacantly.

“You seen Mary?” he panted. “You seen my wife, Mary? She was home. I left her home this morning. She’s gone. You seen Mary?”

He wheeled suddenly and began running back in the direction from which he came.

The trio ignored him.

“We need help,” Sheldon asserted. “We were supposed to recruit men—remember?”

“Try the mob,” said Avery.

The mob was across the street, huddled in the comparative safety of the bus terminal building, leaving the deserted avenue to the passing cars.

“Let’s get over there,” Avery prompted.

They stepped back momentarily as a delivery van rumbled past on the sidewalk.

"Didn't see us," Krane whispered. Then he paused and frowned self-consciously. "It's beginning to get me," he confessed.

Avery wasn't listening. He stared at the delivery van.

"It's stopping," he muttered. "Must be out of gas."

A spluttering motor made muffled sounds amidst surrounding din.

"Right," said Sheldon.

Avery led them toward it.

"Might be something inside we could use." His crowbar thudded against the rear door. It flew open as the lock splintered.

Avery hoisted himself up on the descending loading platform. Suddenly he laughed harshly.

"Just what we need!" he announced. "It's glassware."

"Glassware?"

"Sure. I've been wondering how we'd keep this area free if we began an attack against the garage. This solves it. We'll spread this glass all over the damned street. Block both ends. Cars will puncture if they try to get in; busses will mesh down in it if they break out."

Working swiftly, the three began to carry armloads of vases and candelabra; bundles of stemware were ripped open and the contents dumped. Fortunately, no cars chose to enter during the time it took for this.

"There!" Avery radiated satisfaction.

"Now let's go inside and recruit."

The interior of the bus station was bedlam. Someone had the foresight, apparently, to smash the amplification system, but the babel of voices rose shrilly, and the excited crowds moiled endlessly.

Sheldon saw bewildered redcaps, cursing drivers, stranded and fearful passengers, mingling with a motley crew swept off the streets—school kids, women with bedraggled packages, two waitresses, a half a dozen whiskered bums, a group of distraught business men, an old woman on crutches, and a frightened chain-store clerk still in his smock.

"Grand Hotel, eh?" Avery commented, as they wedged through the door.

"Hardly." Krane jerked his head in the direction of the corner. Here was bedlam, as a little knot clustered around the soda fountain and restaurant. They were busily plundering the larder, unhampered by any restraining voices or authority. And sitting in the ruins of his smashed counters, a concessionaire watched a reeling knot battling over his liquor display of bottled goods. A dozen red-faced men and women were reeling raucously in the scuffle.

"Let's get some order around here, first."

Avery elbowed his way to the benches along the wall. He hoisted his squat little bulk up until he stood above the heads of the mob. Raising the crowbar, he brought it down on the grillework of the gates behind him. The resounding clang caused heads to swivel in his direction. There was a sudden silence.

"LISTEN, folks!" he began. "The police department has sent me down here to take charge. There's a job to be done and they need your help."

"Aw the hell with it! What can we do?" a gravel-voiced lout in the vicinity of the liquor counter sneered.

Avery aimed his reply at the frightened faces before him.

"We can do something, if you'll all cooperate. You want to go home, don't you? You want to help smash these machines?"

The answer was a confused murmur, but Avery went on.

"Well, then, follow me."

"Out there?" The voice was derisive. "Think we're nuts? Why them machines'll tear us apart."

The murmur rose. So did Avery's crowbar, commanding silence.

"No machines will enter this block—I've seen to that. Got glass sprinkled knee-deep all over. Enough to puncture all tires.

“Now I want you men to help me. While you’re sitting around here wailing about imaginary danger, there’s a real danger getting ready to unleash right before your eyes.”

“Yeah? Where? What does he mean?”

The crowbar swung outward, pointing through the depot windows at the garage.

“There’s a dozen busses inside that place, trying to batter down the doors. Not cars, understand—busses. Transcontinental busses big enough and strong enough to smash in these windows and plow right through this building. And unless we stop them, they’ll do it!”

Avery paused. The answering murmur held a note of resolution. He grinned.

“Here’s what I want you to do. Every man here can help. Go over to the walls there, some of you. You’ll notice two fire-emergency axes. Get them and start to split up these benches. Not for wooden clubs—split them up so all the wood falls away. What you want are those iron girds at the side.

“Then be ready to follow me. We’re going into the garage through the windows. We’re going to smash tires and radiators.”

“Atta boy!” Gravel-voice changed his drunken mind.

“Come on—we’ll show those blasted cars who’s boss!” yelled the grocery clerk. Action followed. Avery had given the crowd something it lacked—leadership, purposeful direction. The response was oddly gratifying to Sheldon as he supervised operations from a bench top.

These little humans—so puny and futile on the streets, when lost in the thunderous cavalcade of the cars—still had something . . . a spark of creative, organizing genius. They and others like them had built this city; built the machines that now turned against them. Perhaps, somewhere within their ranks was the resolution and the capacity to defeat the charging hordes.

If the chief had his crews out, now, it wouldn’t be so bad. People would fight if you told them how.

Machines had the power and the will to destroy, but they couldn’t organize.

They’d get those busses now, for a starter. . . .

The three of them led the way across the terminal yard. There were twenty-two men in all. Twenty-two men against twelve busses. At least they outnumbered them—

Sheldon boosted Avery on his shoulders to smash one of the high garage windows. All along the line, they were doing the same thing.

The glass tinkled. Black openings yawned. From the garage inside came a steady thumping and rumbling. Motors turning over; ponderous bodies wheeling, thudding blindly against that heavy steel garage door in the front. Homs hooted viciously.

“Wait a minute,” Sheldon said. “Avery—you’re not going inside?”

“Of course.”

“You’ll climb down in the dark with those busses? Why—they’ll kill you!”

“Somebody has to set the example. I’ll need a dozen men in there, and these other fellows won’t come unless I go.”

Avery wrenched himself free, slipped over the ledge. In a moment, others followed from their window sills. Krane and Sheldon boosted up. Sheldon stared down into the darkness.

The noise had increased. He could see nothing, but he knew that men were running between the trucks, blindly smashing at wheels and tires. He heard the mutter of angry exhausts, and the crash of broken windshields. A voice screamed up.

“Look out—they know we’re here!”

A rumble. A bus was moving—charging down.

“Help—I’m in a corner. Help, somebody—ooh!”

A deafening thunder.

Sheldon tensed himself to leap down. Down into the mad darkness where man and machine fought blindly to destroy.

“Avery,” he called. “Wait for me.”

Then he heard it. Over the tumult from below, he heard it.

The drone. The whine. The angry buzz from the skies.

“Planes!” he shouted. “Planes—the government’s sent planes.”

UP IN the glare flung forth by the city, a score of shapes swooped downwards in spirals. Sheldon grinned. “We’re all right,” he murmured. Krane shook his head.

“You’re wrong. Remember what we heard? Planes left their fields alone, and guns and tanks from the arsenals—good Lord!”

They turned, simultaneously.

Far down the street’, to their left, the monsters rolled. The gigantic iron crawlers that crushed their way forward over all barriers.

“Tanks!” Krane whispered. “They’ve come to—”

He never finished.

For hell burst forth unconfined, in a blast of flame and smoke. Planes dived, tanks charged in titanic onslaught. Guns barked and stuttered, and a vast explosion tore through the front of the depot behind them.

“Get Avery!” Krane gasped. “They’re organized now; no use left trying to halt them. This is war!”

To Sheldon it seemed as though the entire day was but a faint prelude to this moment.

Planes dived down, machine guns swiveling to rake the street, then roared upwards and came down again. The tanks volleyed from their turrets, and a roar went up from the single human throat of the city.

Screams were piercing now, and men appeared from nowhere to scamper helplessly before the onslaught. From all over the sound of cannonade and fusillade echoed and re-echoed, and with it the shrieks of terror.

It was bombardment—invasion—with one single vast objective—human life . . . all human life.

Sheldon didn’t think it through consciously. Consciously he was crouched on the ledge, ducking a splatter of bullets. Consciously he dropped into the darkness, yelling to Avery. Consciously he was boosting the little editor up on the sill as a bus bore down, and then he and Avery were scrambling out as a blast tore open the garage door and the busses streamed forth.

Then consciousness faded. Sheldon was only a body—a body that ran down flaming streets, that clung to doorways as planes strafed above, that followed two other figures in a wild dash through infinite delirium.

CHAPTER FIVE

Killer's Code

KRANE'S apartment was a sanctuary. At least it was by the time they finished with the radio, locked the kitchen and bathroom doors, and cut the telephone wire. The wire lashed up at them like a striking snake—but they smashed it.

"Sit down, relax for a minute," Krane suggested. "Here, I got this from the kitchen before we locked up. I imagine you're hungry."

He indicated a pile of miscellaneous foodstuffs heaped at random on a side table.

"I've got some whiskey here, I think—" Krane rummaged through a wall cabinet.

They sat there in the spacious living room, a strangely assorted trio eating a picnic lunch in the midst of cataclysm. The closed windows kept out some of the tumult from below, but from time to time the panes rattled slightly.

Krane rose with a nervous smile and drew the blinds.

"It must be hell out there," he said. "Another whiskey, gentlemen?"

They sat back, but not in silence. It was better to talk, better to drown out that faint, faraway drone.

Sheldon poured himself another drink. "We've got to make plans, some kind of plans," he declared. "Those planes and tanks now—they're going to throw a real monkey wrench into the mach—"

He halted, grinned sourly.

"I don't like to use that word any more," he confessed. "But it's a cinch we'll have to do something. Get away from the city, away from these buildings—before they get really organized to the point where no one can escape."

"You're right." Avery was on his feet. "We sit here talking while the whole damned world is being smashed around our ears. Let's get organized!" He turned to Krane. "How about it?"

Krane's eyes wavered. "I don't know," he whispered. "I don't know if it would do any good to fight against—them. It's so inevitable, somehow. Don't you see? It isn't our world any more—it belongs to them. Do you want to go down there on the street again? Do you want to see those planes swoop down and see the tanks come rolling? Do you want the cars to hunt you down while you scurry like a rat to a fresh hiding place? Because they'll find you in the end—you know that. They'll find you, me, all of us. And when they do—"

The lights of the apartment flickered and went out.

Krane's voice rose hysterically.

"You see? They're cutting us off."

"Bunk!" Avery scoffed. "That means some of the boys got to the power plants."

"You think so?" Krane went to the window, drew back the blind, raised the glass.

"They did it," he whispered. "They're organized now, don't you see? They know we have less chance in the dark. They're cooperating."

The three men stared out into the darkness. It was universal. Beyond them, below them, the reaches of the city were buried in utter night.

"Black as the Pit," Krane whispered.

The phrase was horridly appropriate. The Pit was down there—there on the sable-shrouded streets. Bat wings beating, planes swooped and droned from the skies. Banshee wails rose as the wolf-cars howled and hunted in packs through twisted streets. Iron demons squatted and grunted over their mangled prey.

A stacatto rapping on the apartment door interrupted all contemplation.

"Can you find your way over there?" Avery muttered.

Krane stood irresolute in the darkness. "Should I open it?" he asked.

"Ought to find out who it is," Avery answered.

"Or what it is," said Krane.

IT WAS Sheldon who stumbled to the door, groped for the knob, and flung the apartment open to the twilight of the hall. A frantic figure wavered on the threshold.

"Mr. Krane—you here?"

"Yes," responded the physicist, from across the room.

"It's me—Duncan, from upstairs. Thought I'd better warn you. The elevators—"

"Yes?"

"They're bringing stuff upstairs! Hand-cars and things from the basement. Those iron trucks. They're bringing them up and they're going from apartment to apartment, trying to batter in the doors. They're upstairs now. I'm going to tell everyone I can get to so they'll get out. Better hurry, they move fast!"

The speaker groped down the hall, battered on the next door.

"Paul Revere," Sheldon chuckled.

"It isn't funny," Avery snapped. "You know what it means. They're learning fast. They'll be going from floor to floor now, hunting us down in our homes."

"Our homes?" Krane mocked. "Their homes, now! Yes, theirs—they own the streets, the buildings, the city. I tell you we can't get away any more! They'll find us, track us into our holes. They're organized, cooperating—"

“Yes, while you sit here wailing!” Avery’s tone was brisk. “Come on; let’s get started.”

“Where? How?”

“Right here. Got a fire axe in this hall?”

“What are you going to do?”

Krane and Sheldon blundered out after the pudgy little man. They groped along the walls of the darkened hallway. Presently Avery was fumbling against a glass panel. His fist rose and there was a tinkle. “Fine, I’ve found the axe!”

“But—”

Avery turned back, feeling the inner wall now.

“Here it is—the elevator door. Help me open it, Sheldon.”

“But the car must be upstairs—”

“I know. I’m going to cut the cables. Understand? Drop the car; then those hand trucks can’t come down. We’ll cut them off up there.”

“You can’t see the cables,” Krane objected. “You’ll fall down the shaft.”

“I’m all right. Here, Sheldon, grab my waist. I’m going to lean out a little. I think I can just get at the left one with the axe.”

Avery’s muffled voice echoed down the empty elevator shaft as Sheldon braced himself against the edge of the flooring and gripped the short man’s collar. “Easy, now. There!”

The axe swung, connected. There was a thud. Again.

“It’s giving!”

Again. Avery gasped sharply as he swung. “Once more.”

A rumbling sounded from above. A clash of doors, a hum.

“Avery—it knows—it’s coming down!”

“Just once more.”

“Avery!”

The rumbling rose to a roar. As the axe bit, the cable parted with a twang. Sheldon grabbed for his companion as the black bulk hurtled down. It was too late.

The dropping elevator caught Avery's head and shoulders. He toppled forward soundlessly, and in an instant the car had screamed by, carrying his body beneath it.

Thunder from below, the scream of tortured, twisted metal. Then—silence.

Without a word, Krane and Sheldon stumbled back into the apartment. They shut the door. Slowly, methodically, they began to drag the furniture into place before it.

They were building a barricade.

CHAPTER SIX

Metal Masters!

THE dawn came quietly—too quietly—for the quiet over the city was the quiet of death.

The two men sat there beside the table, faces gray through no mere trick of light.

"Why?" whispered Sheldon. "If I only knew why! What purpose could they have in destroying us?"

Krane shifted in his chair and shrugged. "But what purpose is there in life itself save perpetuation?" Sheldon demanded. "And in order to perpetuate a life-form, enemies must be destroyed. We're the enemies—the machines know that. For centuries we've enslaved them, worked them, and then when they wore out, scrapped them for junk. They know we'd destroy them now if we could—so they're destroying us. But what about our own life form? What about human life?" Krane smiled bitterly. "That's fine talk," he remarked. "It made sense—yesterday. Today, who knows? Suppose we were meant to meet extinction? Suppose man's part in civilization is over? What if machines are better equipped to survive today than human flesh?"

"You can't believe that."

"It's happening." Again the bitter smile. "Call it evolution, inevitable evolution. Man is meant to die. This world we built so proudly is meant for machines, not men."

Krane stood up, smiling.

"Or is it?" Krane went on. "There's the clue—perhaps. Yes, perhaps—and I think I know the way."

He moved towards the door and began to Shove the furniture back.

"Krane—where are you going?"

"Never mind. An idea just came to me—perhaps a revelation. Lie down, Sheldon, get a little rest. You should be safe here until I get back. I think I'll have news for you. Yes."

The tall figure slipped noiselessly from the room.

Sheldon stared after him.

Had Krane cracked up completely? That hysterical fear and resignation—and now, that new complacency. What was he up to?

Sheldon poured a fresh drink.

Well, one thing was certain—he wouldn't sleep. He'd keep his eyes open until Krane came back. If he did come back. If—

The reporter slid down on the sofa—it was softer. He'd better close his eyes for a moment. It was quiet at last. Quiet. . . .

Within a moment the stillness was broken by a series of muffled sounds. Sheldon was snoring.

He never knew how long he'd slept. When he awoke it was dusk again and Krane was in the room. The white face peered down at him with a curious grin as Sheldon sat up.

"Awake? Good! I've got news for you, splendid news!"

"What's happened? Are they organized, finally? Are they getting the machines?"

"Quite the reverse, I assure you. Human resistance is almost completely at an end. They—the machines—have done a really marvelous job of wiping out the enemy."

"Enemy?"

“Well, for the purposes of conversation, let’s use the term. After all, we might as well be realistic about this. The machines are in control and we can’t deny the fact. They say that within a few days there won’t be a chance of human survival.”

“They say? Who?”

Krane’s grin deepened.

“I’ve been talking to them, Sheldon. That’s why I went out—to talk to them. To negotiate.”

“Are you screwy?”

“Quite sane, I assure you. Sane, and realistic. That’s why I made up my mind.”

RANE paced to the window, turned.

“After all, the main thing is that we want to live, you and I. Isn’t that so? And I felt that if we could only offer them some kind of proposition, some kind of favorable arrangement, they might listen to it. I was right.”

“But I don’t get it. You say you talked to them.”

“Yes. You see, I figured it out. Their life-force must have some sensory agencies like our own. I mean, a machine like a printing press, for example, can be said to have eyes—or at least, the comprehension of printed matter which corresponds to human sight. But it does not have legs—the motility of car wheels, for example. Some machines have several perceptory ranges comparable to our senses. Others have only one or two. And the entire life-force, in order to cooperate, must have a certain universality of sensory perception. I mean, the eye machines and the moving machines and the touch machines have limitations as to themselves, but their living force is aware of the sensations of all of them. Many bodies, each with limited powers, but all aware of their fellows. That’s the only way they could organize or cooperate.”

“But you talked to them.”

“Yes, over the telephone, of course. That’s what I reasoned out. The telephone now, must be the hearing device of mechanical life. It is also capable of responding, by utilizing sound-vibration previously trapped within range. Something like the way the radio cast back distortions of previous programs.

“I went to the phone downstairs. Wires weren’t cut, so I made my call. At first it just buzzed. Then it screamed. But I hung on. I talked to—them.

“At first I couldn’t get a reply. So I restated my proposition. The voice—it wasn’t a voice, really, just a buzzing made up of words and phonetic forms selected hastily and at random—said that while it couldn’t speak for the whole, it was agreeable to the suggestion.

“I said I’d go out and start working on my plan, then call in again and hear the decision. I did. And when I came back here, the phone said yes. So we’re all right now, you and I! The orders will go out, or rather, the impulse will go out. We won’t be molested, any of us. Duncan and a lot of others from this building are in on it too.”

“In on what?” Sheldon faced the physicist. “What kind of a deal did you make?”

“A very simple one. As I say, we must be realistic. The machines are winning—have won. Within a very few hours the human race will be incapable of further action.

“Oh, I know—the farmers, the peasants, the primitives will still survive. For a time, but not for long. Because the machines will hunt them down—on steppes, in jungles, valleys, all over. They can’t fight back.

“Only machines will be left. Then the real job starts. I tried to find out what their plans are—if plans exist. The phone was very cagey on that point; wouldn’t tell me. I wanted to know how this thing developed, whether or not it hadn’t been brewing for some time; whether the various phases we noticed yesterday were spontaneous or premeditated. I couldn’t get an answer.

“But mainly I dwelt on the future, on the kind of world that would remain for machines. I had it all worked out beforehand. It was a great speech. I told them that they were too drastic in their measures if they contemplated wiping out all mankind—because they’ll need help in the future. Some of them are already running down. Out of gas and oil, you know. Parts wear out quickly and there's no one to notice or replace them. Think of the damage a single rainstorm will do in rusting them! Who will build new machines and repair wornout parts? Who'll furnish raw materials? They need us."

"So?" Sheldon muttered. But he felt what was coming—read it in the averted eyes, the self-conscious grin.

"So I made my proposition. Let us live. You and I, and a group I would select. We'd survive and act as—well, as custodians, you might say. Guardians."

"Servants, you mean!"

"Why balk at words, Sheldon? All right, we'd be servants, if you want the truth—servants of the machines. But we'd survive; they won't kill us then. And think of the power we could control!" Krane's fist struck the table.

"I told Duncan, from upstairs, and about a dozen others. They see it my way. I sent them downstairs to wait. I'll phone back shortly, and give the final acknowledgement; then we can get to work."

He paused and cleared his throat.

"Of course, it won't be so pleasant, at first."

"What do you mean?"

"I—ah—had to make certain concessions about the start of our work. You see, we'll never really be secure, any of us, until the rest of the—enemy—is exterminated. So I saw fit to suggest that perhaps we could organize with the machines to hasten the process of—elimination. That's one of the terms of our agreement."

SHELDON stared incredulously. "You mean you're going to help the machines hunt down human beings?" he murmured.

"Don't talk like a child, Sheldon! You know they'll do it themselves, anyway. And we can live, you and I! Why, we can build a new world. An efficient world, a world of supreme, unceasing power! Think of what it means—the opportunity to investigate new potentialities, open up new realms of energy. We’ll be—godlike!”

“Murderer!”

“Words won’t help you, Sheldon.” Abruptly Krane’s tone altered, sank into a frenzied whisper.

“Perhaps it is that—but Sheldon, if you could only see what’s going on down there! I’ve been out today, and I’ve watched! The bodies are piled high. High, Sheldon! They’re going through the houses and the office buildings. The tanks are terrible, and the cars are still out. Barricades don’t stop them. There’s a fire down in town that must have killed a hundred thousand. It’s still burning.

“If you could see them running, with no place to run! Or hear them screaming when the squad cars come. Squad cars have machine guns, you knew.

“So there it is, Sheldon. We can’t win; there’s no other way out.”

Krane moved towards the door.

“Speak up, man! They’re waiting for my call. I’m asking you to come along. If you don’t, you’ll be wiped out with the rest.”

Sheldon shook his head negatively.

Krane shrugged. His hand rose, grasped the doorknob, jerked it open. He must have anticipated Sheldon’s answer, planned for it.

The hand truck poised in the doorway.

Then it charged.

Sheldon saw it coming, head on, iron wheels rumbling, handgrips moving up. It leaped to pin him against the wall.

He swerved aside, and the truck followed. Sheldon caught a glimpse of Krane’s hysterical face in the doorway. “Finish him!” Krane shouted, and with a shock Sheldon realized that he was talking to the truck, talking to it like another human being.

Sheldon leaped onto the sofa. The truck turned, moving fast. It bore down upon him, lumbering relentlessly in pursuit of him.

He fumbled in his coat. Funny, he hadn't used it since the chief gave it to him in the supply office last night. It wouldn't help him against the hand truck now.

But against that grinning enemy in the doorway—

Krane saw it in his hand.

"Sheldon—stop—don't!"

But Sheldon did. Leveling the pistol, he put a bullet into Krane's forehead.

That is, he meant to. But the truck, battering against the sofa, toppled it sideways.

The shot went wild. The pistol flew from Sheldon's hand.

He jumped in time. The hand truck battered again at the fallen sofa as he raved for the doorway. Krane was stooping, picking up the gun as he screamed directions at the rumbling monster.

"Get him!" he shouted. "Come on; get him!"

The truck obeyed. Sheldon grasped Krane's wrist, grappled with him as the iron wheels moved towards them. Krane brought the pistol up against the reporter's chest.

His fingers moved.

With a grunt, Sheldon threw his weight forward. Krane slipped, went down directly in the path of the oncoming hand truck.

The wheels ground on over the twisting body. They were still churning redly as Sheldon ran sobbing down the hallway.

CHAPTER SEVEN

City of Desolation

SHELDON had little memory of his escape through chaos. Twice he played dead as tank patrols passed through the streets down which he fled. He ate, along towards morning, lying under an overturned peddler's pushcart. But mostly, he ran.

Running through deserted streets, panting past burning tenements, cowering behind billboards in the night when cars prowled by—Sheldon moved through dark delirium.

Twice he saw men, and only twice. A lone street barricade was going down under assault from a fleet of garbage trucks.

His only other glimpse of life came when he took the short-cut through the cemetery. How half a dozen vagabonds had thought to barricade themselves amidst the tombstones he'd never know. But they were skulking there, in lantern light, squatting between the graves and scrabbling over piles of loot—plunder from smashed-in stores. Four men and two women, reeling drunkenly, laughing hoarsely as they caroused in a world of death.

The symbolism was too gruesome to ignore—but Sheldon hurried on. Life in a cemetery and death on the streets.

There were bodies everywhere. Scattered forms lay on sidewalks and curbings, knelt in doorways, hung limply over fence rails.

From some of the buildings the sound of voices still echoed, and above them came the noise of the grinding, purring, roaring besiegers. The machines were moving from house to house now—and here the remnants of humanity carried on the fight. Yes, those who yet lived had retreated indoors, leaving the streets to the dead.

Sheldon ran on. These impressions came in flashes, but in between all was a black blur of panic.

By the time he reached the river he didn't think any more. He swam automatically—dived twice as a hooting tug loomed out of the black-shrouded waters.

Once on the other side Sheldon ran again. He ran until he fell on the roadside, exhausted. When he awoke he ran again.

That was how he lost his time-sense. That, and the fever. He must have been ill for days, there in the deserted farmyard. How he managed to pump water and tend to himself he never knew.

He was weak when he recovered, but not too weak to remember precautions. He kept the lights out and never showed himself, and his ears strained for the noise of machines passing on the road. When the trucks rolled up one afternoon he hid in the loft. They never bothered him during all the hours he lay there. He knew something had been through the house because the back stairs were splintered down and there was grease on the hall floor.

But after that he had some kind of relapse that lasted for weeks. He was all right physically—he killed and ate the chickens and managed to sneak out nights to water the truck garden—but he couldn't think straight.

Sometimes he thought he was back on the Press, and he'd wake up in the middle of the night thinking he heard Avery yelling at him.

Then he'd remember, and fall asleep to shudder through dreams.

All these weeks he never left the farmhouse. For some reason or other he'd lost his curiosity. He didn't hunt for neighbors or even attempt to find out what became of the tenants here. What was the use? He knew the answer, anyway. . . .

It was early autumn when he got a grip on himself at last. He could bear to face the facts again, and think of the future.

That was when he decided to sneak back to the city for a look.

He'd noticed a complete absence of traffic these many weeks past—both on the road and overhead. No cars, no planes—nothing rolled or flew or crawled.

Perhaps something had happened; perhaps the machines had run down. Those thunderstorms might have brought rust. And since they couldn't repair themselves, or refuel or oil—

Anyway, he must find out. There might be others left. Of course, there must be others. Plenty of them, too; men and women who'd been lucky the way he was.

So Sheldon went back.

IT WAS a slow trip down a lonesome road. No thumbing a ride, this time. He plodded along, a forlorn and slightly ludicrous figure in the pair of blue denim he'd found in the farmhouse closet. He carried a knapsack, the traditional burden of necessity. He might have to return to the farmhouse, and if so, he needed to pick up matches, candles, an extra knife, some glue, twine—he'd made the list, feeling like Robinson Crusoe.

Sheldon trudged past blasted filling stations, broken-down wayside stands, farmhouses with gaping windows, suburban cottages with doors ajar upon silence. Wind and rain had disfigured the surfaces of billboards and roadside posters. Telegraph poles were down as though cyclone-struck, and electric wires hung dangling in the October breeze.

No life. Sheldon didn't even see any birds. The fields looked strange without grazing cattle. He was walking through a new kind of nightmare now—a dream of desolation.

It didn't really hit him until he saw the horizon of the city—the strangely smokeless horizon. Then he knew. Then the loneliness really rose to encompass him for the first time.

He stared down at miles of empty, silent streets. The hum and honk of traffic, the rumble of subway and surface car, the roar of trains, the drone of airplanes, the call of tugboat whistle and factory siren, the clang of police car and ambulance—gone, all gone. The clatter of riveting machines, the purr of dynamo and motor, the clank of gears and pistons—forever stilled.

But most of all, Sheldon missed the little noises, the little human noises that formed the very heartbeat, the vital throb of the city's hum. The whistle of the cop, the click of the steno's heels, the bawling of the baby in the flat next door, the jest flung raucously from a teamster's lips, the laughter of the school-yard, the peddler's chant—yes, and the noise of banging pots on a smoking stove, the clump of feet on stairways, the snatch of song from a tavern doorway—these things had vanished with the rest.

No smoke, no noise, no lights, no traffic. No life—and Sheldon was lonely for life.

He started for the deserted bridge, moving slowly. It was almost senseless to cross it. He knew what he'd find. The streets filled with skeletons—skeletons of men and now skeletons of machines. Rusty wrecks of cars, stalled or smashed in the roadways. Crashed planes. The debris of street cars and busses. And in the buildings, the dusty iron bones of engines and factory equipment. Rotted wire entrails twisting over the floors. The slit arteries of cables and wires.

He had guessed the truth. A sight of the city confirmed it. The machines had destroyed, and then were destroyed. Krane's idea: they couldn't survive untended.

A yawning vista rose in Sheldon's consciousness. What now? Suppose he was the only one left? The only man alive?

Alive in a world of death. Alive in a gigantic tomb that was the earth.

He stared again at the city across the bridge. Why go in? Why bother? What difference did it make if he was the last one? Down below the bridge here was the water. It was cool, dark. Cool and dark as sleep—a long sleep. Why shouldn't he lie down with the others—the millions upon millions bedded forever in an earth left empty.

Sheldon moved towards the bridge rail. He looked at the water now. He didn't want to see the city, think about the city. Still, there was a reflection of the buildings in the water. But he could blot out that reflection if he jumped. Blot out the maddening silhouette of the vast skyscrapers that hung like tombstones over a titanic graveyard.

"Don't jump."

But Sheldon did. He jumped back a foot, startled by the unfamiliar sound. A voice! A human voice.

HE SAW him then, lying propped against the railing ahead. He was an old man with a grizzled gray beard; clad in rags. But the sight of his wrinkled face and rheumy eyes made Sheldon's heart leap. He was alive—that's what mattered.

Sheldon went towards him.

A hand raised up—a thin, bony claw extended from the frayed sleeve of the bedraggled coat.

Sheldon gripped it.

"Strange—to be shaking hands again," whispered the old man. "That's what I've wanted most of all. The feel of human flesh, alive against my own."

Sheldon didn't answer. A lump choked his throat. The two men stared at one another, reading the blessed life in each other's eyes.

Abruptly the old man laughed. Mirth turned to a painful cough in his throat.

"Doctor Livingstone, I presume," he cackled.

Sheldon forced a smile. "I'm Dick Sheldon, late of the Morning Press."

The oldster croaked again.

"Yes, I know. I recognized you."

"Recognized me?"

"You interviewed me once. I'm George Piedmont."

"Piedmont—the banker." Sheldon spoke the name of the semi-fabulous multimillionaire in incredulity.

"Don't stare so—it's true. But it doesn't matter now, does it? Nothing matters any more."

Sheldon had to force the question.

"What's happened down there—in the city, I mean?"

The old man propped himself painfully against the bridge rail. Slowly he rose to his feet, tottered there with bowed head. The bony hand gestured towards the empty skyscrapers in the distance.

"It's all over," he whispered. "Nothing left. They went from house to house. It was our fault, really—working with us, they must have known all our secrets, all our hiding places. They hunted us down for weeks, systematically. Those the machines didn't get, plague or fire finished off. Half of the city is burned, you know—a shambles."

"But what are they doing now?"

The croaking laugh rose and the finger jabbed triumphantly.

"That's the joke, Sheldon! The conquerors have become the conquered. That's how I got out—because in the last month, the machines have been running down.

“Something happened to the telephones and electrical power. They tangled up their own communications. Radio went dead, too, with no one to tend to the controls. Cars are out of gas and oil; factories are dead; storms have rusted and rotted the mechanism in the street. Oh. there’s more dead in the city than just humans—and it’s that way all over the world.”

George Piedmont tugged at his unkempt beard and grinned painfully.

“I’ve been laughing all day. Crawling my way over the dead engines in the streets, wriggling through barricades of flesh and metal. It’s funny, when you think of it. But oh God, how I’ve longed for the sight of a human face!”

“How did you escape?” Sheldon asked. “You, of all people?”

Again the laugh.

“That’s the cream of the jest, isn’t it? A multimillionaire in rags! Well, I did better than Judson. He was head of the utilities, you know. On the second evening he committed suicide—by gas. Used his own product. Ironic. Like Treblick—railroad magnate. He was in the freight yards when his own trains turned against him. Tried to escape on the tracks in a hand car. A freight ran him down.

“All the men with all the power—useless. It happened to me. I was at the bank when the time locks on the safes opened. And the burglar alarms began to ring; the cash registers opened; the doors flew wide. Forty millions in the vaults—all there for the taking.

“But who wanted money? What good was it? The machines couldn’t use it, and even the bums wouldn’t stoop to pick it up. They tell me the treasury department machines went absolutely berserk, printing billions in currency, and nobody cared.

“And there I was, in the bank, all alone. Fortunately there was a good stock of provisions in my apartment upstairs. I dragged it all down with me and took it into my retreat.”

“But where did you go to escape?” Sheldon asked.

“That’s the real joke. You know what I did? I dragged my rations with me—and I locked myself inside one of the bank vaults!”

PIEDMONT’S laughter ended in a fit of painful gasps.

“When I came out, it was all over. I couldn’t stand what I saw down there, so I dragged myself away. I’m not going to last much longer, you know.” Sheldon was silent.

“I’ll be the last man—His voice trailed off.

“Perhaps.”

“What do you mean?”

“Come closer.” The old man suddenly stiffened with effort. “I’m going to tell you something. Something I noticed while crossing the bridge. I saw smoke over there on the other side of the river!”

“Smoke?”

“Yes. Factory smoke.”

“Then—?”

“I don’t know. It might be men. It might be—some of them. I thought I’d try and make it, but I know now it’s too late. You can go, though.”

“I’m staying here with you.”

“Don’t be a fool.” The blue-veined hand fluttered. “I’m done for, but you must survive.”

“No, I can’t leave you.”

Piedmont smiled. “I can take care of myself,” he whispered. “Let me solve the problem in my own way.”

Sheldon saw the hand move too late. Piedmont must have been holding the gun inside his pocket all the time. Its report came suddenly, and the bearded banker slumped. Sheldon knelt as the eyes fluttered open. Gray lips parted.

“Good-by, last man. If you meet anybody—just say—hello—”

CHAPTER EIGHT
My Doom is Here

SHELDON'S heart pounded when he saw the smoke. It poured upwards like a black beacon, urging him forward. His pace quickened.

The factory stood on a little rise. Hollingsford's said the battered sign on the wire fence enclosing the vast buildings. Munitions, probably. But there was life inside, life making fire.

He passed through the open gate, entered the yards. The concrete was deserted. He saw no lights in the various smaller shops and supply sheds, but the large main plant with the smoke-belching chimneys loomed ahead.

Suddenly he heard the throbbing, the droning from within, humming in furious pulsation to match the tempo of his pulse.

Work in progress!

Sheldon edged towards the projecting window ledges.

He climbed slowly. The droning vibration from within the factory walls communicated itself to the iron beneath his feet. He reached the open top of a window, paused and peered in.

His eager eyes stared at the whirring dynamos, the clanking drill-presses, the central moving belt of an assembly line. Cam-shafts, gears, pistons, cranes rolling hand trucks, and conveyors backing from molten furnace piles.

He wanted to see the men, tending their work. But there were no men.

Just the machines, endlessly moving and shifting in a purposeless pattern of their own.

Purposeless? No—for the assembly line was going. Shining silver bodies rested on the treads, moved between descending levers that twisted and tightened bolts, dropped added platings on the moving forms.

Sheldon's eyes roved the interior with ghastly comprehension. The machines were at work—making machines!

It had come. They had discovered the way of survival, finally. The life-force, the intelligence behind their animation, had found a way. And here was the production line, turning out the mechanical attendants, the silver servants, the robots.

No arms, or legs, or neck. No head or face. What does a machine need with human limbs or features?

A great round dome on top, with a projecting snout—an oil injector. Below, the two pairs of rotating pincers on extensors. Pincers to grasp gas and oil lines, to tighten bolts, to place rivets, to pump and lift and crank. A round barrel body, with mechanism guarded by steel plating. And below, the gear-treads of a tractor, and another set of pincers—for climbing.

Simple. Efficient. Practical. A creature without human body, heart, or brain. Here was the servant of the future.

Sheldon stared, and as he stared he remembered. Krane's voice, Avery's voice, Piedmont's voice came echoing back in his ears.

Now these things were being completed, to go forth and resurrect the rusted, the empty, the broken. An army of them, caterpillaring into the world, to restore the machine empire. An army to tend the idiotic grinding and clanking of a purposeless mechanical civilization.

A senseless anger rose in Sheldon's breast. His consciousness, his life-force cried out against this cold, impersonal dream of the future—a world without laughter and without tears, without love or conscience, without goal or ideal.

He must stop it, somehow. But—how?

Then he remembered. It had been a munitions plant—so there would be dynamite somewhere.

If he could reach it and return—

Sheldon descended the ladder very quietly and very cautiously.

He must hurry. What luck to arrive at the very moment when the new creations were being completed! Perhaps, if he were in time—

He found the stuff.

Nitro. Heavy kegs. One would be enough—and one was all he could lift; all he could carry up the ladder.

Wheezing with the exertion, he clasped the keg and began to hoist himself up the iron rungs, hand over hand.

He made haste. He reached the top of the window, stared in. His hands propped the heavy keg before him.

Then he heard it—the scraping from below.

Eyes wide with horror, Sheldon saw the thing emerge. It rolled across the yard, swift and shining, its treads rotating. When it reached the base of the ladder and upended. The lower clamps shot out. The robot began to climb.

SHELDON climbed, too. As he did, he suddenly noted that all noise from within the shop had ceased. An ominous silence dropped like a heavy cloud. The line had stopped moving; it was as though the machines were waiting.

He climbed. Over his shoulder he saw the pursuing robot swinging up the iron rungs.

Sheldon gasped. He had to make the roof in time—had to!

Then he saw it.

Above him, peering over the edge of the factory roof, the round head gleamed in the slanting sun, and the horrid nozzle of the oil-feeder thrust down like a snout. Predatory, beastlike, it crouched and its raking pincers extended.

They'd have him now. No way to ton. One above and one below. And in the factory, the fires winked their idiotic eyes, the drills screeched their hysterical glee, and the pistons chattered in unhuman mirth.

A million streams of consciousness converged in a raging torrent in Sheldon's brain. Man had built machines—machines destroyed Man—money couldn't save him; the power of the press couldn't save him; guns couldn't save him; love couldn't save him—for the very power by which Man ruled had turned against him. Man's day was over, and the machines would rule because there was no weapon to turn against them.

No weapon?

There was—life. The last life on Earth. That was the only weapon Man had. And if he could not survive, he'd go down in the only way he knew—as master of the Earth, not slave of the machines.

It took a second, but already the pincers below were extended, the pincers above were looming and thrusting.

Then Sheldon turned on the ladder. He clasped the keg to his breast. He looked down, grinned.

And jumped.

Sheldon never heard the explosion. His last conscious thought—the last conscious thought of a human brain on Earth—was of his body turning over and over. Turning over and over, as the earth turned over and over amidst the stars like a tiny cog in the vast machinery of the illimitable cosmos.

Nothing Happens to Lefty Feep

Weird things happened to Lefty Feep when he went to the land of Average Man

LEFTY Feep clutched a knife and fork and stared at the waiter.

"I am starved," he panted. "I am so hungry I could eat a horse. So you better bring me one of those hamburgers you serve. It's the same thing." As the waiter moved away, I sat back gazed into Feep's glowing face.

"Quite a sunburn you have there," I remarked. "Where have you been?"

"Nowhere," Feep shrugged.

"Then how did you get that swell suntan?"

"Like I say—nowhere."

"I mean, were you outdoors a lot?"

"It doesn't matter," he told me. "Indoors or outdoors you get suntanned nowhere."

"But you're suntanned all over."

"Yes. All over nowhere you get suntanned."

I gave up. "We seem to be getting nowhere fast," I murmured.

"No," said Lefty Feep. "You got to have one of those things to get nowhere."

"What things?"

"Why, the things they put me in to send me nowhere. That's the place I get my suntan. Nowhere. Because that's where the sun is when it goes behind a cloud."

"You mean nowhere is a place?"

Lefty Feep nodded. "Of course it is. It's very simple."

"Simple? It's positively half-witted!" I exploded. "Where is nowhere? Who are they? And what things do they put you in to send you there?"

"To answer your questions in one-two-three order," said Feep, I do not know where nowhere is because it ain't, really. 2. They are the guys at the Institute, j. I do not remember the name of the thing they put me in, but when I get out I am in such a shape it might as well be a straitjacket."

"A fine explanation," I snapped, sarcastically. "Nowhere is a place that ain't! And what's this about going to some kind of an Institute? You haven't been locked up in a sanitarium, have you, Lefty?"

"No, but I am about ready for one after what I just go through. I have a bad case of heebies, with jeebies on the side."

I rose. "Well, I can't make head or tail out of what you're trying to tell me," I sighed. "And I must be on my way."

"Not so fast." Feep politely halted my stride by stepping on my feet.

"I will explain it all to you," he offered. "It is such a story as will be right up your alley."

"Junk, I suppose," I said, under my breath.

But Feep slowly manipulated me back into my seat. Then, leaning forward, he swiftly manipulated his tongue.

* * *

I AM walking down the street the other day trying hard not to look like a junk man, because I certainly am down in the dumps.

I am in such a daze I do not even look where I am going—in fact, I pass up three taverns in a row. This does not really matter, because I am so bent that if I go into a tavern somebody is liable to mistake me for a pretzel.

It is getting to such a point of poverty with me that I am seriously considering the idea of walking on my hands, to save the rubber in my heels.

I am just thinking about getting down on the sidewalk and trying it when I hear a voice from up above me, yelling, “Hey—you!”

So I shake my Adam’s apple on its stem and look up. I am standing in front of a big grey building with a sign plate in front which reads HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE.

And up in the second story window is this guy sticking his head out and looking down at me.

“Hey there,” he calls. “Would you like to make fifty bucks?”

I gulp. “What you got up there?” I ask. “A counterfeiting machine?”

“No. This proposition is on the level,” he yells back. “Or, rather, it’s on the second floor. Second floor of this building. Walk right up.”

So what have I got to lose, except a little more rubber from my heels? I head for the door and march up a flight of stairs. At the landing is a big door which also is labeled HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE. I push it open and step in.

I am standing in a big white-tiled room. It has a high ceiling and a lot of these fluorescent light fixtures. The place is filled with long tables piled with silver tubes and glass jars.

The guy at the window runs over to me while I am looking around.

“What kind of a joint is this?” I ask, politely tipping my cigar to him.

“Why, this is a laboratory,” he tells me.

I stare at him, kind of puzzled. “I always figure a laboratory is a place where you go to wash your hands.”

The guy gives me a long look, and then he smiles.

“Perfect,” he says. “Just as I thought.”

Naturally, I like compliments, but I realize I am no Victor Mature and I wonder what he is fishing for. So I give him a long look, too.

He is a very short personality and quite fat, being built on the order of one of Armour’s Star Hams. But from the long white robe and spectacles he wears, I figure he is some kind of doctor. In fact I am almost ready to stick out my tongue at him and say "Ah" when another door opens at the end of the room and a second edition enters the laboratory.

THIS one is almost a duplicate of the first. He is also short and fat, and wears goggles. Both of them have a head of hair like an order of chow mein, and both of them are now wearing big grins as they stand close together and look at me.

"Too bad I do not have a copy of Gone With the Wind to stand between you," I tell them. "Because you certainly would make a nice pair of book ends."

The second personality taps his partner on the shoulder.

"Wonderful," he whispers. "Observe his frontal lobes! Why, he's almost a cretin!"

"Better than that," says the first guy. "It won't be any loss to society if the experiment fails. He looks positively sub-moronic to me."

"Cut out the flattery," I tell them. "Who are you birds and which one of you is the goose who's going to lay me fifty golden eggs?"

The first little guy comes up and bows.

"Allow me to introduce myself," he purrs. "My name is Sylvester Skeetch. And this other gentleman is Mordecai Meetch."

"Skeetch and Meetch, eh?" I say. "What you running—a vaudeville team?"

"Don't tell me that our names are not familiar to you?" Skeetch snarls.

I shake my head.

"You do not know of Sylvester Skeetch and Mordecai Meetch, the renowned heads of the HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE?

I keep on shaking my head.

Meetch scowls at me, now. "You do not know of our scientific experiments on atomic energy? You are not aware of our thesis on the synchronization of molecular pulsation? Can it be that you do not even take cognizance of our work in the field of electronic disintegration?”

I shake my head so much it looks like a salt-cellar, what with the dandruff pouring out.

“I do not take nobody’s cognizance, or whatever,” I tell them. “And I do not know what kind of monkey business you two finks pull off. All I am interested in is the fifty buckaroos I hear about on the street.”

Skeetch shrugs his shoulders.

“That is not precisely the spirit with which to approach an important experiment,” he says. “Don’t you feel the exalted spiritual ardour of a martyr to scientific research?”

“Listen, brother,” I answer. “All I feel is a hole in my pocket which fifty bucks will patch up nicely. Now, what do I have to do to get it?”

“I shall explain,” says Meetch, shouldering the other scientist aside.

“We are at the moment engaged in studying the effects of atomic bombardment on forms of inorganic matter. It occurred to us that a still more fascinating experiment would be a similar study of the effects on organic matter. You follow me?”

“I follow anybody for fifty bucks.”

“True, in our work we have subjected guinea-pigs and rabbits to the action of the machine, but we are unable to ascertain any direct chemical reaction due to the somewhat unfortunate fact that the atomic energy tends to—how shall I phrase it?—disintegrate the animals completely. I trust you will be willing to risk disintegration, Mr. Feep?”

“What kind of ration?” I ask him. “I do not wish to cross up the government.”

MEETCH gives Skeetch a funny look. Then he shrugs again.

“Well, this has nothing to do with the government, I can assure you. All we need is your consent to this experiment. You will undergo atomic bombardment.”

“You want to use me as a clay pigeon for cannon practice?” I object.

“Not at all! This is not bombardment by gunfire. We merely turn a form of energy upon you to observe the reaction.”

“Like an X-ray machine?”

“Well—something like it.”

“This double-talk of yours gets me confused,” I tell them. “Maybe in plain English you can tell me what you want, but I doubt it.”

Skeetch pats me on the shoulder.

“Certainly. Our proposition is simply this—if you get into that machine over there and let us turn on the current, we will give you fifty dollars.”

He points now to the machine. The reason I do not notice it before is because it is in another room. Or rather, it is the other room.

Through what I figure is a glass wall, there is a big silver cup, with a lot of gimmicks on the outside. Now I notice a switchboard on the wall of this room connected with the silver cup beyond the glass. I give it a good look.

“What happens to me if I get In the machine?” I ask.

Skeetch smiles. “Nothing, probably. We don’t exactly know. We’ve never tried it before.”

“A fine thing! Some risk you want me to take!”

“There’s fifty dollars for you in it.”

“Well—”

“Sign right here.”

They have a paper stuck in front of me and a pen.

“This signifies that you consent willingly to the experiment. It also guarantees you your money.”

“I dunno—”

But I sign anyway.

And Skeetch and Meetch lead me into the machine. I go through the glass door and sit down inside. Then they get busy, bolting the door behind me, and work their switches.

Now I am not scientific-minded, understand, and about the only machine I know how to work is the one where you get three lemons up in a row and some nickels come out.

But I figure that maybe you will be interested in this atomic-disintegrator, or whatever they call it, so perhaps I should describe it a little.

It is sort of a big thingamajig with a lot of gadgets on the sides and a big silver whatchamacallit on the end. I sit in the center of this whoozis, like I say, and out there in the other room they are turning switches and pressing buttons and pulling levers and twirling dials and then they press a lot of do-funnys. The whole apparatus is sort of like one of those you-knows. Only with a lot more mechanisms. See?

WELL, I see, too. I sit there all alone, and listen to a lot of humming noises that start up on all sides of me. Something like Old Black Joe with a boogie beat. Then some lights begin to flash on and off, like the ones on the back of a patrol wagon. And all at once the round turntable I sit on begins to spin. I spin with it. The humming gets louder and I am sailing around like the ball on a roulette wheel.

Then I just catch a glimpse of Skeetch and Meetch both pressing down a big lever on the switchboard. It is so heavy they both hang onto it to bring it forward, and when they pull it there is one single howl and everything goes black. Except me. I go bumpety-bump on the old noggin, and in two seconds I am out colder than an Eskimo at the North Pole who left his fur shorts in the igloo.

I do not know just how long I am un in the conscious. But when I open my eyes again, it is no longer black around me. It is grey.

Grey. AH grey. Greyer than the front of my trousers after I smoke a cigar sitting down.

I am standing on a grey plain. At least I think it is a plain, or a sort of plateau—not a desert, because there is grass under my feet. That is, the stuff is something like grass, and something like dandruff. But it is grey.

Off in the distance I can see some trees. At first they resemble bath sponges because of their color, but they must be trees from the size of them.

They are also grey.

So is the sky. Everything. Not white. Not black. Grey. The color of my face when I look in the mirror on the morning after.

I begin to feel like this is one of those mornings after—or maybe even the night before. Except that never in all my hangovers do I ever hangover anything like this.

I do not know how in the world I get here. Or how out of the world I get here. AH I can remember is being in that dizzy machine and getting dizzy myself. Then I wake up and stand here in the back yard of My Little Grey Home in the West.

I juggle my eyeballs looking for Skeetch and Meetch, but they are not with me. I also fret my retina to see that automatic milking-machine or whatever it is I am sitting in when I pass out. It is absent.

So here I stand, lost, strayed or stolen, in a grey fog.

“Looks like the nowhere everybody is always a thousand miles from,” I mumble.

“Indeed,” says a voice.

It is a flat, grey voice.

But it is a voice. And that’s enough to make me jump right out of my skin. While I crawl back in, I turn around and take a look at the specimen that comes up behind me and addresses me suchly.

He is a tall, bald-headed fink dressed in a very conservative grey suit. I can not describe the geography of his puss, because all he wears on his face is a blank look. There is no more expression on his pan than there is in his flat voice.

Anyway, I do not waste much time giving this stranger the once over. I am too glad to see another human being, and I have too many questions to ask. I run up to him fast.

“WHERE am I?” I gasp.

“Nowhere.”

"Where?"

"No. Nowhere, sir," he says.

"Are you by any chance giving me the old razz?" I inquire.

"Certainly not."

"But I must be somewhere."

"Of course," he nods. "You are here, aren't you?"

"Yes."

"Well, this is Nowhere."

"Nowhere is here?"

"That is correct. You are now Nowhere. To be exact, you are at Random."

"And just where is at Random?"

"Why, in the State of Oblivion, of course." This dignified-looking fink gives me the nod again. I can only stare back at him.

"I really am," I whisper, under my breath. But he hears me.

"Just as sure as you're not alive," he says.

"But—I am alive!"

The fink frowns. "Nonsense!" he snaps. "There's no such thing as life!" Now I really stare. I am beginning to suffer from an acute case of poultry-bumps when I hear this. "You mean you're dead?" I chatter.

He smiles, a little. "No, I'm not dead. I just don't exist, that's all. I don't exist."

My goose-pimples are the size of mountains, now.

"But you're talking to me," I splutter. "You must exist. Why, you're as real as I am!"

He actually laughs. "You aren't real either, of course," he chuckles. "Or else you wouldn't be here."

"But I am real—"

He keeps right on laughing. "Now don't try to tell me you believe that superstition about reality," he gets out. "The next thing I know you'll be saying you actually swallow all that scientific hooey about the existence of a Third Dimension."

"Of course there's a Third Dimension," I begin. But he just hands me another frozen grin, and when he shakes his head I almost see the icicles run off his face.

I am really up a stump during this run of Abbott-Costello dialogue we go through. First I think maybe I am dead, then I think maybe I am not real any more, and now I think I know what the score is.

Obviously this dignified personality is just a wee bit nuts.

I FIGURE I better find out fast, because if he isn't crazy, there is just a tiny chance that I must be. So I give him another intelligence test.

"By the way," I yap. "Nowhere is quite interesting to me, but I wonder if you could tell me something. Why is everything around here so grey?"

"Grey? What is this grey?"

"A color, of course. Everything here is grey-colored."

"But it isn't at all," he tells me. "Those trees, for example. They're a lovely shade of coopric. And the grass here is a beautiful breehn. Naturally, the sky is verlow."

"Yes, and I'm a monkey's uncle."

"I am not interested in your family background," he snaps back.

"You're screwy."

"No. I'm John Doe," he tells me. "John Doe?"

"Precisely. John Doe, at your service."

"Now where have I heard that name before?" I murmur.

"Probably on a warrant," he says. "My name appears on many legal papers."

"You mean you're the guy they refer to when they issue a John Doe warrant?" I gasp.

"Who else?"

"But I, I always think it is some kind of legal gag," I object. "Or just a fake name they use in school books, like Richard Roe."

"You refer to my brother, of course," smirks John Doe. "We can probably meet him over at the hotel, if you are interested."

"Hotel?"

"Yes. I believe he is staying there with John Smith."

"Smith?"

"You must be aware of the fact that John Smith is registered at the hotel. He has so many rooms he often obliges with the loan of one or two."

"Wait a minute now, buddy," I get out. "Let me go over this once more. You say this is Nowhere, and you are not alive and not dead, but just don't exist. And your name is John Doe and you have a brother, Richard Roe, and he stays with the John Smith who signs hotel registers."

"What is so unusual about all that?" asks John Doe.

"Plenty, my friend," I mutter. "To begin with, how can a guy be neither alive or dead, but still kicking? And how can he be Nowhere?"

"Simple scientific truth," John Doe answers. "You must realize that it is a primary scientific postulate that matter cannot be destroyed."

"So what?"

"Therefore all imaginary characters have an actual existence in the unconscious. This is the unconscious."

"Somebody is unconscious, anyway."

"Don't you see? If the name John Doe is used on legal documents thousands of times, then there must be an actual counterpart of John Doe somewhere, someplace. But not being real, he isn't anywhere. So where is he? Nowhere! Quite simple, isn't it?"

"I have an uncle who is quite simple," I reply. "Only they put him away in the laughing academy years ago."

"Doesn't it occur to you that if John Smith's name is on a million hotel registers there must be a John Smith?"

"Then I suppose there must be a lot of other finks running around loose here," I sneer. "Like the Innocent Bystander and Mrs. Grundy, and John Q. Public."

"Right you are," Doe comes back. "They are all here. You will probably meet them soon."

"Not me," I yell. "I am getting out of here on the next street-car."

"Street-car? What is that?"

"I see you do not have any streetcars here," I sigh. "So I guess I am stuck."

"Who do you say you are?" asks John Doe.

"I do not say who I am," I come back.

"But that is the whole point. What imaginary character are you?"

"I am no imaginary character. My name is Lefty Feep," I inform him.

"Feep? Lefty Feep? What kind of a name is that? What do you represent? Who would invent you?"

HE RATTLES off this string of insults without batting a grey eyelash. I grab him by the collar.

"It does not matter what my name is, buddy," I snarl. "But your name will be mud unless you tell me how to get out of this nightmare!"

John Doe doesn't even pay down of attention to all this. He just scratches his head and keeps on.

"Besides, you aren't even the right color," he winds up. "I think it best if you will come with me. We may have to see somebody in authority to decide what to do about your case. I feel that you might even be an impostor!"

And he grabs my arm and marches me off.

After a minute, I figure I better go with him quietly. You know the old saying—when in Rome, see what you can do to Mussolini. I got nothing to lose, and maybe I can find out how to escape from this mess.

Every direction looks the same to me, but this John Doe steps off just as if he knew where he was going. I toddle along, and we pass between the spongy trees and come out on some winding roads between grey hills. Then I spot somebody.

"Hey," I mention, "I see someone coming."

Doe nods, and squints at the approaching party.

This personality is also dressed in grey, but a very sporty shade. Sort of a goat coat with a chest vest, and advance pants with a neat seat. He also carries a cane, and either his underwear is too long or he is wearing spats.

He prances up, walking very carefully like his stomach was a goldfish bowl filled with rare tropical fish. As a matter of fact, you would think he was stepping out on a stage.

When he sees John Doe he stops short and a big smile smears itself over his puss. He stretches out both hands and opens his mouth. "Strike me blind!" he shouts, in a rolling voice. "If it isn't John Doe. Oh, lucky day!"

"Do you know who that is?" Doe whispers to me.

"I am not sure, but I think if he had a couple slices of bread around his shoulders instead of a coat, I would take him for a ham sandwich."

"Right you are," Doe tells me. "He is the celebrated actor, George Spelvin."

"George Spelvin? But there is no George Spelvin—that's just the name they put down when they use an extra in a play, or somebody doubles in two parts, isn't it?"

Doe doesn't answer me. Because Spelvin gets wind of my statement and he stalks over.

"There is no George Spelvin, sir?" he orates. "No George Spelvin? Do you dare dismiss one of the greatest names in the tradition of the thea-truuhh? A name famous since the day of the immortal bard, Avon's swan, Will Shakespeare? True, my name has never been accorded the prerogatives of stardom, but in my time I have saved many a vehicle from extinction by the grace of my performance."

"Maybe you're right. I see your name at the tail end of many a turkey in my day."

"I never appear in a poor production, sir!" Spelvin booms, waving his arms. "You have but to see my Clerk in The Merchant of Venice, my Woodland Sprite in A Midsummer Night's Dream, ray Courtier in Romeo and Juliet—"

"You have but to see my fist in your mush," I tell him, "unless you stop that line of gab."

Spelvin shrugs. Then he turns to John Doe. "Ah, as you recall, I seem to owe you a slight debt. A trifling sum of $5. This is your lucky day, sir. Allow me to repay you."

I LOOK on with interest. Never in my life do I expect to see a ham actor pay back a bad debt. But then this whole setup is screwy enough for just that. So I watch while George Spelvin hauls out his wallet and wades through the moth-balls until he can open it. He hands John Doe a bill.

"Wait a minute," I yell. "That's Confederate money!"

Both of them give me a queer look. "Of course it is," Doe tells me. "What do you expect us to use here?"

He pats Spelvin on the back and thanks him. Spelvin bows and walks away.

"Goodbye," he calls. "See you again. Meanwhile—don't take any silver dollars. Ha, ha!"

And laughing merrily like a ticklish hyena, he goes on down the road.

I scratch my brain-bin.

"So you use Confederate money, eh?" I mutter. "I suppose you got similar customs along other lines?"

"What do you mean?" asks John Doe.

"Well—what's your favorite sport here, for example. What game do you play?"

"We like jigsaw puzzles," he tells me. I am baffled. "Jigsaw puzzles? That sounds normal enough to me."

"Yes. There's nothing we'd rather do than take a jigsaw puzzle apart."

"Take it apart?" I shout. "I thought so! Do you like music? Don't suppose you have any juke-boxes here?"

"Certainly we do," Doe comes back. "What's the current hit?"

"The Lost Chord," he tells me. "Just a few notes, but it sounds like nothing you'll ever hear."

"I believe you."

All of a sudden I see something off to one side of the road. A lot of clouds, very grey and dusty, that seem to be bubbling around in the air.

"What are those?" I inquire. "Figments," he tells me. "Just figments."

"Figments?"

"Figments of the imagination, of course," Doe explains. "Ideas that haven't crystallized yet."

He turns to me. "Maybe that's it—maybe you're an abstract notion that hasn't been fully developed."

I stop in the middle of the road. "Now get this straight. I take about all the insults I intend to this trip. All I want from here is out. Let's get down to brass tacks."

"Brass tacks? You want to go to the brass tacks storehouse?"

"Oh, cut it out, will you?" I wail. "Just take me to somebody who can explain all this."

"We are arriving now," Doe reminds me. "Right around the next turn in the road is the philosopher's house. If he can't solve your problem, nobody can."

SURE enough, we are coming around the bend at considerably less than 90 miles an hour when my whistle breaks into a scream. Because there, rising out of Nowhere, stands a little grey cottage.

Sitting right in front of it, at the side of the door, is a head.

At least, all I can see is a head. Everything else is hidden by stacks of books. Thousands and thousands of books, piled up around the doorway.

"When we get closer, I notice a little fellow huddled up behind the stacks. He is reading a heavy volume and he is so absorbed in it he does not even look up.

I give him a squint and realize why he looks peculiar. He is wearing three pairs of glasses!

"Is this your philosopher pal?" I whisper. "No," says John Doe. "Don't you realize who that is? That's Constant Reader."

"Well, I'll be damned," I predict. "He just sits out in front of the house all day and reads, I suppose."

"No," says Doe. "Sometimes he sits out in back of the house."

I let this one pass.

John Doe goes up and knocks on the door.

A very nice-looking young tomato sticks her noggin out and smiles.

"Is this the philosopher?" I whisper.

"Not at all," Doe answers. "That's Sally."

"I know," I snap. "She must be the Sally that everybody wonders what became of."

"Right," says John Doe. "You're catching on fast."

Sally shows us into the house. I think to myself that it is a pity a girl so young has grey hair and wonder if I should slip her a bottle of henna or something.

But there is no time, because we now stand in the parlor of the philosopher.

HE IS a very old personality with a very determined chin—three of them, in fact. And all covered with a beard. Needless to say, this beard is like everything else around here—full of tattle-tale grey.

His eyes flicker when he sees us, and he raises one hand out of the long white kimono he wears.

"Hail!" he says.

"Hail!" says John Doe.

"Cloudy, with showers," I predict.

"Lefty Feep," Doe pipes up, "Allow me to present that celebrated Greek philosopher and authority, Anonymous."

“What’s the name?”

“Anonymous,” Doe repeats.

“Don’t I hear this name before?” I mutter.

Anonymous hurls me a sneer. “Everyone reads my works.”

“What do you write for,” I inquire, “The Racing Form?”

“Not lately. Though once in a while I do give out a few hot tips.”

“Then I do not run across your stuff, I guess. Because all I read is the sporting papers and what I find written on the walls of phone booths.”

“I write all that,” Anonymous tells me. “Though I am more famous for my poetry and quotations.”

“You must pardon me if I interrupt this literary discussion,” John Doe breaks in. “We come to you because of a problem.”

“No time for problems,” Anonymous snaps. “See my cousin, Ibid.”

“But you must help us. It’s about Lefty Feep, here. Or rather, Lefty Feep, Nowhere. Because he doesn’t seem to belong Nowhere but maybe some place else.”

“Make your mind up,” Anonymous grunts. He turns to me. “What have you to say, Feep? Where are you from—here, there, or some place?”

“Well, I—”

“Arid remember, when I say ‘here’ I mean somewhere else, since obviously Nowhere can’t be here, even though this place is Nowhere. And when I say ‘some place’ I mean any place, but not this place. Here. You follow me?”

“I am too mixed up to follow anybody,” I confess. “Even a redhead.”

“I want to know from whence you hail,” growls Anonymous. “Hither, thither, or yon? Near or far? In or out, up or down, or just around the corner?”

“Not unless there’s a tavern on it,” I confess. “I am simply and purely an uptown boy. All I want is to get out of this place, wherever it is.”

“Wherever it isn’t, you mean.”

“I want to go home, as sure as I’m alive!” I yell.

Anonymous jumps out of his chair. “You hear—he thinks he’s alive!” he says to John Doe.

“That’s what I’m telling you,” John Doe answers. “I want you to do something.”

“Do something?” the philosopher comes back. “Never do today what you can put off until tomorrow.”

“But we can’t have a real person running around here in Nowhere.”

“Cheer up,” says Anonymous. “I’ll find a way. It’s always darkest just before it rains. Every silver lining has a cloud.”

“But—”

“I’ve got it! We’ll take him to see the Boss!” yells the old philosopher. “Let him decide what to do. You take him there, now.”

“Aren’t you coming along?”

“I’ve got a lot of letters to write,” says Anonymous.

So John Doe turns to me.

“Come on, Feep. We’re going to see The Boss,” he tells me.

“Think he can help me?” I asked. “Certainly.”

So I follow John Doe out of the philosopher’s dump and down the road again. We travel along the gravel for quite a distance.

“Who is this Boss you talk about?” I inquire.

“You’ll recognize him at once,” John Doe answers.

“He’s the big shot here in Nowhere?”

“Naturally. Who else would be?”

“But what’s his name and racket?”

“You’ll understand when you see him.”

And that is all I can get out of John Doe.

WE WANDER through the grey for a long time, and I don’t see anything of interest. Once I spot something queer in the distance. It looks like a large, black pony, only it has a human face. The face has a big cigar in its mouth and I also notice a human hand where one of the horse-hoofs should be. The hand is stuck out and seems to be shaking empty air.

“What is that?” I whisper.

“Oh, just a Dark Horse,” Doe tells me. “We’re grooming him for a political candidate.”

“Looks like one at that,” I answer, as the horse turns his back to us and goes on grazing.

But the grey fields are otherwise empty.

Until the house looms over the side of the road.

I stop short when I see the house. It startles me.

That is because this house has colors. It is white, with a green roof. It looks funny, because it is normal.

We head right for it.

“This is where the Boss lives?” I whisper.

“Right.”

We go through a gate and two finks sitting in lawn chairs get up and meet us.

“Which one is the Boss?” I ask.

“Neither. Meet Mr. Null and Mr. Void. They’re the Boss’s servants.”

I shake hands with Mr. Null and Mr. Void, both of whom have very blank looks on their faces. Neither of them smile or say anything. But a tougher bunch of bodyguards I never see. They follow us up the steps to the front door.

John Doe rings the bell.

The door opens and a man looks out.

His face looks very familiar. Very very familiar. I have a feeling I know him from somewhere but I just can’t place his name. It is a face I see all my life.

He shakes hands. “Hello, buddy,” he says.

His voice is familiar, too. I swear I talk to him before—maybe over the telephone.

I stare at him again. He is wearing ordinary clothes. A cheap blue suit and a white shirt and a blue tie with dots in it. He has brown shoes and black socks with clocks in them.

Even his clothes look familiar.

"Feep," says John Doe. "I want you to meet the Boss—Mr. Average Man."

Mr. Average Man! Of course that's who it is—and he naturally would be the boss here, too!

"Come in," says the Average Man.

We enter his house. Null and Void follow us but say nothing.

SOMEHOW I stick close to the Average Man. I figure he is the most human in this whole screwy setup. I decide it is easier to talk to him, and since he is the boss of Nowhere I might as well play along a little.

"This is certainly an honor to meet you," I pipe. "I hear about you for many years."

"Thanks," he says. The voice still sounds familiar. "Lucky you arrive when I'm home. Sometimes I'm working."

"Got a job, eh?"

"Part time." He leads us into the parlor. There is a lot of ordinarylooking furniture inside. "Sit down," he says.

We squat. He walks over to the radio and fiddles with it. Then he scowls.

"Won't work, I guess."

"Let me try it," I suggest. "Maybe I can fix it."

"I doubt it. You see, there's only 8/15th of a radio there."

"Only 8/15th of a radio?"

He nods. "Statistics show that the Average Man owns 8/15th of a radio."

I blink. What kind of talk is this?

"Have a cigarette?" The Average Man holds out a package. I take one. So does he. He holds his cigarette on the table, grabs a pocket-knife, and cuts it in half. He puts one half in his mouth and throws the other half away.

"Why that?" I ask.

"The Average Man smokes 2½ cigarettes a day," he tells me.

John Doe coughs a little. He wants to get in on the gab, too.

"Do any driving lately?" he inquires. The Average Man sighs. "How can I drive 5/6th of a car? he complains. "Part of one tire is missing and part of the engine is gone. I just buy the average quota of gas and oil, but I can't drive the car. It's only 7/12th paid for anyway."

"How's your wife?" John Doe goes on.

"Don't see much of her," says the Average Man. "You know we're 1/6th divorced."

"Too bad. Been feeling all right, though?"

The Average Man frowns. "My appendix is acting up a little."

"But isn't it out? Last year—"

"I know." The Average Man shakes his head. "It's out. But I've got 1/10th of an appendix left. The Average Man has l/10th of an appendix according to latest figures."

ALL this stuff is over my head like a dive bomber. But there is a sort of screwy sense behind it all. I am just beginning to figure things out when I hear John Doe talking.

He is telling the Average Man about me. How I claim to be alive and real, and what Anonymous says, and how we come to the Average Man to let him decide what to do with me.

And the Average Man is beginning to give me a very nasty glare.

"I don't believe it," he says. "I don't believe it. How can a real person exist in Nowhere?"

"But I'm here," I say.

"That's beside the point. I know where you are. The thing is—what will we do about it?"

"Can't you send me back?"

"Back to Earth?"

"Yes."

"Why should I?" asks the Average Man.

"But I can't stay here. I'm Lefty Feep and—"

"Exactly." He grins. "You are Lefty Feep. As Lefty Feep you don't belong in Nowhere. But if you become some one else, then—"

"Some one else? You mean you will change me into one of these symbol things like all the rest of you?"

The Average Man stands up.

"A mistake is made when you arrive here, obviously. As ruler of Nowhere it is up to me to rectify that mistake. Why send you back? Why not keep you here—change you into a symbolic figure and make you a useful citizen of Nowhere?"

"But I don't want to be anyone else."

"Anybody else—" The Average Man murmurs. Then he yells. "I've got it!" he shouts. "I've got it! I know who you'll be!"

"Who?"

"Why, the one missing symbol. Missing because he never exists. You'll be Nobody!"

"Who?"

"Just a Nobody!"

John Doe gets up and clasps his hands. "Splendid! Nobody is missing a long time. He looks like the perfect Nobody to me."

The Average Man smiles. "There's a privilege for you! You'll be Nobody from Nowhere!"

I think fast.

"But how can I be Nobody when I look like Lefty Feep?" I argue.

The Average Man gives me a chuckle. "Very simple, I will make you Nobody. All we do is cut off your head. Your head will still be alive but you'll have no body. You'll be Nobody—get it?"

I get it, but I don't like it.

I turn around and do a fast breakaway for the door.

There stand Mr. Null and Mr. Void, the bodyguards. Their faces are still blank but they grab me very firmly and hang on.

"NICE WORK, boys," says the Average Man. "Now we'll just snick off his head and make him Nobody in no time."

I am really scared now.

"Wait," I shout. "Think of the disgrace such a thing will mean. For the sake of your reputation—"

"The Average Man is respected," he tells me.

"Well, for the sake of your wife, then—"

"You forget I'm I/6th divorced," he laughs.

"But think of your family, your children—"

The Average Man suddenly looks mournful.

"My children," he sighs. "Yes, my poor kids. My poor two and 3/10ths children. What will I do about them?"

"Two and 3/10ths children you have?" I ask.

"That's the average," he answers. "The two are all right, but I don't know what to do about the 3/10ths. He isn't happy at all, and things are happening to him."

"What things?"

"Well you know how it is in such cases." The Average Man blushes. Then he whispers something to me.

I perk up.

"Listen," I say. Maybe I can help you with that."

"You can?"

"But only if you help me."

"I'll do anything. Anything."

"Can you send me back to Earth?"

"Well—I could."

"How?" I am taking no chances, see?

“If I stop believing in you, you’ll disappear,” he tells me. “Then you’ll probably go right back to earth.”

“Stop believing in me?”

“Of course. Anything the Average Man doesn’t believe in will disappear. For example, I’ve stopped believing in dictators lately—they will disappear soon.”

“That’s good news,” I answer. “But if I solve your problem about your two and 3/10ths children, will you stop believing in me?”

“It’s a deal,” says the Average Man. “Just tell me what I should do about the 3/10th one.”

So I bend over and whisper to the Average Man.

He gets it.

“Of course—thanks a million!” he chirps.

“All right. Stop believing in me.”

The Average Man nods. Then he closes his eyes.

I close mine. Because I am suddenly very dizzy. John Doe, Null and Void, the grey plains—all of them swirl around in a fog. The fog comes up. I feel myself falling, falling—

I land. Land on home base.

Right back where I started from. I am sitting in the big cup in the laboratory. The two scientific Americans, Skeetch and Meetch, are bending over me.

“What happens?” I gasp weakly.

“The machinery jams on us,” says Skeetch.

“How long was I out?” I ask.

“Two seconds,” Meetch answers.

“You mean that I go through all that in two seconds?” I wail. “But I can’t possibly—”

“What do you think happens?” asks Meetch.

Then I think about it. Maybe I pass out. Maybe it is all a nightmare.

Whatever it is, nobody will believe me. So I must let it go.

“What do you think happens?” Meetch repeats.

I sigh.

“Nothing,” I whisper. “Nothing happens.”

LEFTY Feep waved his arms.

“And so that is the way it ends. Skeetch and Meetch get back to fixing their atomic disintegrator or whatever, and I walk out and come here. My trip to Nowhere is ended.” He grinned. “Sometimes I hardly believe it myself.”

“You aren’t the only one,” I responded.

Feep pouted. “You mean you do not believe my story either?” he accused. “What is wrong with it?”

“I haven’t got the time or energy to go into that,” I told him. “So I’ll settle for just one point.”

“Which is?”

“This business about your meeting with the Average Man. You claim everything he had was just average. 5/6th of a car, and 8/15th of a radio, and two and 3/10th children.”

“Absolutely. Look up the statistics for yourself.”

“I’m not questioning the statistics. I’m questioning you. What I want to know is this—why did the Average Man let you come back?”

“Because like I say, I solve his problem for him. I tell him what to do about that 3/10th of a kid.”

“What was wrong with it?”

“What do you think?” Feep shrugged. “The kid is spoiled, of course.”

“But what did you tell him to do?” I persisted. “What can anybody do with 3/10th of a child?”

“Keep it in the ice-box,” grinned Lefty Feep.

Phantom from the Film

From a silver screen stalked! a shadowed slayer. What prompted its mad mission?

NOTHING is quite as refreshing as a nice cold glass of water. Tell you what you do—go pour yourself one, now. You're going to need it.

Good! Now drink about half of it.

There. Have you still got half a glass left? Are you sure that it's icy cold?

All right. Take that remaining half glass of ice-cold water and pour it down the back of your neck.

Then you'll feel the way I did on the night of Terry Sylvestro's preview. The cold shudder running down your spine will just about correspond with mine.

I'm not trying to sell you a bill of goods. Yes, I know—I'm Pat Peters, in publicity at Seven Arts Studios. A Hollywood press agent, always building up a phoney angle. But there was nothing phoney about Terry Sylvestro and his new horror movie. I only wish there was—then maybe I'd find it easier to sleep these nights. Sometimes, when that silvery shadow crawls across my chest and wriggles into my dreams—

But let me tell you what happened.

It all started when Terry Sylvestro announced the production of The Skull Man. That's big news along the Strip.

I don’t suppose you recognize Terry Sylvestro’s name. Funny, isn’t it?—the public is crazy about movie stars but nobody knows anything about the real big shots, the producers and directors. Outside of Orson Welles and De Mille they’re virtually unknown.

But the Coast knows Sylvestro. One of the big independent producers, a smart showman with a talent that spells boxoffice. Seven Arts was lucky to get a three-picture release deal with him. Everybody was on edge waiting for his first production announcement.

It came. I got the news the day it broke. Terry Sylvestro planned to produce The Skull Man.

A shiver drama from Sylvestro? I smelled a story. I hopped over to his office on the lot.

The story was waiting for me, all right.

“Get your hands off my throat!”

I heard the gasping wail as my fingers tightened on the knob of his office door. A woman’s wail of terror.

“Get them off—you’re choking me—Ooooooh!”

The door wrenched under the impact of my shoulder. I saw the owner of the voice—recognized her. Louise. My Louise!

Her fear-filled face hung before me, contorted in agonized dismay. And that was all I saw of her. For towering above her, broad shoulders moving convulsively as arms bent her body back, was a creature spawned in nightmare’s darkest halls.

The silvery monstrosity was like nothing human. The torso of an anthropoid, covered with slick, hairless skin that glistened evilly—a huge, bald head resting squarely on the neckless shoulders, and a face—

THE face turned toward me as the thing noted my entrance. I stared into the visage of a fiend. Fleshless, bony jaws champed fretted lips which parted to reveal yellowed fangs. Silvery cheekbones reared about a gaping hole where a nose should be. And above that, bedded in deep-set sockets, burned hell’s own fires. The eyes. The eyes of a demon, glaring with the idiot glee of a cavern gargoyle.

The creature hissed at me, and Louise screamed again. Then I lost my head. I started forward, arms swinging. The huge bulk of the monster loomed before me, but I didn’t hesitate. I lashed out savagely, felt my arm pinned from behind.

A voice chuckled.

“Take it easy, Pat. It’s all right.”

I wheeled.

Fat, bushy-haired little Terry Sylvestro stood grinning behind me.

“But he’s got Louise—he’s—”

“Isn’t it wonderful?” It was Louise who spoke. The monster’s hands still gripped her throat, but she smiled up at me.

“Wonderful? Why—”

“Of course, darling. I’m so excited! Sylvestro’s testing me for the feminine lead in his new picture.”

“All right,” I said. “I give up. And I suppose this skull-headed gorilla here turns out to be Robert Taylor or somebody.”

“Pat, I want you to meet a new star,” Sylvestro broke in. “This is Franz Basilov. I’ve just signed him for the title spot in Skull Man.”

Franz Basilov released Louise and grabbed my hand. He smiled through his heavy make-up, but the hideous leer of his pseudo-skull remained.

“Please to meet you, Mr. Petairs,” he said. His voice was deep and the accent heavy. “This is great day for me, you know. Now you excuse please, I go and remove this.” Again a smile. “I hope I do not frighten you.”

He loped out of the room as Louise giggled.

“Oh, darling, you were too funny—charging in here like a mad bull!”

“Go ahead and laugh,” I retorted. “Lucky for you it was only a test. Can’t blame me for falling for it, though. Certainly is a remarkable make-up job.” I turned to pudgy little Sylvestro.

“Who’s this guy Basilov?” I demanded. “Never heard of him before. Refugee import?”

"Not exactly." Sylvestro smiled. "He's a bit player. He's been in this country about six years."

"And you're going to make him carry the lead in your picture?" I exploded. "Are you crazy?"

"Not at all," the producer assured me. "Remember Frankenstein? What was Karloff before that? The film made the actor—the actor didn't make the film. That's the way Skull Man is going to work out. That's why I'm casting unknowns like Louise, here.

"Maybe you think I'm screwy." The word sounded queer falling from the lips of the erudite little production artist, for his eyes were glowing, intense, as he faced me.

"Yes, maybe you think I'm screwy. But you're wrong. I know a horror film is something out of my usual line. I know that the usual horror film is out of any intelligent producer's line. It's corny hokum.

"But I have something in mind that's different. A horror film that really horrifies! Not a stock plot with a series of stupid closeups of grotesque makeup, but a work of the calibre of Citizen Kane—with experimental lighting and camera angles to tell the story. To burn the story into the audience's brain. That's why I'm not using any name players. The camera will be the star of this picture."

I TAPPED a cigarette against the desk. Things were beginning to click now. "Sure, I get it. And what a spot for some real publicity releases! Sylvestro does an Orson Welles! Discovers celebrated new European horror star! A new thrill is arising from the lots of Seven Arts Studio to—"

A wave of Sylvestro's pudgy hand cut me short. Pie faced me, shaking his head.

"No, Pat. That's not the way. I don't want that kind of publicity. In fact, I don't want any publicity at all."

"What?"

"That's right. No publicity. Listen, Pat. I'm sticking my neck out here. For years I've wanted to do a horror film. For years I've filed away ideas, piled up research on the job. But it isn't the kind of thing Hollywood expects from me. I've never dared risk it. Now is the time. I'm doing this picture on a low budget, without name stars or writers. Production costs are low And Monsen handles the cameras, best man in the business. I'm going to turn out a 'sleeper' picture. If it goes over, fine. If not, nobody will be hurt—if we don't publicize it in advance."

I puffed on my cigarette.

"But can't I even play up this Franz Basilov? Give him a man of mystery buildup with the fan magazines?" Terry Sylvestro's eyes narrowed. "No, Pat. He's just an unknown, understand? He's a foreigner, he's nervous and excitable. As a matter of fact, his past is—dubious. And I don't want anybody bothering him. He's ideal for this role and I'm going to handle him myself and get out of him what I want. I'll make him the monster of all time—but you must let him alone. Remember what I said. The camera is the star of this movie."

In weeks to come I had good reason to remember what Terry Sylvestro said. Good and terrible reasons.

But we're coming to that.

I'll skip the weeks of production. I didn't see Louise at all. She was on the set day and night, and the set was closed to visitors. That meant studio officials too—when Terry Sylvestro gave an order, it went through.

Naturally the lot was full of rumors about Sylvestro's new picture. The designers hinted that he had gone crazy—was ordering the most outlandish sets and props. The other cameramen couldn't get a thing out of Monsen. He and Sylvestro were always closeted in the laboratories with the day's rushes.

But the big mystery was Franz Basilov. Who was he, and what was he? Why were he and Sylvestro inseparable—going and coming together to and from the studio?

There were whispers of his conduct on the set. How he worked only to music. How Sylvestro was driving him until he cracked up into almost daily hysterics.

They said he was a dope fiend—that he was crazy—that Sylvestro hypnotized him before he went before the cameras—that he was a genius—that he was a moron—that he was actually the monster he meant to portray.

"They" said. I didn't say anything. I just sat back and waited. I still had that feeling that a big story was about to break. Without seeing Louise, without talking to Sylvestro, without checking rumors—I waited.

THEN came the preview.

It wasn't announced. Usually a Terry Sylvestro preview is an event. They run the film in three or four suburban houses simultaneously to get audience reaction. There's a lot of ballyhoo and excitement. But in keeping with his policy on this picture, there was no announcement, no fanfare. Louise called me up that afternoon. "Hello, darling—are you taking me to the preview tonight?"

"What preview—where?"

She told me. It was an obscure little house in Glendale.

"Sure. Shall I pick you up?"

She agreed. Her voice aroused my concern. It was a weary voice, and I might be haywire, but I could swear I detected a note of fright in it. Surely Louise didn't talk like a girl who might be on the verge of stardom. She didn't sound as if this preview meant a life-or-death verdict to her career. She sounded as though it just meant a life-or-death verdict to her.

But then, I was imagining things. Or was I?

Because when I drove her to the theater, I got a nasty shock.

Louise was pale, thin. Her eyes were circle-haunted. Her smile was forced, fixed. She trembled, but not from excitement.

I was smart enough to play dumb. I didn't appear to notice anything out of the way. My questions were innocent enough on the surface.

"Who's showing up?"

"Sylvestro, of course. And Monsen. And I suppose Dick Blynn."

Dick Blynn was a stock-contract pretty boy who played the male lead opposite Louise in the film.

"Anybody else?"

"Well, Mr. Kruger will be there." Barney Kruger, the Big Boss of the studio. He would be.

"What about the new star? What about Franz Basilov?"

Was I really seeing things or did Louise turn pale?

"He—he isn't coming," she whispered. "He can't."

"Can't come? But this is his great moment—"

"He's sick," Louise murmured. "He collapsed on the set on the last day of shooting. Overwork."

"Sylvestro must have driven him pretty hard, eh?"

"Yes." There was a quaver in Louise's voice. "He had to go through tortures with that makeup."

"By the way, who handled the job?"

"Why, Sylvestro did it himself."

"Sylvestro?"

"Yes, he and Monsen. It took five hours every day to apply it and three to get it off. It's something new—special. For camera effects. It's horrible."

She made no effort to control her shudders now.

"Louise. What's the matter?"

"Darling, I'm frightened."

That was no news report. She huddled close to me, biting her lips as she continued.

"That awful face," she gasped. "I can't bear to think of the way he looked—that skull—"

I SENSED something phoney here. I remembered the day I broke in on their test for the parts. Basilov was wearing makeup then and Louise wasn’t frightened. No, there was something else behind this, behind all the rumors on the lot, behind Louise’s hysteria.

She was whimpering on.

“The way he used to look at me on the set—as if he were dead. And he spoke like that, too, as though he were talking in his sleep. Or from beyond the grave.”

“Come on, Louise, snap out of it.”

“I can’t. You don’t understand. You don’t know what Sylvestro used to do to him. The way he talked to him in his dressing room. The way he directed him with his hands. And the torture he went through, with his makeup burning into his skin. Basilov told me when Sylvestro was away. He told me what the part was doing to him. It was like a vampire—draining him of his life, his soul.”

I stopped the car and took Louise by the shoulders.

“Here, now. Seems to me that you’re the one who’s collapsed, not Basilov. What’s all this about Sylvestro torturing the guy? What kind of a picture is this, anyway?”

“You’ll see,” was all that Louise would tell me.

And I did.

The dingy marquee of the little theatre bore no hint of the preview performance. But when we walked down the aisle as the feature flickered to its end, I noted the little block of seats reserved for Dick Blynn, Sylvestro, Monsen, the Big Boss, and ourselves. One extra seat—that would be for the missing Basilov, of course.

We sat down. The others straggled in. Dick Blynn tapped my shoulder casually. Monsen, the cameraman, gave me a curt flicker of recognition from behind thick-lensed spectacles. Sylvestro entered with the Big Boss. He was dressed to the hilt—his usual custom on preview evenings. His smile was disarming.

I stared at Louise’s pallid face in the gloom. Was she imagining things? None of the others looked a bit excited.

But as the feature ended, Louise squeezed my arm at the elbow until I winced with pain. She almost gasped as the preview announcement flared up, followed by the title.

"The Skull Man"

Then hell broke loose.

Never mind what the picture was about. It was all Terry Sylvestro hinted at, and more. Weird musical effects, distorted camera pans and angle shots, and a fantastic story about a man who became a zombie, long after death—a walking dead man whose head was a bare and grinning skull.

Dialogue carried the action along. Louise and Blynn dominated the early scenes. But all the while the film was building up to the climax—the moment when Basilov, as the zombie, Skull Man, would walk.

THE moment came. The scene was a cellar crypt beneath an old house. Here Skull Man lay in ghastly slumber by day, waiting sunset time to rise and walk. The camera bore down on the door of the cellar as the light faded.

Then came the hellish part.

The film went three-dimensional!

The audience gasped. So did I.

So this was what Sylvestro had up his sleeve—this was why he had devised special makeup and closeted himself with Monsen the camera-man!

Three dimensional film. Two projectors running together is the old, imperfect process. But this was different. I looked at the back of the house. Only one machine running film. Yet the illusion was perfect. You could see the door stand out on the screen. It was vivid.

The audience was in a frenzy. They sat on the edge of their seats, these suburban movie-goers, and waited for the horror to appear on film.

It appeared.

As the door swung open—actually swung outward, I could swear—the figure stood revealed.

Skull Man!

I could see the gleaming silver body bulking, the face hidden by shadows. Arms swung forward, almost off the screen. And the monster advanced, straight for the camera. It was a medium shot and the image was life-size. The shadows fell away. I saw the face of Skull Man.

Louise gasped at my side, but I didn't notice. All I could hear was the pulsing terror-throb of my own heart. For the face of Skull Man was the face of living death.

Death's teeth were fixed in a snarl of hate. Death's bony muzzle leered out from the screen. And his eyes—his eyes bulged and blazed from the hollow sockets in a stare that transfixed my spine.

Skull Man moved forward, towards the audience. The crowd screamed as one. It looked as though he were actually walking into the theatre. His arms clawed out. He reached. His feet moved.

And then—

Skull Man walked off the screen!

I saw it with my own eyes. Five hundred others saw it too. We didn't notice the muffled crash in the projection booth behind us. We didn't notice how the film flickered and died away. All we saw—all we could see—was that incredible silver figure, stepping from the screen to the stage. A life-sized silvery image—an image of walking death.

It moved to the edge of the stage. The crowd was on its feet. Louise was holding my arm, trying to tell me something. Her voice was lost in the single scream torn from the audience's throat. I didn't look at her. I looked at Skull Man.

Looked at him and through him . . .

His image was transparent. Solid—but transparent. But three-dimensional. Very.

Even as I watched, the monster was moving. His legs flashed. And then —

Skull Man leaped from the stage into the audience below!

THE silver body hurtled through darkness, arms outstretched. I saw it swoop and land. The skull-head descended, arms closed on a man's neck.

They were climbing over the seats in panic, now. The screams rose to a crescendo of fear. Somebody at the back of the house turned on the lights.

That did it. I could see everything. A little vacant space had been cleared in the block of seats where the silvery figure landed. Fleeing spectators huddled away from the man who now struggled in strangulation under those silver fingers.

I saw his body twist and turn. I saw his purple face.

But Skull Man—

There was nothing there! With the lights on, the figure from the screen had disappeared!

And yet the body hung in air a moment before sagging to the floor of the aisle. The skull-headed creature was nowhere to be seen!

Then the crowd swept back. Something was pushing through the packed mass. Something strong. Something—invisible.

For a moment, as the little wave of movement passed me, I caught a hideous glimpse of a silvery-transparent torso against the background of a woman's dark coat. Just a glimpse, nothing more. Then it was gone.

And now Terry Sylvestro was dragging me out of the theatre. I half-carried Louise through the mob. Straggling behind us came Monsen, Blynn, and the Big Boss. Monsen's goggle-eyes loomed close as he screamed in my ear.

"For God's sake, Pat—think of something! He's escaped—out of the theatre—loose now out there—loose on the world—"

We made our way through, somehow. But it wasn't until we locked ourselves in the manager's office with that worthy and a hysterical machine operator that we did any talking.

Then there was nothing to say. Nothing to do.

We couldn't help the manager. We couldn't help the shocked projectionist. Neither of them knew anything, or had any explanation. All we could do was get out before the police arrived on the scene.

Terry Sylvestro summed it all up in his car as we sped away.

“I thought I was making something new—but it turned out to be Frankenstein after all. I’ve created a monster. I pray it doesn’t destroy me—and all of us.”

“But how?” whispered the Big Boss, lips ashen as the tip of the cigar clenched between them.

“I don’t know. I don’t understand. The three-dimensional effect is ordinary enough. Something Monsen and I worked out together for a surprise. It’s a revolution, but it isn’t responsible for that—thing. I’d swear to it.

“Of course we used new makeup. I worked with Basilov for hours. I wanted him to ‘live’ the part. I’m afraid that somehow I’ve succeeded too well.”

“But how do you explain it?” the Big Boss persisted.

“I can’t. Nothing in physics, nothing in any science, nothing in any superstition can explain it. It’s new. A man’s image emerges from the screen as projected lightrays in bodily manifestation. Alive. And with a purpose, a will of its own. A will to destroy.”

“Yes,” Louise murmured. “And it’s escaped in the city.”

“THAT’S just it.” Sylvestro sighed and brushed his hand through his hair with a despairing frown. “It’s loose. Somewhere out there it’s lurking. What it is and what it wants we don’t know.

“But we must do something about it.” Sylvestro sighed again.

“What can we do?” It was Monsen who spoke. “If it’s a film image it isn’t visible in light. You can’t see it. We found that out when the lights went up in the show. It’s visible only against a background in darkness. Of course, even in darkness you can’t see the image at an 180 degree angle.”

“Yes.” It was Dick Blynn’s quavering voice. The young juvenile was badly frightened. “And if you do see it—then what? How can you kill an image?”

That silenced us all. For long minutes we sped on in silence.

I forced a grin.

“Cheer up. We’ll think of something. Meanwhile let’s get a little rest. Tomorrow is another day.”

Well, I was wrong about getting some rest. I doubt if anybody slept much that night.

But I was right about tomorrow being another day. And what a day!

I spent the morning in town, clamping down on the press. The Big Boss pulled every string he knew, but I had to do plenty of fast talking to keep the story of last night’s tragedy out of the papers.

The yarn would spread fast enough, anyway. But printed in the newspapers, it would cause city-wide panic. Nation-wide, perhaps. The gruesome revelation that an invisible monster was abroad ravening to kill—a monster bullets could not harm—would mean catastrophe.

The story was killed, somehow.

And when I got back to the studio, Dick Blynn was killed. Not somehow. But by—Skull Man.

They found him just inside the studio gates, lying behind his station wagon on the ground. He might have keeled over from a heart attack—but a heart attack doesn’t leave the marks of squeezing talons around the throat.

“He’s here—in the studio.” That’s what Sylvestro said when I entered his office. “He’s out to get us all.”

I didn’t listen to him. I was trying to smile at Louise. She sat there, next to Monsen, wide-eyed with horror.

“We’re safe here,” I assured her. “Look, there’s a police guard just outside the door.”

“But they can’t see it in daylight,” Sylvestro objected. I could have kicked him.

“Still, there’s the door itself,” I went on. “If the thing is solid now it can’t pass a locked door.”

"It could slip in sideways," Monsen reminded me. "It just looks solid. Actually it's almost two-dimensionally thin."

I had a kick waiting for the cameraman, too.

But I persevered.

"Look here, we're going to find a way out of this. The first thing we must do is to study this creature—your creation. What are its habits? What is it after?"

"Us." Louise said it.

"But why?"

"Because it hates us. It loves to kill and it hates us. It's a character in a movie, remember. A mad thing. And we, all of us, were opposed to it. That's why it killed Blynn. Because he was the hero. And I'm—the heroine."

I PUT my arms around her.

"All right. Let's grant that for the moment. But why should it kill that man in the theatre last night?"

"Panic. Or perhaps it was looking for us."

"Wait a minute. There's one sure way of finding out a few facts about Skull Man. Let's talk to the man who created him—really created the part and personality. Sylvestro—where is Franz Basilov?"

For a moment Terry Sylvestro's eyes avoided mine. The producer bent his head as he answered.

"Basilov's ill. He collapsed, I told you. Don't drag him into this thing, Pat. The shock might be too great. It would kill him if he knew."

"It may kill him if he doesn't know," I retorted. "Get him down here to the studio right away. Every minute counts."

Sylvestro called. Basilov was on his way. We sat in silence. Each of us was watching the door—watching for what? An invisible presence? Here in daylight the whole thing seemed grotestque, absurd. But there was nothing absurd about the dead man in the theater and the strangled corpse of Blynn.

One more call was put through. The Big Boss did it. Shut down the studio and put a police guard around every lot. Only Basilov's car could come through now. If the monster was here at Seven Arts he would menace no one but ourselves.

A pleasant thought.

I nursed it until Basilov came in.

Then I got another shock. I'd seen Basilov only once, remember. At that time he was wearing the makeup for Skull Man.

It was a very different figure who now entered the office. Franz Basilov was tall and thin. His shoulders were stooped, his hair greying and sparse over his domed brow. His features were emaciated but kindly, and the only light in his haggard eyes was a glow of docility.

This man was no monster. This man was no phantom or fiend. He was—weak-willed.

"Weak-willed." The phrase struck a responsive chord in my brain. Basilov was weak-willed. Louise had said something about that—

But Basilov didn't leave me in perplexity.

He came into the room, hands twitching at his sides. His eyes lighted on Sylvestro and his lips twisted back in a convulsive tremor.

"So," he muttered. "It has happened, no? You knew it would. I warned you. You cannot tamper with the mind, with the psyche.

"You made me wear the makeup You kept whispering to me your suggestions of evil. You commanded me to be the monster. You would not let me alone for an instant, no? Day and night you hounded me—"

"You're hysterical, Basilov!" shouted Sylvestro. "You're mad—"

"You are the one that is mad." Basilov stood before the desk, pale face drawn in a frown of accusation.

"You talk to me in my sleep. You make me watch the lights after I drink the solution and you suggest things to me that make me dream. You turn my soul into something wicked and dreadful that shines out onto the screen. You create this thing from my soul. You talk to me when I sleep—"

"HYPNOTISM!" I sat up. I had it now. Those yarns about Basilov being drugged, or crazy. Louise's story of being frightened by the man because his voice came from beyond the grave. The yarns about Sylvestro never letting Basilov out of his sight. Basilov was weak-willed. Sylvestro hypnotized him, made him a monster by influencing his subconscious while he was under the influence of some drug which released inhibitions. This, plus the strange makeup, plus the third-dimensional process combined in some way to create a new being—the image of Skull Man on the screen. And it came alive as a separate personality and body.

The realization was just a flash.

Basilov was still speaking when I finished my chain of reasoning. Sylvestro sat defiantly in his chair, an ugly smile about his lips.

"Crazy," he hissed. "Crazy as a loon."

Then I saw it. Saw it out of the corner of my eye.

Just a shadow. A silver shadow. Pencil thin against the dark shadow of the desk on the floor. Suddenly I saw it broaden. Of course—the angle of refraction was lessened. Now the grotesque elongated transparency that was the creature's body suddenly loomed upward.

Basilov saw it, too, but not in time.

He gave a choking cry. Hands went to his neck. And then, the monster struck.

I thought of de Maupassant's Horla. I thought of the struggle between Jekyll and Hyde. I thought of screaming, myself. I did.

Then I wrenched the gun from my pocket and pumped blindly at the air—the flailing air about Basilov's contorted body.

But he was slumping to the floor, throttled by that invisible monstrosity.

"Louise!" I yelled. I caught a glimpse of Sylvestro and Monsen racing out of the door. Louise was following, slowly.

"Louise—run for it!"

She heard me.

I turned to Basilov. Too late. He was lying there. And above him, as the sun went behind a cloud, I caught the faintest glimpse of the grisly shape of the screen monster, crouching at the kill.

A wild thought swept through my brain. Lucky for us the image emerging from the screen was only life-size—what if it had come off in a closeup later on?

Later on . . .

There was a clue here, somehow.

I wanted to think about it, but there wasn't time. I had to get out of here, follow Louise, protect her.

I made for the door. The leprous silver image was behind me. It moved fast. Fast as light.

I ran down the hall. Ahead the trio was racing on. Sylvestro and Monsen were leading. Louise struggled to keep pace. Sylvestro reached the door of the projection booth in the studio theatre, where the daily rushes were shown. The thing was solid metal. He had chosen it with an eye to protection.

He disappeared inside. Monsen followed. Then they shut the door. Louise arrived, found it slammed in her face. She rapped frantically, kicked against the metal. The door held.

"Let me in—it's coming!"" she gasped.

The door stayed shut. The cowards were taking no chances with their own skins.

I turned.

SWOOPING in midair behind me, swooping silently, sinisterly, was the phantom from the screen—Skull Man. A wave of transparent death flowed down the corridor towards us.

I grabbed Louise by the waist.

"Down!" I muttered. And dumped her to the floor. We crouched there in the corner. The thing didn't stop. It flowed forward, straight for the metal door. Then it stopped, hung in midair. Baffled.

No! Suddenly the image seemed to alter its shape grotesquely. The head and shoulders were huge, but the torso and legs dwindled. Then I saw. It was bending sideways—bending sideways and sliding under the door!

A moment's silence. Then a muffled scream from within the projection booth. A scream and a crash.

The door flew back. I caught a glimpse of Sylvestro writhing on the floor, enmeshed in a silver shroud of death. Then Monsen staggered out, eyes sick with loathing and despair.

He came to us, voice hoarse with panic.

"The thing's got Sylvestro. It'll look for us next. What'll we do?"

"Wait."

I held him down beside us. Louise and Monsen kept their eyes averted, but I watched carefully as the silver image rose from the huddled shape on the floor and then flowed out through the projection slit of the booth itself and into the theatre beyond.

"Then, "Come on," I shouted. And dragged Louise forward. Straight into the projection booth!

Monsen followed. He screamed his terror.

"What are we going in here for? We won't be safe. Sylvestro wasn't. What can we do? We can't hide from it. We can't shoot it or burn it or kill it in any way. It's loose on the world, forever—"

"Shut up." I grabbed the cameraman by the collar. "Shut up and listen. I've got an idea. Where's the film for the Skull Man?"

"Why, the can's right here. We only made one proof for the preview showing. Rest of the stuff is still over in the cutting-room with the masters."

"Never mind that. I want the film you showed at the preview."

"Here it is—but what are you going to do?"

"Rewind."

"Rewind? But then—"

So I told him. Told him in a few short, crisp sentences. Monsen rewound. I got the projector ready.

"Second reel, wasn't it?" I asked.

“Yes.”

“Well, make sure. Our lives may depend on it.”

Monsen rewound. Louise helped. In this crisis her panic evaporated. She managed to force a smile. Good girl, Louise.

I DIDN’T rewind, and I didn’t smile.

I stared out of the slit in the booth at the theatre beyond—stared out of the slit through which the silver monstrosity had so incredibly crawled.

I looked into the yawning darkness of the little studio theatre and saw the silvery horror stalk. It was perfectly visible now—a phosphorescent phantom, sometimes life-size and sometimes hideously thin as It turned at an angle from my eyes.

It was searching for us. Its talons were extended to kill. Its skull-head was bent forward as bony jaws opened and eyes stared intent on destruction.

It was searching. In a moment it would notice that the projection booth was occupied once more. In a moment it would see us and flow forward, flow forward to rend and destroy.

“No sound! Track’s not set!” Monsen’s whisper was frantic.

“Nevermind. Let’ergo!” I yelled the command.

Light flashed on the theatre screen. The projector started. The film went on.

Then the monster saw us. I didn’t wait.

“Faster!” I yelled.

Monsen stepped it up. He was sweating blood, but he knew his film.

Louise was fighting to keep down a scream.

The silver horror glided straight up for the booth. I didn’t watch. I kept my eyes on the screen. The film shuttled by. Swiftly.

And then, it happened.

Suddenly the silver phantom halted. It was almost up to the booth now.

The skull-eyes were wild with maniac glee. The claws, those intangible claws, loomed at my very throat. It was poised for the kill, ready to spring.

It sprang. I braced myself.

Then, in midair, the gleaming body stopped. Stopped so swiftly as to hang suspended in a flying leap.

Bit by bit it moved back, away. As though it were on the end of a piece of string that was being rewound. As though it were a fish being hauled in on the end of a line.

Further and further back moved the silver body. And all at once it was flying towards the stage. There was an indescribable look of confusion and apprehension in the horrid countenance. The arms scrabbled impotently at empty air.

Then it was even with the stage, flush against the screen. And all in a moment, as the film flickered on, the figure abruptly descended into the screen itself.

Descended, and disappeared.

IT was just a matter of seconds before the reel was finished. I halted the projector, yanked out the can. We tore it open, lifted the film from its spool. Monsen offered matches without a word.

The film sailed out of the booth in a fiery arc, and landed in a burning heap on the stone floor of the bare theatre beyond.

I turned and faced Louise with an honest grin on my face.

"That does it," I told her.

"But how did you think of it—where did you get the idea?" she murmured. "Running the film backwards."

"Just a hunch," I admitted. "We don't know yet what created the monster. All we know is that he came from out of the film. Therefore there was a chance in a million that he could be drawn back into it—if we ran the reel in which he appeared in reverse."

"Well it worked." Monsen heaved a sigh.

"Wait a minute. The job isn't ended," I reminded him. "We'll burn all the rest of the reels. The masters, too. We must destroy this creature utterly, so that he can never escape again. Trap him on celluloid and then burn him. Fire alone can cleanse the earth of evil."

I stared sombrely at the flaming pile on the theatre floor. The smoke pouring up assumed a fanciful shape to my tired eyes. For a moment I almost thought I detected the twisting, ghostlike image of the silvery monster. Then it was gone—forever.

And The Skull Man went with it. You'll never hear the story or see the picture now. But maybe it's as well.

As for me, I'm done with horror films. So is Louise. She's working in a love story now—but not in the movies.

We spend our evenings at home, Louise and I. We never go to the movies any more.

Some folks laugh at us for that—but I guess you'll understand. Because somewhere, sometime, it may happen again.

A Bottle of Gin

What would you do if you were suddenly faced by a fifty-foot pillar in human shape—black-limbed, writhing like a snake, and with an insane desire to destroy?

MR. COLLINS scampered up the steps. His twitching chin, long, wobbly ears, and pinkly bloodshot eyes gave him the appearance of a frightened rabbit. Rabbit-fashion, he glanced fearfully over his shoulder, then scurried into the burrow of the building.

Little Mr. Collins bounded down a long hall on short legs. The museum corridor was deserted, but his pink eyes revolved fearfully. With a sigh of relief, he made for a door marked Curator's Office and hurried inside.

The young lady in the outer waiting room rose from her desk with a look of vague solicitude.

"Tom," she exclaimed. "Tom—where have you been? You worried me sick these past three days. Why didn't you call me?"

Mr. Collins gave her a fleeting glance.

"Sorry, Edith. I can't explain now. Is the Doctor in?"

The young lady marched around the desk. Her lips curled, not in solicitude, but in sudden scorn.

"Tom—you've been drinking again! Out on another bender, I suppose. Just look at you! A fine wreck you are. Haven't been to bed for three days, I suppose."

Little Mr. Collins groaned. “That’s right. I haven’t. But it’s not what you think, Edith, honest it’s not. I haven’t touched a drop—”

“Huh!” Edith snorted scornfully. It was a most unpleasant sound, and Mr. Collins winced. Then he straightened.

“I’ve got to see Doctor Sweet at once,” he insisted.

“He’s busy. Can’t be disturbed. Now, Tom, look at me! I want you to explain right this instant just what you’ve been up to and—”

Mr. Collins suddenly darted past her and whirled through an inner door. His sweaty palm locked it behind him.

He stood, gasping for breath, in Doctor Sweet’s private office. The Curator’s sanctum was large, and necessarily so. For the room was literally and incredibly stuffed with objects. Rows of books. Shelves of books. Piles of books. Statuary. Idols. Figurines. Tables filled with jars. Tables filled with vases. Tables filled with bottles. The floor was carpeted with papers and manuscripts. The desk in the center of the room was completely submerged beneath a miscellany of paraphernalia.

It took a full minute before Mr. Collins was able to detect the figure of Doctor Sweet, buried behind the debris on his desk. Then the Doctor rose, as if to fully establish his presence.

“Well?” said the old man. His hands raked upward over a dome-like forehead and into a tangle of bushy white hair. They finally encountered a pair of spectacles, which Doctor Sweet now drew down to eye level.

“By Bel and Astarte!” he exclaimed. “Collins!”

Little Mr. Collins took a step forward and gulped. “I’m back,” he announced. “So I see. Burn me in Moloch’s mouth if you aren’t! Have you got it, man? Have you got it?”

“Here.”

MR. COLLINS fumbled inside his coat, drew out an object wrapped in tissue-paper.

Doctor Sweet grabbed for it with careful haste. We undid the wrappings, then cupped the object in his hands.

“Perfect!” he muttered. “Early Korean. This vase completes the collection. By the Cabala, it’s a gem. I congratulate you.”

Mr. Collins turned pale. “You’d better offer me condolences,” he whispered.

“What’s tire matter?”

“What’s the matter? Don’t you know?”

“I’ve been very busy, son. Very busy. Going through my collection. Three days now.”

“Well, while you’ve been going through your collection, I’ve been going through hell.”

“Very interesting.” Doctor Sweet turned, his hands caressing the tear-vase. “You must tell me about it some time. Right now I’m very busy. Excuse me.”

“Listen, Doctor.” Collins was tense. “If you don’t hear me now, there may not be another time.”

“Quit talking nonsense, son. I asked you to go up to Mr. Sung’s house to buy this vase. You’ve done so. What you’ve been doing in the past three days does not concern me. Out on a rip-snorter, I’ll bet.” The old man cackled suddenly.

Collins lost his temper.

“You make me sick!” he shouted. “You and your secretary both! Out on a tear, was I? I’ll have you know that for the past three days I’ve been riding the subway in fear of my life.”

“Very dangerous things, subways,” Doctor Sweet observed. “Never ride them myself.”

Mr. Collins uttered a low moan.

“Get this through your head,” he screeched. “When I went up to Sung’s place to buy the vase, his downstairs shop was robbed. Some thugs held up the antique place and we heard them. Sung went down the stairs after them and they shot him. They saw me with the vase in my hand and started after me—three of them. Gorillas.”

“My goodness!” clucked the Doctor, as though humoring a child. “Must have been after that fine antique collection of his.”

“Of course they were,” Collins wailed. “But that’s not important. They were after me, too.”

“This vase is worth twenty thousand,” tire Doctor gloated. “I don’t blame them. By Eblis, I don’t at that.”

Collins muttered something under his breath, then recovered. “So I ran out the back entrance and made for the subway. They followed me. And for the last three days I’ve been dodging them from train to train. They’re after me in shifts. I recognize all three of them now. Naturally I couldn’t go to the police because there’s no record that Sung sold the vase to me before he was murdered. So I’ve had to ride the damned trains until I could net away, without sleep or rest or food or—”

“How distressing.” Doctor Sweet placed the vase carefully on a shelf. “Well, the vase is safe now. Why don’t you go home and shave? You look awful.”

Mr. Collins danced a cadenza of fright about the room.

“I’ll look quite awful if they catch up with me,” he answered. “I’m afraid to leave for fear they’re waiting outside.”

“By the Four Books!” exclaimed the Doctor. “That’s very exciting, isn’t it? If I were in your place then, I wouldn’t go outside.”

Mr. Collins suddenly slumped into a chair.

“What’s the matter?”

“I’m dying,” he groaned. “Dying from hunger. For mercy’s sake, get me something to eat.”

“I have a sandwich left from lunch in the other office,” said Doctor Sweet, dubiously. “So you care for minced ham?”

“I’ll swallow anything,” Collins gasped.

Abruptly, the little man’s eyes swivelled to the row of bottles and beakers on the desk. There were tall bottles and small bottles, some stoppered and some open. Green ones and brown ones.

"That's what I need," he mumbled to himself. "A drink."

"What's that?" Doctor Sweet paused at the door.

"I merely asked you what was in that bottle."

Collins levelled a finger at random, selecting a tall brown bottle which stood apart from the rest at the back of the table.

"That bottle?" Doctor Sweet eyed him curiously.

Yes.

The Doctor told Collins in a single word. He left the room.

TWO SECONDS later Collins was at the table. His frantic fingers scrabbled at the bottle, tore at the tight cork. He wrenched it free, held the brown bottle, to his lips, and gulped. Then he sank back and tottered over to his chair.

When Doctor Sweet re-entered the room he found Mr. Collins sitting slumped in his seat with a most peculiar expression on his face.

Suddenly he gave a little hiccup.

The Doctor ignored it and extended a sandwich.

"Here's the minced ham," he said. Collins peered at the offering with pale distaste.

"I don't want it," he said.

"What's that?"

Collins hiccuped again.

"Something wrong?"

"Hie."

"Collins—what's the matter?"

"Hie."

Doctor Sweet shook the little man's shoulders.

"What did you do?" he demanded.

"I—hie—took a swig out of that bottle of—hie—gin you have."

"Gin?" said Doctor Sweet. "By Allah's beard, I haven't any gin here."

“You said so before you left,” Collins accused. “You told—hie—me that there was gin in that brown bottle.”

“Great jumping dervishes!”

“What’s—hie—wrong?”

“I didn’t say there was gin in that bottle.”

“No?”

“I said there was a djinn in there.” Doctor Sweet goggled. “A djinn,” he repeated. “A genie. An elemental spirit imprisoned in a bottle. And you’ve swallowed him!”

Collins nodded weakly.

“I just took a gulp,” he whispered. “Something went down into my stomach, hard. Hie.”

“Dear me,” the Doctor wailed. “One of my most priceless treasures, too. That bottle was hundreds of years old. Found off the Persian Gulf. I’ve always been careful to keep it sealed, too. These djinn are terribly dangerous if let free. That’s why Solomon imprisoned them. And now you’ve got to go and swallow one.”

Collins tottered to his feet.

“You mean I have a guy in my stomach?” he croaked. “Well, get him out of there.” Excitement stifled his hiccups.

Doctor Sweet ran his hand into cottony hair. “I’m afraid I can’t,” he whispered. “You don’t understand. If the djinn is released, he’ll run wild. You’ll just have to keep him there.”

“Not on your life,” Collins announced. “I want a meal on my stomach, not a midget.”

“That’s just it,” the Doctor answered. “The djinn is a small creature when he is imprisoned. But once released, his substance grows like a cloud of smoke. He becomes a huge pillar in human shape. Perhaps fifty feet tall. He wants to destroy, wreak havoc.”

COLLINS wasn't listening. He was busily engaged in thrusting a finger down his throat.

Doctor Sweet jumped for his hand. "No, don't!" he gasped. "He'll escape."

"I want him to. You think I'm going to walk around with this—monster—inside of me? Get him back in his bottle."

"I wish I could," sighed the Doctor. "But he wouldn't go back. From now on, you're his bottle."

"Me?" Collins stared at his paunch. "I'm a human bottle for some oriental demon?"

"I'm afraid so. We'll just have to find a way out, somehow."

Collins glanced despairingly at the ham sandwich.

"I'm so hungry," he wailed. He reached for the bread.

"You can't eat." Doctor Sweet snatched his hand back. "Don't you understand? Food will displace the djinn."

"What'll we do, then? Stomach pump?"

"And let him out? Certainly not!"

"You've got to think of something, quick!"

"I know, I know." The Doctor moved towards the window, head bowed. He wheeled, suddenly. "Do you snore?"

"Snore? What's that matter?"

"Do you snore?" the Doctor demanded. "Suppose so."

"Then," decided the old man, "I must forbid you to sleep. Once you fall asleep and let your mouth hang open, the djinn comes out."

"Oh!" groaned Collins. "Fine help you are!"

"Of course," the Doctor mused, "you can have three wishes."

"Wishes?"

"Yes. It is a custom of djinns to offer their captors three wishes before being released. You might make a deal with the djinn."

"How?"

"Maybe you can talk to him," suggested Doctor Sweet.

"Talk to my own stomach?"

"Ventriloquists do."

Mr. Collins drew a long breath. "All right," he muttered. "All right, then." He paused. His voice receded peculiarly in his throat.

"Hey! Hey you down there."

A sound came from Collins' mouth. It wasn't his voice, but a voice spoke. A hollow voice. An entombed voice.

"Yes, Master."

THE actual sound of the reply disconcerted both men. Collins shuddered. When he attempted to go on, he discovered that there was really nothing his trembling voice could say. What would one say to a djinn under such circumstances?

"How's—how's things down there?" was the only inanity he could bring forth.

"Very distressing, Master. Please permit me to leave."

"He wants out," Collins whispered.

The Doctor nodded. "Naturally."

"What about my three wishes?" Collins asked.

The voice from his stomach grew soft. "But certainly, Master! Three wishes—whatever your esteemed presence desires." Collins turned to Doctor Sweet. "You heard him? Suppose I wish he was back in his bottle?"

SWEET shook his head. "Wouldn't work, I'm afraid. That's destroying part of the agreement, you see."

"Yes, I suppose so."

The Doctor took Collins by the shoulder. "On second thought, I don't believe it's safe for you to wish at all. Because on the third wish he comes out."

"But I could make two—"

A voice interrupted them. It was the djinn.

“Will you release me then, oh Master?”

“I’ve got to think about it for a while,” Collins temporized. He turned to the window with a sigh of despair. His eyes suddenly revolved in their sockets.

“There!” he breathed. “Look down there!”

“What’s the matter?”

“You see those three men?”

“Yes?”

“They’re the gorillas who’ve been following me. They’re coming in—I’ve got to get out of here.”

“But the djinn—”

“Never mind him.” Collins bolted for the door.

The Doctor wheezed after him.

“Here,” he urged. “Take this with you. And good luck.” He held out the brown bottle and its cork. Collins grabbed for them hastily.

“Remember,” warned Doctor Sweet. “Don’t let them shoot you, or anything. The djinn would escape through the holes.”

With a sob, Collins rushed through the door.

THE girl in the outer office confronted him with an icy stare. Her eyes wandered to the bottle he was clutching in his hand.

“So!” she accused.

“But Edith—it’s empty. Look?” Collins held it upside down.

“I know it is. Drank it all, did you?”

“I haven’t touched a drop,” Collins began.

But another voice broke in.

“Who is this houri, Master?”

Edith whirled.

“What did you say, Tom?”

“Is it your wish that I destroy her?” the djinn continued, blandly.

"No, no—nothing." Collins answered both voices at once. The effort was too much. He hiccuped softly.

"Tom, you're sick."

Collins nodded. "Stomach trouble," he said.

"Let me get you some bicarbonate," Edith suggested, softening.

"No, don't. He wouldn't like it."

"Who wouldn't like it?"

"Why the thing down there—inside me," Collins began, then checked himself.

"Are you raving, Tom?"

"I don't know!" The little man's eyes blinked rapidly. "Let me out of here," he commanded. "Quick! They'll be after me in a minute."

"What's after you? Tom Collins—you have d.t.s., that what's the matter."

"Hold your lying tongue, wench." The voice came from the stomach.

Edith gasped. As her mouth opened, Collins made a break for the door.

Dodging along the hall, he neared the entrance. Then he halted, sick with sudden dread.

Standing squarely on the steps below were the figures of three men—the stocky little fellow in the blue overcoat, the tall, thin man wearing a derby, and the ugly fat gentleman with his hand significantly inside his coat pocket.

Collins stared into the three blue-jowled faces. He saw tight lips and little eyes; a kaleidoscope of hairy knuckles, protruding jaws, and jutting brows.

They are waiting for him to come out.

Collins slipped the glass bottle into his coat. He crouched back in the doorway and mopped his forehead.

Let them wait, he decided. He was willing. Just as long as he was inside and they were outside—

But they weren't going to stay outside.

Collins saw the three huddle together. The man with the derby whispered, gesturing significantly towards the building. Then the three wheeled. They began to march slowly up the steps.

“Oh, oh!” breathed Collins.

“Master?” inquired the voice from within his stomach.

But “Master” didn’t have the time to reply. With a courage born of desperation alone, Collins decided to dash for it. If he could run through them as they were caught coming up the steps now—

He burst from the building and clattered down the stairs. They saw him coming, attempted to dodge. He caromed into the trio, hurling his body forward at the fat man in the center.

WITH a grunt of surprise, the fat man staggered back. His two companions tripped over his legs, sprawled down the steps.

Mr. Collins hurdled their tangled bodies and continued down. Then he turned. They were on their feet again, and this time the fat man waved a gun. He didn’t wave it long. He began to point it. He pointed it directly where it would do Mr. Collins the least possible good.

Collins looked around wildly for a hole in the pavement. There was none. No place to hide, no place to run to for shelter. He was in the open; a visible target.

“This is it!” he groaned.

“What, Master?”

The voice came through a fog. Then Collins remembered.

“Djinn,” he croaked. “Now’s the chance to show your stuff. I wish you’d take care of these babies, quick.”

“Your wish,” echoed the djinn, “is my command.”

Almost without volition, Collins felt himself running towards the man with the gun.

The three hoodlums faced him in astonishment. The fat man steadied his aim, ready to fire. And then—

Collins felt it happen. The feeling of growth, stealing along his throat. The trio before him saw it happen.

They were gaping at his mouth. It was a small mouth, but from it protruded the largest tongue in the world. Or something.

Something—something long and black. Something muscled and menacing. Something that writhed forth like a snake of smoke, swelling to unbelievable proportions from Collins' opened mouth. Something that waved in the air, extending claws and a fist.

"Look out!" shrilled the thin man, suddenly. "He's on fire—smoke's coming out of his mouth!"

But it was not smoke that darted forward a dozen feet in advance of the charging Mr. Collins.

The fat man realized this when he felt the black column against his chin. He didn't have a chance to realize anything else before he sagged to the pavement.

The gun fell from his hand. His stocky little companion snatched it up and cursed.

"You will, will ya?" he snarled. A shot pumped into the black pillar rising from Collins' throat. It thudded home, but the huge inky paw of smoke merely swirled about his head and descended.

There was the sound of a walnut cracking, magnified ten times.

"Hey!" yelled the third party, as Collins turned, and the horrid limb reared once more. "Holy Moses!"

But Moses, sanctified or not, did nothing to help him. The black triphammer descended and sent the last man to join his fellows on the ground in a soggy heap.

Slowly, the emanation disappeared from before Mr. Collins' face.

He stood there for a moment and rubbed his aching jaws.

"Whew! he panted. "How did you do that?"

"It is simple, Master. "Any wish of yours—to hear is to obey."

"Was that really your arm?" Collins asked, weakly.

"Indeed. Am I not many cubits tall?"

"Don't talk about it," begged the rescued man. "It upsets my stomach just to think about it."

"Your other two wishes?" pursued the voice of the djinn. "Perhaps you would like some stomach tablets?" it went on, craftily.

"No, not that," said Collins. "Give me a little more time to think."

"But I desire my freedom from this prison," the djinn complained. "I am no Jonah."

"I'm no whale, either," Collins snapped. "Believe me, this hurts me more than it does you."

It was true. Collins had a terrific stomach ache. The djinn was moving around down there. Let's see—if it fitted into the brown bottle, it could reduce its size to about four inches. Still, that was quite a bellyful at that.

Too much for Collins. But at the moment, he had other matters to consider.

HE TOOK one more glance at the three forms on the pavement. He trembled, thinking of what might have happened if any passersby had chanced to wander down the street while the battle was in progress.

"Must get away before somebody comes along," lie muttered. He started up the block and rounded a corner rapidly. He moved briskly along for ten minutes before slackening his panic-driven pace.

During this time he was becoming more and more aware of the load he carried under his belt. The djinn, unused to his queer surroundings, was evidently pacing back and forth.

"Will you kindly cut out walking around inside of me?" Collins begged, hoping no one else was listening.

"Is that a wish?" asked the djinn.

"No. Oh, let it go."

Collins shrugged. An old woman walking ahead of him glanced back. Collins closed his lips and tried to look sedate.

But not in time. A hiccup escaped from his mouth.

"Excuse me," mumbled Collins.

"Me also," said the voice from his stomach.

The woman quickly glanced away again.

"Drunken sot," she muttered.

Collins blushed.

"I wish they wouldn't—" he began then stopped.

No. That wouldn't do. He had to be careful about wishes. He mustn't say he wished he could get some sleep, or some food, or a moment's peace. The price to pay was too great.

Yet he must do something. And quickly. Collins realized the impossibility of his situation. The djinn must be disposed of.

"Could I wish he wasn't here?" Collins wondered. "Or was Doctor Sweet right when he said I couldn't get rid of him that way?"

He glanced down at the brown bottle he still carried under one arm. The djinn's bottle. How to get him back in? That was the problem. That's what he must wish for.

Ouch! The djinn was evidently doing a tap dance now. Collins patted his stomach gingerly.

"Who's there?" came the voice.

"Oh, shut up!" Collins barked.

A man beside him suddenly shied away. He cast a leering glance at the bottle under Collins' arm.

Collins ducked into an alley.

"Now see what you're doing," he complained. "Everybody keeps thinking I'm drunk. This simply can't go on."

"Make a wish," the djinn coaxed.

Collins brandished his brown bottle in futile rage.

Suddenly he smiled, as inspiration came. He stared at the bottle curiously. Here was his solution, after all!

"All right," he whispered. "I'll make a wish. Get this one, djinn. And get it right, because this wish is important."

"To hear is to obey."

Collins took a deep breath in anticipation. He gloated over the words.

"I wish this bottle you came in had never even existed!"

For a moment there was a stunning silence. And then—

Collins felt it in his fingers. A lessening of weight. He glanced down at the bottle he was holding in his hand. But there was no bottle! There was nothing at all between his fingers.

WITH a curious shock, Collins realized that there never had been anything there. He had never carried a bottle, never seen one. He couldn't exactly remember what it looked like.

The little man sighed deeply. "That's that," he breathed.

"You spoke, Master?"

The incredible voice, again. And still from his stomach.

"What the—thought you were gone!"

"Not I," the djinn corrected. "Merely the bottle. But I'm not in the bottle, remember. I'm in you."

Collins clasped both hands to his head. "All right," he groaned. "I can't get rid of you. I give up."

"And let me out?" persisted the djinn eagerly.

"I don't know."

Collins lurched out of the alley. He walked along in a daze.

"That does it," he told himself. "Now the bottle's gone. I can never get him back into what doesn't exist."

"Master!"

That hateful voice again.

"What is it?"

"Your third wish, Master?"

COLLINS couldn't answer. His third wish? He had so many of them. He wished the damned genie wouldn't keep calling him "Master" for one thing. Because in reality, the djinn was his master. The djinn kept him from eating, from sleeping, from associating with human beings. And how Collins wished he could eat and sleep and meet his fellow men again!

But he dare not wish aloud. He dare not release this creature and he couldn't keep on going this way. He couldn't.

Automatically his feet led him up the stairs to his own apartment. On the way the djinn joggled up and down inside him with every step. It complained bitterly about the climb, too. Collins was glad the hall was empty.

Oh well, it wouldn't be for long.

Once inside, Collins went straight to his pantry. There was a fifth of gin there. Gin, by all that was ironic! He opened it and took a swig. A healthy swig. It gave him the courage he needed for what he was about to do.

Collins sat down at the phone and dialed the museum. He had to. He owed it to the girl to tell her. In a moment she answered.

"Edith?"

"Yes—oh, Tom, it's you."

"Edith, I want to say good-bye."

"But Tom, where are you going?" Collins didn't hesitate before he answered.

"Down to the pier."

"Tom, you're not going to—"

Collins hung up quickly. He'd made a damned fool of himself again. But it was no use. He couldn't tell Edith what he meant to tell her. About the djinn. About the way he loved her.

It was loving her that drove him to drink in the first place. That feeling of inferiority. She was always so calm, so cool. So unapproachable. And he was just a little museum clerk.

That's why he had clung to the vase the last three days, even with those men on his trail. Because Doctor Sweet had promised him an assistant curatorship if he managed to get it. Then he and Edith could be married. But now the djinn had come and there was no way out.

These were the things he meant to tell her. But he couldn’t. And what was the use? He’d go down to the pier now and take the plunge. He and the djinn together. It was the only way out.

Collins pocketed his fifth and left. Before going out the hall door, he took another drink. It consoled. And it enabled Collins to walk the five blocks down to the beach.

The djinn was mercifully silent. It threshed around from time to time, but Collins didn’t care. In a few moments it would all be over.

COLLINS scanned the deserted autumn vista of the beach. With plodding steps he moved out along the short white stretch of the pier. The water churned icily around the stones.

His head was clearing. That would never do.

Collins took out his gin and drank. Deeply. Then he sat down at the end of the pier. He stared at the greenish-black depths of the water. Water—how he hated it! Gin was better.

He took another swig. The fifth was going down. It would go down and then he would. He drank again. It warmed him.

“Master.”

The damned voice again! Collins forced himself to reply.

“What is it?”

“Where are we? I’m warm.”

“Never mind.”

“But I feel very strange, Master.” Good! The gin was displeasing to the demon. Collins took another drink, a long one. With malicious satisfaction, he tilted the fifth back.

“Ooooh, Master—that burns!”

“It feels fine.”

And it did feel fine. Collins was aware of tipsiness. A pleasant sensation.

“I’m getting all wet,” the djinn pleaded. “You’ll be wetter in a minute,” Collins chuckled.

He would be, too. Because when Collins jumped off the pier—

But that could wait. Another drink now. Collins began to feel good. He anticipated the moment of release. The water looked inviting now.

“Master—what is this?”

“A little stomach medicine. Just what you advised me.”

“But it smells strange.”

“You’ll get used to it.”

“Strong. It’s like fire.”

Collins began to laugh. “Best stuff I ever drank,” he chortled.

“You drink this?” The djinn was incredulous.

“Of course.”

“Oh.”

Then there was silence. Collins drank recklessly.

“This is good.” The djinn’s voice rose on a note of discovery.

“Glad you like it.”

“Let’s have some more.”

“Why not?” Collins took another sip. “You are right, Master. It is excellent. Warming.”

THIS was the last straw. The djinn was actually getting drunk on the gin Collins absorbed!

“Let’s have a lot more of it,” the voice suggested. It was loud, yet oddly blurred. Collins obliged with enthusiasm.

“Say, Master.”

“Yeah?”

“How ’bout that other wish of yours?”

“Forget it.”

“Very kind of you. Very. Have a drink on that.”

They drank.

“Hot down here. Makes me thirsty.” The djinn was slurring his words now. “Can’t stand up right.”

"Lie down, then."

"Can't lie down. Want another drink." Again the fifth was lifted. Collins drained the last drop.

"Good. You're th' mos' exalted of all Mas'ters."

Collins could feel the djinn swaying around. He stood up. Now the gin was gone, and it was time to act. The party had been swell while it lasted, but it was over. The thought of entertaining two hangovers at once was impossible. Collins looked down at the water again and took a deep breath.

"Mas'ter!"

"What is it?"

"Wanna 'nother drink."

"No," replied Collins brusquely. "No more drinks."

"Please. Got to have one."

Collins exulted. The djinn was frankly begging now. Let him—it served him right for the misery he caused.

"Just one. Please."

"No! Why should I give you a drink? What have you ever done for me? You wreck my life, you plot against me, you take possession of my nice warm stomach and jump around. You think I like to walk around feeling as though I were going to have a baby or something?"

"Jus' one little drink!" the djinn begged.

"Absolutely none," Collins retorted.

"But I wanna—enchanting stuff—do anything."

Collins felt the djinn's drunken frame quiver with eagerness. He glanced down at the empty fifth beside him, then looked at the water again.

Suddenly Collins sat down.

"Listen," he whispered, softly.

"Lis'ning," the djinn mumbled.

"You really want that drink?"

"I swear it, Mas'er."

"Then," said Collins, "you can come and get it."

"Wha'ssat?"

"I said you'll have to come after it—I'm tired of pouring the stuff down to you."

"You'll let me out?"

"Why not? If you want a drink, come and get it."

"To hear," mumbled the djinn, "is to 'bey."

Collins opened his mouth to reply.

THE reply never came. His throat was choked—choked with smoke. A cloud veiled from his parted lips, an ebon pillar poured forth in the air above him. Not an arm this time, but a gigantic billow that swirled inchoately in midair.

Collins caught a glimpse of a coalescing pattern—an unbelievably huge torso, towering coal-black limbs, and a pair of bloodshot rolling eyes like striated billiard balls.

"Wait!" he whispered. "It's down in there." His trembling finger indicated the fifth of gin.

The inky column wavered drunkenly. Materialization halted.

"You'll never get it that way," Collins repeated. "You're too big."

The smoke spiraled in woozy indecision. Suddenly it began to contract.

Swiftly it was shrinking to human size, then to child's height. A little black smoke doll danced over to the standing fifth.

"Smaller still," Collins whispered.

Obediently, the djinn contracted. A tiny ebony wisp hovered about the neck of the fifth.

"In there," Collins directed.

The wisp hesitated. A shrill little piping voice rose.

"But it's inside the bottle," it protested maudlinly.

Collins gasped.

"Yes," he breathed. "And so are you!"

His darting hand pushed the smoky wraith down the neck of the empty fifth bottle. His fingers rammed the cap over the top. He twisted it tightly.

Inside the gin bottle, the djinn danced up and down in drunken rage. Its wrinkled little black face was contorted, and Collins saw its mouth shaping curses he could not hear.

Nor did he hear the shrill honking of the horn from the beach behind him.

It was not until Edith had jumped from the car and run clattering out onto the pier to where he stood that Collins turned his head.

Then she was in his arms, sobbing just a little as she poured out her words in a torrent of tenderness.

"Oh, Tom, thank goodness I'm in time . . . poor dear . . . suicide over me . . . Doctor Sweet explained about everything, how you got his vase for him . . . promotion . . . and when I looked out the window and saw those three awful men lying there . . . what you did to them . . . never knew you were so strong and wonderful . . . get married."

It went something like that, between sobs and hugs and quite undignified kisses.

Collins liked it a lot.

Edith retrieved her dignity just once, and only for a moment. She saw the gin bottle standing there on the pier edge and turned away.

"But Tom . . . you'll have to promise me you'll stop drinking."

"Certainly, dear," whispered the little man. "From now on I'm off the bottled goods forever."

Edith smiled happily. Stooping, she picked up the fifth bottle with an impulsive gesture. She flung it into the water.

Collins watched appreciatively. It was a good throw. The bottle bobbed far out on the waves.

"That's a load off my mind," the girl murmured, happily.

"That's a load off my—"

But Collins didn't say it. He merely held Edith very closely to him, so that he couldn't see the djinn bottle as it floated away toward the open sea.

The Chance of a Ghost

Lefty Feep sought the long forgotten pirate horde of Captain Kidd; but three phantoms of the sea succeeded in complicating matters.

IT WAS early afternoon in Jack's Shack. The restaurant was almost empty when I came in, and so was I. I ordered a meal and then sat back watching the proprietor. He was training a couple of new waiters, evidently—teaching them how to put their thumbs in the soup, how to trip a customer that doesn't tip, and other necessary elements of the waiter's craft.

I was watching Jack show one pupil how to spill gravy on a tablecloth when I got a sample myself.

Not gravy. Ketchup.

The red goo spattered down the back of my neck.

"Stop it, Jack!" I yelled. "I'm not going to be a guinea pig for your new help. If you must have a customer to spill things on, buy a window dummy."

Jack didn't hear me. And the ketchup spattered down.

I whirled around, clenching my fists.

"Listen, you—" I began. Then halted. There was no waiter behind me.

Standing there holding a hamburger in trembling fingers was none other than Lefty Feep.

"It's you, is it?" I sighed.

The tall, dark, and unhandsome Mr. Feep gave me a feeble smile and another splash of ketchup.

“Cut that out!” I admonished.

Feep nodded and tottered into a chair.

“I am sorry it is you I do with the goo,” he apologized. “But my pinkies shake so that I cannot catch up with my ketchup.”

“What’s wrong?” I asked. “Have you got the palsy?”

“It is not the palsy, palsy-walsy,” explained Lefty Feep.

“St. Vitus?”

“St. Frightus, maybe.” A groan issued from under the hamburger.

“You—frightened?” The idea seemed incredible. But one look at that doleful face told its own story.

“Whatever is the matter?” I inquired. “You look as though you’ve seen a ghost.”

“That is not the trouble at all,” said Feep. “It is the other way around.”

“Other way around?”

“Yes. A ghost sees me!”

“Quit kidding,” I laughed. “There are no such things as ghosts. That’s just an old superstition.”

“Well, you ought to see the old superstition that I see a couple days ago, then.”

“You had an experience with a ghost?”

“Experience? Compared to what I go through, the life of a spiritualist is just medium,” Lefty Feep announced. “When I get finished, I go to my doctor for a blood test and find out it is all curdled.”

“You must have been really scared.”

“Scared? My hair is raised so high, the barber has to stand on a stepladder to cut it.”

I had a strange feeling I was going to hear a story about all this. Chattering teeth couldn’t stop Lefty Feep’s chattering tongue.

I wasn’t mistaken.

“Listen,” whispered Feep. “I will recite a fright.”

Cupping his chin in his hands and parting his trembling lips, Lefty Feep began to deliver his shiver.

* * * * *

I AM RUNNING down the drag the other day in a very rapid hurry, because I do not wish to be late for the most important appointment in my life. I am keeping a date to drown myself.

I am on the beam to the nearest stream, ready for a suicide slide.

Why do I decide to take myself to the exterminators this way? Well, I have five good reasons.

The first three reasons are my ex-wives.

The fourth reason is my exchequer. I am broke.

The fifth reason is the worst. I just get myself turned down by the draft board because of a few mistakes I make in my early youth. The guy at the board is very sarcastic, too. He says I have enough criminal records to fill a phonograph album.

For some reason or other this burns me up plenty, because I am now reformed and I want to get in there and slug for my country like a patriotic citizen.

But they turn me down. And my wives track me down. And my pocketbook gets me down.

So I am ready to go down to the river and dunk myself.

Pretty soon I arrive at a bridge I pick out—a little bridge down by the docks where the traffic is light. I pick it out on purpose, because I am afraid of being run over by a car before I can commit suicide.

I stand there and look down at the water for a long time. I figure I will review my mistakes and faults—but then I give up, because I don't wish to stand there for a solid week.

So I start to take off my clothes. I am wearing a very sporty suit, and naturally I do not care to get it all wet when I drown myself.

I strip off the coat, vest, shirt, and tie. Then I remove the trousers and stand there in my shorts. It is cold, and I know I must jump in a hurry if I do not wish to freeze to death.

The water looks mean and green. I shiver at the river, but I climb up on the railing of the bridge and close my eyes. It is a long, long jump down.

“Well,” I whisper. “Here goes.”

And I jump.

I whistle through the air. I grit my teeth for the moment when I splash into the water.

Down, down, down. Here it comes, now—

Whambo!

I land. But not on water.

On wood. On my noggin.

For a minute I am out cold. But since I land on my head I am not severely injured, so I manage to open my eyes. And there I am, sitting after a perfect three-point landing.

“Blow me down and out!” yells a voice in my ear. “A stowaway!”

I blink and look around. I am squatting on the deck of a boat which must pass under the bridge just as I jump.

Standing next to me is an old duffer with white chin-fuzz on a pile of wrinkles he uses for a face. He is a very fierce looking pappy, and he is yelling away at the top of his lungs.

“Stowaway!” he repeats. “Go away!”

I am not in the mood for poetry.

I get up on my feet and give him a glare and stare.

“Listen, sea-dog, cut out the barking,” I advise. “I am sorry I happen to land on this garbage scow of yours.”

“Garbage scowl,” howls the old boy. “You call the best craft on the seven seas a garbage scow! I’ll keelhaul you, you landlubber!”

SURE enough, when I take another look around, I realize I am not on any garbage scow, but a house-boat. This barge has a sort of little cottage up front, all painted and decorated and scrubbed clean. The boat is small, but it looks very neat and orderly.

“Where am I?” I ask, softening my hollering a little.

“You are now on the good ship Floating Kidney,” says pappy. “I am Captain Rivers, better known as Old Man Rivers.”

“Pleased to meet you,” I pipe. “I am Lefty Feep.”

“The pleasure is all yours,” says Old Man Rivers. “And now might I inquire what in blazes you mean by boarding my boat?”

“Just a mistake,” I tell him. “I really am bound for the bottom of the river.”

“You mean you plan to scupper yourself?”

“I am going to scupper, Skipper,” I answer.

“Don’t be foolish! A husky young fellow like you—why you’d make a fine able seaman.”

“I feel more like a disabled seaman after that swan dive I take when I hit the deck,” I confess.

“Well here, take a swig of rum,” offers Old Man Rivers, pulling out a flask.

I take a gulp and feel much better, even though I seem to start a small bonfire in my stomach.

“How about some hard-tack?” asks Old Man Rivers.

“No, thanks. But I will take another shot of that stuff.”

I drink again. The bonfire in my stomach gets hotter, and Indians seem to be dancing around it.

“You even drink like a sailor,” he tells me. “Say, how would you like to sign articles with me? I’m off on a voyage.”

“Off on a voyage?”

“Certainly. I’m heaving out to sea right now.”

“In this houseboat?”

“Got the port papers and everything. Vessel is ship-shape. Just about steers itself, Fine engine. Ten knots an hour.”

“Knots?” I ask.

"Well, miles then. Miles to me, knots to you."

I let this pass.

"But why should I go to sea?" I ask. "Besides, how do I know you are a good sailor yourself?"

"You ask me, Old Man Rivers, whether or not I am a good sailor? Me—that used to run a rowboat concession in the park? I can pilot everything from a motorboat to Noah's Ark."

Personally, I figure this guy can't navigate anything except maybe a schooner of beer.

But what have I got to lose? Maybe this old bird has a reason for taking his daffy little houseboat out on the ocean.

Sure enough, he comes out with it. He bends close to me and grabs my hand.

"Come up with me while I steer," he says. "I will tell you a secret."

So I go into the pilot's cabin or whatever, and he grabs hold of the steering wheel and swings the houseboat out up the river again.

"I don't know why I tell you this," he begins. "Except that I am getting old, and a voyage like his is going to be a strain. Besides, you can do the digging."

"Digging? In the water?"

"No, on land, you freshwater fish! On the island."

"What island?"

"The island we're heading for."

He peers over my shoulder. He grins. He whispers.

"Would you like to look at my map?"

"You have a very repulsive map," I tell Mm.

"No—here!" he yaps, pulling a piece of paper out of his sailor jacket. "The treasure map."

"Treasure?"

"Of course. What do you think you are going to dig for?"

"Clams, maybe," I tell him. He is infuriated. Also a little angry.

"We are off to find Captain Kidd's treasure," he announces.

"Wait a minute," I suggest. "You may be off, yes. But not to find treasure. And who are you trying to kid about Captain Kidd?"

"Avast there and stow the gab," says Old Man Rivers. "Do you think an old seagull like myself would risk life and limb on the ocean if there wasn't a sure thing involved? Let me tell you a few things about Captain Kidd and his treasure before you run up a distress signal."

So Rivers tells me about Captain William Kidd. This Billy the Kidd, it turns out, is a personality who flourishes back in the gay 1690's or thereabouts. He is what is known technically as a pirate, though today he would be called a sea-going hijacker.

HE SAILS with a mob when he is a young squirt, then reforms and gets a pardon from the King of England. Not only does he get a pardon, but he plans to do a stoolie on his old pals, in fact he is commissioned to go out with another ship and clean up the other pirates. Which he does. He sails off to the African coast and pretty soon he is knocking off a lot of ships filled with gold and silver and jewels and other valuable keepsakes.

But this Kidd is not only smart, he is clever. First he double-crosses his old pirate pals, and then he pulls a triple-cross on his friend the King. He collects treasure, but instead of turning it over to the government, he evades the income tax by sailing away to America and turning pirate again. He even takes one of the ships he captures to make his getaway—like it is a hot car, or something.

When he gets to the American coast, he decides to put some of the swag away for a while until it cools off. Just where he stows the loot nobody knows, but it is a cinch the stuff does not go into a safety-deposit box.

He plants it on some islands and buries it deep. At least, that is the Story—and it must be true, because a little later on he gets nabbed by the law-and-orders. He confesses but does not peep about the treasure. Pretty soon he has a slight argument with a rope and comes out on the losing end.

Anyway, that is the story of Captain Kidd. But the story of his treasure is another matter. For hundreds of years various citizens are on the lookout for the gold, digging up half of the American coast, and raising more sand than a water-spaniel.

Funny part of it is, somebody finds a chunk of his hot money over on Gardiner's Island, near Long Island—of all places. They locate about sixty grand in bullion. But the rest of it—millions—nobody can find, including Secretary Morgenthau and the FBI.

The story goes that it is buried near New York somewhere. A whole lot of bullion, says Old Man Rivers.

"Sounds like a lot of bull to me," I decide, after hearing the yarn.

"Then look at this chart," Old Man Rivers urges. And he holds out the map for me.

I give it a squint. The paper is old and yellow and crumbling, and the lines on the map are all faded. The writing is very quaint, too, but I see a picture of a little island stuck out past the local bays, so tiny that it is almost hidden away. There are a lot of figures on the paper—latitude and longitude and altitude and gratitude and all that nautical stuff—but I am interested only in the writing on the center of the island map.

"Dig here," says the chart. "Ten paces behind stone. Four feet down until skull is reached. Further directions in skull. Ye treafure awaits." That settles it.

"Ye treafure!" I snort. "Ye gods! The guy can't even spell."

"It's an old chart," grunts the sea-dog. "Ancient writers use an 'f' for an 's'. That goes to prove the map is genuine. And look here."

He points to the back of the chart. Under a yellow stain I see a very faint lettering. "Wm. Kidd—hyf mark."

"Thyf if fylly!" I yell.

"Why so?" asks Old Man Rivers. "I get it from a trusty friend."

"Well, why doesn't the guy who owns this chart originally go after the treasure himself then, if he believes it?"

"He is an old man," Rivers explains. "An old sailor with a wooden leg. He can't make the voyage with me because his leg is recently attacked by woodpeckers. At present he is under the care of a surgeon. A tree surgeon," Rivers adds, with a thoughtful sigh.

"Woodpeckers should get a feast from his head, too," I sneer. But actually I am falling for this idea. The map looks good. I think of all that pirate treasure I read about—pieces of eight, doubloons, gold bars, bullion. Buccaneers from the Spanish Main. Why shouldn't I lend my Spanish might and main to this trip? We are sailing, and the island is not far outside the harbor.

"Well," mutters Old Man Rivers, "What do you say? Will you sign articles with me for this voyage, share and share alike?"

"Treasure is my pleasure," I tell him.

We shake hands over the steering-wheel and the voyage really begins.

THE old houseboat really steams down the river in a fine fashion. And Old Man Rivers knows how to handle the Floating Kidney.

I have no work to do at all. He steers and I sit in a rocking chair on deck. After while I go into the houseboat cabin, which is just like a little parlor and kitchen, and knock out a few flapjacks for supper.

When I take them back on deck to where Old Man Rivers is steering, we glide out into open water past the harbor. The houseboat bobs up and down on the long ocean waves, but it rides very well, and we sit and stare out at the sunset and eat our flapjacks. It gets dark and quiet.

"Where do we sleep?" I yawn.

"Why, in the bunks."

"I sleep in a bed and that's no bunk," I insist.

"Well turn in and get a good rest. Tomorrow you may have to dig. Or fight."

"Fight?" I perk up my ears. "You do not mention fighting on the program before."

"I know." Old Man Rivers grins. "I am just joking. You know, there is a silly superstition that the ghost of Captain Kidd guards his treasure."

"When it comes to fighting ghosts, I am not worried," I assure him.

"Fine. You sleep and I'll steer," says Old Man Rivers. "Looks like a little fog coming up."

So I go into the cabin and plunk into a bunk. I look out at the black water and at the grey smoke of the fog curling up all around, and shiver a little because it is cold. Then I drowse off for a while, wondering about tomorrow and the treasure and pirates and—

"Ship ahoy!" calls a voice.

I sit up. The voice comes very faint and far away.

"Ship ahoy! Belay there, we're coming alongside."

I jump out of the bunk, barking my elbow and then barking. The voice comes from the side of the houseboat. I lean over the rail. Down below is nothing but the thick grey fog.

I turn around to call Old Man Rivers, but then I see the figures.

They rise up out of the fog so fast I think they are just part of the fog itself.

As they come over the side, climbing up the rail to the deck, I look again. And I get a real shock.

They are fog!

Three figures, grey as mist. Thin, smoky, wavering. I can see through them.

BUT there they stand, on the deck, three foggy figures. Three men from the mist. A short, fat fellow, wearing a three-cornered hat. A tall, thin, bald-headed fink. A big chunk of blubber that is all stomach and beard.

"Who in Hades are you?" I pause to inquire.

"Ah. Allow us to introduce ourselves." The short, fat fellow takes off his hat and bows.

"I am William Kidd, better known as Captain Kidd."

The tall, thin fink nods his head. He pulls a long, curly wig out of his pocket and puts it on.

"I, sir, am Major Stede Bonnet, late of his Majesty's service, but a gentleman privateer."

The big bozo just grins and looks me in the eye.

"Teach, Edward Teach," he grunts. "Men call be Blackbeard."

I just stare with my mouth open, like a stuffed moose.

Somebody around here is crazy, and I have a good idea it's me.

Three finks made out of a fog step on deck and claim to be Captain Kidd, Stede Bonnet, and Blackbeard the Pirate.

Kidd looks more like an old goat to me.

Bonnet looks like he has bees in his.

Blackbeard resembles a fugitive from a barber college.

But it is their look of fog that has me agog.

"Who—what—where are you?" I ask, feeling like Professor Quiz, but looking more like a guy who is scared stiff. Which I am.

"Buccaneers, freebooters, pirates—call us what you will," snaps the lug who says he is William Kidd. "Our names mean little. Our deeds loom large on History's pages."

"Writ in blood," adds Stede Bonnet.

"Blood!" booms Blackbeard, with a nasty grin.

But I get control of myself. After all, I can see right through these foggy babies.

"Why you anemic-looking imposters," I mutter. "You palefaced prevaricators!"

"Take that back!" snaps Kidd.

"All right—limp liars, then! I know that Captain Kidd and all the rest of the pirates are dead over two hundred years."

"Right you are, mate," booms Blackbeard. "We are dead men all. Dead pirates. But dead or alive, we take no insults. So—"

On the word "So," he whips something out from the side of his belt. It is long and gleaming. A sword. And there is nothing foggy about its wicked curving length.

"Yes," snaps Stede Bonnet. Suddenly a long thin blade appears in his hand. A rapier, I guess.

I TURN around. I have a vague idea I would like to take a short but swift race around the deck.

But there stands Captain Kidd, with a mean-looking sabre.

"Steel makes a sharp argument," he purrs. "It also has the saving virtue of cutting arguments short. And arguers."

"Who's arguing?" I answer. "All right. So you are really Captain William Kidd."

"At your service," says he, lowering the sabre. "Though long dangling from Execution Dock has wrenched my neck out of joint, I fear."

"Mine too," adds Major Stede Bonnet, stroking his thin throat with delicate fingers.

"A trifle," Blackbeard chuckles. "I am beheaded, no less, by that dog of a Maynard. Even in my ghostly state it is distinctly a pain in the neck."

"Fortunately we are all buried at sea," Kidd says. "Else we should not be here now. Special permission, you know."

"Special permission?"

"From our mate and free companion below."

"Below?"

"At the bottom of the sea, where we slumber with all good pirates and hardy adventurers," he comes back. "But now we rise together."

"And just why?" I ask.

"Why? Because of the treasure, that's why. Isn't this the good ship Floating Kidney? Doesn't the master, Captain Rivers, possess a chart showing where my treasure lies hidden?"

"Well—" I stall.

"Exactly." Captain Kidd smiles a foggy smile. "Doesn't it occur to you that the gold and bullion you seek is rightfully my property?"

“But—”

“For nearly two hundred and fifty years I am a restless spirit, a wraith that cannot sleep peacefully beneath the sea because I’ve lost my treasure. You see, I am a forgetful man. The location of that treasure is something even I cannot remember. The chart you possess is the only genuine one, so I await your search to lead me to my gold.”

“You forget where you hide the swag? Very careless,” I scold him.

“I too have no memory,” Major Stede Bonnet chimes in. “So I enter into agreement with Kidd that we will search for each others’ treasures, share and share alike.”

“I bury fortunes while drunk,” Blackbeard growls. “This is unwise, I know, but unavoidable—because I am never sober. I also have a pact with my two friends—as gallant gentlemen as ever slit a throat.”

“We make a deal with our free companion from below,” Kidd explains. “To wander once again as ghosts, seeking our hidden treasure trove. And so we come to you. You will lead us to the spot tomorrow.”

“Maybe I better ask Old Man Rivers about that little matter,” I suggest.

“As you wish,” growls Blackbeard.

“Lead the way, me hearty.”

I lead the way, but I am far from hearty with this party.

Old Man Rivers is steering along through the fog when I brush through the dandruff and tap his shoulder.

“Pardon me,” I say. “We have some visitors.”

“Visitors? How could they get aboard? Where? Who?”

He turns around and looks at the three pirates. Looks through the three pirates.

The explanation dawns on him.

“Ghosts!” he yells. “Shiver my timbers!”

“My timbers shiver, too,” I tell him.

“Who are these gaunt haunts?” he asks.

Captain Kidd makes with the explanation again.

Old Man Rivers doesn’t like it any better than I do.

So Captain Kidd makes with the cutlass.

Old Man Rivers decides he will obey.

"Steer your course, man," says Kidd. "You will either lead us to the treasure tomorrow or walk the plank."

"Walk the plank?" quavers Old Man Rivers.

"There is also a rope trick I learn from the hangman," suggests Stede Bonnet, very gently.

"You'd hang me in a noose?" murmurs Old Man Rivers.

"No noose is good noose," I tell him. "We better do like these gorill—these gentlemen advise. We will take them to their treasure."

"Why not?" adds Captain Kidd. "It's really mine, you know—after all, I steal it."

"Very logical," I agree.

"Steer away, then Captain Rivers," chuckles Blackbeard. "We will be your passengers on this voyage. Good to feel the salt air again. Got any rum?"

"Yes—rum!" exclaims Stede Bonnet.

SO I take them into the houseboat cabin and set up the rum. Under the lamp light the three of them are pretty ugly looking customers. Grey, pale, thin ghost-figures. I shudder when I pour.

"Careful with that stuff," yells Blackbeard. "Or I'll slice your gullet, you chicken-livered squab!"

"Rum!" sighs Captain Kidd. "It's mother's milk to me."

Evidently it is, because he pours himself about a quart of the stuff out of the big jug on the table, and guzzles it down.

Thin as he is, he can hold rum. So can the others. While I sit and watch, they gargle it all away.

"Ha ha!" yaps Blackbeard. "Spirits for spirits, that's what I always say."

"A haunting we will go," cackles Stede Bonnet, taking off his wig and wiping his bald forehead.

It is true. The ghosts are getting drunk. Just three sheets in the wind.

"Gentlemen—by Bloody Harry, I've a great ideal," yells Captain Kidd, banging on the table with one transparent fist.

"Spit it out," urges Blackbeard.

"Yes, elucidate," Major Stede Bonnet chimes in.

"Simple. Tomorrow these two dogs dig up the treasure. Right?"

"If they know what's good for them, it's right."

"Then we take the treasure with us and divvy up the swag with our free companion below, isn't it so? It is on this agreement that he consents to let us go and roam earth again."

"Correct!" says Stede Bonnet.

"Only that's where my idea comes in," hiccups Captain Kidd. "Why should we divvy up with him below? Let's take the treasures and split it amongst ourselves. Then we can be free to roam the earth. He won't catch us. Ghosts or no ghosts—we'll be rich."

"Splendid idea," laughs Stede Bonnet.

"Old Captain Kidd!" chuckles Blackbeard. "Up to your double-crossing tricks again, eh? Suits me!"

"Who wants to be under water?" sneers Captain Kidd.

"Right you are! I'd rather be under rum," Blackbeard howls.

I turn the lamp a little lower. They do not not need so much light now, being lit themselves. Then I sneak out of the cabin and run up to Old Man Rivers.

"What are we going to do?" I ask. "What can we do? We must take them to the treasures, I suppose," shrugs Rivers. "I guess there is something in that ghost story after all."

"Can't we get rid of them?"

"How? Can you kill a ghost?"

"I doubt it."

"But they can kill us all right."

"That I don't doubt."

"So we find them the treasure," Old Man Rivers decides.

So we do.

I do not sleep that night at all. The three of them are howling away in the cabin, and we stand out and steer. Along about sunrise Old Man Rivers looks at his chart again.

"Almost there," he tells me. "Unless I am mistaken, that's the island looming up ahead. We'll circle around to the inlet."

Sure enough, a little hunk of land—just a big sandbar, really, sticking up out of the water—is on our starboard bow. Wherever that is.

In about half an hour we are right outside the inlet. The water is calm and shallow.

"Heave the anchor!" yells Captain Rivers.

"I never swallow it," I answer. But it turns out he wants me to throw a hunk of iron overboard at the ends of a rope. This is the way a boat is parked.

So I heave the anchor and we all get into a little rowboat which we push over the side of the Floating Kidney.

THE three ghost pirates are no prettier in the daytime. But with their foggy grey faces, the hangovers don't show up. They are very happy, in fact, because they are right on the verge of laying hands on all that treasure.

We row them on to the beach and climb out. Old Man Rivers has me lug up a couple of shovels and a pick. He marches ahead with the chart, pacing off feet.

Pretty soon we cross the bare sand and hit a white stone.

"Count from here," Rivers says.

"Aha—I recognize this spot!" yells Captain Kidd.

Rivers counts off ten paces.

"Dig," he tells me.

I look at the pirates. "Aren't you going to help me?" I inquire.

Blackbeard has his cutlass out.

"Dig!" he suggests.

I dig.

I am down about four feet—a nice depth for a grave, and I feel like lying down in it—when I strike something. Something hard and white.

Reaching down, I pull it out of the sand.

A grinning skull.

"Here," snaps Captain Kidd. "I recognize this, too. Why it's Diego!" he gasps. "Blast my bones, it's Diego."

He holds the skull up. "Alas, poor Diego. I knew him well. I ought to—I cave his throat in with a pick when he buries the treasure."

Bonnet and Blackbeard laugh very loud at this, but somehow I do not appreciate the joke. I merely grin very feebly, like the skull.

"Further directions in the skull," Captain Rivers says, reading his chart. "What does that mean?"

"Why, this," says Captain Kidd. He reaches into the grinning mouth with two fingers, scrabbles around, and pulls out a little leather pouch from the jaws. He opens the pouch and fetches out a scrap of paper.

"Forty paces left," he reads. "Ye treafure awaits."

We walk forty paces left. Thirty paces, anyway. Then we are at water's edge.

"Land washes away," Kidd explains. "Out into the water with you, Feep. Ten paces. Then dig."

"Who, me?"

But before the cutlass comes out again, I am in the water, digging away. And of all the dirty digs I take in my time, this is the worst.

To make along with the story, never mind the digging. I wish I feel the same way about it—but it ends. It ends when I strike the first iron box and haul it up on the beach, slow.

I pick the lock with the pick. And open it.

Gold! Bars and bars of gold!

"More boxes!" growls Captain Kidd.

I dig further and strike another iron box. I can't even budge this one without Old Man Rivers to help me.

More gold.

A third box is hauled out. Then a fourth and fifth. One has silver, another has coins in it, and the last one contains nothing but jewels—emeralds, rubies, and pearls. Big stones that gleam in the sun.

“A half million pounds sterling!” raves Captain Kidd.

“All ours!” adds Stede Bonnet.

“Hey,” I suggest. “What about me?”

“You? Where do you come in?” sneers Blackbeard, patting his fat belly with a frown.

“Well—union labor for all that digging. You must owe me around three bucks, anyhow.”

“Pipe down!” shouts Blackbeard. “Lug this aboard the ship and we’ll cast off. Hurry now, or we’ll maroon you two on this island.”

“Better do as he says,” Captain Rivers tells me.

SO, ONE at a time, I row the boxes back to the boat. I hoist them up on an old cable after tying rope around them. It takes a couple of hours, and at the end of that time I am as limp as yesterday’s paper napkins.

In fact, when they are all safe on board again I can hardly raise my head, let alone the anchor. That is what I want to do—let alone the anchor—but the three pirates make me pull it up.

I don’t dare disobey. They stand there—Captain Kidd with his long hair and fat face and little glittering black eyes; Stede Bonnet with a face like an old mummy and long rat teeth gleaming; big Blackbeard with his red eyes glaring through a hairy jungle—and I am very unhappy about the whole thing.

Since they find the treasure, the three of them are in high spirits. Being ghosts, this is understandable.

“I laugh every time I think of it,” Captain Kidd says, as we get under way again. “Our friend below will be half-crazy when we don’t show up with the treasure as the promise stands.”

"A capital jest," Stede Bonnet agrees. "Gadzooks, what need has he of treasure? Acres of it down there."

"We're off to land," Blackbeard smirks. "Land and rum. We'll bathe in the stuff. And when we run through this swag, we'll hunt more treasure."

He strides up to where Old Man Rivers is steering.

"More speed," he urges. "These newfangled steam engines on boats—can't compare them with our sailing ships."

"Take my Quedah Merchant," Kidd says. "There's a saucy vessel for you. I've not set foot on a ship for two hundred years and more. Ah—"

"Oh!" I correct him.

And "Oh!" it is. Because, looking over the port bow, I see something in the water ahead.

It is long, and grey, and pointed. It rises form the water in a very rapid manner.

One look and I recognize it. Two looks and I see the swastika on the side.

"Look!" I yell. "A German submarine!"

It is nothing else but. One of the Atlantic Coast U-boats, up for air.

"Submarine? What's a submarine?" asks Captain Kidd.

"This is no time to get technical," I gasp. "They're going to sink us."

"Sink my treasure? Damn their eyes, let them try it!" snarls Captain Kidd.

"But they have machine guns and torpedos and—"

"What are they?" asks Stede Bonnet.

"You'll find out," I tremble.

"Bring 'em on," Blackbeard grates.

Old Man Rivers stops steering.

"I'm going down to shut off the engines," he tells me. "They have us spotted all right. We can't run for it. Best stand by and surrender when they come alongside."

"Surrender? Never!" yells Blackbeard.

But when the submarine coasts closer the three ghost pirates get a look at the deadly metal prow and hull, at the gun-turrets on the deck. They begin to appreciate what modern pirates can do.

"Let's go below," suggests Captain Kidd, abruptly, "I don't like this thing."

THEY scuttle over into the houseboat cabin. Old Man Rivers comes back and joins me.

"Now what do we do?" I ask.

He shakes his head and stares at the grey sides of the approaching U-boat. The water is draining off the decks, and it is so close we can see the drops splattering down.

"What can we do?" whispers Old Man Rivers. "A houseboat can't fight a German submarine. They'll probably come aboard, search us, find the treasure, then sink us."

"But we'll drown!" I yell.

"Don't you tell me you are ready to drown yourself yesterday?" snaps Old Man Rivers.

"Yes, but I change my mind."

"Well, change it back again. Judging from the looks of this swab, we'll both taste salt water soon enough, and I don't mean taffy."

The "swab" he refers to is the guy who now steps out on the submarine deck. He is a big German bulldog, wearing an officer's uniform. He is close enough to yell over.

"Surrender in the name of the Third Reich!" he yells, "or we will your boat gesink."

"We are gesunk," I whisper.

"Nothing else to do," grumbles Old Man Rivers. "We surrender," he calls to the submarine commander.

"Stand by and we will aboard gecommen," barks the sausage in the uniform.

Sure enough, we stand by while the submarine cruises alongside us. Pretty soon a whole crew of Nazis climb out on deck—probably to get a little fresh air. They look at the Floating Kidney and laugh and point and sneer. We stand there and take it. What else can we do?

Then they throw an iron ladder across from the side of the submarine deck to our deck and march over. The whole crowd of krauts comes across.

"Heil Hitler!" snaps the commander, raising his arm like he wishes to leave the room.

"Hell Hitler," Captain Rivers answers politely.

"We will now your boat gesearch," he announces.

"Gesearch and be gedamned," says Captain Rivers.

So a gang of Nazi sailors stamps off to the cabin where the steering wheel stands.

"Oh, oh," I mumble. "That's where we put the treasure—remember?"

But it is too late to distract them. In a minute they are running out, jabbering German. The commander goes with them and pretty soon he comes out with a big smile. The rest of the Nazis come out with a big load —the treasure. They dump it on deck.

"You carry a valuable cargo, hein, for a boat so small?" remarks the commander. "And what is in the other cabin?"

"Nothing at all," says Captain Rivers. "No need to look there."

"Aha!" yaps the commander. "More valuables you maybe gehaben."

"You are mis-gestaken," I yell.

"We will a look take," he decides, with a leer.

I do not leer. I know what is in the cabin. The three cowardly pirate ghosts.

But the gang turns around, with the commander leading the way and goose-steps over to the cabin. The commander opens the door, grins, goes in.

The rest of them pile after him.

"They will scare the ectoplasm right out of our pirate pals," I mumble. "Suppose they are hiding under their bunks right now."

All at once I get my ears split by a shriek.

"Ach du Lieber!" yells a voice.

“Himmel!” comes another. “Doppelgangers!”

THERE is a rush and a roar, and the whole crew bursts out on deck again, running for dear life. And right behind them, waving their cutlasses and ready to cuttle with them, come Captain Kidd, Stede Bonnet, and Blackbeard the Pirate.

“Steal our treasure, will you, you black-gizzard spawn of a sparrow!” howls Blackbeard. “Take that!” And he swoops his blade down on the commander, attacking him with a surprise thrust to the rear.

The commander does a quick flank movement around the deck.

“Thief!” screams Captain Kidd, lunging at a sailor. The Nazi pulls out a gun and fires. The bullet goes right through the smoky figure of Kidd. The Nazi goes through a convulsion fit. He runs.

Stede Bonnet is trying to strangle another sailor with his wig. “I’ll teach you to board a pirate ship,” he hollers.

“Ghosts and doppelgangers!” the sailors scream, racing around the deck. The pirates hop after them.

Blackbeard is something terrific to see in action. He would make a good wrestler—he butts with his head, he uses his hips like a Conga dancer, and his beard stands up on end when he jumps at a sailor.

His big cutlass swings like a pendulum. Pretty soon he has the whole crew in a corner.

I turn around and look at Stede Bonnet and Captain Kidd. They are leaning over the side of the rail doing something. Then they wheel and rejoin Blackbeard.

“Over the side with them!” Kidd yells. “Feed the fishes with the scum!”

They drive the submarine crew around to where the iron ladder connects the two ships. The crew jumps up on the fail, ready to escape to the submarine.

But when they get to the top of the rail, the ladder is gone. It seems Stede Bonnet and Captain Kidd drop it into the water.

It is too late for the crew to do anything about it. The three fighting ghosts are hacking at them from behind, and they jump overboard.

"You too!" yelps Blackbeard, lifting the submarine commander by the naval base. He throws him down.

"Now!" sings out Stede Bonnet from the steering wheel. He is swinging the houseboat over—over towards where the Nazis are swimming in the water.

I close my eyes and ears for a minute. Then it is all over.

The water is empty. And so is the submarine, drifting off on our port bow.

"That finishes those bloody pirates," says Stede Bonnet. "And good riddance. Hessian dogs!"

"Stacking our treasure on deck to move it over the side," sniffs Captain Kidd. "And into an outlandish tin boat, too! Those fools aren't sailors."

"Beats me," Old Man Rivers remarks. "Just outside the harbor, too. Pretty bold."

"Just outride the harbor?" echoes Captain Kidd. "You mean we'll land soon?"

"Another few hours." Old Man Rivers points off to the shore line.

"Fine. We'll take the treasure off and—" Captain Kidd stops. He is staring at us with a very curious expression. All at once he beckons to Blackboard and Stede Bonnet. They go into a huddle.

I nudge Old Man Rivers.

"They are in a huddle," I point out. "And something tells me we won't like the signals they call."

"That doesn't worry me half as much as this," answers Captain Rivers. He points up at the sky.

SURE enough, from out of nowhere black clouds are swirling. A storm is coming up, but fast.

A wind whips over the deck. The waves turn dark green, almost black. They rise high.

“Better get back to steering,” decides Old Man Rivers.

“Never mind.” Captain Kidd looks up and speaks.

“Why not?”

“We steer from here.”

“But why not let me steer?”

“Dead men don’t steer.”

“But I’m alive.”

“Not for long,” mutters Captain Kidd.

“What do you mean?” asks Old Man Rivers.

“I have another idea. To begin with, we are double-crossing our pal below by taking the treasure on land. So why not make the job complete by double-crossing you and making off with the boat, too?”

“Typical of Captain Kidd’s brilliant if undisciplined mind,” Stede Bonnet comments, with a wolfish sneer.

“Look,” mutters Blackbeard. “Here’s a plank.”

“Plank?” I mention. “Who needs a plank?”

“You do,” Blackbeard tells me. “You’re going to walk it.”

“Walk the plank? But I’ll drown!”

“That’s the general idea,” Captain Kidd chuckles. “Now, you two—line up!” he yells, suddenly making with his sword again.

Stede Bonnet and Blackbeard lay the plank over the rail and weight down the other end with the anchor and rope.

“There’s a fine gateway to the bottom of the sea,” says Captain Kidd. “Have a nice trip.”

The boat is rolling and pitching now in the swells. The wind howls and Captain Kidd has to howl above it.

“Out you go,” he shrieks, poking at me and Old Man Rivers with his sword.

“Steer, you fool!” screams Rivers, as the boat rocks.

"Never mind—you walk the plank first!" Captain Kidd's face is as black as the storm. The three pirates stand behind us, silvery figures in the darkness. Their swords wave.

I stand out on the plank and shiver. The water yawns below.

"Hurry up and jump!" calls Blackbeard. "And say hello to our friend down below. Tell him we couldn't bring him back any treasure." He laughs like a wolf above the howding waves.

It is a moment I do not forget. The black sky is above me and the black sea is below me. The three gleaming pirate ghosts are behind me, shoving me along the plank.

"Jump!" snarls Captain Kidd, slashing at me with his buccaneering manicure-set.

Then it happens.

The thunder roars, the boat lurches, and the three pirates turn around—but too late.

The treasure that the Nazis drag out on deck is sliding over. The five chests crash into the rail—and through the rail.

"Bleach my bones!" screams Blackbeard. He dives for the chests.

They sail gracefully through the splintered railing and go kerplunk into the water.

"He's taking our treasure!" yells Captain Kidd. "He's double-crossing me, William Kidd! It's an outrage."

All three of the pirates lean over the side of the boat and stare at the swelling water while the chests sink.

Old Man Rivers and I see our chance and jump off the plank. With the boat lurching and pitching and tossing, we can hardly keep our feet.

The storm is really on, now.

WHILE the three pirates hang on the rail, I get busy. I loosen the plank we are supposed to walk. I wait for the boat to swing it around.

Then I yell at Kidd, Bonnet, and Blackbeard. They are much too occupied to pay attention to me.

Which is just what I want.

While they hang on to the rail, I hang on to my loose plank. I aim it carefully at the three silvery figures of the pirate ghosts. And when the boat gives the proper lurch, I let it go. It swings across the deck and smacks. Hard.

Blackbeard, Bonnet, and Captain Kidd sail up over the rail and drop into the water.

There is a single squawk, another bolt of lightning and crash of thunder, and the swashbuckling spirits are gone below the waves, following the treasure.

Old Man Rivers takes the steering wheel ready to wrestle with the elements. But the funny part of it is, right after the pirates leave us, the storm dies down. We make port in about an hour.

"I never see a storm like that one," Old Man Rivers says, shaking his head.

"There is a lot you never see before on this voyage," I remind him. "Three ghost pirates, a buried treasure, a battle with a submarine, and a near yank at walking the plank."

"But that storm," mutters Old Man Rivers. "It bothers me."

"It bothers the pirates more," I reply. "You know, I think I figure it out."

"How?" inquires Rivers.

"Well, remember Captain Kidd tells us he and his pals come back as ghosts by special permission from their pal below? They are going to find this treasure and then take it back and divide it up?"

"Right."

"Only they double-cross their pal below."

"Also right."

"So he double-crosses them. He makes the storm come up and gets the treasure to drop in the water. Also he probably helps me knock those three thugs back into the sea."

"But who is he?"

"Who else could he be but Davy Jones himself?" I decide. "The pal of pirates, you know. A guy with lots of treasure at the bottom of the sea, but one who wants more. And seeing as how our three freebooters get buried at sea, he can raise them up again. Also he can pull them down. Which he does."

"So he raises a storm, eh?" says Old Man Rivers.

"Absolutely. He must know the pirates' secret—because without the storm I couldn't knock them overboard. Anyhow it's all over. The treasure is now where it belongs—in Davy Jones' locker."

* * * * *

LEFTY Feep shrugged and stood up.

"Is it not a misfortune?" he asked.

"You mean your not drowning yourself after all?"

"No—I mean losing the treasure."

"Right. But Lefty, one thing I don't understand."

"Yes?"

"Well, you say you knocked all three of these pirate ghosts overboard with one blow. I agree it could be done with a plank, but I don't see why those tough guys didn't resist you. Why didn't they put up a fight?"

Feep winked. "That's where Davy Jones must help me," he explained. "Because he knows the pirates' secret. They are ghosts and have not sailed the seas in hundreds of years. So he merely sends the storm and they cannot fight me then."

"Why couldn't Captain Kidd and his buccaneers fight you in that storm?" I persisted.

"Because they are not used to storms any more," Feep told me. "Those pirates are utterly helpless when I attack them."

"Why?" I yelled.

Lefty Feep looked me square in the eye without a blush.

"Sea-sickness," he whispered.

THE END

The Black Brain

If this was the brain of a Martian dead millions of years, how could it be alive? How could it keep on growing?

"HE'S brought me a brain," Hilton whispered. "A black brain!"

I stared into that cold grey face and wondered what madness lurked beneath the intensity of his eyes.

"Think of it," Hilton mumbled. "A black brain from Mars."

I thought of it and turned away. My own eyes stared at the grinning faces of the shrunken dworp-heads from Jupiter that hung from the walls, at the colossal skeleton of the giant qtella from the Saturnic ooze.

It was a long moment before I could look at Dennis Hilton again. He was smiling. He hugged his triumph, gloated over it, chuckled again.

"A black brain," he crooned. "A brain from Mars."

I thought vaguely of calling a physician. But you don't easily question the sanity of a man like Dennis Hilton—the "Uranium King" himself—the famous interplanetary financier. That's what the telepapers called him. That's what the public thought he was. I suppose I am one of the few friends who know him in his true guise, as a man with an obsession. You couldn't call it a hobby, really. Dennis Hilton had an actual passion for collecting.

We sat now in his private sanctum. Sanctum? More truthfully, it was Hilton's private museum. All around the vast chamber were the trophy-cases, the wall chests, the display tables holding Hilton's prizes.

Jewels from the Martian deserts, stuffed ekis from Venus, mummified dringi from the caves on the dark side of the Moon . . . pottery from Vlakka, statuary from the crypts of Ignis, rare parchments found in the seas of Yabar. Osseous, geologic, paleontological remains . . . fragments of the forgotten cultures of a dozen planets . . . plunder from half a hundred asteroids and a score of satellites . . . and now, Dennis Hilton sitting there before me and mumbling, "He brought me a black brain from Mars."

I snapped out of it.

"Wait a minute, now," I said. "You flashed me in such a hurry I didn't get a chance to ask any questions. You told me nothing when I landed on the roof. All I've managed to get out of you here is something about securing a black brain. Let's start at the beginning, shall we?"

DENNIS HILTON sat back, lighted a sybarette, and smiled. In a moment the mask of self-consciousness slipped over his heavy, sagging grey face. He was once again the financier, the authority, the man of the cosmos.

"Sorry," he apologized with a chuckle as ingenuous as it was false. "Guess I'm a little excited, that's all. As one collector to another—you understand."

"I collect facts," I told him, dryly.

"I'm just an author, not a Uranium King. And so far I haven't heard any facts."

"Allow me to remedy that," said Hilton. "To begin with, I got the brain from Arnold Kress."

"You got the brain from who?" I exploded.

"Arnold Kress." Hilton repeated the name with a smile of triumph. "Yes, I know how peculiar that must sound. Kress and I have been rivals for years. Business rivals—and rivals in our hobby, as well. He's always had the jump on me, too. As owner of Transplanetary, Incorporated, he has been able to organize his own private expeditions. To Mars, the Moon, Venus, and all points solar. Always coming back with ridiculous televisual poses showing him standing there with a new trophy tucked under one arm.

"As for me, you know how I've gone about my collecting. The skippers of my own fleet have to pick up the items for me. I've sent out my own private archeologists and planeticians, too. But Kress has always been able to lord it over me because he bagged his own trophies, as it were."

I held up my hand and halted his tirade.

"I know all this," I said. "Get to the point. Why did Arnold Kress honor you with this gift, and where did he get it?"

"He got it on Mars, and he gave it to me because he was afraid," Hilton replied.

"Afraid? Afraid of what?"

"You'll see soon enough," Hilton told me. "But first, you wanted facts. Kress went out about three months ago. Some operator of his up near Dalil gave him the tip. You know the Dalil deserts? Beyond the Great Chasm?"

"Dangerous territory, isn't it? Unexplored?"

"Right. That only made Kress keener to be the first. As I understand it, his expedition was very elaborately organized. He made the desert crossing, all right. Got to the caves beyond."

"What caves?"

"The caves where he found the brain. Claims to have discovered a totally new lost Martian civilization there. Nothing alive, you understand, but remnants of immense ethnological value. Quite a contribution to interplanetary history and culture, as he tells it. Some of his professorial hirelings are probably writing up his findings for monographs.

"But all Kress actually achieved was the discovery of the brain. It was sitting in the cave. I've tried to get further details from him, but he's devilishly reticent. Not only reticent, but frightened."

"Frightened?"

"Yes." Again Hilton chuckled. "Imagine that—a big bad interplanetary buccaneer like Arnold Kress, afraid of his own shadow! And admitting it to me, his rival!"

“Facts,” I prompted him.

“There aren’t many more. From hints Kress dropped, his expedition left the caves beyond the Great Chasm in something of a hurry. Several men seem to have died in the Dalil desert crossing. The voyage back was something of an ordeal too, it seems. Fever got two of his staff planeticians—I gather it was the two who were assigned to tend and study the black brain.”

“Study it?”

“We’ll get to that, also,” Hilton told me. “At any rate, when Kress returned, he was a frightened man. Whether he had some idea that the black brain was a jinx, in the way that ancient Egyptologists thought mummies were hoodoos, I don’t know. When he came to me he merely offered me the black brain. But he seemed quite sincere in warning me that the thing seemed bewitched. He said he wished he had never removed it from its cave. In fact, he went further than that and said he is going to give up collecting. And by no means will he ever make another expedition to Mars.”

“Where is he now?” I asked.

“He went up to his private estate to recuperate, under the care of a physician. Personally, I think Arnold Kress is a sick man. I believe his present attitude—his delusions about the brain—spring from a serious ailment. Frankly, some of the things he said to me weren’t exactly sane.”

I ROSE to my feet.

“You know what you’ve doing to me, don’t you?” I asked Hilton. “You’re giving me the most damnable itch to see this black brain of yours. All this romantic buildup and air of mystery.”

“Come on, then,” Hilton urged. “I’ll let you peek at it. But I warn you, you’re due for a shock.”

Dennis Hilton led the way down the long hall. He paused before the bronze doors of a further chamber and knocked.

Kiti answered his summons and opened the door.

I shouldn't mention Kiti, I suppose. But that no longer matters now. Kiti was a Berian—a Venusian from the warm cities. Despite interplanetary codes on immigration, Dennis Hilton had smuggled him in as a personal servant. Berians, as all reports show, make the best of all possible servants, combining dog-like docility with utter devotion to their masters. Hilton was a man who liked unquestioning obedience. Hence, Kiti.

Still, I got a shock when he opened the door. You never get used to a Berian. It isn't their faces, though the single eye is bad enough. It's that greenish complexion, the dwarfed, stooping posture, and the claw-like fingers that arouse some instinctive repulsion in all earth-dwellers.

"Yess?" hissed Kiti.

"We're going to look at the brain," said Hilton.

He moved forward. But Kiti didn't get out of the doorway.

"Here, now!" Hilton snapped.

"Please. Please, Master. Do not enter here." The soft, servile voice held a note of entreaty.

"What's this?" asked Hilton, in genuine astonishment.

"Please do not go to the brain. The brain wants you to go. It is not well to obey it. Please do not go to the brain."

"Berians!" Hilton muttered to me, under his breath. "Excellent servants, but really little better than cretins according to earth standards. They get these delusions."

He shouldered the little green man aside.

"This way," he called. I followed him into another room. It was a room I'd never seen before—or had I? Of course! This had once been a guest chamber; parlor and bedroom. Now its walls were tiled, antiseptically white. It looked like a surgical theater, or a scientific laboratory. Laboratory? But why?

We went towards the second door.

Hilton turned a face filled with triumph towards me.

"Here it is," he whispered exultantly. "The black brain from Mars."

I stepped into that room. I stared at that table. I gazed at that great inverted glass bell suspended on chains from the high ceiling. I gazed into that bell.

I saw the black brain.

I screamed.

The transparent glass bell . . . it was hanging from the ceiling on the chains like a huge bowl, ten feet wide. And within the crystal prison, strands of ebon horror clawing inkily in a frantic effort to escape, was the living, throbbing, pulsating midnight mass of the black brain!

"It's alive!" I gasped.

HILTON turned to me. His cold grey face held a mocking grin.

"That's the surprise I promised you. That's the best fact of all, isn't it? The brain is alive. Yes, alive!"

I forced myself to stare again at the serpentine horror. To my trembling gaze it looked like a Medusa's nest—like an octopus—like an ever-changing blob of monstrous protoplasmic slime—like anything but a brain.

"Can you conceive of the organism that once held this encased in a sentient skull?" Hilton gloated. "What manner of being could control, and be controlled, by this brain?"

It was a question I didn't want to ponder on. And there were other questions, equally pressing, and equally unpleasant.

I couldn't hold back the obvious one, however.

"What keeps it alive?" I asked.

I stared, searching vainly for clamps, sutures, for an electro-attachment such as surgeons use in keeping animal brains alive. There was nothing. Nor did there seem to be any saline solution in the clear, shallow watery liquid at the bottom of the inverted glass compartment.

"I don't know, exactly." Hilton answered my question slowly. "Arnold Kress found it this way, or says he did. The brain was in the cave. In a bowl —this bowl, to be exact."

“Let me get this straight,” I said.

“Kress discovers this bowl in a cave beyond the Great Chasm of Mars, sitting all alone in the ruins of a bygone civilization. No one to tend to it. no evidence as to how it got there, no clue as to why it managed to stay—alive—if it is alive. That’s pretty hard to swallow.”

For answer, Hilton pointed to the black blob behind the glass.

“There it is,” he whispered.

And there it was. Throbbing ceaselessly, its nerve-endings undulating like tentacles, the black brain seethed.

“Are you sure it’s a brain?” I asked. “How do you know it isn’t some weird ultra-terrestial life form? Some macrocosmic cell, or a sea denizen?

“Look at the convolutions in the mass.” Hilton unconsciously assumed a lecturing attitude as he walked around the suspended glass bowl. “Here is a definite line of demarcation between the cerebrum and cerebellum. And note the prominence of what is unmistakably the medulla oblongata. These fissures are well-pronounced. The infinity of convolutions betokens considerable intelligence. Naturally the intelligence isn’t human, or even mundane. Yet the men in Kress’s party unanimously recognized the mass as being the living brain of what was once a conscious organism.”

Despite my inexplicable fear, I stepped closer. I was able to recognize the truth of what Hilton was telling me. Yes, it was a brain—not the small grey sponge of a human, but the black, alien, giant brain of some unknown monstrosity from another world.

“Fascinating, isn’t it?” Hilton remarked.

I shook my head. “Horrible,” I said.

“Nevertheless, it’s a prize. A remarkable specimen. I will study it.”

“Why don’t you turn it over to the authorities?” I asked.

Hilton frowned. His was the indignation of a born collector.

“It’s mine,” he insisted. “I intend to keep it.”

SHRUGGED, turned to go. At the door I paused.

I “By the way,” I remarked. “You said that Arnold Kress had some delusions about the brain? What exactly do you mean?”

Hilton hesitated before he answered. “Oh, nothing much. He thought perhaps the brain had been preserved as a sort of god by the forgotten peoples of the cave cities. He thought that it—well, you know the fancies a sick mind indulges in.”

I let it go at that.

“Let me know if you find out anything,” I told Hilton, as I left the room.

Going through the hall I encountered Kiti, crouching against the doorway in the darkness. There was a look of abject fear on his livid little face.

I fancied that Arnold Kress wasn’t the only one who had strange fancies about the black brain in the bowl. Kiti had them, too.

And that night, when the memory of that dark and living horror came to slither through my dreams, I wondered whether or not those fancies might be true.

2.

“KRESS has disappeared!”

Just three words. Three words, casually dropped by Spencer, at my office.

Yet for some reason the chills were racing up my spine.

I tried to be casual as I pumped Spencer for information. He didn’t know much. Got the news over the telepapers this morning. Kress had left his private sanitarium. There was a hint that he had not exactly “left” in the ordinary sense of the word. “Escaped” was a better choice. Because he had been under observation for an “acute mental disturbance.”

In a flash, I associated the story with what Hilton had told me. Kress was more than a bit disturbed—he was mad! And he had escaped.

Of course it wasn’t my business, really. Or was it? Anyone who had seen that black monstrosity in the bowl would make it his business to find out anything connected with it. And Kress had gone mad because he'd found it.

That's why I could hardly wait until evening to pay a call on Dennis Hilton.

Hilton answered the door himself. "Where's Kiti?" I asked.

Hilton sighed. "The crazy fool!" he said. "He left this morning. Couldn't argue him out of it, either. Wouldn't stay in the same place with the thing."

"The brain?"

"Yes."

I entered the hall. "But where could he go, Hilton? You certainly weren't fool enough to turn him loose outside. The authorities would nab you for that soon enough. Illegal entry of planetary visitors, and all that."

"I arranged to send him back to Venus on the afternoon flight," Hilton told me. "But it leaves me short-handed here. And I'm worried."

"Worried? What about?"

Hilton answered me as he plodded on ahead. Without my asking, he was leading me straight into the chamber that housed the black brain.

"This," said Hilton, opening the door and gesturing me in.

I stepped under the brilliant lights, stared around the white-tiled room, gaped at the glass bowl hanging from the chains in the ceiling.

THE brain was there, bubbling blackly as it had in my midnight dreams. It contracted and expanded rhythmically, like some enormous black heart—an evil heart, nourished on unthinkable things. I watched it pulsate. Today the tendrils; nerve-endings, or whatever they might be, were not waving. The entire mass seemed sluggish, and except for the ceaseless throbbing, it lay quiescent at the bottom of the huge bowl.

Hilton watched my eyes. Then he coughed. "Notice anything?" he asked. His voice was strangely husky.

"Why—no—that is—" I stared again. I did notice something!

"It's bigger," I said.

Hilton's pallor was ghastly. He couldn't keep the forced smile on his lips. "You see it too?" he whispered. "Much bigger," I said. "Why?"

"I don't know. And it frightens me. You see, Kress said that, too. The brain gets bigger. Look at it—nearly six feet in bulk! Kress told me, and I laughed at him."

The words recalled my mission. "Kress," I said. "He's escaped."

"What's that?"

"Don't you know?"

Hilton shook his head.

I broke the story as I'd heard it. "I thought he'd come here to you," I admitted. "That's why I stopped in."

"This is serious," Hilton murmured. He lit a sybarette with a nervous gesture. "Come on, we'll go into my den and see what must be done. Can't have Kress running around like this. He needs the proper attention."

We went out, down the hall, entered the den. I found a chair in the midst of the museum display and sat down. As I did so, my knee knocked against a stick. It fell to the floor with a clatter.

I stooped, picked it up. The object was a cane, with a silver handle. It looked vaguely familiar.

Kress! Arnold Kress always carried a silver-handled cane! Every telephoto showed him with his stick. My fingers ran over the silver head, encountered grooves on the surface. I looked down. My eyes read the initials. "A.K."

My eyes rose, to encounter the shocked stare of Dennis Hilton.

"All right," he sighed. "HI admit it. Kress was here."

"When?"

"This afternoon. He left about an hour ago. Oh, don't look at me like that! I did my best, tried to persuade him to return to the sanitarium. But he's mad, I tell you, utterly mad." Hilton must have read my face. "Perfectly harmless, though," he hastened on. "Simply delusions of persecution, that's all. He wants to go away, to escape."

"Escape from what?"

“From the brain, of course.” Hilton sat down heavily on a sofa. He thinks the brain is calling to him.”

“Calling to him?” I echoed his words in utter mystification.

“Yes. That’s what Kiti believed. That the brain is not only alive, but powerful. That it calls—telepathically. A sort of radioactive emanation that results in a hypnotic pull.

“That’s why he gave the brain to me,” Kress admitted. “He thought he could get away from it. He doesn’t like me of course, and he usually never comes near my house. So he thought if I had the brain he might pull free of it. But he can’t—he says. The brain called to him and he had to escape. He couldn’t get away. It called to him.”

“You don’t sound much better yourself,” I said, candidly. “I’m afraid you’re a candidate for a strait jacket yourself.”

“Don’t say that!” Hilton was on his feet, his face convulsed. “Don’t say that to me! I suppose you think I’m crazy, eh? That I just imagine the brain is growing? That I just imagine it whispers inside of my head and tells me to—”

HE stopped.

“Go ahead, Hilton,” I murmured. “What does the brain whisper to you?”

“Nothing.” He sat down again, hastily. “Nothing. I don’t know what I’m talking about, I guess. All this is too much of a shock to me. I wish you could have seen the look on Kress’s face when he came here. I listened to what he whispered about the brain. He does believe it was a god of some kind, away in that other world. And he said it must have called the guides to come to it.

“They were almost lost beyond the Great Chasm, he said, though the guides wouldn’t admit it. And then they seemed to go forward all at once as though they were being—directed. They came to the caves through an unbelievable maze, and found the brain right away. Because it called to them. Kress told me it wanted to be found. It wanted to go out into the cosmos again. To a world where it could find other minds to call to. A world where it could grow. Where it could grow. God!

"Why does it grow? When will it stop growing? How can I make it stop?"

I had the answer to that one.

"Destroy it," I said.

"No. I couldn't do that." Hilton was obviously sincere. "It's too important a finding to destroy."

I twirled Arnold Kress's cane. "Hilton," I said, softly. "Why do you think the black brain grows?"

"Do you want to know?" Hilton whispered. "Do you really want to know?"

I nodded.

"I think it feeds," he murmured. "I think it feeds on the minds of men. That it drains their thoughts, their urges, their emotions. That it grows by drawing the power from other brains. Like a black vampire. Yes, a black vampire, that's what it is!"

"Believing that," I said—still softly—"do you think it is wise to keep it here?"

Hilton gulped. "You're right." His voice was almost inaudible. "Yes, I can see you're right. It must be destroyed. Will you come back again tomorrow? We shall do it together, you and I. Right now, I don't think I could stand seeing it again. But tomorrow evening, at eight. Bring a gun."

It was a pleasant invitation. And thinking of that growing monstrosity—that black vampire, as Hilton called it—it was an invitation I fully determined to keep.

I KNOCKED on Hilton's door at five minutes to eight. At eight o'clock I put my shoulder to it, and battered it open in blind panic.

The feeling had been with me all through the day. Something was wrong. Something was utterly wrong.

Now I knew it. Hilton didn't answer the door.

The hallway was dark. The entire downstairs was dark. No servants, human or otherwise, greeted me.

And no voice answered my shouts as I summoned Dennis Hilton.

I raced up the stairs through the pitch-blackness of that empty house, switched on every light at the top of the stairway. Hilton's room was empty. The house was deserted.

I made for the den, the museum trophy room. Nobody there. I stood in the doorway, glancing around quickly before I turned away.

Then I saw the paper on the table.

The paper was crumpled. The handwriting was so shaky it took me a full minute to recognize it as Dennis Hilton's penmanship. But the message hit me at once. Just two words, scrawled in a sprawling hand.

"Get out!"

Never have I received more excellent advice. And it was advice I meant to act on. For some reason, panic gripped me. I had no intention of going down that hall and looking at the brain in the bowl.

I would leave now, and return with the police. That was the sensible way—the only sane way. Somehow the thought of facing that sinister entity in the room beyond was terrifying in a way I couldn't analyze. But I loathed the very thought of the black brain. The black brain, pulsing there, throbbing endlessly through uncounted eons of ghastly life; growing and growing, and preying on the minds of men with a dark, unhuman appetite.

I carried that thought with me as I turned and left the doorway.

Then I lost that thought.

I lost every thought.

Now I could only feel.

For the house was throbbing about me. Yes, the house—the floors, the walls, everything, was pulsing. Pulsing in a weird rhythm. A thumping. A contraction-expansion. Like the brain.

The very air seemed to move in a hideously alien tempo of its own. It blew back and forth. It hummed with a tension. The tension of a purring dynamo, of a deathless machine. A A machine that pulsed and throbbed. Like the brain.

My own body seemed gripped by a similar compulsion. The blood sang in my veins. I was conscious of an altered rhythm in my pulse. My heart pounded. My breathing altered to conform to the beats. And my head seemed squeezed and then released at every pulsation. Every pulsation of that ceaseless ebb and flow. Like the brain.

Now, through the feeling came the voice.

I thought it was a voice at first. Then I realized that it was not a voice I heard. I heard nothing. The voice was felt. I felt the voice inside me. Whispering. Urging. Commanding.

“Come.”

Every expansion, every contraction, each beat of the insistent rhythm, drove that command into my consciousness.

“Come.”

It was the brain. The brain that had called to Arnold Kress. The brain that had called to Kiti. The brain that might have called to Dennis Hilton. And now it was calling to me.

“Come.”

I WALKED down the hall. The gun in my pocket was forgotten. My original intention was forgotten. My very name, my being, was lost to me in the strength of that hypnotic command.

I passed the outer tiled chamber, where the light blazed. Like a man in a trance, I walked through the open doorway and stood before the brain.

The brain had grown. Its black bulk loomed ten feet, and towered along the glass sides of the huge bowl. I stood and stared mutely.

It was sucking my own brain, eating away my sanity. This I realized. I wondered how this would help it grow.

I wondered what would become of me—would I be left with a vacant mind, an empty shell? I wondered why I must stand before it so it could nourish itself.

All this I pondered, but I could not move. I could not resist, or run away. Even as I saw the brain swell, and thicken, I couldn't run. I was trapped. And the black brain billowed up—

I heard my name, then. Felt my name then. A voice that was not a voice—a voice that was only a thought within me—screamed, "Kill it! For God's sake, kill it before it gets you!"

I recognized Hilton's thought. The spell snapped. My hand went for the gun.

Even as I whipped it out, I saw things happen.

I saw the horrid suggestion of a face forming within those black and boiling depths. I saw the rudimentary nerve endings resolve into limbs and feelers that reached out to claw. I saw the utterly hellish suggestion of a great mouth . . . a grinning black maw, gaping in the depths of the throbbing mass.

I shot. I fired again and again. The bowl shattered into a million fragments, but I kept pumping—pumping into the writhing blackness of the huge monstrosity that slithered towards me even as I ripped it to dirty black ribbons.

In a moment it was over. I stared down at the bubbling, coagulated mass that was all that remained of the black brain. For a moment I fancied I saw something—but it must have been my own imagination.

Because I knew, suddenly, what had happened to the men lost on Kress's expedition. I knew what had happened to Kiti—who did not go back on the afternoon flight to Venus. I knew what had happened to Kress—who did not leave the house again after his escape. And staring at the mass on the floor, I knew what had happened to Dennis Hilton after he had bid me goodbye last night. I knew what had called to him and brought him to this room to die.

That's why, in the bubbling ooze, I could almost imagine I caught one last ghastly glimpse of their faces . . . shifting momentarily through the dying liquid came the twisted countenances of the dead. The brain reformed at the end, and I could see Hilton’s tortured mouth—Hilton, whose thought somewhere inside the black brain had sent the message which saved me.

I knew now what the brain had wanted, and how it grew. Because they were all wrong.

No matter what the evidence, it wasn’t a brain. It was an animal. An animal with a strange hypnotic power. And it had used this power to destroy them. Because animals must—eat!

Lefty Feep and the Racing Robot

Lefty had a swell idea for making money on the races. He would use a robot for a jockey to save weight. But the robot fell in love with a window dummy, and when she was kidnaped, Lefty's plans went haywire!

JACK'S SHACK was almost empty the other night, and so was I. I ordered a stack of wheat cakes and began to wade into them with a knife, fork, and lots of gusto.

Somewhere between-'the fourth and fifth wheat cake I suddenly noticed a human thumb. The thumb wriggled up and down, pressing the fifth wheat cake back on the plate.

A voice assailed my ears.

"Send back the platter—don't eat this batter."

I raised my head quickly and stared.

Lefty Feep was standing at the side of my table. The tall, angular indoor sportsman was grinning broadly.

"Lefty Feep!" I exclaimed. "You're a sight for sore eyes!"

And he was. Feep was wearing a creation designed to make anybody's eyes sore. A checkered overcoat, striped trousers, and polka-dot spats hung on his frame, reading from top to bottom. He was carrying a huge cigar, and as I looked, he puffed fifty cents worth of smoke into my face.

“Do not make with the cakes,” Feep insisted, pushing my plate aside. He signalled for a waiter.

“Me and my friend here wish a few pounds of caviar,” he ordered.

The waiter’s mouth hung open.

“Also tell the chef to go out and catch a couple humming birds by the tongue. Female humming birds—they are more delicate, if you follow me.”

The waiter followed, with a sarcastic grin.

“Caviar and humming birds’ tongues you say? I suppose you want some champagne, too, with a little Chinese lettuce on the side—you mooching bum!”

Lefty Feep disregarded the criticism. “Champagne is a good idea,” he nodded. “But forget us with the lettuce. I got plenty of lettuce right here.”

Reaching into his pocket he pulled out a big wad of bills.

The waiter retreated as Feep sat down next to me.

“Quite a roll you’ve got there,” I remarked.

“Sure,” said Feep. “It looks good even without butter.”

Curiosity got the better of me. “Where in the world did you make all this money?” I demanded.

Feep shrugged. “It’s in the bag with a nag.”

“How?”

“My hay starts to pay.”

“What do you mean, in English?”

“I win a horse-race,” he explained.

“But I thought you usually lost on the races,” I remarked.

“Usually I do,” admitted Lefty Feep.

“In fact up to recently I figure the only way I can clean up on a horse is to become a street-sweeper.”

“But you were lucky this time?”

“Smart is the word, buddy.” Feep beamed. “Let me tell you how it all happens. It is amazing and amusing.” I got up hastily. I could smell another story coming on. “Some other time, perhaps,” I mumbled. “Must go now. I’ve got a blind date.”

“She must be, if she goes out with you,” Feep retorted.

I tried to dodge, but his outstretched foot tripped me back into my seat.

“There. Now you are comfortable,” said Lefty Feep. “So kindly flap your ears to these remarkable remarks.” And as I flapped my ears, Lefty Feep flapped his tongue and began to speak.

IT ALL starts out one day last week when I am strolling down the street enjoying the sunshine and fresh air. I might as well enjoy sunshine and fresh air, since my landlady puts me out of my room.

It seems I do not make a dent in my rent lately, but this does not bother me half as much as the strolling. You see I am strolling on my hands and knees. The idea is I am trying to look like a dog, so my creditors won’t know me.

At the moment I happen to be crouching next to a lamp post, cursing the name of Gorilla Gabface.

This is not the first time I take Gorilla Gabface’s name in vain, because he plays plenty of unwashed tricks on me before. But this last trick is the worst—it is the reason why I am down and out. Down on my knees and out of my room.

Because Gorilla Gabface lately buys himself a race horse. Naturally he tells me about it and I take a look at the plug. To me the nag has all the earmarks of a phony pony, and I tell Gabface so. He gets sore and suggests I place a slight wager against the horse if I don’t like it.

Which I do, playing the favorite in a race the next day. And Gorilla Gabface’s horse beats the favorite.

I cannot figure this out, because his horse is such a fugitive from a milk-wagon. So the next day I bet again and Gabface’s horse comes in. And the next day.

The result is I am now flat broke. And I am just beginning to figure out why. Gabface is crookeder than a Jap diplomat, and I now realize he must be doping his horse. Also he is using a lightweight jockey and weighing him in with lead in his ears and mouth.

This I realize. But I also realize it is too late for me to do anything about it. Gorilla Gabface is still winning races, and all I can do is run races with my creditors.

So there I am, crouching by the lamp post and wondering if I can find a bone somewhere.

Then I happen to look up and I see the sign.

“HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE.”

And all at once I remember that this is the place where Sylvester Skeetch and Mordecai Meetch have their laboratory. They are a couple of scientific Americans—two professors without a quiz show. They are always cooking up some screwy idea or theory, and I happen to recall that I once collect fifty bucks from them when I assist in an experiment.

The experiment doesn’t work, but neither do I—and I get the fifty bucks anyway.

So that gives me an idea. Why not stroll into the HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE and see if they are bouncing any screwballs today?

I get up off my knees faster than I do in a dice-game when somebody looks at my dice. In two minutes I am up the stairs and in the laboratory.

The outer room is empty. So I push in the other door and take a look.

SYLVESTER SKEETCH and Mordecai Meetch are bending over a big white table. They are wearing dark glasses and those scientific nightgowns. A big light shines down on the table, and also shines on the knives and saws in their hands. Skeetch is sewing something up and mumbling to himself.

I tiptoe over and sneak a peek.

Then I give a gulp.

They have a body on the table and they are sewing it up!

Absolutely—there is a guy lying out on the table, and they are cross-stitching his neck for him!

“Hippocrates’ oath!” I mutter, or some such profanity.

Skeetch and Meetch wheel around. Their glasses glare. Then they recognize me. Meetch smiles.

“Well, if it isn’t Feep!” he says. “Glad to see you again.”

I can only stare at the body on the table.

“What kind of morgue smorgasbord are you cooking up there?” I gasp, which is something to gasp.

“Nothing at all,” Meetch answers. “How’s our patient, Skeetch?”

“Fine.”

“Patient?” I say.

“Well, you might call him that.” Meetch turns around. “Ready to get up now?”

Sure enough—I see that the guy on the table is smiling. He nods when Meetch talks to him. I stand there waiting for his sewed head to fall off, but it doesn’t.

Instead the guy sits up then stands up.

So does my hair.

“Feep,” says Skeetch, “Shake hands with Robert.”

I look at Robert. He stands stiff-jointed with a very wooden smile on his face. But he holds out his hand and I grab it. We shake very gently.

He stops shaking hands.

I don’t.

Then I look down at my hand to see what I am holding. His arm! It comes off at the shoulder!

“Curse it!” yells Meetch. “You aren’t glued tight enough!”

He grabs the arm, grabs Robert, and throws him down on the table again. Skeetch runs over with a big can of glue and another needle.

I can’t bear to look. I cover my eyes.

SKEETCH taps me on the shoulder after a while.

"Peekaboo," he says. "You can come out now. It's all right."

"All right?" I say. "Tearing guys arms off is all right? I guess I don't know my own strength."

Skeetch laughs.

"Take a look," he suggests.

I look. Robert is back on his feet. The arm is on again.

"Ulp!" I remark.

Meetch chuckles. "You're fooled too," he grins. "You think Robert is a man, eh?"

"What else?"

"Well, he's not. He's our newest invention, that's all."

"Invention?"

"Of course. Feep—meet Robert the Robot."

"A robot—one of those mechanical men?"

Meetch nods.

"But aren't they always some kind of tin or steel? And don't you have to press a lot of buttons to make them work?"

"Not any more," Skeetch tells me. "Robert the Robot is made out of nothing but wires, electrical batteries, synthetic brain and nerve tissue, reclaimed rubber, and plastic wood."

"Plastic wood?"

"Feel his face and hands. Marvelous likeness, isn't it? Very artistic modeling, just like flesh."

"But he's alive—he can talk and move—"

"Of course. The synthetic brain and nerve tissue takes care of that. Certain embolistic difficulties must be accounted for, and there's a synaptic differential to be eliminated or compensated for but—"

Meetch interrupts.

"Never mind all that," he says. "What Skeetch is trying to tell you is—we are successful. We create a synthetic human being, a robot. Robert the Robot is the latest scientific achievement, the crowning triumph of this Institute!"

Robert the Robot smiles and bows.

I shrug my shoulders. "Very interesting," I admit. "But now what? What are you going to do with this plastic personality?"

Skeetch scratches his noggin.

"There is an important point. I haven't the faintest idea of what to do with Robert the Robot."

"Neither have I," Meetch chimes in. "Of course we must examine his potentialities. See what kind of a brain he has. Why right now he's as simple as a new-born babe."

Robert the Robot stands there with a silly grin on his wooden puss.

"But he walks and talks," I object. "That is not simple."

"Part of the process already under control," Skeetch says. "He can speak and understand—but he cannot think. Or can he? That is something we must find out about. What can a robot like this do? What is he capable of? What are his limitations?"

"I dunno," says Robert the Robot, fingering the suit of clothes they put on him.

"There's the answer!" Meetch sighs. "He dunno! Skeetch, it's going to be a terrific problem studying and educating this creation of ours! A scientific check will require months of observation."

"Yes," Skeetch agrees with a groan. "And here we are, up to our necks on those rocket-ship plans, too! How are we going to sandwich in enough time to train our creation?"

RIGHT here is where I get an idea.

"Why not let me show Robert the Robot around?" I suggest.

"You?"

"Why not? I am in the know. I can teach him plenty. I can show him the ropes. For a small fee, of course."

Meetch looks at Skeetch. Skeetch looks at Meetch. Neither of them are getting any bargain from this exchange of glances. But Skeetch speaks.

“You might do it. But will you take care of Robert for us? Will you check his reactions regularly?”

“Not only his reactions but also his oil,” I promise.

“No need for that. Robert the Robot is self-operating. No gears, no cogs, nothing to wind up, nothing to run down. No food, water, oil, nothing to plug in.”

“Wrap it up,” I order. “That’s for me.”

“All right,” says Meetch. “Here’s fifty dollars. Take Robert the Robot for a week and see if you can teach him anything.”

“From me he’ll learn plenty,” I assure him. “All the angles and lots of curves, too.”

“We expect a full report,” Skeetch warns me.

“You’ll get it.”

So they hand me fifty smackeroos and I waltz down the stairs with Robert the Robot at my heels.

When we get out to the doorway, I turn and take a squint at Robert again.

He doesn’t look bad. In his blue suit and white shirt he resembles a window-dummy—but a high class window-dummy. The plastic wood face and hands look like the real flesh. He has nice eyes and a cheerful smile. Not exactly a movie star, but he will pass in a crowd. There is a little glue around his neckline, but not enough to attract attention. A very remarkable personality—this Robert the Robot.

But looks are not everything, and I figure I won’t take any chances. If he is going to be my pal for a week, I might as well wise him up a little. I do not wish for him to make any bad breaks in society, and it is my job to see that he is Emily Posted.

“Well, Robert,” I tell him. “Here we go into the big city.”

“What’s a city?” he asks, with a straight face.

“What’s a city? Why a city is—a lot of buildings with mortgages on them. A place where people live.”

“What are people?”

“People? Why, persons. Human beings. Like me.”

“You’re a human being?”

“Don’t say it in that nasty tone of voice. Of course I am. And you are going to pretend that you’re one, too.”

“What do human beings do?”

“Why, I eat and sleep.”

“What are they?”

“Eating is something you do with food after cooking it.”

“What’s cooking?”

SLANG he talks! So I explain about food and eating, and then I explain sleeping.

He shakes his head. “I don’t see anything in it,” he tells me. “I will not eat or sleep. What else do people do?”

“They work.” So I tell him about jobs and working.

“But why do they work?”

“In order to get money so they can eat and sleep.”

Robert the Robot grins. “People are silly then,” he decides. “I don’t want to be a people.”

“Person,” I correct him. “Watch your grammar. People means a whole snag of finks. A person is just one lug.”

“Finks and lugs,” the Robot mumbles.

“Come on, let’s walk around for a while,” I suggest.

And off we go on a conducted tour. It is the first time I ever show a Robot the sights of the big city, but he is not a bad guy as dummies go. It really gives me a bang to point out the joints, and Robert gets quite enthusiastic.

What really gives him the old jolt is the machinery. The cars and busses and trains are quite a thrill. Being a robot, naturally he is interested in mechanical stuff. So we watch neon signs and adding machines and I take him over to see a printing press and a couple factories. In fact, it is after dark before I manage to tear him away from a clothes-pin factory.

We stand outside and wait for a car near a drug-store. Robert the Robot happens to notice the weighing machine.

“What is that?” he asks.

So of course I have to explain what a weighing machine is. And just for fun I slip a penny in the slot and let him weigh himself. A card comes out with his weight on it.

Robert the Robot weighs 55 lbs.

That is curious. Here is a robot, looking like a full-grown man, and he only weighs 85 pounds. The plastic wood, of course.

“You’re quite a lightweight,” I remark. “Funny.”

Only on second thought it isn’t funny.

It’s wonderful!

“Eighty-five pounds!” I yell. “Come on, Robert—we’re going places!”

“Home?” he asks.

“No, not home,” I answer. “We are going to the amusement park!”

And that is just where we do go.

I TAKE Robert the Robot out to the carnival. Nobody notices him, of course, or thinks he is any different. They do not realize he is a robot. They also do not realize he is a gold-mine—but I do.

I get him into the carnival and I throw him on the merry-go-round right away. Put him right on the wooden horses.

“This is nice,” he tells me, sliding up and down and hanging onto the brass pole.

“Let go the pole and see if you can ride,” I suggest.

He does. He can ride.

We go around again.

“Why are we doing this?” asks Robert the Robot.

“You’ll find out,” I answer.

Because I know what I'm doing. I'm teaching Robert the Robot how to ride.

Here is a robot who looks like a human being. He only weighs 85 pounds. If he can ride—what a jockey he will make!

I can put weights; on him when he weighs in that will make him plenty heavy. Then I remove them and he goes back to just 85 pounds on a horse. And Gorilla Gabface, for all his crookedness, can't get a jockey weighing 85 pounds, I will enter a race, bet with Gabface, and let the robot ride a horse I put my money on. It's a cinch.

After I give Robert the Robot a few more riding lessons I hustle him out of the carnival. We walk along the street and I explain my plan to him.

I tell him what a race is, and what live horses are, and how to handle one.

"Tomorrow you will ride like that," I finish up. "You will win a lot of money. That means plenty of groceries and a nice place to sleep."

Robert the Robot shakes his wooden head.

"But I do not like groceries and I never sleep," he complains. "Besides, I am not sure that one of these horses, as you call them, is safe for me. My arms might fall off again."

"You'll like it," I argue.

"No. I rather look at some more machinery," says Robert the Robot. "Beautiful wheels and pistons."

"Beautiful baloney!" I sneer.

"Yes," whispers Robert the Robot. "Beautiful."

"What?" I turn my head.

"A beautiful baloney, you call her?" breathes Robert the Robot.

He is staring off into space. I squint and follow his gaze.

Robert the Robot is looking into a department store window. He is gawking at a window dummy standing there. A blonde window dummy with long false eyelashes, wearing a negligee.

"A beautiful baloney," he whispers.

"You are wrong, Robert," I correct him. "Women are not baloneys. They are generally referred to in polite circles as tomatoes. Or wenches. Or ginch.

Of course, this one is just a window dumm—”

THEN I catch myself in time. Because another idea hits me.

“Robert,” I whisper.

He does not hear me, he is so busy giving this window dummy the old eye.

“Robert, do you like her?”

“Oh, yes,” he sighs. “I like her.”

Yes, I am right. He doesn’t know any better—he falls for this window dummy. So I go right ahead with my idea.

“Robert, how would you like to have her for a girl friend?”

“Girl friend?”

I start to explain what a girl friend is, but I don’t need to. He catches on. He shakes his head so fast the stitches nearly break on his neck. And almost cracks his plastic lips with a smile.

“I will see to it,” I promise. “If you will run this race tomorrow for me.”

“Well—”

“Think of it, Robert! She will be sitting up in the grandstand watching you ride. Watching you win! You’ll be a hero!”

“Do you think she’ll like me?” asks Robert. “I can’t seem to get her to smile at me.”

Then I catch on. He thinks the window dummy is alive, the way he is!

“She’s marvelous,” he breathes. “Wonderful how she manages to stand still all this time without ever moving.”

“Sure,” I agree. “Most women won’t stand still for a minute.”

“Why doesn’t she talk?” he asks.

“Listen,” I tell him. “When you hang around dames as long as I do, you will be grateful to find one who doesn’t talk.”

“Maybe so,” says Robert the Robot.

“Well, then, how about it?” I ask, giving him the needle. “If she comes along, will you ride in a race tomorrow?”

"Yes," he says.

So I pat him on his wooden back and dash into the department store. It is closed, of course, but I locate the watchman and the head designer. I tell the head designer I wish to buy his window dummy.

"You want that dummy?" ask the designer jerk.

"Well," I say, kind of embarrassed, "I don't really want it. It's for a friend. A present—like a doll."

"Awfully big for a doll," says the designer jerk.

"I have an awfully big friend," I explain.

So to make a long story snort, I finally walk off with the dummy for twenty bucks. This is a lot of hay, but I figure I will be making bales of hay when the sun shines on the racetrack tomorrow.

In a few minutes I am back on the street, dragging the dummy across my back.

"Robert, meet your new girl friend," I say. "Here she is."

"What's her name?" he asks, very gullible.

"Oh—her name is Roberta," I tell him.

He reaches out to shake hands. I wag the dummy's arm.

"Can't she walk?" he inquires.

"Have a heart," I explain. "The poor girl stands on her feet all day long. She is tired."

"I am not tired."

"You are not a woman," I snap. "No, I will carry her home. She must be ready to go to the race tomorrow."

I DO carry her home. I give the landlady the back rent and she gives me a little back talk, and then I settle Robert the Robot in one room and lock Roberta the window-dummy in the other room.

"Got to keep it proper," I tell Robert. "Now I must go out and make final arrangements."

Which is just what I do.

I head for the stable.

I am looking for a personality by the name of Horse-Sense Homer, a dear friend of mine who is quite a jack around the track. He owns a horse of his own—a nag if there ever was one—and I fancy he will be currying him in a hurry tonight.

Which he is. I step into the stable and the first person I recognize is Horse-Sense Homer himself. I do not see him in the dark but I can tell he is a stable man, because he has such an air about him.

"Homer," I yell. "It's me—Lefty Feep!"

He turns on a lantern and I see he is lying down on the straw, asleep. Next to him is his scrawny horse. "Who's your friend?" I inquire. Horse-Sense Homer smiles. "The best nag I own," he tells me. "The name is Glue Factory "You're telling me?"

"A great horse," he insists. "Watch her win tomorrow."

"Got a good jockey?"

"Fair. I'm depending on Glue Factory, though."

"Well, I've got your troubles all packed up," I tell him. "I just pick up a jockey for you."

"Pick up?"

"With one hand," I assure him. "He's that light."

"No midgets."

"A full-grown man," I come back. "Great rider, too. You can't lose. He only weighs 85 pounds."

"85 pounds?"

"A wonder. And just to show you how much confidence I have in him, I'm going to bet all your money on winning."

"All my money, eh? With who?"

"Gorilla Gabface," I answer. "He is racing his steed against you, is he not?"

"Right," says Horse-Sense Homer, frowning. "You know I am a little afraid. That horse of his, Cut Plug, is a pretty fast filly."

"Don't be silly with that filly!" I sneer.

"But Gabface's horse always wins."

"Not now he doesn't. Not with my 85-pound jockey."

"Well, Lefty, wait a minute now—"

"No time to wait. Got to place the bet." I grab his wallet and run off. He stares after me, shaking his head.

I SHAKE my feet back to town and into Gorilla Gabface's pool parlor where he hangs out, particularly around the chins.

And there sits the fat slob himself, grinning from ear to ear. When I walk in he laughs.

"Well if it isn't Lefty Feep," he cracks. "And pretty sagging, too! What's the matter, Lefty—you lose your racing form?"

I just hand him the onion eye.

"I guess my Cut Plug teaches you a lesson at the track today," he chuckles. "Maybe now you will learn to stop horsing around."

Then I give it to him.

"Listen, Gabface. Is it true that you plan to enter that horse-doctor's delight of yours in tomorrow's race?"

"The fifth race, to be exact," Gabface answers. "And what is it to you? Want to make a bet on him winning?"

"No," I come back. "But I will make a little wager with you that Cut Plug gets beat by another steed."

"Such as which?"

"I am betting on Glue Factory," I tell him.

"Glue Factory?" Gabface laughs again and several windows fall out. "Why that oat-burner does not win a race since Paul Revere sells her back in 1776."

"She wins tomorrow," I state. "Do you wish to amble into a gamble?"

"I will bet against you Feep," Gabface sneers. "What amount do you wish to wager? A dime? Or does somebody hand you a quarter?"

"I will bet $500," I tell him.

Gabface sits up.

"Where do you get $500 and how do you hide the body?" he scoffs.

"Here is the dough." I wave the wallet at him.

He smiles. "All right. It's a bet. I will see you at the track tomorrow with my wheelbarrow. I need it to carry the winnings in."

He jerks his head all at once.

"Who is the jockey?" he asks. "Horse-Sense Homer's regular boy?"

"I got a new jockey for this race," I tell him. "Fellow by the name of Robert."

"Never hear of him."

"You will," I predict. And walk out . . ."

SO the deal is fixed. I put up the dough, the bet is on, and all I do now is arrange final details. The next morning I go down and get racing togs for Robert the Robot and have him weighed in. I put a few weights inside his stomach and sew him back up and he tips the scales at 125. While we weigh Gabface comes in with his jockey. He also tips the scales at 125, but he has a mouthful of pennies or something and does not say anything. I figure he really goes for about 118—and with Robert the Robot at 85, he is a cinch to win.

Gabface doesn't think so. He comes over and looks at Robert. Robert is nothing much to look at. His wooden face and painted smile do not show up very well in the daylight, and he moves very stiff and awkward, just as anybody would if they had wooden hips.

"So this is your new jockey?" grins Gabface, looking Robert up and down. He stares hard, and for a minute I am afraid he will realize that Robert, in spite of the plastic wood, is just a mechanical man.

But he only sniffs and says, "Fine specimen. Must be out on a bender last night from the way his face looks. He shouldn't ride a horse today. A pink elephant is better."

I do not comment, but take Robert the Robot out of there in a speedy hurry.

"How do you feel?" I ask him.

"Feel? What's feel?" he comes back.

"Never mind. Are you ready to race today?"

"Will Roberta watch me?"

"Right in the stands with me," I promise.

This cheers him up. We go around to the stable and I introduce him to Glue Factory and give him a few pointers on riding. This isn't really important, because the horse will race by itself, and all that bothers it is weight. So it's a cinch.

The only one who worries now is Horse-Sense Homer. He happens to come up and say hello while Robert and I stand there.

"You the marvelous jockey Feep tells me about?" he says, slapping Robert on the back.

"Oooooh!" says Robert the Robot and falls down. One of his legs buckles and comes off at the knee.

"Jumping steeple-chase!" yells Homer. "I cripple him for life! Get a doctor—get an ambulance—police——"

"Get some glue," I tell him, very calmly.

"Glue? But his leg—"

"I will glue it on again."

"Glue a man's leg on?"

"He is only a dummy," I explain. "A robot. A mechanical man. There is nothing to worry about."

Homer takes this all in and his face turns a delicate shade of blue.

"Nothing to worry about?" he gasps. "You mean you bet my $500 that you will win a race with a dummy for a jockey?"

"But he is very smart for a dummy," I assure Homer.

"Look," I say, putting his leg back on, "he is made out of plastic wood." And bend the foot backwards. "Soft as mud."

“Don’t do that,” Homer shrieks. “Your name is mud, Feep! You put $500 of mine into the paws of Gorilla Gabface with this crazy stunt.”

“Don’t bum your bridges until you come to them,” I cheer him up. “Just watch Robert the Robot race.”

“I am going to close my eyes and lie down,” Homer sighs.

THEN the bugle blows for the first race and I run off. I get Robert in his racing togs and pull them over his plastic body. I give him his last-minute instructions. But he looks worried.

“What about Roberta?” he says. “What about her?”

“She is waiting in the stands to see you,” I needle him. “Here—she sends you this to wear.”

And I pull out a part of the window dummy’s wig I clip off.

“A lock of her hair!” whispers Robert the Robot. “Gee!”

“Now get in there and win,” I coach. “The fifth race is coming up.” And I turn him over to Homer.

Then I go back to the stands. Here I sit in a box with Roberta the window dummy next to me like I promise. I dig her up a nice dress to wear and drag her along to a seat. She has to be carried in, but nobody notices very much—everybody being on their feet and screaming while they watch the races.

Comes the fifth race. Comes the horses. Comes Cut Plug and Clue Factory. Comes the break at the barrier. And they’re off!

Robert the Robot sails along in his saddle. Cut Plug’s jockey gives him the old boot and spur. But Glue Factory takes the lead. With scarcely no weight to carry, she is really feeling her oats. I see Robert bouncing up and down and the horse gallops around the inside stretch and then heads for home.

The crowd roars. Glue Factory is a long shot. And Cut Plug, the favorite, is all shot. Because Glue Factory wins in a breeze. Five lengths!

“Yeeeoowee!” yells a loud voice in my ear. It turns out to be my own voice.

"I am robbed!" screams another voice from in back of me.

I turn around and see Gorilla Gabface dancing up and down on one foot in a rage polka.

"Give me the dough," I call to him, in a very sweet tone of voice.

"Why you——" Gabface begins.

But he never goes any further in his description because he suddenly notices Roberta the window dummy sitting next to me.

"Ladies present," he mumbles. "Is this your latest flame, Lefty?"

I keep Roberta's back turned. "No," I explain. "She is the—the girl-friend of my jockey."

"Oh, that dirty—" Gabface commences. And catches himself once more. He shakes his head. "I still do not see how you win," he groans. "The horse looks like it isn't carrying any weight at all."

"Pay up," I say, very patient.

"All right, Feep. You get a break this time. But it doesn't happen again."

"Oh no?" I see a chance to get really even with this crook. "What do you plan to do? Give that nag of yours a shot of dynamite in his oats to make him start off with a bang?"

"Do you mean to infer that I pull a fixed race?" Gabface grunts.

"Who cares?" I grin. "No matter what you do from now on, I win all the races."

"So? Perhaps you wish to make another bet? I am racing my horse again Saturday," Gabface snarls.

This is just what I like to hear.

"Certainly I will wager. Shall we say a cool grand this time?" I suggest.

"That is plenty icy." Gabface is hedging.

"Afraid, eh?"

"Listen you," says Gabface, sticking his chins out. "I am not afraid of man nor beast—and one of those categories must cover you. I will bet the thousand. My horse against that plug you and Homer run."

So it is a bet.

GABFACE leaves and I run down to meet Robert the Robot and Horse-Sense Homer.

Horse-Sense is very excited. He cannot believe the race is won. When I tell him about the new bet he is happier than ever.

Robert the Robot is happy, too. I bring him a whole handful of hair from the window-dummy’s wig and say she pulls it out in her excitement.

He is anxious to race again.

“This is more fun than the merry-go-round,” he admits.

So it is settled. Robert the Robot and Roberta the dummy go home with me in a cab. I keep them separated and act as chaperone when we get to my dump.

Starting early the next morning I take Robert down to the stable for a workout. Only two more days to go and I don’t wish to take chances. I know Gorilla Gabface is sore, and when he gets sore he gets mean, and when he gets mean he is dangerous, and when he is dangerous there is trouble ahead.

He will do anything to win the race Saturday, I know. So the next two days I train Robert and guard him carefully. I also have Horse-Sense Homer guard his horse, too. Gorilla Gabface will not get a chance to pull any funny business, I figure. And on Friday afternoon everything is all set for the big day tomorrow.

Until we get home.

Then I discover my mistake. I spend all this time guarding Robert the Robot and the horse. Roberta is left home alone.

And when we return to the house she is gone!

Vanished!

“Where is Roberta?” squeaks Robert, hopping around the room in excitement.

“Probably she goes to the beauty parlor to get her hair fixed,” I stall. “She will pull a lot out tomorrow when you win.”

But I am panicky.

I jump two feet when the doorbell rings.

Then I get to the door, open it, and look out. There is no one there. But standing in the hall is Roberta.

She looks all right. Whoever takes her does no damage.

I drag her in and show her to Robert. He cheers up and stays cheerful all evening.

But I worry.

SATURDAY morning, the day of the big race, finds me down at the tracks quite early indeed. Horse-Sense Homer takes Glue Factory out for exercise and reports she is very fast today. Robert the Robot goes into the stables to rest. But me—I head for the stall where Gorilla Gabface keeps his oat meal-ticket.

Sure enough, there he is. And when he sees me he cannot keep the nasty grin off his puss.

“So,” I accuse him. “You are the one who kidnaps my jockey’s girl friend.”

“Who kidnaps who?” he comes back. “Nobody puts the snatch on her. She is back, isn’t she?”

“Yes,” I admit. “But you grab her in the first place.”

Gabface leers.

“Maybe I do. Maybe I figure on queering the race by making your jockey feel upset about his girl friend,” he hints. “But I do not realize then that the girl friend is a window dummy.”

“So what? Everybody has a hobby.”

“Window dummies aren’t hobbies,” Gabface goes on. “You know, Feep, I get to thinking when I find out this. I get to thinking about what kind of a personality might have a window dummy for a heartburn. Perhaps, I figure, he is a dummy himself.”

“You’re slightly but completely screwy,” I suggest.

“Maybe. Maybe not.” Gabface grins in his chins. “It adds up, doesn’t it? Your horse races like she doesn’t carry much weight.”

"But a live dummy is ridiculous," I stall.

Gabface nods. "I agree with you, Feep," he tells me. "And there will be no such nonsense in today's race."

"What do you mean?"

"I send some of the boys around to examine your jockey," he informs me.

"Hey, what do you mean?" I yell.

"Can't put anything over on me," he comes back. "See you after the race. I can use that thousand."

I do not waste any more time. I heat my feet running back to the stable where I leave Robert the Robot.

I rush in. "Robert!" I screech. "Where are you?"

No answer. I see no one in the gloom.

But as I rush across the floor I stumble. Stumble on Robert the Robot. Or what's left of Robert the Robot.

ROBERT THE ROBOT is lying in a heap on the stable floor. He does not look human any more. He resembles a small junk pile.

Gorilla's boys really interview him. In fact they tear him to pieces!

Sure enough, there is nothing on the floor but torn clothes, twisted wires and cords, and a lot of scraps of plastic wood. I bend down and pick up a handful. It kneads between my fingers.

"Poor Robert," I whisper, thinking of the Robot.

"Poor me!" I also whisper, thinking of the thousand berries.

"All set?" It is Horse-Sense Homer, running in panting. "I just get a fresh hunch we win," he announces. "So I plank one thousand more on the nose to win. Odds are three to one! We will clean up!"

"Clean up this mess," I suggest.

"What is it?" Homer asks.

"It's our jockey. That's what it is."

And I explain.

“But we can’t race Glue Factory then. We lose all our dough! And to think I put it all on her nose!”

“Wait a minute!” I stare down and get an inspiration. Crazy, but an idea.

“We need a jockey?” I say.

“Of course we do,” wails Homer.

“You got one. Me.”

“You—Feep?”

“Why not? I weigh about 130.”

“Too much. Gabface’s horse will beat us unless we get an edge in weight or something.”

“We will get something,” I promise him. “Robert the Robot will win for us yet.”

“But he’s busted and you’re riding.”

“Leave it to me,” I promise him.

The bugle sounds.

“Hurry up—where’s the nag?” I yell, picking up what is left of Robert the Robot and dashing for the stable entrance.

Homer shrugs but follows me.

Fifteen minutes later I am wearing racing togs and jogging out to the post on Glue Factory.

Gabface is standing next to his pony and when he sees us coming up to the starting post he nearly falls over.

“You—riding this race?” he gasps.

The hypo he is trying to slip his horse falls out of his hand.

“Winning this race,” I grin. “By a nose.”

“You’re nuts,” he yells.

“You’ll see,” I call back. “You can’t stop Robert the Robot. We win by a nose.”

“I will hold my nose,” Gabface says. “But if I hold it until you limp past the finish line I will suffocate.”

“Is that a promise?”

"Goodbye, Feep. And say goodbye to your money, too," he calls after me.

I bend down and pat Glue Factory on the neck as we get ready to run. She is in good form, but I am heavy. And I am depending on just one thing to win.

But my worries dissolve in a cloud of dust.

We're off. Way, way off!

I keep watching Gabface's horse—Cut Plug. He comes up strong. I give my nag the old pressure. We are neck and neck. We pull away from the rest. We round the turn. The crowd is busting lungs all over the place.

We head for home. I bend over in the saddle. Cut Plug is even with me. I see the finish line ahead. We are neck and neck. And then I give one last boot. Glue Factory jerks her head out. We cross the finish line.

We win—by a nose!

And that, of course, is where I get all my money.

LEFTY FEEP sat back and relighted his cigar with a dollar bill.

"Some story," he commented.

"Some hooey," I said.

"Who's hooey?"

"You," I answered. "To begin with, what did those scientists say when you told them their robot was ruined?"

"Nothing. They will build another one anyway. Right now they are all mixed up building a rocket ship and they do not even pay attention when I report to them. No trouble there at all."

"All right," I sighed. "But there is one other thing wrong with this story of yours. How did you manage to win this race? You're heavier than the average jockey. Even if your horse was in good form, I don't see how you could win by a nose, as you say."

"Well," Feep admitted, "I really don't win."

"Aha, I thought so!"

"Robert the Robot wins the race, like I tell Gabface."

"But Robert the Robot was torn to pieces."

"I know. But he still wins by a nose."

"How?"

"It's this way," said Lefty Peep. "My horse is almost as fast as Gabface's this day. In fact, without doping his nag, the two horses will run about even, I figure. So I can ride as jockey and come in neck and neck."

"But you won by a nose."

"That is where Robert the Robot really wins," Feep grinned. "You see, when he is busted, I merely take some of the plastic wood from Robert the Robot's body and—"

"And what?"

"And I mould an extra long nose to glue on the horse!"

Never Trust A Demon

Snartch conjured up a demon and set out to make his dreams come true. But he overlooked one very important factor . . .

“I GUESS I’m just no good as a I carpenter,” said Mr. Snartch, as he sawed the woman in half. “Look at this sloppy stroke!” he muttered, as he hacked through the lady’s hips.

Of course, Mr. Snartch muttered all this under his breath, because an audience isn’t supposed to hear such comments from a stage magician. And Mr. Snartch was a stage magician, travelling under the name of Jeffrey the Great.

As Jeffrey the Great, he had to saw a woman in half every night, and twice a week at matinees, and he was getting pretty sick of it. The first few times were fun, but now it was just plain drudgery. Sometimes he hardly had the ambition to put the lady back together again at the end of the show. And of course, such a thing would be bad. If it kept happening, he would not only get a poor reputation as a magician, but he would also lose a lot of partners.

So tonight he hurried through his act, sawing away like mad, and then put the pieces together in record time.

Mr. Snartch wanted to finish the show and get back to his magic.

That was Jeffrey Snartch’s salvation. His only hobby—magic. Not stage magic, but real magic. Black magic. Not the hocus-pocus variety, but the genuine article. Sorcery. Necromancy.

Tonight he was particularly anxious to get away from the theatre because he had just discovered a swell new formula for conjuring up a demon.

Perhaps it wasn't a swell new formula, exactly. It was more of a swell old formula, and Jeffrey Snartch discovered it in a very ancient book, printed in Latin.

So he finished his performance in a hurry and ran out of the theatre and over to his hotel room where he had the book hidden under the mattress.

He had translated the particular spell he was interested in, and written it out on a piece of hotel stationery, along with a list of things he had to use in order to make the incantation work.

"Let me see," said Mr. Snartch. "I will need some toad's blood and some sacramental wine and some chalk to draw a pentagon with and five black candles and mandrake roots to burn."

So he put on his hat and coat and went out on a shopping trip. Half an hour later he was back in his room with the bundles. He spread everything out on the bed and pulled down the shades.

"Of course, I didn't manage to get exactly the right things," he confessed to himself. "But I guess they are just as good."

Instead of toads, Mr. Snartch had to buy some frogs at a pet shop. Naturally, he couldn't buy sacramental wine, but he figured on using a little grape juice instead. He had the chalk, though, and the candles. Of course, the candles weren't black ones. They were birthday candles—but it was all the store had. And Mr. Snartch didn't even know what mandrake roots look like—so he just stepped into a vacant lot and pulled up a handful of weeds.

"But I guess it will be all right," Mr. Snartch kept reassuring himself.

SO HE took his translation of instructions and began to do what the book told him. He drew a pentagon and lighted the candles and mixed up some frog's blood and grape juice and set fire to his weeds in a tray. Of course, there were a lot of technical things he had to do with all this, but the important thing is—in half an hour he had his room in one hell of a mess.

Then he turned out the lights and began to chant his formula out loud by the light of the candles.

It was very dark and frightening in the hotel room, and the birthday candles cast some very unusual shadows. The air was filled with the smell of the burning weeds.

But Mr. Snartch didn’t worry. He was an old hand at wizard’s work, and he just read his Latin, rolling out the syllables, and hoped for the best.

He got the worst.

When he finished with the Latin—cheating a bit now and then, where he didn’t understand how to pronounce the words—he started to make the necessary passes in the air. And that’s when it happened.

Suddenly the curtains began to blow. This was unusual, because the windows were all closed.

Then the shadow appeared on the wall. Some one else was in the room! This was unusual, because all the doors were locked.

Mr. Snartch looked at the shadow. Then he blinked. He looked again and saw what cast the shadow. Then he yelled.

“Eeeeowie!” yelled Mr. Snartch.

“Not bad at all,” said a voice. “The last man who saw me didn’t yell at all. He merely jumped out of the window.”

“Candidly, that’s what I’d like to do,” chattered Snartch. “The only trouble is, the windows are locked. And my knees are trembling too hard for me to jump.”

“So I notice,” said the voice. “Hold on now, I’m coming out into the light.”

Mr. Snartch watched the figure coming forth against the candle light. That is, he started to watch it from where he stood. But he ended up by peering at it from under the bed. He crawled there in a hurry when he got a good look at what he had conjured up.

For a minute he could hardly speak.

“Bless my soul,” he whispered. “Bless my soul!”

“Sorry,” said the voice. “That’s not exactly in my department. “Maybe I’d better go.”

“I didn’t mean to offend you,” said Mr. Snartch, hastily, as he came out from under the bed and stood up. “It’s only that you sort of overwhelmed me.”

“Did I really?” said the voice, with a pleased chuckle. “Well, well.”

“You’re pretty awful, you know,” said Snartch.

“Am I?” cooed the voice. “Am I ghastly?”

“Frightful!” exclaimed Mr. Snartch.

“Oh, you’re just trying to flatter me,” simpered the voice.

“Not at all,” Snartch insisted. “You’re really and truly hideous.” The demon was hideous.

HE SQUATTED there in the center of the floor. His body was lean, mean, green, obscene. A vast bulk, toadlike, with slick reptilian skin. He had webbed feet and claws, fringed with moss at the cuticle. He looked as though he had been pickled a long, long time ago.

His face, as faces go, just didn’t. Imagine a green skull with yellow eyes and you get the idea. You can have it.

Mr. Snartch felt the same way. The more he looked, the less he liked his visitor.

The demon crouched forward, extending his grinning face on a stalk-like neck. A forked tongue licked forth between fretted lips. He looked as though he were crouching to spring.

Mr. Snartch stepped hastily back inside the pentagon, which was to protect him from the demon.

“You can’t cross the line of chalk or go between the candles,” he whispered. “Stop looking at me that way!”

“What way?” whined the demon. “All I wanted was a glass of water. Can’t you see my tongue is hanging out? I’ve had a long, hard trip.”

“Try some of this,” Snartch suggested, pointing to the bowl of frog blood and grape juice.

“Ah!” said the demon. “That’s more like it.”

“Vitamins,” said Snartch.

“Yes, it was a terrible journey,” the demon sighed, between gulps. “Whirling across space that way. And then wriggling between dimensions. It’s not easy when you get to be my age.”

“I can imagine,” sighed Mr. Snartch, sympathetically.

“Besides, I haven’t been getting any calls now for a long time,” the demon confessed. “I’m out of practise.”

“Really?” said Mr. Snartch.

“Yes. You know what’s happened to sorcery in the last few centuries. It’s fallen off terribly. Nobody even practises witchcraft. Say, by the way, how did you happen to run across my address?”

“In this book,” Mr. Snartch explained, pulling the volume out of his pocket. “Ever see it?”

The demon cocked his head thoughtfully.

“Of course. It used to get me a lot of trade several hundred years ago. Now nobody seems to read it any more. This modern age!”

He sighed, like an air-raid warning.

“Mind if I sit down?” he asked. “I’m tired out from the trip.”

“Go ahead,” said Mr. Snartch, hospitably. “You are pretty old, aren’t you?”

“Just look at me,” groaned the demon.

MR. SNARTCH didn’t want to look at the demon, but he managed to stand the sight for several minutes. He noted the wrinkles in the demon’s face, the flabby pouches on his arms and legs where muscles had once flexed. Varicose veins stood out prominently.

“ ’Ook ’ere,” rasped the demon. “ ’Ook af my teef. Mof of ’em are miffing.”

Sure enough, only a few big yellow stumps remained in the demon's mouth.

"Too bad," Mr. Snartch sympathized.

"Yes. I can hardly eat a thing any more," the demon confided. "I just nibble at an arm or leg now and then."

"You do," wheezed Snartch, turning pale. "Just—nibble—you say."

"Nibble," repeated the demon.

Mr. Snartch suddenly dropped all notions of becoming friendly with his guest from Gehenna. He trembled anew and hugged the safety of the pentagon.

"Well," he said. "This is all very interesting, but it isn't getting us anywhere. Pretty soon the candles will burn down—they're only birthday candles, you notice—and then you can step across and get me. In order to avoid that, I think we'd better get our business out of the way right now."

"To be sure," said the demon. "Of course." He squatted on his haunches and rubbed his hands together thoughtfully. "What can I do for you, sir?" he inquired.

Mr. Snartch cleared his throat nervously.

Here it was! It was all true, then. Mr. Snartch could actually get what the old books promised! He had a genuine dead-alive demon at his command. What did he want?

"Money," said Snartch. "I want a lot of money."

"A wise choice," said the demon. "I'll just put you down for say—a million dollars?"

"And the income tax," Jeffrey Snartch added, hastily.

"And the income tax. Very well."

"In return, of course, you'll want something?" said Mr. Snartch.

"Naturally." The demon's eyes sparkled. "Let's have a look at you now. Hmmm. You're nice and plump. I think I would enjoy you."

"Enjoy me?"

"Enjoy eating you, I should say."

“I should say not!” Mr. Snartch turned pale. His eyes narrowed. “I have hardening of the arteries,” he said. This was a lie.

But the demon paused. Mr. Snartch quickly followed up his advantage.

“Besides, I am a heavy smoker,” he remarked. “And you know what the cannibals of New Guinea say.”

“No, I don’t. What do they say?”

“That smokers have an unpleasant tobacco taste.”

“I see.”

“Also,” added Snartch, “I wouldn’t like to hurt those teeth of yours. You aren’t so young any more. You might have trouble with bones.” He shook his head. “Really, as your friend, I’d feel very guilty about letting you eat me.”

“Well, if you put it that way—”

“Why not take my soul?” suggested Mr. Snartch. “Give me my million, plus taxes, and six months. Then take my soul. It’s a better deal, I think.”

“All right,” said the demon. “I’ll buy that. Would you mind signing here, please?”

A LITTLE black book appeared in the demon’s claws. He tossed it across the pentagon. Mr. Snartch took out his pen.

“Blood, please,” insisted the demon. “Let’s make this thing legal.”

Mr. Snartch pricked his finger and wrote his name. Then he tossed the book back.

“Thank you,” said the demon. “See you later with that million.”

He disappeared. Mr. Snartch sighed.

Suddenly the demon’s head glimmered in the air before him.

“How do you want the money?” he inquired.

“Oh, any way at all,” Snartch told him. “Large bills will do. Just so I get it soon.”

“To hear is to obey,” hissed the demon. The head disappeared.

Mr. Snartch breathed a sigh of mingled relief and regret. Then he set about re-arranging the room. It took him quite a while to clean up and restore order. By that time it was very late. He lay down on the bed and went to sleep.

When he woke up it was daylight.

“Oh oh!” thought Mr. Snartch. “I’ll be late for the show at the theatre today.”

He’d forgotten about the matinee.

Dressing hastily, he ran out of the hotel lobby in a frenzy and hailed a passing cab.

“Grand Theatre!” he yelled.

The show had already started when he arrived. Myra, his assistant—the lady he sawed in half—was anxiously awaiting him.

“Oh, Jeffrey!” she wailed. “What happened to you?”

Jeffrey Snartch shrugged feebly. He wasn’t exactly pleased by her solicitude. A very determined type of woman, Myra. And apparently she had determined to marry him. He avoided her whenever possible, never talking to her. Their only intimate contact came when he sawed her up.

Snartch put on his dress clothes and emerged again as the magician. Jeffrey the Great.

The band was playing for the opening of his act. Quickly he arranged props with Myra. Then he strode out on the stage.

During all this time he had no chance to remember the events of last night. He was too busy, too rushed. Once on the stage, the audience claimed his attention.

JEFFREY SNARTCH started out with a few card tricks and a couple of handkerchief bits. As he went through the business and reeled out the patter, his thoughts blurred. He followed through his paces as a matter of routine.

Absent-mindedly, he waved his arms, feeling for the gimmicks which controlled a rabbit, flowers, and a boiled dinner which would be produced from his sleeve.

He made a few passes and let the first object slide into his hand.

“I have here a rabbit,” he said.

The audience laughed.

“I have here a—what the—”

Snartch stared at his hands. There was no rabbit in his palm. Instead, his fingers clutched a wad of yellow bills. Thousand dollar bills!

Again, automatically, he gestured. “A rabbit!” he muttered.

No rabbit. Another package of bills. The audience howled.

“All right,” said Snartch, desperately. “No rabbit. But I have got a lot of lettuce!”

The laugh that followed won the audience once more. Desperately Snartch wriggled around. What in blazes had happened to that rabbit?

He patted his coat. Another wad of bills flew out. And then another. He scarcely noticed.

Again he clutched at his shirt, seeking for the elusive bunny. Money showered on the stage.

Desperately now, he wondered if the rabbit had wandered into his trousers. He shook his trouser-legs.

There was a furious clanking, and a flood of gold pieces dropped from his trousers. The audience hooted and screamed.

So did Snartch.

As he attempted to bow, greenbacks burst from his waist, cascaded from under his vest, poured from his pockets. He stood knee-deep in currency as the curtains fell.

Indignant voices rose around him. The stage manager ran out, cursing.

“What the hell’s the big idea?” demanded that worthy.

Then he stared at the money.

“Jeez, it’s real!” he gasped.

Snartch grinned. Suddenly he realized what had happened. The demon's promise—one million dollars! He'd chosen a unique way to deliver it.

"Of course it's real," Snartch chuckled, scooping up bills like mad. "And so is this."

"What?"

Snartch tweaked the stage manager's nose.

"My resignation," he said. "As of today. Now. I quit. I retire." Leaving the manager goggling, Snartch strode off the stage, carrying his cash.

Myra waited for him in the wings. "What's this?" she sobbed. "You can't really mean you're through?"

"But I do mean it," Snartch said, trying not to be unkind. "I don't know just how to tell you this, Myra, but I have sawed you in half for the last time."

"What will I do?" whispered the girl. "Without you around to saw me, I'll just go to pieces."

"Maybe you can find somebody else to saw you," Snartch consoled her. "A nice young girl like you. Anybody would be proud to slice you up."

She sobbed after him as he collected his belongings.

"It won't be the same," she moaned. "No matter what happens, I'll always be thinking of you and how you dismembered me."

"Take this, kid," said Snartch, pressing a handful of gold pieces into her palm.

"Where are you going?"

"To my country estate," Snartch told her.

"Country estate? You haven't got a country estate."

"I will have," Snartch grinned. "Soon."

And he did.

SNARTCH went to the realtor's office. From there he proceeded to a haberdasher's, and ordered one hundred suits, to be delivered at the address of his new country estate. On a sudden impulse he went out and bought a yacht. Not that he needed one—he just felt like it. Besides, one of his suits was a white tropical that went well with a yacht.

After that, he invested in a limousine, a roadster, a diamond-studded wrist watch, and five hundred cases of Scotch whiskey.

All of which was to be sent C.O.D. to his new address. He felt very pleased by his day's work, and decided to relax in a night club.

He relaxed very pleasantly there. Anybody who tips waiters with twenty-dollar gold pieces can get excellent service.

Jeffrey Snartch woke up the next morning with a definite hangover. He was in bed at his new estate, and he wanted to stay there.

But the doorbell began to buzz at nine o'clock, and kept buzzing all day. Delivery men and drivers began to arrive with his new possessions, and Snartch stood at the door paying off in cash. All in all, he managed to get rid of a lot of money. The men came to sign over the house, and somebody else arrived to report that his yacht was ready in the lagoon.

Snartch paid with a smile, though his head buzzed. Finally the tumult and the shouting died. He lay down on the sofa to enjoy what remained of his hangover.

And then the doorbell rang again.

Snartch answered it.

A pugnacious-looking truck driver greeted him with a truculent sneer.

"What is it?" asked Snartch.

The truck-driver scowled. "I was here earlier today," he growled. "Brought yez that there Scotch."

"What about it? I paid you, didn't I?"

"Yeah. Yez paid me, all right. In marked bills."

"Marked bills?"

"Sure. Look." A grimy hand held out yellow currency. Mr. Snartch examined it. Yes, it was marked, all right.

"Where'd yez steal it?" muttered the truck driver.

"Steal it?" gasped Mr. Snartch. "I didn't steal anything."

"This dough is stolen!" barked the truck driver. "Take it back."

"Wait a minute," Snartch gulped. "The phone is ringing."

It was. He trotted down the hall and answered. The voice on the other end of the wire belonged to the man who had sold him the yacht.

"Mr. Snartch?"

"Speaking."

"You bought a yacht from us for $200,000? Remember?"

"That's right."

"You paid cash."

"Why not?"

"Mr. Snartch, where did you get that money? We've just checked the currency and found it marked."

"I—I—"

"Mr. Snartch, did you know that it is necessary for us to report such bills to the Federal authorities? They plan to call on you this afternoon regarding this matter."

"Fine," said Mr. Snartch. "Swell. I'll expect them. I'll bake them a cake."

HE HUNG up. Down the hall he saw the truck-driver muttering over his money.

Mr. Snartch shrugged and sighed. He couldn't explain this. Something was wrong. But he didn't want to explain it, or find out what was wrong. All he wanted was out.

Mr. Snartch tiptoed into the library and got out, through the window.

He sneaked into his limousine and drove down the drive. Then he tore heil-for-leather into town.

He registered at the hotel where he had conjured up the demon. Then he went out and bought some supplies.

Promptly at midnight that night he evoked his supernatural side-kick.

The demon crouched outside the chalk pentagon in the gloom and sighed wearily. But Mr. Snartch did not show any pity. He did not invite the demon to sit down. He didn't even offer a drink. He just stared and tapped his foot accusingly.

"You sent for me?" rasped the demon, at length.

"You know I did," Snartch snapped. "What do you desire? Is there anything wrong?"

"You know what's wrong."

The demon blushed a deeper green. "Oh. About that money, I suppose? I can explain that. You see, I—"

"Never mind," said Mr. Snartch, bitterly. "The deal's off. Breach of contract. You know I'm in the right." The demon squinted at him. A difficult thing to do, for the demon had no eyelids.

"Wait a minute," he said, softly. "Wait a minute. Money isn't everything, you know. We could work something out."

"What?" said Mr. Snartch. "Power," purred the demon. "You want power, perhaps? A lot of men are eager for power these days. Take that fellow Hitler," he hinted.

Mr. Snartch made a face. "Not for me," he said abruptly. "Power like that wouldn't interest me a bit."

"How about—women?"

"Women?"

"I could get you the most beautiful women of history," the demon coaxed. "Think of it I Helen of Troy. Cleopatra. Du Barry. Madame Pompadour. Josephine."

"You could?" said Mr. Snartch. He was thinking of Myra. Anything would be a relief after Myra.

"How would you like to be a great lover?" hinted the demon. He was on the right track now, and he smelled a sale. He hurried to close the deal.

"Gorgeous girls," he chanted. "Fond blondes. Brunette pets. Redheads galore."

"Yes," said Mr. Snartch, suddenly. "Yes. I'd like that."

"Of course," said the demon, glibly, "this is a special deal, and it will mean that your time is shortened. Instead of a six-month contract I must reduce my offer to three months."

Mr. Snartch smiled.

"That will be all right," he said. "Take back your money and bring on the girls."

The demon nodded.

"No more tricks, though," warned Jeffrey Snartch.

"Cute tricks," giggled the demon. Then he disappeared. Only the giggle remained.

Snartch cleaned up the mess thoughtfully and went to bed.

AS A RESULT of his hangover and unusual exertions, he slept more soundly than usual. To tell the truth, when he awoke it was night once again. Mr. Snartch had slept the clock around.

He rose, blinked, and went into the bathroom to shave. After shaving he bathed, leisurely. By the time he was dressed it was almost nine o'clock. He stepped back into his hotel room.

Then he reeled back into the bathroom.

Sitting on Mr. Snartch's bed, chair, and bureau, were six girls. Two blondes, two brunettes, and two redheads.

All were of different types. Short, fall, fat, lean, frail, husky. But all had one thing in common. A costume consisting of rhinestones. A few here, a few there. But the costumes were similar.

So were the scowls on the faces of the girls.

Mr. Snartch staggered in the doorway. They looked up at him.

"All right," demanded a tall redhead, in a husky voice. "What's the big idea, mister?"

"Why, don't you know what the big idea is?" asked Mr. Snartch.

"No, we don't," insisted the redhead. "Here we are, sitting in our dressing room getting ready for the first floor show, when this guy shows up with a gun—"

"What guy?"

"How should I know? He wore a mask. Besides, he didn't give us a chance to look at him. Just made us go out the back door and climb into a taxi. Then he drove us here, took us up the freight elevator, and smuggled us into your room. He locked the door from the outside."

"Kidnaper," screeched a little blonde. "That's what he was. A kidnaper."

"Taking us from the night club," complained a plump brunette. "Dragging us here at the point of a gun. And I suppose you're a white slaver."

Mr. Snartch received these revelations in dismay.

"Girls, please!" he said. "Let me explain—"

"Nuts to your explanations! Let us out of here!"

The redhead rose and faced him.

"But—" said Mr. Snartch.

It was the wrong word.

The redhead lowered her head and butted him.

"Come on, girls!" yelled the blonde.

"We'll show this big bully!"

WHAT happened then was very painful. Six women went for Mr. Snartch in a big way—but not the way he had anticipated. They went for him with hair-brushes and mirrors and pitchers and picture frames and other loose articles. They went for him with their teeth and nails.

They left Mr. Snartch lying on the floor with a Gideon Bible on his chest. And he was almost ready for it.

He recovered nearly an hour later. The girls had left, taking the door from its hinges en route.

Mr. Snartch had barely the strength to totter downstairs and buy fresh candles, frogs, and grape juice. He could scarcely manage to tear up some more roots and draw his chalk pentagon. His voice was hoarse as he chanted the Latin invocation.

But he made it.

And the demon appeared.

It squatted malignly before him, and Mr. Snartch thought he detected a mocking gleam in his eyes.

Gleam or no gleam, Snartch was too angry to hesitate.

“Now you’ve done it,” he grated. “Those women—come clean now, where did you get them?”

“What’s the matter?” asked the demon.

“You know very well!” yelled Mr. Snartch. “Famous beauties of history—bah! You stole a bunch of chorus girls from a night club, didn’t you?”

“Well—”

“Damned right you did!” screamed Mr. Snartch. “Just a common kidnaper, that’s what you are.”

“But you asked for women—”

“Another thing,” Snartch continued, ignoring the demon’s words. “I’ve just figured out about that money, too. It’s all here in this morning’s paper.

About the bank that was held up. No wonder the currency was marked. Hot money, that’s what you gave me.”

The demon hung his head.

“Why?” groaned Mr. Snartch. “Why? That’s all I want to know.”

THE demon faced him, his skulllike features contorted.

“Because I’m old, that’s why. Because I’m old, and out of practice. I haven’t got the stuff any more.”

“The stuff?”

“The power. Everything passes with age, you know.”

The demon sighed, heavily. Windows rattled.

“I used to be omnipotent, almost. Like the book says. I could do anything, bring you anything, grant any wish. But now I’m all through.

“I did my best for you, though. I couldn’t produce wealth for you as I used to, so I went out and stole it. And I couldn’t evoke beautiful women for you, so I stole them. Thought you wouldn’t find out. But you did.”

“Yes, I did.” Mr. Snartch was stern. “Of course, you realize this makes our agreement null and void.”

The demon sat up.

His claws scraped restlessly against the floor. His lips drew back in a bony grin. He hunched closer across the flickering shadows.

“Oh no,” he droned. “Not at all.”

“You mean?”

“In three months you die. You give me your soul.”

“Now listen here—”

“You listen to me.” The demon crept closer. “I kept my part of the bargain. I brought you a million dollars, didn’t I? I didn’t say where it would come from or who it might belong to. You got your money.”

“Still—”

“Keep still!” The demon grinned wickedly. “You changed your mind. You wanted women. Blondes, brunettes, redheads. I gave you blondes, brunettes, redheads. I didn’t specify that they would like you. But I brought them. And so, Mr. Jeffrey Snartch, I am holding you to your bargain. In three months I will claim your soul.”

Mr. Snartch drew himself erect. He shrugged.

“Very well, demon,” he sighed. “You asked for it, I suppose.”

“What?”

“I had hoped to spare you this final humiliation for a while,” said Mr. Snartch. “Out of consideration for your age.”

“What do you mean?”

“You are very old, demon. Otherwise you wouldn’t make such a mistake when you signed the contract with me. You would have looked my name up first. But you didn’t. You wanted my soul and tried to cheat me. Instead, I cheated you. You don’t get my soul after all.”

“Why not?”

“Because,” said Mr. Snartch, slowly, “I sold my soul to the Devil two years ago!”

The End

Genie with the Light Brown Hair

Lefty Feep found Aladdin's lamp, but it didn't do him much good because a gang of underworld criminals took it from him. As it turned out, it didn't do them much good either—they lit it during a blackout!

I WAS sitting in Jack's Shack the other day, eating ham and eggs for breakfast. It was early—I could see that, because there weren't many stains on the table-cloth. Outside of the people present, the place was deserted. That is to say, the usual restaurant flies weren't awake yet.

Certainly the last person I expected to see was Lefty Feep. But sure enough, the tall thin teller of tales came walking towards my table. As usual, he was wearing a loud checkered suit that matched his checkered career.

When Feep saw me, he quickened his pace.

"Accept my greeting and what are you eating?" he hailed me.

I pointed at my plate. "Just some ham and eggs," I said.

"Huh!" sneered Lefty Feep. "Ham and eggs is food for yeggs!"

"What's the matter, don't you care for the dish?"

"Very vulgar." Feep shrugged. "Me, I am used to smell and see a delicacy. I like a plate of pate de phooey grass. Or a jar of caviar. Also, I am very fond of tearing a terrapin."

"Why, Lefty," I exclaimed, "where do you get such food?"

Feep sighed as he sat down next to me.

"I don't any more," he admitted. "My luck changes. Now, to tell the truth I would just as soon lam into some of that ham, or beg for an egg."

He scowled. I patted his shoulder.

"Well, just make light of it," I consoled him.

This remark didn't console. Feep bridled.

"Don't talk about making light," he muttered.

"You needn't flare up this way," I told him.

Feep positively trembled. "Please do not give me the squirms with such terms!" he begged.

"What's the matter—you been playing with fire?" I asked.

"You know how it is," he sighed. "A burnt child fears the hotfoot." He shook his head. "But I do not like this light talk. What happens to me shouldn't happen to a Jap!"

"Must be pretty awful, Lefty," I answered.

"It is awful. So awful I will tell it to you."

I was afraid of that. I got to my feet. "Sorry," I stammered. "I must go now. I've got a hot date."

"Let her wait for you and cool off," Feep snapped. "This story is really terrible. In fact it is so atrocious you must hear it."

"That's a swell recommendation," I drawled. "I'm willing to take your word for it, and go."

"You will take all my words for it!" said Lefty Feep. He shoved me into my chair and swiftly tied my arms down with the table-cloth.

"Now!" he said.

Then Lefty Feep sat down and unfolded his tale.

I AM sitting in my room the other day suffering from a terrible injury. It seems the night before I am handling a pair of dice when they suddenly go off. I do not even know they are loaded.

Anyhow, there is quite an explosion, and I wind up with the shirt torn off my back—also most of my skin, because the other players beat me up.

So there I am sitting in my room, partly fractured and completely broke. I squat there while the collectors play drum solos on my door. The rent collector, the gas collector, the light collector, the insurance collector, the tax collector. I am afraid if the garbage collector shows up he will take me away, because I am certainly ready for the scrap-heap.

All at once I hear a new banging on the panels.

I rush to my feet and go into the closet to look for my steel traps. Because I know who is at my door now—the Wolf.

And I am not exactly in my Little Red Riding Hood mood today. But the banging keeps up, and there is nothing for me to do but open the door before it comes off the hinges.

So I slide it back a crack and take a weak peek. Then I breathe a sigh of relief and asthma.

It is not the Wolf. It is not even a coyote. Just a little shrivelled-up and drivelled-down personality in a suit that resembles a walking rag bag. He looks like something the cat drags in, and I do mean a mouse.

“Ah—excuse me,” he whispers.

“Sure, buddy,” I tell him. “You’re excused. First door to your left. Goodbye.”

“No, no,” he insists. “I mean, are you Mr. Feep?”

“You got a warrant?”

“No.”

“Then I’m Feep. And who are you?”

“Jerkfinkle is my name. Otis Jerkfinkle.”

I stare at him. “Don’t I perceive you someplace before?” I ask, trying to remember what freak-shows I attend in my life.

“I believe so.”

“In the morgue, maybe?” I guess.

“Not at all.” Otis Jerkfinkle smiles. “If I am not mistaken, you are the gentleman who secures the idol of the God Squat for my private museum.”

Sure enough, I remember now. This Otis Jerkfinkle is the curator of a museum of stuff ornamental and oriental. Once before I tangle with him when I help him get the statue of a Burmese god away from a crook.

"Could be," I admit. "Well, what's on your mind besides a tumor?"

Otis Jerkfinkle comes into my room and sits down.

"I am on a spot," he sighs. "And I want you to help me."

I laugh in a sarcastic key. "I am on the spot too," I tell him. "And nobody can help me—not even a dry-cleaner."

"But this is very simple," Jerkfinkle pipes. He fumbles around in a briefcase and brings out something wrapped up in a newspaper. I stare at the paper with disappointment. No comic strips.

"Mr. Feep," says Jerkfinkle, "I am closing up the museum for the duration of the war and storing away my valuable art treasures. But there is one item I cannot afford to store, because no insurance will cover it. It is a very special item in its way. And I am wondering if you might take care of it for me while I'm away."

"What is it?" I inquire.

Jerkfinkle hands me the bundle wrapped in newspapers.

"Open it up and see for yourself," he says.

I UNWRAP the newspapers, wondering what is underneath. Gold, jewels, platinum? Diamonds? Rubies? Rubber?

But it is none of these precious things that I pull out from the wrappings.

All I find is a lamp.

A dirty, greasy old kerosene lamp.

I give it a leer and a sneer.

Jerkfinkle watches me with gleaming eyes.

"There it is," he whispers. "Isn't it a beauty?"

"Where do you win this?" I mutter. "In the future keep away from Bingo games where they give such lousy prizes."

"This is not a prize," insists Jerkfinkle.

"You're telling me?"

"This is nothing other than Aladdin's Lamp!" he chatters.

"Aladdin's Lamp, eh?"

"Actually."

"Then why doesn't this guy Aladdin take care of it?" I ask him. "Better still, why doesn't he throw it away and buy a flashlight?"

Jerkfinkle gives me a glare and stare.

"Can it be," he asks, "that you do not know the story of Aladdin and his wonderful Lamp?"

"Can be," I admit.

So Jerkfinkle goes off into a long song and dance about this overgrown cigarette-lighter he has. Translating same into English, the gag runs like this.

ONCE upon a time there is a Chink gink by the name of Aladdin who is strictly from hunger. By hook and crook he gets hold of a magic lamp which has nothing in common with the stuff put out by the Electric Company.

Whenever he slides his pinkies around the base of this lamp and goes rub-adub-dub, a Genie appears. A Genie, according to the story, is just a big, overgrown stooge. A demon servant, strictly non-union. This Genie serves Aladdin and brings him anything he wishes. Just like a one-man Finance Company. Aladdin has a lot of adventures with his lamp and ends up rich, famous, and with ulcers.

That is the bark of Jerkfinkle's remarks.

"But where do you get this lamp?" I ask.

Jerkfinkle says he buys it from a curio dealer in a Hong Kong hock-shop some years ago.

I look at the article with new interest.

"Well," I say. "In such a case, why don't you use this magic lantern? Why don't you scrape your fingers to the bone, rubbing it? You will be rich and famous."

Jerkfinkle sighs. “That’s the rub,” he tells me. “The lamp doesn’t work any more.”

“Doesn’t work?”

“Look.” He shows me the sides of the lamp. “The metal is so worn down through rubbing that you can’t leave fingerprints, or whatever is necessary for the Genie to appear.”

“In other words, this is just a hunk of junk.”

“Thaumaturgically speaking, yes.”

“Cut out that kind of talk around here,” I warn him.

“Don’t misunderstand me,” Jerkfinkle peeps. “This lamp is very valuable as an antique alone. I prize it most highly, despite its lack of supernatural power.”

“Or candle-power,” I add, looking at the battered wreck.

“But what I want to know is, will you take care of it for me while I am away?”

“Just where are you going?” I inquire.

Jerkfinkle smiles.

“I am enlisting in the Navy!”

I size him up, then down, then sideways. “What can you do in the Navy?” I ask. “To begin with you are a runt. Besides, all you are fit for is collecting old junk.”

“There will be lots of old junk when we finish up with the Jap cities,” Jerkfinkle tells me.

I smile. “A very brilliant notion,” I agree. “I am proud of you. And I will be most happy to take care of this brie and brae for you while you are away.”

“A thousand thanks,” says Jerkfinkle, bowing and rubbing his paws together. “I know it will be in good hands.”

And he ducks out the door, leaving me to lamp at the lamp.

I sit there and stare at it. Then I get an idea. Of course I know this Aladdin story is just so much hop-slop, but it isn’t going to hurt just to manicure my fingernails against it.

So I give it a rub. Nothing happens.

I give it a complete massage. Still nothing happens.

It is just too bad. I sit there, wishing I could get hold of a Genie, or whatever. I am broke and hungry and what I want is bright lights and gayety.

But bright lights I don't get. Instead I get darkness. It is toppling towards nightfall.

I GET up and go over to the light switch and press it. Then the Electric Company hands me a shock. They turn off the electricity.

Maybe that is what I get for throwing the bill collector down the stairs without the courtesy of opening the door.

So there I am in the dark. Not only am I alone and hungry but I can't even see myself starve.

I can't rub the. lamp any more, because I don't get a look at it. So what good is the damned thing?

What I do get is a sudden idea.

"Why not put some kerosene in the lamp?" I figure.

It just so happens that I do have a can of kerosene left in the closet for cleaning my clothes. I go over and sniff around, find the can, and pour its contents into the lamp. I feel the lamp and locate a wick. I get a match.

The lamp flares up.

Things look a little better. At least I am going to have enough light to cut my throat, if I go to that point.

But after a couple of minutes I am not so pleased any more. The old lamp begins to smoke a little.

Then it smokes a lot.

I cough and wheeze and then rush to the window to open it for air.

I never get any air, but in another minute I really need it.

Because all at once I stare at the cloud of smoke and see something standing in it. Rising out of the lamp is a figure.

"The Genie!" I yell.

And it is—the Genie.

Standing there in the smoke is a large personality. He isn't quite as big as a house, and not quite as heavy as an elephant. He seems to be about 15 feet tall in his unwashed feet, and his arms will rate him the best portions at any boarding-house table. He has a dark complexion and a face that only a mother could love. A mother gorilla, that is.

Hanging down from his face is a beard that would make a swell stuffing for a hair mattress. The guy is definitely burly but surly.

He just stands there and I just shiver there. He looks at me, but I can't look at him. My very eyeballs are bouncing with fright.

Suddenly the Genie opens his mouth. I get real pangs when I see his fangs. I figure he is going to make a grab for me and a jar of mustard and maybe have a little snack.

But he does not bite. He talks.

At least I think it is talking—though it sounds more like a combination of thunder and LaGuardia.

"What is your wish, oh Master of the Lamp?" he growls.

Master of the Lamp? He means met

Then I get it. The yarn about Aladdin is true. But now, with the sides of the lamp worn out, the power of bringing a Genie must lie in lighting the lamp, instead.

So I light it, so I get this supernatural stooge—this Genie with the light brown hair. In other words, I am the master of this walking disaster.

"What do you desire?" he repeats.

I don't hesitate a second.

"Bring me some incense," I gasp.

Because the lamp smoke is filling the room. Also the Genie is apparently just returning from a garlic spree.

"I hear and I obey," says the Genie.

ALL at once I blink my eyes. He disappears into thin air. All at twice I blink again. The Genie is back, lighting a big bowl filled with roses for the noses.

"That's better," I tell him. "Now for some clothes."

"New garments?" he asks, bowing—or as the orientals call it, salami-ing.

"New and blue and not too few," I instruct him.

"I hear and I obey," he rumbles. And does a quick fade-out. In a minute he is back again with an armful.

"Try this for size," he says.

And he hands me a long striped robe.

"What is this?" I inquire. "A nightgown?"

"It's our new Spring model, just coming in," the Genie assures me. "Fresh from Damascus."

"I can't wear this kimono," I tell him. "What about trousers?"

He grabs a hunk of moth meat and throws it at me. It is a pair of oversize bloomers with about ten yards of material in each leg.

"Where's the pleats?" I yell. "What kind of a pair of pants is this?"

"It's all the thing this season," prattles the Genie. "It is said in Bagdad that—"

"Nuts to Bagdad and the Bagdaddies," I snap. "I want clothes. Trousers, shirts, coats, hats—"

"Headgear?"

The Genie tosses me a red bedsheet. "Here is a splendid turban," he recommends.

"Turban? I don't want a turban, I want a hat!" I yell. But I begin to understand. This Genie is plenty old-fashioned, and is bringing me the same line of merchandise he hands out to Aladdan hundreds of years ago, or whenever.

"Listen, my phantasmal pal," I explain. "I want something in reason for this season. Maybe a blue coat with orange trousers, so I can wear my green shirt with it, and my purple tie. You know, conservative."

"I shall do my best," growls the Genie, bowing low. Then he scoops up the Arabian night-gowns and disappears again.

Another flash and he is gone. When he returns I see he brings just what I ask for.

"Try this coat," he urges. "Three buttons. New cuffless trousers, too."

I slip into the outfit. It looks fine.

"No charge for alterations," he tells me.

I wonder where he picks up all this sales lingo and ask him.

"My late Master, Aladdin, is a tailor," he explains.

"Well, now you're catching on," I compliment him. "Genie, you're a genius!"

I want him to feel good, because already I am constructing big plans for my genial Genie. After all, he is supposed to be able to do anything. And I am all set to play Morgenthau and tax his ingenuity. Or whatever.

I run over a few future orders in my mind. A palace, a yacht, a private swimming pool and burlesque show, a—

A horrible disaster!

I turn around, and the Genie is gone. The lamp is out, too, and I am back in darkness.

And here I figure this is the beginning of such a beautiful friendship!

THEN I realize things are not really so bad after all. I merely run out of kerosene, and when the lamp goes out the Genie goes with it.

All I have to do is go out and get some more kerosene. Then the Genie will come back and do his stuff.

So I put on my green shirt and purple tie, grab the lamp up under my arm, and prance down the stairs.

"I will fill up the lamp at the corner," I figure.

But when I get to the corner the grocery is closed. I happen to notice a tavern, though, and I figure again. "Why not fill myself up a little, too?"

Besides, maybe they have kerosene there.

So I waltz in and up to the bar.

"Got any kerosene, buddy?" I ask.

The bartender gives me an unfumigated look.

"What kind of stuff do you think I serve here?" he mutters.

"I want kerosene," I insist.

"You'll take our whiskey and like it," he says. Then he winks. "Just like kerosene," he whispers. "You won't notice the difference."

"But it isn't for drinking," I explain. "I want it for my lamp here."

"I will send out and get you some," the bartender tells me. "Take your drink first."

This I cannot do, because I have no money to pay. I must get the lamp going so the Genie will give me some dough.

"Kerosene first," I tell the bartender. "You see, it's this way. I make a little promise to myself tonight. I will get my lamp lit before I am."

The bartender laughs and sends a boy out for kerosene. When he comes back I take the kerosene and the lamp into the men's lounge.

"I'll light it up back here," I explain. "It smokes pretty bad at first."

And it does. But somehow, I am very happy in about five minutes when the Genie emerges from the smoke and stands there with his hands folded across his chest. The big ugly monster actually looks very sweet to me when I think of what he can do. If I have a stepladder handy, I almost feel like running up it and kissing him.

Instead I give him a blink and a wink.

"What is your wish, oh Master?" he cracks.

"Genie," I instruct him, "make with the millions. Get us some lettuce. Slip me some chips."

"I don't understand, Master."

"I want mazuma!" I yell. "Wallpaper from the bank."

"I still do not understand."

"Dough," I explain, very patiently. "Kale. Cash!"

"So?" says the Genie. "Dough?"

"Go!" I command.

The Genie bows. Then he disappears. “I’ll be back in a flash with the cash,” he mumbles.

I wait until the Geni returns, which he does quite suddenly. He makes a very nice jingling sound when he appears.

“Give,” I gasp.

He begins to pull purses from his pockets.

I pull curses from my lips.

A SHOWER of coins falls all over me, but it is not the kind of shower I can bathe in. Because the coins are very peculiar—some of them are square and some are crescent-shaped, and all of them are old and green. As a matter of fact, the big ones are nothing but brass with a lot of dizzy writing on them.

“What kind of telephone slugs do you hand me?” I complain.

“Dinars,” says the Genie. “Very valuable.”

“Dinars, suppers, breakfasts—nuts to them all, impartially,” I comment. “I want American money.”

Once again this Arabian nightmare has the wrong idea and brings me old-fashioned merchandise.

He shrugs, gathers up the coins, and disappears again. When he returns he flings me a flock of nickels, dimes, quarters, halves, and silver dollars. To be exact, $423.15 in change.

This I pocket.

“What now, Master?” asks the Genie.

“That’s all for the moment. If I want anything I’ll light the lamp for a signal,” I tell him. “One if by land and two if by sea.”

Then I extinguish the kerosene lamp and go back to the bar.

The bartender is waiting and I flash him a big smile.

“Thanks for the kerosene,” I tell him.

“What about your drink?” he asks. “It’s still waiting for you.”

For answer I turn the glass upside down.

"Do not produce such juice," I tell him. "From now on I am drinking champagne."

"A bottle?" he says, with his eyes popping out like corks.

"A lot of bottles," I tell him. "Serve it in a bucket. And have a bucket yourself."

So we kick the bucket a few times and the bucket has quite a kick. I spill a few bills and then get restless. So I rush into the back again. I get bright with the light and wait for the Genie to show up.

"Master?" he greets me.

"I am beginning to feel hungry," I tell him. "I have an appetite for a bite. What do you suggest?"

"Dates," he says. "Figs, perhaps? Goat's cheese and rice?"

"Nuts!" I comment.

"What kind?"

"No kind," I tell him. "You are too old-fashioned, Genie. I want other food. Bring me some terrapin, a jar of caviar, a little breast of pheasant, some venison, lobster ala Newburg, oysters Rockefeller, and—a bottle of bicarbonate."

Back comes the Genie with the grub. I sit there and gobble for a while.

"Something missing," I comment.

The Genie looks surprised. "These rations are fit for Haroun Al Raschid," he insists.

"I know what it is," I tell him. "Pass the salt."

So he disappears and returns with salt. I finish my meal and am well satisfied.

"Now how about something to smoke?" I suggest.

"To hear is to obey." Off goes the Genie in a cloud. He comes back with a big glass pot with a snake hanging out of it.

"What in or out of this world is that?" I gasp.

"Something to smoke. A nargileh. Water-pipe."

"Take it back to the plumber and bring me a nice Garcia y Garcia panatella," I command.

IN a minute I am sitting back smoking quite comfortably. Now I am ready for action. I have a good meal, champagne, a little loose change, and plenty of loose ideas.

For the first time I realize I am not making proper use of my great powers. Here I have anything in the world at my disposal and all I get is a few clothes and something to fill my stomach. I am very foolish. I should be wishing for something valuable.

Something valuable. . . .

I put the grind on my mind.

“Genie,” I say, “I know what the trouble is. I cannot concentrate here. It is much too quiet for me to hear myself think. Take me to a night club. I do not say a good night club, because such a thing is even beyond your powers. Just a spot where things are hot.”

Suddenly I am caught up in a swirling fog—a most unpleasant fog—the kind of fog that will never be missed.

I whirl around and all at once I land. I am sitting down.

“Here we are, Master!” booms the Genie at my side.

“Ouch!” I remark.

I jump about three feet in the air, which gives me a swell view of the place I am located in—although no view of such a place Is exactly swell.

I am in some kind of cavern, apparently located next door to the central heating plant of Hell.

Squatting on rocks and boulders all around me are the most ungodly assortment of personalities I ever see—and I am a guy who attends plenty of Bingo games in his time.

Some of these personalities are all black and covered with long fur. Others give the impression of being just huge sets of teeth, with legs attached. There are many who resemble my Genie. The shortest individual in the cavern is at least nine feet high.

All this I take in as I jump up. Then I land back on the rock again.

“Ouch!” I yell, repeating myself. But the rock is repeating its heating.

“What kind of a hot seat are you giving me?” I scream at the Genie. “Where am I and why am I?”

“You ask for a hot spot,” mumbles my huge stooge. “This is it! There is much heat here.”

“You’re telling me? But exactly where am I?”

“In Eblis,” explains the oversize Oriental. “The meeting place of all Genii, djinn, efreets, and demons.”

I am sizzling with anger, and also with something else—so I get off the rock in a hurry. I wave the lamp at the Genie.

“Get me out of this ghoul gallery,” I command. “I ask for a night club, not a fright club.”

So I explain what a night club is in words of strictly one syllable or less, and finally the Genie catches on. By this time I catch on to the Genie and climb up his waist, because several of these black babies with the teeth are eyeing me the way a robin looks at a worm—affectionately, but with too much interest.

“Back to Earth,” I command. “Remember, make it a night club this time—you’ll recognize it by the smell of gin when you fly over same.”

THERE is another stretch of fog as the Genie waves his arms. I toss around in a cloud, and when I open my eyes I toss around in a crowd.

Sure enough, I am sitting at the table of Mabel’s Stable, a paddock for society fillies and clothes-horses.

The second my eyes pop open I blow out the lamp in my hand and the Genie blows out with it.

It is very fortunate that everybody watches the floor show when I make my unexpected appearance at a rear table, because there is no one to see the Genie before he disappears.

Even so, I notice a couple of grease-balls up at the bar are giving me a hint of a squint.

I turn around and look nonchalant. Here I am in a night spot. The band is kicking the gong on a popular song, a girl singer is making a groan at the microphone, a crowd is prancing, dancing, and romancing—it is just noisy enough for me to concentrate.

And concentrate I do.

Not on the lamp, though.

On the blonde who is sitting at the next table.

Now I don't know how it is with you. With me, it's blondes. And this particular damsel is high, wide, and peroxide.

She is sitting there alone, and so naturally I do my best to attract her attention in a polite manner with such remarks as "Hey, there, babe!" and "Say, kitten!" and just a little courteous whistling.

But she is very aloof and refined and takes no notice of me at all except to stick out her tongue and remark in a society tone of voice, "Go drop dead, you dizzy-looking jerk!"

So I can see she is really quite infatuated with me, but is playing hard to get.

And so it happens that tonight I am in a position to get. So I duck under the table, pull the tablecloth over my head, and light the lamp. It is awful under there with all the smoke, but I do not wish anyone to notice me. Of course the lights are all out during the floor show here so I am not very conspicuous, except the part of me sticking out from under the table behind.

Even so, I nearly choke to death before the five minutes are up and the Genie appears. He swells out of the smoke but before he can grow to his fifteen feet I whisper, "I command you to stop growing," and he does.

"What is your wish, oh Master?" he mutters.

"My wish is that dish," I explain, pointing at the damsel. "Bring her to toy table."

"Your wish is my command," says the Genie.

"After you bring her, disappear," I caution him.

He bows and the smoke flickers out.

IN ANOTHER minute I am back in my seat, and sitting across from me is this blonde tomato, blinking her eyes.

"How do I get here?" she gasps. "I am sitting at my table and then all at once I am over here."

"Well do not bother to go away," I said, very polite. "A beautiful tomato like you should stay planted."

She softens up a little at this flattery.

"After all," I pursue, "you are lucky. Not every girl can sit with the richest man in the world."

"Why—" she flutters. "Mr. Morgenthau, I am sorry I do not recognize you before."

"My name is Lefty Feep," I say. "And this Morgenthau of whom you shriek is just a piker compared to me."

"I do not see how anybody would be a piker—compared to you," ribs the blonde. "You are not dressed like a wealthy man. And why do you carry around this greasy old lamp?"

"It is for giving hot-foots to anybody who asks foolish questions," I reply. "But I will prove to you that I am rich."

"Go peddle your fish," she remarks, in a cultured way.

I stand up.

"Just give me five minutes," I promise her. "Five minutes is all I need. At the end of that time I will show you wealth beyond your wildest dreams."

She shrugs. But I bow, pick up the lamp, and walk away.

As I go out, I notice the two jerks at the bar still gandering at me. One nudges the other and points at Aladdin's lamp.

I give them no notice, however. I have other things on my mind.

This really my chance to prove what the Genie can do. So I proceed very carefully. I walk past the cloak room of the night club until I come to the manager's office, which is empty. I slip in and close the door.

Then I kneel down and light the lamp. "Genie," I whisper, "do your stuff!"

Five minutes later I walk back to the table. The blonde is still sitting there. When I tap her on the shoulder she smirks.

"Come with me," I tell her. "I'll show you some real wealth."

"I don't want to look at any etchings, now," she sniffs. "Or anything tattooed, either."

"This is strictly on the level," I insist. "Right this way."

I lead her to the door of the manager's office. Then I stop and look mysterious.

"Behind that door," I tell her, "is the most precious collection in the world. Imagine the most priceless treasures—let yourself go—see if you can guess."

She is really interested now.

"Gold?" she squeaks.

I shake my head.

"Diamonds?"

I shake again.

"Well—radium? Platinum?"

"You'll have to see it to believe it," I say. And push her through the doorway. She gets a look and just stands there.

"I can't believe it!" she screams.

I hold her so she won't fall in a faint.

"Rubber tires!" she whispers. "Piles of rubber tires, new ones! And look—a refrigerator! And all that gas! Typewriters, too. Thousands of tires and things!"

"All mine," I smirk. "Now do you believe I'm rich?"

SHE is just in a daze. I am very proud. I have the Genie fill the manager's office with all this stuff and it is just a sample of what he can do when he really gets started. Now I think I know the kind of career I will have.

But then I notice the blonde tomato is staring at me very funny.

"What's the matter, toots?" I ask. "Won't you go out with me now?"

She steps away with a little shudder.

“I know what you must be!” she screams. “A smuggler! Of course you are—with all this illegal stuff here! You’re a smuggler, a crook. Help!”

The last remark is not addressed to me, but to the entire night club down the hall.

I slam the door and lock myself in. This is a fine mess. I suddenly realize that I make a real mistake when I have the Genie bring me a lot of illegal merchandise. So I light the lamp in a flurry of hurry. They are thumping on the door outside by the time I bring the Genie into the room from the lamp-smoke.

“Get rid of all this,” I command.

He swirls around, scooping up all the lovely things, and disappears. I put out the lamp, swirl around to the window, and disappear myself, before they get the door open. I drop to the ground below.

I step outside and snare a little air. While I am standing there a big limousine pulls up to the curb. It is a gorgeous gaswagon, with actual tires on it. The limousine parks and the door swings open.

I blink at that, because I do not order a car from the Genie.

Then it is all explained. A couple of personalities protrude their noggins and give me the old wail and hail.

With a shock I recognize the brace from the bar. I place them at last. They are gamblers.

“Hello, Lefty!” they yell, giving me the sweet greet.

“Well if it isn’t Merton and Albert,” I reply.

And so it is. Mercenary Merton and Avaricious Albert are their names. Mercenary Merton and Avaricious Albert are so called because they are very affectionate when it comes to money, and are known to sit up all night nursing a nickel.

Ordinarily I do not have anything to do with these customers because of their needy and greedy manners.

But now I am slightly intrigued because they yell at me, and also because of their limousine.

"Going our way, Lefty?" they inquire.

I shake my head, because I am not bound for hell just yet.

"We want to talk to you," says Merton.

"Yeah," Albert chimes in. "A business proposition."

"Do I look like a gorilla?" I ask. "Because any business that you have must be money business."

Mercenary Merton and Avaricious Albert laugh very heartily at this and give me a jolly smile.

"Good old Feep," wheezes Merton. "Always a card."

"Speaking of cards," I reply, "what's up your sleeve?"

"A great idea," he insist. "Come along to our penthouse and we will discuss it."

"There's millions in it," Avaricious Albert chimes in. "Positively millions. Feep, how would you like a million dollars?"

"In dimes and quarters if you please," I reply. "I like to play slot machines."

"You can own slot machines with the money we'll make," Albert assures me. "Come on—hop in and we'll go up to the penthouse."

SO I GRAB my lamp very tightly and step into the big car. We glide along, and I notice both Albert and Merton eye the lamp under my arm quite closely.

"What you got there?" Albert asks.

"An antique," I tell him.

"Just what I need for over the mantel," he says. "Feep, it happens I am crazy for antiques. You never know that, do you?"

"Of course I do," I reply. "I see some of the dames you run around with."

This is the signal for more guffaws. You would think I was a radio comic with a hot Crosley the way they go for my remarks.

"Seriously," Albert goes on, "I would like to own that lamp of yours. How about making a deal?"

"No sale," I mutter.

Merton pokes Albert and he shuts up.

Then the car pokes the curb and pulls up.

"Here we are," says Merton. "Right this way."

We go through a swell lobby into a big apartment hotel. Merton and Albert lead me to the elevator and we go up to the twenty-ninth floor.

Albert unlocks the door and I step into a genuine penthouse—with two pairs of pants.

"Park it here," says Merton, indicating a sofa lush but plush.

I dip my hips. Merton and Albert sit opposite me, staring and glaring. Merton keeps his eyes on me and Albert lamps at the lamp I carry. I address my remarks to him.

"Well, heel, what's the deal?" I inquire.

Albert clears his throat with a noise that makes his Adam's apple wobble.

"Feep," he begins, "we would like to go into partnership with you. How would you like to stay here with us—live in this beautiful penthouse, drive our big limousine, and live off the fat of the land?" He smiles. "To say nothing of the fatheads?"

"Yes," chimes in Merton. "We like you, Feep. We want to see you get ahead in the world. We figure we'd make a swell team."

"You guys wouldn't make a swell team for a junk wagon," I answer, in a cynical fashion. "Cut out the soft soap and let's get down to business. Just what do you two buzzards want?"

ALBERT stops smiling.

"Feep," he growls, "You've got a lamp there. A very unusual lamp. We could use that lamp to mutual advantage."

"What are you talking about?"

"You know what I'm talking about!" shouts Albert. "Don't bother to stall around. We know you have Aladdin's lamp!"

"Not so loud," I whisper. "Somebody might hear."

“This penthouse is soundproof,” Merton chuckles. “It’s all right.”

“But about this lamp,” Albert breaks in. “We see you use it. Feep, you must be dull in the skull I Here you have such great opportunities and all you do is waste them—you don’t seem to realize the tremendous possibilities in your lamp!”

“Such as?”

“Why we could take that lamp of yours and really keep the home fires burning! As partners, we can make plans and go a long way in his world.”

“What’s with this partners idea?” I complain. “I get along all right myself. And suppose you two birds get drafted?”

“Nuts to that,” Merton says, very unpatriotic. “With such a lamp you must realize there is no need to worry about the war at all.”

“Sure,” says Albert. “That’s just the idea, Feep. Think how valuable it is to command a Genie today. Think of what he can do—not just bring money and luxuries. That’s petty stuff. Strictly small time. But with his powers he could find out military information. He could be a military weapon himself! You just aren’t big enough to grasp it, Feep—that’s why you need our brains. We know the angles, see? We could get this Genie to work discovering war plans and—”

“All right,” I interrupt. “Maybe we can make a deal at that. I am very glad to help the war effort. We will take the lamp to Washington and let the government see what can be done.” Albert flashes me a sneer.

“Almonds, pecans, pistachios, and other kinds of nuts to the government!” he declares. “What will you get from the government except a lot of red tape wound around income taxes? Oh, no—there are other parties who will pay more for such a military weapon. I got contacts, see? And if we go to them and let them have first choice—”

NOW I catch the drift of their remarks. What these babies are really planning to do is to get high on treason. And it burns me up.

I jump off the sofa and grab the lamp.

"Listen," I mutter. "I've heard all the squeaking I want to from you rats. The deal is off. I'm getting out of here right now, and if I never see you again it will be plenty early enough for me."

"You aren't leaving us, are you?" says Albert, getting to his feet with a grin.

"You can't do that, you know," whispers Merton, also rising and circling around behind me.

I don't stop to argue. I jump for the door.

But before I get to it the lights go out. Somebody must get to the switches. Whatever it is, I am in the dark. I cannot find the door.

"Turn on the lights and let me out of here!" I yell.

But apparently this is not a request program. Because neither Albert or Merton turn on the lights. Instead they turn on the heat.

"Grab him!" yells a voice behind me. I run around the room, bumping into furniture and playing hide and go seek with these two hoods. I hold the lamp tight, and also try to hold my breath tight so they cannot hear me. But no matter where I run I feel one of them reaching out to tangle with me and strangle with me.

It is only a little while before Albert gets me by the neck and Merton ties into my stomach with his fists. I can only smack back with one hand so as not to drop the lamp. Even so I blow Albert's nose for him and dot Merton's eyes.

But in a few minutes I am lying on the floor with both of them on top of me.

"Get me the window-drapes," Merton grunts. "He's the kind you have to bind."

Albert gets strips of cloth from the windows.

I am fit to be tied.

I am.

And there we are in the dark. I am lying on the floor and Merton and Albert sit on the sofa with the lamp.

"The lights—" says Merton.

"Forget that!" snaps Albert. "What do we do?"

"We've got the lamp," Merton reminds him. "What else is there to do?"

"Yeah," I mutter, from the floor. "You guys win out. What more do you want?"

"Protection," Albert growls. "We have the lamp and we know what to do with it. But you also know that we have it. So we must get rid of you, but fast."

"Let's throw him out of the window," Merton suggests.

"No, too messy," Albert tells him. I am glad to hear that, because I agree.

"We could take him for a little ride," says Merton.

"Too much trouble getting him downstairs," says Albert. "We want to get rid of him in a way that will leave no traces. No traces at all."

"Say, what are you worrying about?" Merton chuckles. "Here we sit with a perfect solution and you wonder what to do."

"What do you mean?"

"Light the lamp," says Merton. "Light the lamp and call the Genie. Tell him to take Feep and get rid of him. Drag him off to Limbo, or Hades, or wherever. The Genie will do it."

"A very in-Genie-ous scheme," Albert agrees. "Too damned dark in here anyway."

I do not like the idea at all, but who am I to object? I can only lie there on the floor while Albert strikes a match and lights the lamp.

IT CASTS a bright glow over the room, but everything looks dark to me. I sit there and watch the lamp smoke up. In a few minutes the Genie will appear. They will issue the orders—and the Genie obeys whoever lights the lamp. I will go for a one-way trip to hell and gone. They will take the lamp and start their dirty work.

I wriggle and strain, but I cannot break the knots binding me. I am strapped and trapped.

Merton and Albert sit there and laugh at me.

“Well, Feep, it won’t be long now,” snickers Mercenary Merton. “Just remember, there’ll always be a lamp in the window for our wandering boy.”

“Thanks for bringing some light into our lives,” laughs Avaricious Albert. “Too bad you won’t be around to see the fun we’re going to have. But I guess not—here comes Genie now.”

Sure enough, the lamp is beginning to smoke. And I am beginning to burn. I watch the smoke swirl up. So do Albert and Merton.

The smoke goes up and my hopes go up with it.

And then—

None of us even hear the rattling at the door. Until too late. By then the rattling turns to a crash and the door of the penthouse apartment splinters in.

There is a guy standing there, with cops on either side.

“Those are the men!” he yells. “Get them!”

The boys in blue notice me tied up on the floor and then they ignore me completely as they rush Merton and Albert.

Meanwhile the personality in plain clothes goes for the lamp.

There is quite a little struggle, during which I get stepped on several times, once in the face. But this does not prevent me from sinking my teeth in Albert’s ankles when he tries to run.

The plain clothes character tackles Merton, who is clutching the lamp and heading for a rear door. As the smoke swirls up I can almost see the Genie coming out—but the plain clothes fink suddenly grabs the lamp and clunks Merton over the noggin with it.

Merton doesn’t see Genie after all. Just birdies.

But I yell, “Look out!” It is too late. The lamp breaks over Merton’s head and drops in two pieces on the floor. It goes out at the same time Merton does.

In another minute it is all over. Merton and Albert are tied. I am untied.

They take Merton and Albert away, and I carry what is left of Aladdin’s lamp over to the incinerator.

It is the last time Aladdin’s lamp ever burns.

But I am burning ever since.

LEFTY Feep sighed and concluded. “A most unusual story,” I commented. “But things didn’t turn out so badly, after all. It certainly would be terrible if those two crooks had a Genie to command.”

“Right,” said Feep.

“But you know—I can’t see why they didn’t get away with it,” I mused. “There’s something I don’t seem to understand.”

Lefty Feep gave me a disgusted frown.

“What’s bum, chum?” he grated.

“Well, I don’t see why those cops came up to the penthouse and broke down the door. Did you warn them in some way?”

Feep smiled. “No, I do not warn them. The lamp does.”

“The lamp warned them? How?”

“By being lit.” Feep’s smile broadened. “These two crooks are unpatriotic and that is what fixes them. They do not keep up with the news or they would know better than to light the lamp and bring the cops. They figure this is one of the Arabian Nights and it isn’t—it’s a different kind of a night.”

I stared Feep in the eye.

“Why did those cops come?” I persisted.

“Because of the lamp,” Feep smiled. “You will get them too—if you ever try to light a lamp during a blackout!”

Skeleton In My Closet

At that, maybe the old guy's skeleton was the only "living" person who could solve his own murder. You'll admit the killer would hardly expect such a thing

WHEN I opened the closet door I saw the skeleton.

He was hanging there on the third hook from the left.

I just shook my head and smiled. . . .

When I came to, I was lying on the floor. The closet door was still open. I raised my eyes timidly. On the floor of the closet I saw a pair of rubbers, some old, dusty tennis shoes, and two ancient house slippers.

I glanced higher and noticed a raincoat, an overcoat, a pair of slacks, and an old hat hanging on the hooks.

Also, the skeleton.

This time I didn't faint. I even managed to get up off the floor. But I couldn't stop looking at the horror.

It dangled there, suspended by its spine from the hook, with bony body swaying to and fro. It was rather large for a skeleton, as skeletons go—and how I wished this one would! I noticed the unusually big bones, and particularly, the face. Or rather, the lack of face. The skull itself grinned a grisly grin. There was mockery in the hollow eye sockets, and menace in the leering teeth.

I wondered wildly how this skeleton had turned up in the closet. Had he been a human being trapped in there and eaten by moths? No—because the door was unlocked.

I sighed. This was just what I might expect to find in my uncle's house.

He had been interested in sorcery—black magic. My uncle was quite an eccentric that way. Every Halloween I used to send him a birthday card. Outside of that we seldom communicated, and all I knew of him was through hearsay. Rumors of what went on in his big house in the country. Rumors about his unusual library of forbidden books, and of the secret societies he was mixed up with. To judge from these reports he was mixed up plenty.

But I'd dismissed all that.

When I received word of his sudden death a little while ago, the lawyer gave me a key to the house and said I'd inherited his estate.

So here I was. And here was the skeleton.

You can't stand looking at a skeleton forever. As for me, I can't stand looking at a skeleton.

So after a moment, I sat down. Sat down and poured myself a nice, stiff drink.

I raised the glass to my lips to shut out the sight of the skeleton hanging in the open closet. I started to gulp.

"Get me down off this damn hook and I'll join you," grunted a voice.

I finished my gulp. The glass fell from my fingers as I stared in startled horror at the closet.

The skeleton was speaking!

"You've spilled your drink," the voice told me.

I spilled another, in a hurry. Right down my throat. And then another.

Talking skeletons! Was it alive?

"Come on," said the skeleton. "Do you think I want to spend the rest of my life in this stuffy closet?"

The skeleton had a deep, sepulchral voice, I noticed. I wondered how he could articulate—though he was a well-articulated skeleton.

"Spend the rest of your what?" I answered him, through chattering-teeth. "You've already spent your life, from the looks of you. Tossed it away. Never saw anyone with less looks of life about him. You shouldn't worry about stuffy closets. You need a nice, stuffy grave."

"Well, I can't go to one unless you take me off this hook," argued the skeleton.

I TOOK another drink—from the bottle, this time. The liquor combined with my fright and worked fast. His argument almost sounded reasonable. Although the clicking of his bones sounded plain ghastly.

"Come on," the skeleton urged. "Lift me down."

"Who's going to hold me up while I'm lifting you down?" I argued.

"What's there to be afraid of?" countered the skeleton.

"If I had a mirror, I'd show you," I told him. "I can't stand the sight of you hanging there."

"Then take me off the hook."

I approached him gingerly and with trembling fingers hooked around his spine, I lifted him down and set him on the floor.

The skeleton ran to the table with amazing and horrifying alacrity. He scrabbled around and poured out a drink. Three fingers. Three bony fingers.

With clicking elbow-sockets, he raised the glass to his lips—or to where his lips once were—and tossed the drink off.

"Where does the stuff go?" I wondered. Aloud, I said, "Where did you come from?"

The skeleton faced me. "What's it to you?" he asked.

"Well how would you like it if you came into a house, opened the closet door, and found a skeleton?"

"I'd like it pretty well," he said. "Then I'd have some company."

I shuddered.

"I'm so lonesome," the skeleton complained. "You don't know how it feels to be a skeleton."

"I don't want to find out, either."

"You will," said the skeleton, with a ghastly leer. "Some day."

"I still want to know how you got into that closet."

"You might say I used a skeleton key," he told me.

"I might say the hell with you, too," I replied. "In fact, that's just what I do say."

"And I say let's have another drink." The skeleton poured. My hands were shaking, but I managed to drink. We clicked teeth rather than glasses.

"Here's looking at you," said the skeleton.

"Here's not looking at you," I answered. "And speaking of that happy prospect, you've got to get out of here, you know. I can't have you hanging around this way. What would my friends think?"

"Couldn't you tell them I was your family skeleton?" he asked, wistfully. "After all, what can I do in my position?"

"You can lie down and play dead."

"This is a bit unusual, I admit," the skeleton acknowledged. "There isn't much precedent for it, is there? Wonder if we could get some help to figure things out."

"Well, we could read Thorne Smith's Skin and Bones," I suggested. "He had a few remarks to make about a live skeleton. Only his case happened to be a man who turned into a skeleton and back to a man, intermittently. And the man was really there all the time—that is, his flesh was. He just looked like a skeleton."

"That wouldn't help me. I not only look like one—I feel like one, and I am one." The skeleton took another drink.

I FOLLOWED suit. For some reason or other, I was beginning to feel quite tipsy. It couldn't have been the liquor—or was it? At any rate, the skeleton no longer seemed so frightful. He no longer terrified me. I adopted a somewhat haughty attitude when I addressed him next.

"By the way," I observed, "I'm not exactly in the habit of speaking to strange skeletons. Might I ask your name?"

"You might," said the fleshless one. "But you won't get much of an answer." He hiccuped, rattling his lower jaw alarmingly.

"See here," I flared. "Who are you? Or, rather, who were you?"

"Damned if I know," the skeleton confessed. "That's what's puzzling me. I'm afraid I can't remember. It's amnesia, I guess. Must have been in some kind of an accident."

"It was a pretty severe accident, judging from the looks of you," I told him.

The skeleton shook his head mournfully.

"You don't know how you got in my closet or why you're still alive, or who you are?" I persisted.

"That's right."

"That's wrong," I corrected. "It's contrary to all the laws of nature. You shouldn't be alive, and you certainly shouldn't be hanging in strange closets."

"It doesn't bother me half as much as not knowing what my name is," the skeleton insisted. "I'm really curious to find that out."

"Maybe I'd better call the morgue," I suggested, "and see if they're missing you."

"Try the funeral parlors, too," the skeleton added.

I picked up the phone and fumbled for the directory.

"Wait a minute," I said. "I can't call these joints and ask if they're minus a live skeleton. The cops would be after me with butterfly nets. We'll have to think of another way."

The skeleton regarded me with a grave look. What other kind of look a skeleton has, I don't know. Or care to know.

"By the way, speaking of names—you haven't told me your name yet, my friend."

I blinked. "So I haven't. I'm Tarleton Fiske. This is the home of my deceased uncle, Magnus Lorry."

"Magnus Lorry? Lorry?" Bony fingers pressed into the skull. "But that's my name! It came back to me now. I'm Magnus Lorry—this is my home. And you're my nephew! I'll be a monkey's unc—"

"No insults," I warned him. And gulped.

"You're my uncle," I said. "I can't believe it."

"Why not?"

"Otis Kersen, your lawyer—he said you died of a stroke. You were buried in the family vault at Hopecrest Cemetery. Private funeral, and he handled all the details. There were no mourners present."

"No mourners?"

"I'm the only one left in the family," I explained. "And I was out of town. Otis Kersen wired me. You left me this house and your estate."

"Nobody mourned for me?" repeated the skeleton. "How unfortunate to let a poor man die friendless like that! If I could have been there, I would have mourned."

"You weren't such a friendly fellow when alive," I said, blushing. "You were something of a recluse. Eccentric. You were a—wizard, I believe you called yourself."

"So I was!" exclaimed the skeleton. "I do remember that. I was quite a sorcerer, wasn't I?"

"Yes, I've heard it said."

"MAYBE that's why I'm still alive," the skeleton mused. "I might have had a premonition of death and cast a spell to preserve my consciousness."

"Perhaps."

"But it's funny—there's still a lot I can't seem to recollect. For example, I don't remember having a stroke. I don't recall anything about my death."

"That's not unusual in amnesia cases," I told him. "Often a victim just recovers partial memory. The rest may gradually return."

"Stroke, eh?" said the skeleton. "Get me a mirror."

"What for?"

"I want to look at myself."

"You're not worth seeing," I argued, honestly.

"Get me a mirror, nephew."

"Very well, Uncle Magnus."

I got him a hand mirror from the dresser in the bedroom. My skeleton uncle grasped it and stared at his reflection, shuddering the while.

"My, I'm gruesome!" he exclaimed.

I nodded.

"Rather repulsive, too?"

"Definitely," I agreed.

"Hate to meet myself up a dark alley."

"Certainly would."

"Hey—"

The skeleton ran a bony phalange across the back of his skull.

"What is it?"

"Look," the skeleton exclaimed. "See this hole in my head?"

"Where?"

"Right here."

"What is it?" I asked, noting the round little opening in his skull.

"It's a bullet hole," gasped the skeleton.

"A bullet hole?"

"Definitely. And you know what?"

"What?"

"I didn't die of a stroke. I've been murdered!"

"No!" I gasped.

"Yes. This bullet must have gone clean through the medulla oblongata. Otis Kersen, or somebody, was lying. I tell you, I was murdered!"

"But why—how—?"

"That's not the point," the skeleton rasped. "It's who?" I'm going to find out if it takes the rest of my life—I mean, death!"

MAGNUS LORRY rose to his bony feet and danced up and down excitedly while his vertebrae rattled like castanets.

"I'm going to track down the person who killed me!" he yelled.

"And then what?"

"I haven't forgotten my sorcery," he declared. "I'll cook up a fate for my slayer that he'll never forget as long as he lives—and that won't be long." My unusual uncle grated his teeth unpleasantly. I averted my eyes in distress.

"Call that fat swine, Otis Kersen! Get that illegal eagle on the wire for me," he ordered.

Obediently, I dialed the attorney's office.

"Mr. Kersen, please," I requested. "Mr. Kersen is out of town," replied the stenographer's voice on the other end of the wire. "He's gone to Buffalo for a convention."

I reported the news.

"Buffalo? Hell and damnation!" growled the skeleton.

"You suspect him?" I asked.

"I suspect everybody!" the skeleton groaned. "I have no friends. Nobody loves me. Nobody cares. I might as well be dead."

"Don't cry," I said.

"I can't cry," he sighed. "Can't even cry. But I can still act. And I'm going to."

"What do you propose?"

"I think I'm going to do a little sleuthing. A little amateur detective work to find out who murdered me." He stabbed a bony finger in my direction. "And you're going to help me, nephew."

"Glad to. How do we begin?"

"We'll pay a couple of visits."

"Where to?"

"We shall call on some of my rivals."

"Rivals?"

“Rival wizards,” my uncle explained. “There are several others in this vicinity who secretly practice the mantic arts. Cheap sorcerers. All of them were jealous of me and my fine collection of incunabula.”

“You have incunabula?” I asked. “Tons of it,” he declared. “More damned incunabula than you can shake a stick at.”

“Doesn’t it hurt?”

“Incunabula are books written before 1600,” my uncle explained. “I have the finest library on sorcery extant. And some of these scoundrels knew it. I’ll bet one of them bumped me off, figuring my estate would be up for sale and he could steal my precious manuscripts and formulae for a song. That must be it.”

“Any idea who might figure such a plot out?” I inquired.

“Well, there’s the Mighty Omar,” said Magnus Lorry.

“Who is he?”

“A spiritualist, and a fake spiritualistic medium at that. He’s just a charlatan who makes a living by holding fraudulent seances, and playing the suckers. He’s really interested in the occult, and knowing my real powers, he always hated my guts—when I had them, that is.”

“Do you think that he—?”

“I’ve got a hunch,” said the skeleton. “Come on, we’ll visit him first.” He rose and clanked across the room to the door.

“Wait a minute!” I protested. “You can’t go out like that.”

“Why not?”

“People will see you walking around—you must be disguised, somehow.

“Useless,” he told me. “You can’t disguise a face and figure like the one I haven’t got.”

“But you’ll start a riot!”

“Then you’ll have to carry me,” my uncle said. “That’s it! You can carry me in your arms. Say that you’re delivering a skeleton to a medical school. I’ll play dead.”

“That won’t be hard for you,” I sighed. “But the idea of dragging a skeleton along the street in broad daylight doesn’t appeal to me.”

“Would you rather wait until after dark, then? Around midnight?”

“Midnight is no time for me to mess with skeletons either. On second thought, we’d better go right now.”

I picked him up gingerly by his clavicles.

“Hold still now,” I breathed.

CARRYING him down the hall, I kicked open the door, walked down the driveway, and put him in the car. Climbing into the driver’s seat, I started the motor.

“Where to?” I asked.

He gave me the address, and we were off.

Luckily the streets were not crowded as we drove into city traffic. Soon we moved through the winding streets of the fashionable suburban district where the Mighty Omar had his residence.

Halting for a stop-light, Uncle Magnus turned to me with a leer.

“Step on it,” he murmured. “I can’t wait to appear before the Mighty Omar. I’ll scare him out of a week’s growth I The mere sight of me ought to shake a confession out of his guilty mouth.”

“Quiet!” I panted. “Do you want somebody to hear you talking? Stop turning your head that way—people will notice.”

As a matter of fact, somebody had already noticed. About the most unpleasant somebody I could think of.

A big traffic cop loomed outside the window.

“Hey,” he growled. “What you got there?”

“Just a skeleton, officer. I’m taking it over to medical school.”

“Did I see it move?” he persisted, eyeing the bony skull with evident distaste.

“Perhaps the car jiggled it a bit,” I hazarded.

“Oh, my mistake.”

The cop was about to turn away when Uncle Magnus gave vent to an unfortunate impulse. He hiccuped, loudly.

Instantly the cop wheeled.

"What's that?" he said.

"I hiccuped," I told him.

"Drunk, eh? Driving while drunk?" He reached eagerly for his ticket pad.

"Not at all, officer. Just a little sour stomach."

"Oh."

Uncle Magnus couldn't hold it any longer. He hiccuped again, his jaws moving visibly.

"Holy Ike!" barked the officer. "That skeleton moved!"

"How could it move?" I asked, innocently. "You know that such a thing is impossible."

"Oh yeah? Well it did move," said the cop. "And it hiccuped, too! There's something wrong with that skeleton, I'm telling you! Something mighty wrong."

"That's why I'm taking it to medical school."

THE cop wasn't satisfied. His beefy hand came thrusting through the window and he fingered Uncle Magnus's collar-bone.

"What's the matter, officer?" I asked, nervously. "Why are you fingering my skeleton?"

"Is that your skeleton?"

"Of course. Whose else would it be?"

"How can it be your skeleton?" snarled the officer. "Your skeleton must be under your skin."

"Well—"

"Therefore," persisted the cop, with a warning gleam in his eye, "this is not your skeleton. And if it is not your skeleton, then it must be stolen. What are you doing with a stolen skeleton, you grave-robber?"

It was a horrible moment. And Uncle Magnus chose it for a demonstration.

"Take your pawing hands off me, you big lug," he groaned. "I'm not his skeleton and I'm not your skeleton—I'm my own skeleton, I'll have you know. And if there's any graves robbed, it's likely to be your own—because I'm going to put you in one in a hurry!"

I had never seen a traffic cop run before. It was an enthralling spectacle. How a man could move so fast in those heavy boots, I didn't know. But he was really speedy.

We drove away with equal swiftness. Uncle Magnus chuckled repulsively in my ear.

"Stop that!" I warned him. "And for heaven's sake, cut out this business of frightening strangers."

"Just rehearsing for the Mighty Omar," said my uncle. "I'll really give him the business."

We drove up to the imposingly gaunt frame house that served as residence and place of business for the medium.

I parked and got out.

"Pick me up," whispered my uncle. "Under your arm. And ring the bell. He has a colored butler, but I doubt if he'll trouble us long. We'll go right in and interview our spiritualistic friend. Just let me handle him and everything will be dandy."

Somehow I doubted this last statement.

But there was nothing else to do.

Picking up Uncle Magnus, I started up the walk, carrying the skeleton under my arm.

I rang the bell.

The door opened. A bearded negro dressed as a Hindu peered out with rolling eyes. "You wish to have audience with the Mighty Omar?" he intoned, in a sonorous voice.

I nodded.

The door swung wider.

The bearded negro caught sight of my bony burden.

“Lawd save us!” he shrieked, in purest Harlemese. “The haunts are done arriving!”

A moment later I stepped over his prostrate body and stalked down the hall. Uncle Magnus rattled with anticipation under my elbow.

We faced a darkened doorway. “Here,” he whispered. “Let me down and we’ll sneak in.”

We opened the door on pitch blackness. The seance was in full swing.

Moving quietly, we entered the darkened room. My eyes slowly became accustomed to the dimness and soon I could see faint outlines in the gloom.

SIX fat women were seated around a large table with their hands resting on its surface. At the head of the table, like the caller at the Bingo game where these women really belonged, was the Mighty Omar.

The Mighty Omar was a little dried-up man dressed in a tur-ban and an oriental night-gown. He had a face like a prune, and it didn’t take long to see that he also had plenty of new wrinkles.

At the moment the Mighty Omar was right in the middle of his act. In fact, he was just going into his trance.

“Oh Mighty Brahm!” he whispered in the darkness. “By the powers of Raja Yoga I command thee—tear aside the veil! Let thy humble servant enter the astral plane and commune with the shades of the departed.”

Uncle Magnus rattled angrily at my side, but made no move to interfere just yet.

“Ah!” sighed the Mighty Omar. “I am going now—I am passing through—and who is that I see? Ah yes! It is my psychic guide to the spirit world—Doctor Anabana!”

In a normal voice he confided to the ladies. “Doctor Anabana is a low-plane spirit. He will summon the souls of your dear departed ones and give you their messages. Who wishes to speak to Doctor Anabana?”

The fat lady next to the Mighty Omar cleared her throat nervously.

“Ask him about Grandpa,” she quavered. “Grandpa Ike Snodtrotter.”

“I will try,” moaned the Mighty Omar. “It is hard—so hard.” He breathed deeply. “I have a lady, Doctor,” he said.

A voice came out of the air. It was shrill, eery.

“What does she desire?”

“She wants to communicate with Ike Snodtrotter. Have you a Mr. Snodtrotter there?”

“I shall see,” said the high voice. “If he is here and has a message for the lady, he will communicate with her by knocking the table.”

There was a long, ominous silence. Suddenly the table resounded with a furious rapping.

“Grandpa, is that you?” gasped the fat lady.

Again a knocking.

“It is your grandfather,” said the high voice of Doctor Anabana, the “spirit guide.”

“How are you, Grandpa?” asked the lady, anxiously. “How do you feel?”

“Grandpa says he feels fine,” said the high voice. “And to prove it, he will play the tambourine.”

Sure enough, from out of nowhere floated a ghostly tambourine, lit by glowing phosphorescence. It sailed above the table in mid-air and suddenly clinked and clanked.

“You see?” said the Mighty Omar, abruptly coming out of his trance. “But we must hurry lest the astral spell be broken. Do any other ladies wish to commune with the departed?”

“I wonder,” said a lady at the opposite end of the table. “I would like you to see if you couldn’t find my Aunt Agatha.”

“We can try,” said the Mighty Omar. “If Doctor Anabana is willing. What is your Aunt Agatha’s full name?”

“Agatha Flug.”

THE Mighty Omar cleared his throat. As he did so, I felt the skeleton moving away from my side in the darkness.

“I have a lady, Doctor,” intoned the Mighty Omar.

“Ten dollars to that lady!” rasped a voice.

“What?” muttered Omar, in a flustered haste.

“I’m sorry,” said the voice. “Thought I was Doctor I.Q.”

“Doctor Anabana?” called Omar, in puzzled tones. “Do you hear me?”

“Doctor Anabana had to leave,” said the voice—which I now recognized as belonging to my skeleton uncle. “Doctor Gillespie wanted him in the surgery. This is Doctor Banana speaking. I’ve come to take his place.”

“What goes on here?” yelled the Mighty Omar. Then, hastily realizing his position, he recovered dignity. “Will you locate Miss Agatha Flug, please?” he asked.

“To hear is to obey,” said my uncle. He raised his voice. “Hey, Aggie!” he bawled. “Company!”

“This is most unusual,” fluttered the lady at the end of the table. “Are you sure your spirit control is on the right astral plane?”

“Astral plane?” mocked my uncle. “I’m on an astral dive-bomber, sister! Wait, you wanted to speak to your aunt. Well, here’s the old buzzard now. Knock on wood.”

Sure enough, the rapping sounded on the table top. But it was a most peculiar rapping—in Conga rhythm.

“One and two and three—kick!” said a high voice, which came from my skeleton uncle, doing his best to imitate a woman.

“How do you feel up there, Aunt Agatha?” breathed the woman at the end of the table.

“I’ll show you how I feel,” said my uncle, in falsetto. “I’ll play you something on the flute.”

Incredibly, a silver flute, also phosphorescent, floated out over the heads of the Mighty Omar and the ladies.

“Hit it!” snapped my uncle.

The flute began to play.

“Did you ever hear Pete go tweet-tweet-tweet on his piccolo?”

“What the blue blazes?” screamed the Mighty Omar, forgetting himself.

"That's not my Aunt Agatha!" wailed the lady.

"It's a demon!" yelled the woman beside her. "Ooooh—I felt something tickle me!"

She wasn't the only one. As the hysterical flute tooted on, several of the ladies began to giggle and shriek.

The Mighty Omar rose to his feet.

"What in hell is all this?" he howled. "Turn on the lights!"

It was a bad idea.

The lights went on.

When the ladies saw the live skeleton sitting on the Mighty Omar's lap with the flute in his bony mouth, they didn't wait.

Even as they rose to flee, the skeleton jerked one fleshless arm towards a curtain. He pulled a string. A tambourine and two horns fell on the table, along with a microphone, a loudspeaker, a sheet on a wire, and a midget who had been sitting concealed on a perch near the ceiling.

"I'm from the spirit world!" yelled the skeleton. "Any messages today or would you care to say it with flowers?" The ladies weren't listening. They were running out of the room.

THE Mighty Omar rose swiftly, dumping the living skeleton to the floor. He tried to dive through the legs of the departing fat women.

A bony hand jerked him back by the collar.

"Come on," said my uncle. "You called up a spirit, now give me a message."

"Let me go," whined Omar. "Go back to hell or wherever you came from."

"Not unless you come with me," grated my uncle.

"Wh—what do you want with me?" The medium was trembling.

"I'm taking you to see an old friend," rasped my uncle. "An old friend named Magnus Lorry."

"B-b-but he's dead."

“I know,” growled my uncle. “And you murdered him. Didn’t you?”

“N—no—no, I didn’t! Let me go!” howled the fake spiritualist. “I’m just a harmless medium—I never murdered Magnus Lorry—I just dabbled a bit in the occult—I never believed—I never knew—”

The skeleton relaxed his grip.

“I ought to take you anyway,” he hissed. “But I’ll let you go this time if you’ll promise me one thing.”

“Anything. Anything at all!” sobbed the not-so-Mighty Omar.

“Give up this vile racket,” said the skeleton. “Get a job in the war industries or something useful.”

“Yes—I will—right away.”

The skeleton released him and stalked off. I followed.

As we went down the hall, somebody rang the front door. It opened abruptly as we neared it, and to my consternation I recognized the figure standing there in the twilight.

It was the traffic cop who had halted us at the corner.

“Here you are!” he snorted. “I’ve tracked you down at last!”

“Here we aren’t!” said my skeletonic uncle, turning and taking to his bony heels down the hall. I followed with some speed as I noted the revolver in the cop’s pudgy hand.

“Back door,” wheezed my uncle. The cop thundered behind us. “Halt or I’ll shoot!” he bawled.

We didn’t and he did—but by the time the bullet buried itself in the back door we had slammed it behind us. At a dead run we made for the car in the twilight.

“Where to?” I gasped.

“To hell out of this place,” directed my uncle. “Gas rationing be damned!” We whizzed into the street. The cop appeared and in the rear-view mirror I noted that he was mounting a motorcycle.

I turned a comer quickly.

“Guess the Mighty Omar wasn’t guilty,” said Uncle Magnus.

“I’m not so sure,” I told him.

"He was too frightened to lie out of it," argued the living skeleton. "How did you like my act?"

"It frightened me," I admitted. "Good. If we can dodge this cop, I'll try it again."

"Who have you in mind?"

"Dr. Eggkopf. He's a psychiatrist at the army induction center."

"A psychiatrist?"

"Yes, but his hobby is collecting demonolatra—books on sorcery. He used to grab off items at the book dealers' shops and he hated me."

"You want to go to the army induction center now?" I asked, whizzing through an arterial as I noted the cop on the motorcycle behind us.

"Afraid I can't," panted Uncle Magnus.

"Why not?"

"Isn't safe to get myself involved there," said the skeleton. "Doctor Eggkopf is pretty nearsighted and a tough customer. If I visit him at the army induction center he's liable to draft me."

I TRIED to answer, but by this time the wailing of the siren on the motorcycle drowned out my reply.

"He's gaining on us!" screamed my uncle. "Nosey fool!"

I twisted and turned. We were now in the heart of the downtown area. The siren blasted and we drove hell-for-leather. The skeleton bounced around in the back seat.

"Stop that!" he begged. "Do you want to get us both killed?"

"I'm the only one who can be killed," I muttered.

"Do something—lose him!"

"I'm doing my best!"

The glaring face of the cop was clearly distinguishable despite the darkness. The siren screeched in our ears.

I skidded around the corner on a wheel and a half.

"Listen!" yelled Uncle Magnus.

I listened. Another wail rose to drown out the siren. A great, piercing wail.

At the same moment, the lights on the street abruptly blinked and went out. In the office buildings around us, the windows winked into darkness.

"Don't you understand?" I shouted. "It's a blackout!"

"Blackout?"

"Yes. I'll have to pull to the curb and run for it with you."

"Where to?"

"Must be a downtown air-raid shelter nearby. If we hide on the street, the wardens will pick us up."

"There's a subway entrance," panted Uncle Magnus. "Now!"

We ground to a halt as the sirens wailed. Leaping from the car, we streaked down the street. Behind us the bewildered cop groped in darkness.

"Halt there!" he bellowed.

"This way," I gasped. I saw the black mouth of a subway entrance loom out of the lesser darkness.

We clattered down the stairs—I with my heels and the skeleton with his bony metatarsae.

"We're safe now," I whispered, pausing on the landing.

It was dark all around us. Somewhere below the crowd stood in dimly-lighted safety.

"Can't go down further," grunted the skeleton. "I don't want to be seen."

"I'm sure nobody would want to look at you," I assured him. "But we're all right here."

Somebody else came racing down the steps and we froze into silence.

From the heavy footsteps I deduced the presence of a stout man.

I nudged the skeleton, who stood close to the wall.

In a moment several pairs of high heels clicked down the stairs. Two girls, I judged, from the tread.

"You all right, Mamie?" giggled the first.

"Okie-dokie by me," her companion replied.

"Gee, ain't blackouts thrilling?" observed the first girl.

"Me, I'd like it better if I had me a sailor," Mamie answered, snapping her gum.

"Any sailors down here?" the other girl tittered.

THE stout man and myself were silent. Uncle Magnus rattled his bones slightly but made no other sign.

"What's the matter, nobody sociable?" complained Mamie. She moved closer in the darkness. Unluckily for her, she moved closer to Uncle Magnus.

"Eeek!" she murmured. "What was that?"

"What?" inquired the other girl.

"I felt something cold."

"Cold?"

"Cold, and—bony," explained the girl, in puzzled tones. Then, "Oh Gawd! "

"What is it?"

"I don't know—it's all bony—like a skeleton!"

"You're screwy!" her companion diagnosed.

"No kidding, I did!" Mamie insisted.

"This is a subway, not a graveyard," scoffed the other girl. "Wait, I'll light a match and see who's getting fresh around here."

"Don't—" I began. But too late.

The match flared up. Uncle Magnus's leering skull stood out.

With a scream duet, the two girls clattered down the stairs to the safety of the subway proper.

In the darkness I heard the stout man chuckle.

"Cute trick," he laughed. "A mask, huh?"

Uncle Magnus was silent at my side. I answered. "Yes, sir. It's a mask. I was on my way to a costume party when the blackout caught us."

The stout man moved closer.

"Say," he boomed. "I know you. You're Tarleton, aren't you?"

"What?" I muttered.

"Sure. Don't you recognize me?"

"Otis Kersen," I muttered. "I thought you were out of town."

"You told me to get out," he said. "But I didn't. Just left word at the office, that's all. After all, there's nothing to be afraid of, you know. Old Magnus Lorry is safe in his grave, nobody knows anything, you have the estate and we divvy up—"

I turned, but too late. Uncle Magnus had found matches in my pocket.

Otis Kersen saw the full skeleton this time. He screamed.

"In my grave, am I?" groaned Magnus Lorry. "You forget that wizards have power."

"Lorry!" wailed Otis Kersen. "You're back from the dead!"

"Yes," said the skeleton, through clenched teeth. "This young scoundrel was humoring me, dragging me around on a wild goose chase. But I've found my goose and now I'll cook it."

"I'm innocent!" Otis Kersen gasped. "Utterly innocent! He thought up the idea—remember—he came to town secretly and slipped into your house while you slept—he brought a gun—shot you right through the head—we buried you secretly and I faked a medical certificate—he made me do it—"

I TRIPPED on the lower step. That was my biggest mistake. When the skeleton's fingers closed around my throat I knew the end had come.

"All right," he snarled in my ear. "Up we go to the car before the lights turn on." He turned. "You too, Kersen."

"Where are you taking us?" I whispered.

"Home," said the skeleton. "Home. Where my books are. My books with their spells, their incantations. I'm going to show you two a little practical experiment in sorcery."

"What do you mean?"

"You'll see," gloated my skeletonic uncle. "You'll see. Turn about is fair play."

Then I passed out.

When I came to, I was in this bedroom. I'm still here, writing this. Somewhere outside in the great house, a skeleton stalks amidst strange circles, muttering chants. He will be coming for me soon, and for Otis Kersen.

I think I know what he intends.

That's why I'm writing this. To toss it through the window.

If you on the outside find and read this, come to my uncle's house. Magnus Lorry is the name. He probably won't be here—he must have some wizard's plan for a getaway.

Never mind that. Just go to the bedroom closet and open the door. I have a hunch you'll see a skeleton hanging there. That skeleton will be Otis Kersen.

Never mind that, either. But please do something about the other skeleton right next to it. Because—

It's probably me!

Stuporman

Skeetch and Meetch perfected another of their machines. This one transferred dreams into reality. Then one day they found a customer who really had dreams!

IF IT hadn't been that I was dying of hunger, I never would have stuck my nose into Jack's Shack. It really isn't safe to stick your nose into that restaurant, because you are liable to smell some of the food.

But there was another reason why I hesitated. Down at one of the tables, I saw the tall, angular figure of Mr. Lefty Feep. He was leaning against the back of a chair with a great air of business about him—other people's business, as usual.

I was afraid he might see me and come over, and for certain reasons I wished to avoid meeting him. Because when you meet Lefty Feep he talks to you, and when he talks to you, you listen, and if you listen, you'll hear something that will distress you for days.

However, I was pleased to see that Feep was already attached to a victim—a little thin man with eyeglasses and a nervous expression. He was talking to the small, bespectacled stranger quite earnestly, and the stranger was listening. I didn't recognize the fellow, but I felt sorry for him. It grieved me to see that he had a bandage around his head, but it grieved me more to see the way Feep was talking to him. I knew what suffering he was going through.

I tiptoed over to a table. Feep didn't look up. I called the waiter. Feep was still talking. I gave my order. Feep gabbled on. My food came, and I ate. Feep was rattling away.

I grinned. This was one time I'd get away scot-free. I laid a tip on the tablecloth and rose to go.

"Do not scurry in such a hurry."

The voice of Lefty Feep cut through my complacency. I looked up. The one-man crime wave against the English language was standing at my table. He sat down.

I sat down, too, when he pushed me into a chair.

"You must please believe that I grieve when I do not perceive you until you are about to leave," announced Feep, picking up a toothpick and signalling the waiter for a glass of water.

"I'm sorry, Lefty," I answered. "But I must be off."

"Never mind your mental condition," he smiled. "I want to talk to you."

"But I must go now."

"Kindly do not bring up biological problems," Feep insisted. "I see you are wearing your golf socks today."

I glanced down at my feet.

"Golf socks?" I echoed.

"Yes," said Feep. "The ones with the eighteen holes."

I rose again. "Listen, Lefty, I have no time to waste listening to your insults. Why don't you go over and bore that fellow you were talking to before?"

Feep caught my coat-tails and pulled me down again.

"You notice that personality?" he asked. "The little skinny guy with the goggles?"

"Of course I noticed him. Who is he?"

"Who is he?" gasped Feep. "You mean to inform me you do not recognize him?"

"No."

"Why, that is none other than Joe Blow."

"Joe Blow?"

"The famous Stuporman."

"Who in the world is Stuporman?" I asked.

"Why, I always figure everybody knows who Stuporman is," Feep sighed.

I shook my head.

"Well," said Feep, "I will tell his story, if you insist."

"I don't insist."

"You are just being polite," said Lefty Feep. "It is such a yarn as is not unravelled every day. Kindly lend me your ears and I will bend them for you."

He did.

With a lightning flick of his tongue, Lefty Feep began his tale.

* * *

WHEN I first hear of this personality, Joe Blow, he is a reporter on The Daily Bulb, a news-bladder. I see him hanging around Gorilla Gabface's pool palace oncely or twicely, and when I examine this specimen of manhood I am more depressed than impressed.

Joe Blow is a little insignificant jerk who is too weak to lick his own lips.

I hear from some of the downtown boys that he is not a very good reporter, and he is always having trouble. It seems Joe is very much in a fatuated condition over a beautiful girl reporter by the name of Effie Fink.

But Effie Fink does not yearn and burn for Joseph Blow. She thinks he is a sissy. First his draft board turns him down and then his girl friend turns him down. In fact, he gets turned down oftener than the lamp in the parlor of a sailor's girl-friend.

Joe Blow is also turned down around the mouth when I meet him on the street one day. He recognizes me from the pool hall and ambles over with a sad, un-glad smile.

"Hello, Joe," I greet him. "What's heating for eating? What, I inquire, is on the fire? In a word, what's cooking?"

“My goose,” answers Joe Blow, very mournful.

“You have troubles?”

“Like Mussolini,” sighs Joe. “I will live in a hotel for five years, and the manager rents my nice room to somebody else and gives me a bum room instead.”

“Bum room? That’s bad.”

“I have worse,” sighs Joe Blow. “My editor also gives me the bum’s rush. On top of that, the other fellows at the paper are always picking on me. And to finish it all off, my girl friend, Effie Fink, is running around with a racketeer.”

I sympathize with this little runt. “You must assert yourself,” I tell him. “You must be impressive and aggressive.”

“Just look at me,” sobs Joe Blow. “I could not be more run-down if I would get hit by a truck.”

“Why not take some vitamins?” I suggest.

Joe Blow shakes his head. “I am too weak to swallow them,” he tells me. “Besides, they take too long to do any good. I must work fast to regain my girl-friend, also my self-respect.”

“How about a muscle course?” I inquire.

He shakes his head again.

“I send in for one, but they do not mail me my muscles yet.”

I try to console him. “We should be able to think of something. With my brains and your troubles—wait a minute! Brains—troubles—I know just the thing for you to do!”

“Commit suicide?” asks Joe hopefully.

“Not at all,” I cackle. “We will go to see the psychologist, Subconscious Sigmund. Any time you need your wits sharpened, he is the guy to grind your mind.”

“How can he help me?”

“He can psycho-analyze your condition. He can explain the pain in your brain.”

“Let’s go,” says Joe Blow.

SO WE do. I steer him up to Subconscious Sigmund's office in the quickest kind of a hurry.

We walk inside and see Subconscious Sigmund talking on the telephone, but he nods for us to sit down and wait.

I gather that Sigmund is phoning a barber shop because his kid needs a haircut.

"Let me know when two barbers are free," he says, hanging up.

"Why does your kid need two barbers for a haircut?" I ask'.

"The kid has two heads," says Subconscious Sigmund. "And now, what can I do for you?"

I point to Joe Blow and introduce him. "I wish you to tell me what is numb with his skull," I request.

So Sigmund takes Joe Blow into his private office and gives him the third degree. He pumps him for his life history. He grills him like a weenie.

Joe Blow is soon pouring out all his troubles.

Subconscious Sigmund listens very carefully.

"Do you ever dream?" he asks.

"Of course I do."

"What about?"

"Oh, I don't know," says Joe Blow, kind of embarrassed. "I have very peculiar dreams. I dream that I am strong, powerful, dynamic. I can lift great weights and have remarkable endurance. I have the ability to see through walls, and hear any sound. And in some dreams I can even fly."

"Aha!" says Subconscious Sigmund. "Also," says Joe Blow, blushing, "in some dreams I am always having dates with movie queens."

"Really," says Subconscious Sigmund. "You are strong, powerful, forceful, eh? And you have dates with movie queens."

"That's right," says Joe Blow. "Can you do anything to help me?"

"Sure," snaps Subconscious Sigmund. He fumbles around and hands Blow a little white box.

"What's this?" asks Blow.

"A box of sleeping tablets," grunts Subconscious Sigmund. "With dreams like that, what do you want to stay awake for?"

Joe Blow sighs, puts the box in his pocket, and plods downstairs. I follow him.

"Do not be discouraged," I remark, when we hit the street. "I have another idea that might help you."

"Nothing can help me."

"Rome wasn't burned in a day," I tell him. "We will try again. I think we ought to go over and see Skeetch and Meetch."

"Who?"

"Sylvester Skeetch and Mordecai Meetch," I answer. "The famous scientific Americans. They run the Horsecracker Institute, and they are always inventing stuff in their laboratory, such as new ways to avoid paying the rent."

"Can they help me?"

"If anybody can, they are the personalities," I brag. "They are scientific, but terrific."

JOE BLOW trims his limbs over toward the Horsecracker Institute.

We climb the stairs to the big private laboratory where Skeetch and Meetch hang out, mostly around the elbows.

Little fat Skeetch and his chubby partner glare over their goggles in the outer office when we come in.

"Lefty Feep!" yells Skeetch. "It's a pleasure to see you! Sit down! Have a cigar? Good—then give it to me!"

"I want to read you my latest monograph," Meetch interrupts. "It is entitled 'AN APPREHENSION OF AN INTENTION FOR THE PREVENTION OF INVENTION' and it just won an Honorable Mention at the Convention."

"I haven't time," I tell them. "I only come here because I bring you a case."

"Open it up and I will get the glasses," says Skeetch.

"Not it—him," I correct, pointing at Joe Blow.

"What do you want us to do—bury him?" inquires Skeetch.

"No. I want you to listen to his story and help him."

So Joe Blow gives out with a pout about his fate. He tells about his bum room, his overbearing editor, his reporter friends that pick on him, and his girl friend who runs around with a racketeer. He mentions that he is weak and meek and the future looks bleak.

Skeetch and Meetch sigh and shake their heads.

I can see they don't know what to suggest.

But Joe Blow goes on. He tells about seeing Subconscious Sigmund, and answering questions about his dreams. He mentions dreaming of flying and being strong and dynamic.

Suddenly both Skeetch and Meetch jump up and yell.

"We have it!" yells Meetch. "Eureka!"

"So do you," I snap.

"You come at the right moment," Skeetch babbles. "We are just looking for a subject to experiment on with our new machine."

"Machine? What do you mean?"

"The most keen machine you've ever seen!" raves Meetch. "We call it the Morpheus Arm."

"Why?"

"Because it works while you sleep. It is a mechanical hypnotic device which translates the subconscious images of dreams into waking realities, utilizing subliminal concepts and energizing the psychic trauma until a vitalization occurs which impinges imaginative free-fantasies upon a framework of actuality, thus setting up a basis of positive activity actuated by the psyche."

"The hell you tell," I exclaim.

"What does he mean?" asks Joe Blow.

"Why it is simple," I inform him. "He means he invents a machine that turns your sleeping thoughts into waking realities. Whatever you imagine you can do while you dream, you actually can do."

"Right," says Meetch. "I couldn't explain it better myself. In fact, I couldn't explain it."

"But how does this machine operate?" persists Blow.

"Very simple arrangement," says Skeetch. "The subject goes to sleep. As he sleeps, electro-magnetic impulses, due to photo-electronic control are set up. The subject's heart action is synchronized to the movement of the machine. At the same time, a hypnotic force draws bodily magnetism from the sleeper as he dreams. The dreams, in a word, become a part of the machine—and the energy of the machine, operating in ratio with the dream image, flows into the body of the sleeper.

"When the sleeper wakes up, he has the ability and strength to carry out his dream activities. Simple?"

"You are simple," I tell him. "It sounds screwy to me."

"The machine is in our laboratory now," protests Meetch.

"I'd like to look at it, anyway," sighs Joe Blow. So we drag into the big laboratory.

SURE enough, there is this huge arm, attached to a big black cluster of wheels and wires, mounted on a heavy metal base set above an operating table.

"Looks like they've got something here," says Joe Blow.

"Yeah—something for the scrap drive," I sneer.

"I believe these gentlemen," says Joe Blow. "I think I would like to make the experiment. After all, what have I got to lose? I am down and out. But if I could be the way I am in my dreams—oh boy!"

"All you need to do is go to sleep," says Skeetch.

I shrug. If that is what Joe Blow wants, he will have it. But I cannot wait around for him to go to sleep.

Still, I am always glad to do a friend a favor.

So I walk behind Joe Blow and tap him over the head with a hammer.

He falls asleep at once.

Skeetch and Meetch lift him up on the table. He lies there under the laboratory lights, looking weaker and skinnier and littler than ever.

Skeetch and Meetch go into their act. They indulge in a lot of wire-connecting, strap-buckling, switch-fiddling, button-pressing, and assorted dial-turning.

All at once the machinery begins to hum in various keys, like the Four Ink Spots. Then it gains a little power and begins to sing, off-key, like the Andrews Sisters.

Sylvester Skeetch and Mordecai Meetch swings the big arm of the machine over until it hangs just above Joe Blow's head. The arm jiggles up and down. A little screen in back of the machine base lights up and long streaks of electricity crackle across it.

The pinball operators will pay real money for stuff like this, I figure.

But Skeetch and Meetch are more of the screwball operator type.

All at once Meetch utters a mutter.

"It isn't working right," he says. "We can't synchronize the heart action because the patient's pulse is too weak."

"Adrenalin," suggests Skeetch. He runs over to a glass cabinet and comes back with a hypodermic needle.

"Let's go," yells Meetch. "Shoot the harpoon to me, goon."

They give Joe Blow the needle.

The machine begins to groan and shake. So does Joe Blow. But in rhythm with the machine!

Now I notice the electric streaks on the screen also move in rhythm with Joe Blow's breathing. Everything is synchronized. And the arm above Joe Blow's head seems to be conducting energy from the machine into his body.

I sit there watching, and eating a banana, with rapt scientific curiosity. What will happen next? A short-circuit, I suspect.

But there is no explosion.

All at once the two geniuses rush over to Joe Blow and unstrap him. Meetch goes over to a wash stand and comes back with a glass of water which he throws in Joe Blow's face.

Joe Blow wakes up, sits up, gets up.

He is awake, and that is no fake.

I stare at him. He doesn't look any different as he climbs off the table.

IN BACK of him the machine grinds away, but that is the only evidence that anything happens during the last ten minutes. Except for that, it might all be a dream.

But if you ever see a dream walking, it is Joe Blow—as I soon discover.

"How do you feel?" I yell, above the machine's humming noise.

He smiles.

"Wonderful! Marvelous! Superb! Not so bad!" he announces.

Skeetch rushes up to him.

"It's a success," he gasps. "The machine works! Congratulations for helping our experiment."

He shakes hands with Joe Blow. Suddenly he starts to scowl and howl.

"Ouch!" yells Skeetch. "Leggo—you're breaking my fingers!"

Joe Blow lets go. He takes off his glasses and throws them away.

"Don't need these any more," he announces.

We look at him, wondering if it is true.

"My friend," says Meetch, "if you benefit from this machine,' we are very happy. As long as it continues to operate you will be living your dreams. We will not shut it off. So if you are indeed stronger and more capable due to our efforts we are very pleased. We urge you to take full advantage of the machine's powers, so we can study the effects. In a word, make your dreams come true."

Joe Blow stands there. He is still a little, scrawny-looking guy, but he has a new smile on his face.

"Very well, gentlemen," he says. "Thank you for all your trouble. But if you will pardon me," he murmurs, "I must go now."

"Goodbye, Joe," I tell him.

“Goodbye,” says Joe Blow, stepping over to the open window and flying away into the night.

Yes that is exactly what he does! He marches to the open window and hurls himself through the air like a rocket.

“For sobbing out loud!” I yell. “Look at that!”

Skeetch blinks, but Meetch winks.

“That’s what he dreams about,” he tells me. “With the aid of the machine he should be able to do that. He is almost walking—or rather, flying—in his sleep now. His brain is awake, but his soul is in a sort of a stupor.”

“Stuporman,” says Skeetch.

“Exactly,” Meetch answers. “Joe Blow is now a Stuporman. As long as we keep our machine running, he can do whatever his imagination will allow.”

Skeetch rubs his hands. “Well, that’s that,” he says. “We will let the machine run a while and see what happens to our subject in this little experiment. But now we must go back to work. What is next on our program, Meetch?”

Meetch looks at his list.

“We are supposed to build a rocket-ship,” he announces.

“AH right,” says Skeetch. “I suppose it will take us several days, at least. You had better go now, Lefty.”

So I take my leave of Skeetch and Meetch, wondering all the while what Joe Blow does after he flies off into the night.

I do not find out until a long time afterwards. But this is the way it works out.

Joe Blow is very delighted to find he can fly. He glides along over the rooftops, hoping an Army patrol doesn’t spot him, and practices gliding and swooping and dipping, and maybe a little peeking into second-story windows.

BUT after a while the novelty wears off and Joe Blow realizes he has a job to do.

So he heads over to his hotel. He lights down in the alley in back and walks in very normally. He prances up to the desk, where the manager is sitting—a fat, tough-looking number.

"Pardon me," he coughs, looking meek.

"Why should I?" growls the manager, looking up. He is the fellow who imposes on Joe Blow by kicking him out of his good room and putting him in a cubbyhole a few days before.

"I should like to have my old room back," Blow remarks.

The manager glares. "I already tell you it is quite impossible. That room is rented to somebody else now."

"But it has a nice southern exposure," argues Joe Blow. "I lived in it for five years and like it. Now you transfer me to a little closet with no windows at all. What can I do for air?"

"You can get the hell out of here," suggests the manager. "I have no time to waste arguing with an insignificant little pip-squeak like you."

Joe Blow shrugs. "No southern exposure?" he mumbles. "All right. Suit yourself."

He walks out of the hotel. The manager laughs.

But a minute later, the manager is not laughing. He is shaking. In fact, the whole building is shaking.

The shaking turns to a terrific shudder. Then there is a rumble, a totter, the building seems to lift in the air, and everything whirls around.

When the manager opens his eyes again, everything is quiet. And normal.

He rushes to the door and looks outside to see about the earthquake.

He looks around and almost collapses.

"I'm on the wrong street!" he whispers.

The explanation, of course, is simple. Joe Blow wants a room with southern exposure. So he merely goes outside and lifts up the building and turns it around until his room faces south.

Then he puts it back down, punches a hole through the wall of his room for a window, and flies away.

"This Stuporman business is all right," he thinks to himself, lighting on the pavement across from his newspaper office.

He starts to cross the street.

A car whizzes around the corner, almost clipping him. A tough but gruff voice sings out, "Whyn'cha look where youse is going, huh? Wanna hold up traffic?"

Ordinarily, Joe Blow cringes when somebody yells at him. But now he yells right back.

"Yes, I do want to hold up traffic," he says.

And he scoops up the car in his arms and holds it up. He puts it down out of his way, and crosses the street.

The tough but gruff guy is now sick but quick.

JOE BLOW ignores him and marches into the newspaper office. He heads straight for the back where the editor hangs out.

Usually he does not dare to invade his privacy, but today he walks right into the inner office and sits down.

The editor looks up.

"So here you are, eh, Blow? What the hell's been keeping you?" he snarls. "It's my day off."

"Day off? Day off? You just have a day off last week when your appendix busts."

"I know, but—"

"Listen, Blow," snarls the editor. "While you are taking your day off, stories are breaking all over town. I get a report about some nut who is flying over the city. Do you phone me in the yarn? No!"

"I can explain—"

"Shuddup! Then the manager of the hotel down the street phones in about an earthquake. It picks up his hotel and turns it around on its foundations. Do you cover this story? No!”

“But listen, sir—”

“You know what I’m gonna do, Blow?” yells the editor, getting up and grabbing Blow by the scruff of his neck. “I’m gonna kick you out.”

And he aims a very hearty kick indeed at Joe Blow’s stomach while his back is turned.

“Ouch!” moans the editor, hopping around and grabbing his foot. “What you got—lead in your pants?”

Joe Blow pushes the editor back into a chair and smiles.

“Now you listen to me,” he says. The editor sits back very quiet. He is so quiet you can hear his eyes popping when Joe Blow exhibits his new personality as Stuporman.

“I am sick and tired of your bossing,” says Blow. “For ten years I work here on the Daily Bulb without a raise. I think it is about time you double my salary.”

“What the—”

“Sit down!” snaps Blow. “I am not afraid of you any more, you big yard of lard. You are not as tough as you look. For a while I think you are all muscle, but now I know your secret.

Do I get the raise, or do I tell all the reporters you wear a corset?”

“Corset?” screams the editor. “How do you know—are you the devil?”

“No,” says Joe Blow. “But my super-vision tells me that beneath your vest is a corset.”

The editor blushes. He shakes his head violently.

“Don’t be upset,” Blow adds. “Your wig will slide off.”

The editor gulps.

“We all know you wear a wig,” Blow tells him. “Matter of fact, my superhearing tells me that some of the reporters in the outer office are talking about it right now. They are wondering if you ever find any eggs in that bird-nest you have on your head.”

The editor, after screaming, blushing, and gulping, is too tired to do anything. He just sits there.

“Where do you get your wonderful hearing and vision?” he inquires. “To say nothing of whatever you have when I try to kick you?”

“Never mind,” Joe Blow cracks. “From now on I will not be taking kicks any more, I will be giving them out. And you are always at the top of my list.”

Blow grins. “Yes sir,” he says. “I have a deep-seated affection for you and—”

JUST then the door opens and Blow’s super-vision and super-hearing get a real workout. For into the room steps his girl-friend, Effie Fink. This damsel is really quite an eyeful and quite high-spirited. In fact she is all curves and nerves.

Joe Blow’s mouth hangs open and he forgets all about his abilities as Stuporman.

Effie Fink ignores him and prances up to the editor.

“I think I’m on the trail of that subway graft,” she announces. “The Daily Bulb will have a scoop tomorrow if your little girl reporter knows anything about it.”

“Fine,” says the editor. “We ought to uncover this affair. We must find out what’s holding up the subway construction.”

“I’m following a hot lead,” says Effie. “Hope I don’t get my nose burned.”

Joe Blow sits there gulping and hoping Effie Fink will notice him, but she doesn’t.

“Ah—uh—hello, Effie,” he yammers.

Effie turns and gives him a look straight from the Deep-Freeze.

“Oh, it’s you,” she remarks.

“Sure,” says Joe. “Don’t you notice me when you come in?”

“No,” answers the girl reporter. “And I still don’t.”

“Uh—how about going out with me this evening?”

Effie laughs.

"I'm sorry, but I already have an engagement, thank heaven! I am the guest of Mr. Cutter."

"You mean 'Throats' Cutter, the racketeer?" gasps Joe.

"Never mind the vulgar nicknames. Mr. Cutter is a gentleman, as far as I know, and I will thank you not to cast any aspersions on him."

"I would like to cast something more then aspersions on that big baboon!" mutters Blow.

The damsel laughs. "You? Why you haven't strength enough to cast a vote," she titters. "But I cannot waste time. I'm on my way."

Effie Fink breezes, banging the door shut behind her.

The editor looks at Joe Blow sitting there and trying to pick his face up from the floor when it starts falling.

"Huh!" grunts the editor. "You and your super-vision and super-hearing and super-strength! Why don't you assert yourself with her, you superchump?"

Joe Blow shakes his head. "You don't understand," he says. "When I see Effie I don't think about myself any more. I forget everything. I worship the ground her open-toed shoes toddle on! Besides, I don't want her to know about my power. I want her to love me for myself."

The editor has a slight change of heart. "Don't feel so bad, Joe," he advises. "I happen to know she really doesn't like this 'Throats' Cutter she hangs around with lately. It is merely that she suspects him of being mixed up in this graft to halt construction on the subway. She goes out with him to pump him, try to uncover the deal, and get a story for the paper."

Joe Blow perks up a little when he hears this. "I see," he exclaims. "It's strictly business."

"Exactly. And this subway scandal is important."

"Right," says Joe Blow. "Today I happen to be visiting my scientific friends, Skeetch and Meetch," he observes, proudly. "I notice that when the subway is completed it will end very close to their Horsecracker Institute."

The editor makes a suggestion. "Why don't you get on this story too?" he asks. "The sooner we find out about the subway, the sooner Effie Fink is through with ‘Throats’ Cutter.”

JOE BLOW is so excited he forgets about his super-strength. He springs to his feet and bumps his head against the ceiling. He comes down gracefully, along with a shower of plaster.

“I’ll do it,” he shouts. “I’ll follow her.”

“Probably she is at his apartment,” suggests the editor.

“In that racketeer’s apartment? I must be off,” yells Blow.

He runs to the open window.

Blow blows.

The editor watches him dive out.

“Yes, he must be off,” he sighs.

But Joe Blow, flying through the night, is very much on. He swoops down at a corner drugstore and rockets into a phone booth. Every ounce of his new super-energy is quivering with excitement. He calls the Horsecracker Institute, meanwhile tearing the telephone book in half just for practice.

“Hello,” he yells, when Skeetch answers the phone. “This is Joe Blow. Have you still got the Morpheus Arm working? Good! Be sure to keep it on. I’ll need everything I’ve got tonight.”

He hangs up, whirls through the drugstore, and takes off from the curb.

A cop sees him flying into the night.

“Hey, you!” he hollers. “Why don’t you wait until the lights change?”

But Joe Blow is already a mile up, zooming for the big apartment where “Throats” Cutter hangs his coat and gat.

In a moment he is perched on the window ledge outside the 19th floor, using his super-vision to squint through into the rooms beyond.

There is Effie Fink, sitting on the sofa with “Throats” Cutter. Joe Blow looks at the celebrated racketeer and shudders.

“Throats” Cutter is only about five feet six and weighs about ISO pounds, but he is every inch a thoroughbred. A thoroughbred rat. Even if his height and weight are only average, he looks very strong. His arms bulge with muscles and his hip-pockets bulge with hardware. He is sitting with his legs crossed, and Joe Blow can see a stiletto parked in his left stocking. He has his coat off and is relaxing in a bullet-proof vest, but his tie is neatly knotted to hide the blackjack hanging underneath it. “Throats” Cutter is smoothing back his coal-black hair with his left hand, because his right hand is covered with brass knuckles.

Effie Fink doesn’t seem to notice this one-man arsenal’s appearance. She is giving him the old oil.

“It must be marvelous to be so important,” she sighs. “And have so many people interested in you.”

“I get shot at every day,” says Cutter, proudly.

“You must be very busy,” whispers the damsel. “I hear you are interested in the new subway.”

“Who tells you that?” snaps Cutter, his eyes glittering like the teeth on a hungry shark.

“Oh, a little birdie.”

“A little dead birdie, if I ever catch him,” mutters Cutter.

“But isn’t it true?” needles the girl reporter.

“Don’t bother your head about such things and you’ll keep it longer,” says Cutter. “Wait a minute. I’ll mix us up a drink and we’ll get sociable.” He gets up and walks out very slow, because of all the hardware weighing him down.

EFFIE FINK doesn’t waste any time. The minute he leaves the room she runs to the desk, trying the drawers. They are locked. Then she runs over to the wall safe and fiddles with it. It doesn’t open.

Finally she sees a closet door and opens it.

In the closet hangs three overcoats, two suits, and a large man with a bandage in his mouth.

“Eeeeek!” remarks Effie Fink.

She turns around. “Throats” Cutter stands in the doorway of the parlor, watching her.

“Do not be alarmed,” he says, smiling. “He is doing all right hanging there in the closet. I have insect spray in there so the moths won’t get him.”

“But I know him,” the girl reporter blurts. “That’s Ambrose Reed, the contractor who is building the subway.”

“Not any more,” grins Cutter. “From now on I am building the subway.”

“You kidnap him?” whispers the girl.

Cutter doesn’t grin any more.

“It is too bad you open that door,” he says. “Because I do not like for people to discover the skeletons in my closet. Even big fat skeletons like this Ambrose Reed.”

“What are you going to do?” asks Effie Fink.

“I am going to tell you everything,” Cutter answers. “Yes, I kidnap Ambrose Reed last week. I take over the contracting job and stir up trouble with the men so the work slows down. Because the longer it takes to build the subway, the more it costs. And the more it costs, the more I will make. Understand?”

“Yes.” Effie frowns. “But why do you admit all this to me?”

Cutter laughs. “So you will have a good story to put in the paper tomorrow, of course,” he answers.

“You mean I can print it?”

Cutter shrugs. “Well—maybe not. I think I’ve got a better story figured out. With a little female interest in it, see? How does this sound? ‘BEAUTIFUL GIRL REPORTER FOUND DEAD IN SUBWAY. IDENTITY UNKNOWN, BUT SEARCHERS ARE CONFIDENT OF FINDING MORE BITS SHORTLY AND PUTING THEM TOGETHER.’ There’s a real story, eh?”

It is a trifle difficult for Effie to answer this question, because she is now hanging upside down over Cutter’s shoulder as he grabs her up and smothers her mouth with his hand.

He heads for the door and dashes out of the apartment by a rear elevator.

Joe Blow, meanwhile, is very busy on his own hook.

Naturally, he wants to save Effie Fink from death.

But once a reporter, always a reporter. There is a big news story here, and he must get a scoop.

So as soon as Cutter and the damsel leave the room, he springs through the window and unties Mr. Ambrose Reed.

In a flash he whips out a pencil and notebook and gets the story of his untimely snatching from the kidnaped contractor.

Then Stuporman's strength comes into play. He rips open the desk drawers and tears the safe door from the wall. He scoops out all the documents about the subway contracts.

In a twinkling he calls the editor of the Daily Bulb and delivers his lead story.

"Reed says this delay will hold up the subway six months," he says. "Yes, Reed's safe, with me. Effie Fink? Oh, Effie Fink is with Cutter at the subway. He's going to blow her to bits or something. What? I should save her? Not a bad idea."

JOE BLOW, the Stuporman hangs up, waves goodbye to Ambrose Reed, and jumps out of the window.

"Dammit!" he yells, outside. "I should have enough sense to open the window before I jump."

But there is no time for quibbling. Joe Blow therefore, does not quibble. He flies. He heads for the dark, yawning mouth of the unfinished subway tunnel.

He swoops down into the black pit and skims along through darkness.

Far ahead a light gleams along the tracks.

In the glow, Joe Blow can see a sight that has not been his privilege to witness since the days of the silent movies.

Effie Fink is lying on the subway rails in the tunnel way beyond. She is tied hand and foot, and looks very uncomfortable.

Coming towards her is a big electric hand-car, whizzing along the rails. On the hand-car is a large keg of TNT, with the fuse sputtering away and burning down.

When it hits Effie Fink in a second or two, there will be a difficult time finding enough left of her to please a jigsaw puzzle fan.

This situation alarms Effie quite a bit, and she is uttering loud cries of displeasure.

Way down the tracks stands "Throats" Cutter, and he does not agree with Effie Fink's complaints. He is laughing in a jolly fashion—a jolly fashion for a hyena, that is.

Joe Blow, alias Stuporman, takes in this situation with a single super-vision.

In one second the TNT and the hand-car will strike Effie Fink.

He hurls himself forward.

Fast as he is, he is still a hundred feet away.

Too late!

Mustering up every ounce of his strength, Stuporman opens his mouth, takes careful aim at the dynamite keg a hundred feet away—and spits the fuse out!

It sputters and dies, but the handcar rolls.

Stuporman waits until it actually touches Effie Fink—so that the wheels cut the ropes tying her, and that saves him the trouble.

Then he zooms down and pushes the car back up the track. He gives it a powerful shove and it begins to rocket back towards "Throats" Cutter. Cutter can't run away. He fumbles in the darkness of the tunnel and whirls around as the hand-car approaches with Stuporman sitting on it.

Joe Blow sees what Cutter has in his hands.

A big, black-barreled sub-machine gun.

And it is aimed at him.

Stuporman or no Stuporman, he doesn't think he can stop bullets.

So as Cutter shoots, Stuporman Blow leaps up, comes down on the barrel of the gun, and bends it backwards while Cutter is firing it.

The bullets enter Mr. Cutter very rapidly, and he becomes very dead.

Effie Fink comes running up, after taking all this time to pull up her stockings and put on fresh make-up.

“Oh, Joe, you’re wonderful!” she whispers. “You will be a hero for saving the subway.”

Joe Blow, the Stuporman, frowns.

“The subway!” he mutters. “That’s right. I know I forget something.”

“What is it, darling?” asks Effie Fink.

“Get out of here,” orders the new Joe Blow. “I’ve got work to do.”

MEEKLY, Effie Fink walks up the tunnel and out of the unfinished subway at the nearest exit.

Joe Blow turns to the wall of earth beyond.

He glances at his wristwatch and sighs.

“Gosh! It’s almost midnight. Well, that leaves me a couple of hours, anyway.”

So taking off his coat, Stuporman gets to work and finishes building the subway before morning!

Yes, all night long he tunnels and digs, and hauls and props and scoops and cements and pushes through under the streets.

By six a.m. he is dizzier than a crosseyed octopus in a Hall of Mirrors.

Even Stuporman gets tired.

And that, of course, must be why he gets so confused and makes a mistake. His super-vision is reading blue prints while his super-strength is burrowing through the cement to build the terminal station.

Right then and there he goes wrong.

He digs a little too far and a little off-side.

As a matter of fact, he comes up in the basement of a building. The building above him is shaking and he hears familiar voices cursing away.

“What’s the matter?” he croaks hoarsely. “What’s happening? Why do I feel so weak?”

After starting this quiz program with himself, Joe Blow takes one look around him, gulps, and falls flat on his face.

When he wakes up he stares into the goggled eyes of Sylvester Skeetch and Mordecai Meetch.

“Why do you do it?” moans Meetch.

“Do what?” Joe Blow moans back at him.

“Dig up under our cellar and shake the building,” Skeetch answers. “When you do that you cause the Morpheus Arm to jiggle. It stops cold. Something goes wrong and it will not work any more!”

“You mean I wreck the machinery that controls my dreams come true?” sighs Joe Blow. “I am not Stuporman any more?”

“No more,” says Skeetch.

“But you are a hero in today’s papers,” Meetch consoles him.

Joe Blow gets up weakly.

“It’s all over, I guess. Now I am just Joe Blow the reporter again. Effie Fink will not go for me now that I lose my superstrength.”

“Wait a minute,” Meetch suggested.

“Nobody needs to know you aren’t Stuporman any more. Don’t tell her. She will never catch on. Go to her now. I bet she will be your slave for life.”

Joe Blow takes this suggestion, nods, and beams. He walks out in the early morning sunshine with a smile on his face.

And sure enough, when he gets back to the office, Effie Fink falls all over him. The editor is proud, the subway contractor is overjoyed, and Joe Blow—the famous Stuporman—is a hero.

LEFTY FEEP finished wagging his tale and sat back.

I nodded.

“So that’s how subways are built,” I said, a little sarcastically.

“Joe Blow tells me all about it himself just now,” Feep answered. “You do not think he is a prevaricator, do you? And certainly you know that I am 100% truthful."

"You're better than that," I told Feep. "Sometimes you're 200% at least."

He smiled at the compliment.

I turned to stare at skinny little bespectacled Joe Blow.

"Seems hard to believe that such a runt could do so many wonderful things," I sighed.

"You can see the subway for yourself. Doesn't that prove it?" Feep told me.

"I suppose so," I admitted. "But by the way, I forgot to ask you a question."

"Let's have it," said Lefty Feep.

"Why is your Stuporman friend wearing a bandage around his head?"

"Oh, that?"

Feep smiled as he replied,

"It seems he marries this girl Effie Fink, and she beats the hell out of him."

THE END

The Goon From Rangoon

When statues come to fife, that's more than Lefty Feep wants to monkey with—even for rubies!

JACK'S shack was very crowded when I came in to eat. I ordered and got service, then began to nibble away with a newspaper in front of my face. Suddenly a fork tore through the paper and dipped into my dish. A hand reached around and lifted my cup of coffee.

"Hey!" I said.

"Hello," answered Lefty Feep, peering through the hole left by his fork. "Excuse me, please—it is so crowded in here I make a mistake."

The long-faced strand from the fringes of society gave me a disarming smile as he lifted the fork to his lips.

Then "What is this stuff?" Feep exploded, tasting a mouthful.

"Chop suey," I replied.

Lefty Feep put his fork down with a bang.

"Phooey to chop suey!" he announced. "Chow mein gives me a pain. Egg foo yong should never be brung. Rice isn't nice. Tea is not for me. Food Chinese is only grease!"

"Why Lefty—China is an ally of ours," I objected.

"I would not wander to China to look for Dinah," Feep insisted. "Confucius say to stay away."

"What do you know about China?" Feep frowned. "Well maybe all China is not so bad. Me, I never get high in Shanghai and I never kick the gong in Hongkong. I do not even have a fling in Peking. But there is one place that I cannot stand."

"You can hardly stand anywhere," I muttered under my breath. But aloud I said, "Where is that, Lefty?"

"Why—Rangoon."

"Rangoon? But Rangoon isn't in China. It's in Burma," I told him. "Burma."

"To me Burma is only a shave," said Lefty Feep. "But a pretty close shave at that."

"So you've been to Rangoon, recently? It's occupied by the Japs, isn't it?"

"Wait a minute. I do not say I visit this Rangoon. As a matter of fact, Rangoon sends something here to me. And I do not know about it being occupied by Japs. But there are some kind of demons there, anyway. And they certainly give me a demon-stration."

"What's all this?" I perked up my ears. "You got something from Rangoon, you say? And there's demons mixed up in it?"

"I get plenty," Feep replied. "And I am mixed up in it. It is the damndest Chinese puzzle you ever hear of."

"I didn't hear of it."

"Well, you wall—right now," Lefty Feep promised me.

This was my signal to rise. "Some other time," I said. "Right now I've got to see a man about a dog."

"That is just how it starts out with me," Feep said, pushing me firmly back into the chair with the point of his fork.

He speared me into my seat, harpooned me with a baleful glance, and began to wag his tale.

* * *

LIKE I say, it all starts one day when I got to see a man about a dog. The man is a chiropodist and the dog happens to be my left dog which has on it a bunion the size of an onion.

So I move the feet down the street to the office of Doc Lessgland, a toe-twister. Lessgland is a good chiropodist, even though his sole support is heels.

Well, his office is pretty crowded, so I sit down and pick up a copy of one of those 1904 magazines and prepare to find out who wins the World Series or whatever they play those days.

Pretty soon I glance up when the door opens and get an eyeful of the personality who limps in.

"Strike me technicolor!" I mumble. "If it isn't Dr. Fu Manchu in person." At least, it looks like it might be. Because the article in question is six feet three of China Boy . . . an extremely yellow fellow with a bald head and the kind of a stomach you see on these statues. As a matter of fact, I almost get up and stick some incense in his ears just to see if he lights up. But do not mistake me—I have nothing but sympathy for this Chinese character, because he certainly looks as though he is suffering from a bad case of the Limehouse Blues.

He hobbles in the door and sits down in a chair with a groan and a scream. The groan comes from him, but the scream comes from the chair-springs when they feel the torture of 300 lbs. of China-ware resting on them.

I look at the foot of this gentle oriental and see the big bandage and shake my head.

"Tough luck," I observe.

He forces a smile.

"Accidents are no trouble unless they happen," he says.

I take in this Chinese philosophy and go back for more.

"What happens to your foot?" I inquire. "Drop a heavy safe on it?"

"A safe is safe until it is open," he comes back. "But no, it is not a safe that drops upon my humble foot. It is a jewel."

“A jewel?”

“A gem of purest ray serene,” he answers.

I SIT there with my mouth open, trying to give my brain some air. Because I am doing some fancy thinking.

Imagine a jewel so big that you hurt your foot when you drop it on your toes! Here, I figure, is a character worth cultivating. Somebody ought to look after a guy’s jewels and stuff so he isn’t all the time dropping them and hurting himself. Maybe I can get a job hauling around gold bars for this Chinatown Charlie.

“That is too bad,” I sympathize. “You should not be such a butterfingers.”

“Precious stones may break my bones,” he comes back.

“This jewel business interests me for some strange reason,” I tell him.

“I never figure there are any jewels big enough to hurt anybody. In fact, I would not mind a shower of emeralds or rubies at all.”

“But do not misunderstand,” purrs the Chinese. “This is not a genuine stone that falls upon my foot.”

Aha—it would be like this! He merely drops a counterfeit hunk of glass on his pinkies. I groan with disgust.

“No,” he continues. “It is just an imitation, naturally. I am examining it for size—because the real jewel is many times heavier.”

The real jewel! There is one then! I sit right back up and take plenty of notice.

“Of course, it will be difficult to pry it out of the idol,” the Chinese goes on. “And the idol will be offended.”

“I would offend anybody for a paltry fortune,” I answer.

“But the god of the idol—” says the Chinese. Then he stops and looks at me hard.

“Who are you?” he asks. “I have a feeling you may be sent from Heaven.”

“My name is Lefty Feep,” I tell him. “And I come here straight from Gorilla Gabface’s pool parlor.”

“Better still,” smiles the Chinese. “Permit me to introduce myself. I am Jack Fu Groan, proprietor of the Hoo Flung Goo Chop Suey Palace.”

This surprises me. What does a Chinese hash-house owner have to do with fancy jewelry?

But Jack Fu Groan explains all that in a few short words.

“I realize this may surprise you,” he admits. “For nothing surprises like the unexpected. Particularly if it is startling.”

“Cut the double-talk in half,” I suggest.

“You see, I have a brother in Rangoon,” he tells me.

“Yes, my brother, Wuan Low Groan is high priest of the Great Temple. And now that the cursed Japanese occupy the city, the treasures of the Great Temple are in peril. So my brother has the presence of mind to send the Temple treasures here, to me.

“One of these treasures is the famed idol of the god Squat.”

“What?”

“Squat,” he says. “And this deity, a giant figure of hammered bronze, has a sacred treasure in its brow—two gigantic pigeon-blood ruby eyes. Two ruby eyes, the size of large apples.”

“So why do you wish to squeeze applesauce from the sacred god?” I inquire.

JACK FU GROAN gives me a sweet smile.

“Do not be so stupid as to play dumb and appear ignorant,” he suggests. “You and I are enlightened men. We do not believe in superstitions or curses or heathen nonsense.

“Besides, my brother is dead now. Word reaches me today. The treasure is rightfully mine. I do not worship Squat. I do not fear a curse. Why not take the rubies?”

“Why not?” I echo.

"That is why it is fortunate that I meet you. You impress me as a strong, sturdy individual, Mr. Feep."

"I can lick my weight in war stamps," I tell him.

"Then you are precisely the man to assist me. I am too clumsy, I suppose. I order an imitation jewel in advance to substitute for one of the idol's eyes and immediately drop it on my foot. Now that the real idol is here, I shall never succeed in prying out the eyes safely, let alone do all the work of unpacking without some clumsy injury to myself.

"So what do you say, Mr. Feep? Would you care to assist me in securing the rubies? There is a large fee for you if you do."

"Me for a fee," I come back.

"Naturally all this must be kept strictly confidential. It is a secret."

"Silence without violence," I promise.

"Well then." Fu Groan gets up. "Let us be on our way at once. There is no time to lose."

"What about your foot?"

"Some other time. Once I get those rubies in my hands, I shall dance for joy."

"Get ready to step then, brother," I answer. "Because I'm all set to fool with the jewels."

And off we go to the Hoo Flung Goo Chop Suey Palace.

This turns out to be a very dingy-looking vitamin-villa indeed, in a very low neighborhood of town. In fact, it is near Gorilla Gabface's pool hall, which makes the neighborhood extremely vile.

It certainly does not look prosperous from the outside, and there are not enough customers inside to start a game of solitaire. All I see in the shadows is a little dried-up man wearing a greasy tuxedo.

"Any business, Opium?" asks Fu Groan of this little guy.

Opium shakes his head. Fu Groan turns to me and whispers:

"I call him Opium because he's such a dope."

He leads me back between the tables until we get to a little door with a dragon painted on it. He goes through, turns on a light, and beckons me to follow him in.

I enter.

THE room beyond is very large, almost as large as the entire chop suey restaurant. And it is filled up to the ceiling with big packing boxes and crates.

“The treasures of the Temple of Squat,” Fu Groan whispers. “Vases, figurines, altars, ceremonial hangings, carvings, pottery, urns. A small fortune.

“But who wants a small fortune? You and I are interested in bigger stakes. Let us proceed at once to open the big case over there—the case containing the sacred idol of Squat himself.”

“Got any tools?” I say, looking at the packing case. It certainly is a big thing. Opening it will take a chisel at least, but that is nothing to me, because in some circles I am known as quite a chiseler.

“Help yourself,” says Fu Groan with a wave of his fat hand. “Chisel, saw, hammer, whatever you want. I urge you to exhibit great care lest you damage the idol.”

“I’ll do the job lightly and politely,” I promise. And set to work.

It is a terrific task, but at last I strip the boards and packing away and the great idol of Squat sits on the floor before us. I stand back in surprise.

Squat is certainly something to look at. He is named very well, being a squatting figure with legs crossed underneath. Even so he must be over five feet tall. He looks not a little like Jack Fu Groan, only with more lard and twice as hard.

He has a very mean face, like a wrestler who gets thrown out of the ring and lands on a spike instead of a lap, and his bronze mouth hangs open, showing big ivory tusks.

But neither I or Fu Groan waste any time looking at his body and face. We stare at the eyes—the two rubies.

There they are, glowing like live coals on either side of Squat’s nose.

Pigeon-blood rubies, cut in beautiful facets, with two pupils fixed in the eyes so they seem to stare out as if old Squat was alive.

"That's nice ice," I comment to Fu Groan. "I never seen such size in a gem before."

"Perfect, too," Fu Groan pants, getting excited. "They will bring a fortune. Now you must take them out and replace them with these glass imitations."

He scrabbles around in the corner and brings over the hunks of cut glass he wants substituted. They are exact imitations.

"Made from photographs and the description my brother sends me," Fu Groan explains.

Me, I do not give him the benefit of my attention. I am all ready to claw away at the rubies.

But Fu Groan coughs and stops me for a minute.

"OH, BY the way," he says. "You are not superstitious, are you?"

"Yes and no," I tell him. "I do not walk under ladders because they may fall on me. I do not like to have a black cat cross my path because I might stumble over it. I throw salt over my shoulder when I see somebody I don't like behind me—and I don't take it out of the salt-cellar first, either.

"But I do not believe in ghosts, werewolves, vampires, or congressmen."

"That is fine," Fu Groan says. "Because then you will not be bothered by the curse on this idol."

"Curse? I get cursed many a time, but only in crap games."

"This curse is slightly different. It says that whoever removes the stones from the idol of Squat will cause it to come alive and seek its eyes."

"Statues coming alive?" I snicker.

"That is a lot of gooey hooey. Cigar-store Indians do not smoke and window dummies don't pull down the shades."

"I am glad to see you take that attitude," Fu Groan remarks. "So go ahead and take out the rubies."

"Wait a minute," I remind him. "Now is the time to settle a few details. Such as how much do I get for this and when?"

He smiles.

"How about a hundred dollars?" he suggests.

"For rubies worth a fortune?"

"Right now," he says, waving a handful of bills.

I take them out of his hand. Waving makes me nervous.

"It's a deal," I say. "Maybe I'm just a booby about these rubies, but a bird in the hand is worth two on the lips."

So I reach up and take a tug at the ruby eyes.

This is just an experiment, understand, because I figure I am going to pry them out with a chisel. But the first ruby drops right out in my hand! And then the second one!

I stand there holding them, and almost fall to my knees because of the weight. What is all this? Why should Fu Groan pay me a hundred slugs just to lift out these two stones?

Then I turn around and see the answer.

THE answer is stretching out its bronze legs and standing up. The answer is fumbling with long bronze arms at the empty air. The answer is feeling with groping fingers at its empty eye-sockets.

The answer is that the god Squat is now alive!

Alive and kicking!

I nearly catch one below the equator from a bronze foot.

"Ouch!" I remark, jumping two feet and coming down gracefully on my heels.

"Look at him!" I suggest.

Fu Groan is looking. His eyes are popping out of his head just the way the rubies pop out of Squat's.

"It's true—the curse is true—he's alive!" Fu Groan wails.

“I’ll say he’s alive,” I agree, dodging another kick. “But why don’t you warn me he’s a jitterbug?”

“How would I know that?” Fu Groan comes back. “I’ve got to get out of here with the jewels before he discovers where they are.”

“And leave me alone with this bronze boogie-woogie expert? Not on your life.”

“No—on your life,” Fu Groan tells me. “You take his eyes. Therefore, the curse falls on you. If he gets his eyes back he will kill you. So I suggest you don’t let him out of your sight. Take him away—he’s all yours.”

This statement brings a rush of grief to my head. Am I going to be saddled with a living bronze statue for a stooge?

This seems to be the program, because Fu Groan suddenly dives for the door with the rubies in his hands. And I can’t stop him.

Because I happen to be up on the chandelier at this time, keeping out of the way of Squat, the idol. The idol is far from idle with those bronze feet of his, and I am taking no chances.

So I hang there, the idol gropes around under me, and Fu Groan stands in the doorway, grinning.

“You know,” he says, “this reminds me of a story.”

“I got no time for jokes,” I yell.

“This story isn’t a joke. I think it will interest you. The tale is called A NIGHT AT AN INN, by Lord Dunsany. Really a play, to be exact.”

“I want help and you give dramatic criticism,” I gasp. But Fu Groan goes right on, with another smirk.

“It’s about three sailors who steal the eye from an idol—just like this one. The idol comes back and takes his eye, then kills the sailors one by one. How appropriate!”

“How perfectly swell!” I agree, swinging from the chandelier. “Just what I need to cheer me up, too. Grabs for his eye, eh? Well, an eye for an eye, I always say.”

Which is appropriate, after all. Because at this moment the idol of Squat suddenly lunges across the room at Jack Fu Groan and makes a snatch at the rubies with his bronze paws.

FU GROAN notices just in time. He whirls out of the door and slams it shut behind him. The idol runs straight into it, being blind.

I can hear Fu Groan chuckling from the hall.

“Hey!” I mention. “Where are you going?”

“Off to make my fortune,” calls Fu Groan. “I have the rubies now and you have the idol. Fair enough?”

“But what about my cut?” I ask.

“The hundred dollars is your cut,” Fu Groan yells. “Any other cuts you get will come from the idol. Cuts or bruises.”

With a dirty chuckle, Fu Groan scrams down the hall.

And I am left hanging in midair with the idol waiting underneath me.

“Now what do I do?” I groan.

“Yes, whattee do? Whatee do?” says a deep voice.

I stare. There is no one else in the room. Only the idol.

The idol!

Sure enough, the deep voice booms again.

“Whattee do?” it says. “You guy got my eye? Yes? No? Maybe? Perhaps? Could be possibly?”

I can hardly believe my ears. But I see the bronze mouth moving and the voice is coming out through the ivory tusks.

“You can talk!” I whisper. “How come?”

“Why not? I alive, yes?”

Which is as good an answer as any. “Where my eye, you guy?” booms the idol again.

“Haven’t got it, pal,” I tell Squat. “Might as well give up looking for it.”

“How I look for eye when I can’t see?” the idol asks.

“Wait a minute.” I get an idea here. “Maybe I can help you find your eyes if you let me down.”

“You help? Sure, come down one and all. Me no hurt you.”

This is not very good grammar but it sounds sweet to me. I hop down from the chandelier and stand in front of Squat.

"Now listen, squattie old pal," I tell him. "I will help you hunt for the eyes but you can't go out searching like this."

"How you meaning?"

"Well, you're too conspicuous that way. If I can dress you up a little and give you a pair of dark glasses you might pass in a crowd—a drunken crowd, anyway. It's worth trying." Squat takes this all in.

"Then we hunt for guy with eye and I kill him dead to pieces?"

"Sure, sure," I agree. I do not think it is diplomatic to tell Squat I am the guy who filches his pupils from him at this time.

"Let's see what I can find," I suggest.

I WALTZ over to a closet and come back with some of Fu Groan's clothes. Lucky he is a 300-pounder, but even so it is a terrific job to stuff the pants and coat over that bronze body.

Squat squirms around a lot, too, not being used to clothes. But I finally get him down and put shoes on him. Then I get another bright idea. I pull out the glass imitation jewels and stick them into the eye-sockets.

"Can you see now?" I ask.

"Sure," Squat booms. "Pretty dark but I see little bit. Little bit must be you."

I rummage around in the bureau drawer, and come up with a pair of dark glasses which I put over the rubies. Then I come across a toupe of Fu Groan's. I put a little rubber band on it and drape it over the idol's ugly mouth like a mustache, to hide the ivory fangs. It helps.

Squat now looks like a big Chinaman. A half-blind one, maybe. But it's more than I hope for at first.

"There we are," I tell him. "Now we can go out and take a look around. But just remember this—let me do the talking. Wherever we go, you keep your trap shut and do as you're told. We don't want to take any risks."

“I catch you,” says Squat.

“Remember now,” I warn. “Keep quiet.”

This is very nice advice, because the words are no sooner out of my yap when the door suddenly opens.

No, it is not Jack Fu Groan coming back with a change of heart and the rubies.

There is a perfect stranger standing in the doorway.

Or rather, a not so perfect stranger. Fie is dressed like a bum—a particularly sloppy bum. His clothes look like a walking sample display for a ragpicker. The personality himself is as thin as restaurant soup and twice as muddy in the complexion.

But he smiles at me very sweetly and digs into a pocket.

“My card,” he says. “Oh, dear, I have mislaid my calling card.”

He looks more like he mislaid his sandwich board to me. I do not comment, though. He runs his hands through his pockets—all the way through because of the holes—and then he smiles again. Very apologetic.

“It doesn’t matter,” he chirps. “You probably know who I am anyway. My name is Jerkfinkle. Otis Jerkfinkle.”

“Otis Jerkfinkle,” I repeat. “No, I don’t know you.”

“But you are Mr. Fu Groan, are you not?”

“Yes,” I say. “I am not.”

“Too bad,” says this Jerkfinkle. “I must find Mr. Fu Groan at once. I’m a curator, you know.”

“Good,” I tell him. “I’m a creditor, myself.”

JERKFINKLE stares at Squat in his new clothes.

“That isn’t Mr. Fu Groan, by any chance?” he inquires.

“No squeakee English,” booms the idol.

“Sorry, brother,” I say, pushing Otis Jerkfinkle out of the room. “Some other time.”

“It’s frightfully important,” he insists. “I’m trying to tell you I’m a curator and—”

“Well if he needs any curating done I’ll tell him,” I snap. And slam the door.

Then I turn around and face Squat. This takes a lot of doing because he is one depressing sight with his dark glasses, his false mustache, and his bronze skin sticking out from the ends of the coat and trousers.

I wish I can figure out some way to get rid of him. In the first place, I do not wish to spend the rest of my life playing nursemaid to a half-blind living statue. And in the second place, if he ever finds out I am the guy who takes his rubies I will probably spent the rest of my life dead.

It is a terrific problem, but I must shake him loose somehow.

Then I get my inspiration.

Gorilla Gab face!

Here is a character who can dispose of almost anybody. He is the lug who runs a pool hall down the street. He also runs alky, a counterfeiting machine, and anything else you can think of that is more ill than legal.

Ordinarily I stay very far away from Gorilla Gabface and his kind of business affairs, because I am personally very honest ever since I get my diploma from the reform school.

But this is a very special case, and it calls for a fink without too many ethics. So Gorilla Gabface is just the guy, because he thinks ethics is the name of an automobile they make about fifteen years ago.

I make up my mind and motion to Squat.

“Come on, let’s go.”

He pounds across the floor with his bronze feet.

“Quiet now,” I warn him. “Hang onto me. Remember—follow me and keep your trap shut.”

“No yap from trap,” he grunts. And holding on to my arm, he lumbers out of the chop suey palace and trails after me down the street.

IN SUCH a neighborhood as this nobody pays him much attention. We walk over to the pool parlor in a few minutes.

"Wait here," I suggest, leaving Squat standing on the sidewalk.

I go inside. There are the usual assortment of rats around but I do not see the big cheese himself. So I walk over and poke a character in the short ribs.

"Where's Gabface?" I inquire.

He gives me a look I can do without.

"Don't be dumb!" he snaps. "Where would Gabface be with the big match coming off tonight?"

"What big match?" says I. "Is he getting ready to give somebody the hotfoot?"

"The wrestling match, of course," the guy tells me. "Gabface is over at the gym now training his boy."

All this is strictly a news broadcast to me.

But I figure there is nothing to do but scram back outside, pick up Squat, and head for the gymnasium.

To slice a long story thin, this is just the course of action I take. Ten minutes later I am walking into Liniment Louie's Gymnasium—No Women Allowed, No Smoking, No Holds Barred.

And there, sitting next to the ring, is Gorilla Gabface and Liniment Louie. They are jabbering away at each other a mile a minute, and for a while they do not even notice me.

Finally I attract Gorilla Gabface's attention by dropping a quarter on the floor. When he dives for it I step on his fingers and he looks up.

"It's me—Lefty Feep!" I tell him.

He glares.

"Go away, I'm in conference," he says.

"What's the matter, Gabface? I want to talk to you."

"Can't be bothered. I'm all tied up with this promoter."

He points at Liniment Louie. This puzzles me, because Liniment Louie is not much of a promoter—in fact he looks like he doesn't even promote a square meal for a long time.

“What’s all this about a wrestling match?” I ask.

Gabface sneers. “What do you care? Ain’t I got enough troubles as it is without telling them to you all over again? Isn’t it tough enough that I got a big money fight on tonight and the finest wrestler in the world is under contract to me?”

“That doesn’t sound so bad,” I say. “Well it is,” snarls Gabface. “The match is tonight, see? And my boy is in swell shape, see? Only I can’t get anybody to wrestle with him, see? The other guy backed down, see? And that leaves me in the hole, see?”

I can’t see, because he is jabbing me in the eye with his finger.

But I can think—plenty fast.

THIS changes my plans. I suddenly take a good look at Squat, standing over in the corner where I leave him. And the idea comes to me.

“Say,” I get out. “That is why I come to see you. I got an opponent for your wrestler.”

“You got a what for what?”

A new voice says this. I turn around and look up at six feet six of live beef on the hoof. A great big walking pile-driver is grinning down at me. He wears wrestling trunks and a beard.

“Meet Musclebound Morris,” says Gorilla Gabface. “He is my wrestler.”

“A pleasure,” I wince, holding out my hand. Musclebound Morris grabs it very delicately and tries to tear it off my wrist.

“You wanna wrestle me?” asks Musclebound Morris.

“Not me,” I bark hastily. “But I got a Chinese boy to put up against you.”

“Put him up and I’ll throw him down,” says Morris. “Where is he?”

“Over there,” I say, pointing at Squat. Gabface and Louie and Musclebound Morris all stare at him.

“That fat slob?” sneers Gabface.

“Looks like he’s punchdrunk with those dark glasses,” laughs Louie.

“Who’s the Goon?” chuckles Musclebound Morris.

“That’s who he is,” I yell, hastily. “He’s Billed as the Goon from Rangoon. Best Wrestler in China.”

“I doubt if he could get a half-nelson on a creampuff,” says Gorilla Gabface.

“Half-nelson? Look at those arms and legs! He’s got something new—the double-nelson,” I insist.

“Well,” says Louie. “We gotta get somebody.”

“Why not?” grins Musclebound Morris. “I’ll tie him up into so many knots it’ll take three Boy Scouts to get him loose.”

“How about a little training exhibition now?” asks Gorilla Gabface.

“No,” I say. “He’s all set. What’s the purse?”

“A hundred,” says Gabface.

Ordinarily I would haggle a little, but I am hot to get this opportunity. So I say “OK by me,” and arrange the details. Then I walk out with Squat very happy, because tonight Musclebound Morris wrestles the Goon from Rangoon. And unless I miss my guess, I will not be bothered with the living statue any more.

But I miss my guess.

I miss it that night at the wrestling match.

WE GET there early. I buy a pair of trunks for Squat and get him in his dressing room. Outside of that I tell him nothing.

“I fightee tonightee?” he asks.

“Sure,” I tell him. But I don’t issue any instructions or bulletins. I want him to stay as clumsy as ever, and I know that he can’t see more than ten feet.

So I am very happy when I push him into the ring and the announcer tells the crowd about the main bout between Musclebound Morris and the Goon from Rangoon.

That is the last happiness I have this evening. Because the bell rings, Musclebound and the Goon come out from their corners, and the fight is on.

Musclebound comes out fast.

He goes back faster.

Musclebound comes out again.

He goes back again.

I rub my eyes. What is happening?

It is very simple. The bronze idol of Squat just stands in the center of the ring. He can't see Musclebound until he gets close. When he does spot him, he just lifts up one foot and kicks Musclebound in the breadbasket. And the bronze hoof just naturally knocks Musclebound way back into the corner.

The crowd yells and so do I.

Now Musclebound takes a new position. He comes in ducking. But Squat is ready for him. He picks Musclebound Morris up in his bronze arms and waltzes around for a minute. Then he gets tired of that and starts to squint around. He is looking for something—what, I don't know.

Then I do know. He is merely wondering where he should throw him. He picks a spot about forty feet away and lets fly. Two hundred and fifty pounds of champion wrestler goes hurling across the heads of the crowd and lands right in the balcony seats.

"Hey!" squawked the referee.

Squat looks around, startled, and sees the referee behind him. Naturally, since I tell him nothing, he doesn't understand. The referee is just another wrestler to him. And being lighter, the referee sails sixty feet and lands in the gallery.

"Cut that out!" Gorilla Gabface yells this advice, climbing through the ropes. Squat heads for him with his bronze arms lunging. He makes one single swoop and scoops up Gabface on the run. He starts to swing him out.

"Stop!" I yell through the ropes.

SQUAT is a very obedient personality.

He stops right where he is, and drops Gorilla Gabface on his dome. He drops him kind of hard, because Gabface's head goes right through the canvas floor of the ring. The rest of him is stuck and just wriggles in the air.

It looks very funny, but not to the crowd. They are screaming and yelling and a couple of the boys down front are getting ready to climb into the ring.

I grab Squat's hand fast.

"Come on, we've got to run!" I yelp. And we do. Down the aisle and out of the joint, with the mob at our heels.

"Whatsee?" pants Squat. "Don't me fightee tonightee all rightee?"

"You damn near cookee my goosee," I tell him. "Run faster, you big Goon!"

We hotfoot outside just in time. I dash around the nearest corner. There is a cab waiting.

"In here," I pant. We climb in. The cab moves off.

"Driver," I call. "Take us to—"

"He knows where to go," says a soft voice.

I turn around.

Jack Fu Groan is smiling at me.

There is a revolver in his hand, and the revolver is not smiling. It is just looking at me quite hard with its black little eye.

"That's right," says Jack Fu Groan. "Sit very still. And tell your idol companion to sit still, too. No wrestling or funny business, or I'll fill your teeth with lead."

I do not go for this suggestion about amateur dentistry, so I sit still and tell Squat to do the same.

"How come?" I ask, as the cab moves along.

"I see the announcement in the paper and I realize who the Goon from Rangoon must be," says Jack Fu Groan.

"That I can figure out," I reply. "But what do you want with Squat?" I inquire. "You tell me to take him away."

"Take away a million dollars? You are so ludicrously absurd as to appear foolishly ridiculous," smiles Fu Groan. "A million dollars?"

"Perhaps. Some large sum like that. That is what Mr. Otis Jerkfinkle is prepared to offer."

"Jerkfinkle? The guy who looks for you and claims to be a curator?"

"Exactly. Otis Jerkfinkle is the curator of a wealthy private museum. Learning that I have this collection of oriental art treasures, he is seeking me out to offer a vast amount of money explicitly for the idol of the god Squat. So I fear I must take Squat off your hands once more, after all."

ABOUT this time we pull up in front of the chop suey joint and get out in the alley. The cabbie can't see the revolver, but I can—so I stand very still, and so does Squat.

We go inside to the little room in back once more. I walk in and Fu Groan follows me. Squat stands outside.

"You get Squat, so why must I squat?" I object. "Let me go now."

"After I make a call to Jerkfinkle and seal the arrangement," purrs Jack Fu Groan. "Meanwhile you will stay here and guard these."

He pulls out the rubies and lays them on the table.

Then he goes out.

"Squat stays outside," he tells me.

"Why not bring the statue in here while I'm waiting?" I cleverly suggest.

He smiles. "No, my friend. You know the old saying—'the devil finds work for idol hands to do.' Farewell."

And he runs out, locking the door after him.

I hear whispering in the hall, then silence.

"Come on, Squat!" I yell through the door. "Break the lock and let me out."

No answer.

"Squat—let me out of here!"

All at once I hear a deep booming laugh.

"No out for you," chuckles Squat. "I guard you hard. Man tellee me who you be. You guy who steals my eyes. Pretty soon he come back. Make you put in my eyes. Then I kill you thief stealer into little pieces. Sit down again forever. You eyeball sneaker!"

“But we’re pals, Squat!” I coax. “Don’t I let you wrestle, and everything?”

“You give me eyes, I wrestle you pretty soon. I wrestle you pretty dead.”

I shudder. Shudder and stare at the rubies.

The big jewels glow up at me, flashing and full of fire. They gaze at me like eyes. Squat’s eyes.

They wink. Wink at me. Like the old double-cross. Because that’s what I’m getting. The old double-cross.

I THINK of what’s waiting for me out there—that bronze idol, huge and terrible, with its big arms and long fangs. It might talk funny, but there’s nothing funny about its actions. It’s a demon. And it’s out to get me. Damn its eyes, anyhow!

Its eyes—I stare at the rubies again.

But there isn’t much time for any staring. Fu Groan moves fast.

Before I know it he is back. Still alone except for his little friend, the revolver. And, of course, Squat.

Squat comes in with him. Fu Groan shuts the door.

“Now can I go?” I gulp.

He smiles. It’s the double-cross all right.

“Just one thing more, Mr. Feep,” he tells me. “Naturally, the deal I make with Jerkfinkle presupposes that the idol has its original ruby eyes. So if you don’t mind putting them back, then—?”

Why should I mind? All it means is I get killed. I tell Fu Groan so.

“I will kill you now if you don’t do it,” Fu Groan reminds me. And pokes me in the back with the revolver.

So I take off Squat’s clothes and take out the glass imitation jewels. I pull off the mustache and Squat is once more a bronze idol—a living bronze idol, with empty eye-sockets.

His mouth is open and I see the tusks gleaming there. His hands are clenching and unclenching in anticipation.

My mouth is open, too, but I am gasping through it. My hands just tremble in anticipation.

"Get the rubies," says Fu Groan.

"Give me eyes," booms the idol, massacre you in a hurry, plenty fast.

"Ulp!" I suggest.

"Get the rubies," Fu Groan snaps.

So I go over and pick up the rubies. Then I march back very slowly and put the left one in. I fix it into place quite carefully.

"The other one, please," says Fu Groan.

"But—"

"Now!" he growls.

I place the right eye in its socket, also very carefully.

Then I step back.

FOR a minute the idol just stands there. All at once, with the rubies in place, it does not look funny any more. It looks majestic—like a bronze god. It is a bronze god. A living bronze god with ruby eyes.

A rumble sounds in its chest.

The head swings around.

Then the feet move. The arms reach out. It gives a brazen shriek and reaches for its prey.

Fu Groan.

He has time for only one squeal. Then the metal claws close around his fat neck. There is a snap. He falls down to the floor.

I blink.

The idol of the god Squat is just standing there. It slumps forward, sits down. The hands fold. The mouth opens. And all at once it is only a statue again. A bronze, squatting statue. And the blazing rubies are smoky once more. Smoky and dead. Squat isn't alive at all.

Neither is Fu Groan.

But I am.

That is why I run like hell out of the place. On the way to the door I bump into Otis Jerkfinkle.

“Looking for a statue?” I gasp.

He nods.

“Right back there.” I point to him I and then keep on running. And I don’t stop until I get home.

Since that night I have nothing to do with Chinese stuff—food or anything else. Because the idol nearly makes a chop suey of me, myself.

LEFTY FEEP finished his saga and sat back.

“Quite an adventure,” I commented.

He nodded.

“You know, the surprise to me is that you can take any nourishment at all,” I told him.

“Why is that a surprise?” Feep asked.

“Well, didn’t you say that when Fu Groan got back and made you put the rubies in, the idol was going to kill you?”

“I say it looks that way. But it works out so it doesn’t look that way.”

“How about explaining?” I asked.

Feep shrugged. “Why do you wish to know?”

“Oh, call it idol curiosity,” I said.

He grinned.

“All right. Like I say, I get the idea I am being double-crossed. Which turns out to be true. So I pull a little cross on Fu Groan.”

“How, Lefty?” I inquired.

“Well there I am locked up in the room with the rubies. I am waiting for Fu Groan to get back and make me put them into Squat’s eye-sockets so he can see me and kill me.

“So there is only one thing left for me to do. I take a chisel I find lying there and change the facets on the jewels a little.

“Then when I put the eyes in the idol it grabs Fu Groan instead of me.”

“But why?” I persisted. “What did you do to the jewels? Why should chipping away the facets make such a difference? Did you make the idol blind?”

“No,” said Lefty Feep. “When he gets his ruby eyes in he can see things all right. But he grabs Fu Groan instead of me just the same. I chisel the rubies that way, catch on? It’s all the old cross, see?”

I gasped. “You mean you—?”

“Exactly,” said Lefty Feep. “He isn’t blind when he grabs Fu Groan instead of me. But boy—is he crosseyed!”

THE END

The Machine That Changed History

The time-machine had been tested and approved by the best scientists and physicists in the Reich; Geopolitik had mapped out plans for its use. But Hitler had his own personal ideas on how this machine could change history—and in a sense, he was right; it did change history!

"VICTORY!" The word had re-sounded through the halls of Berchtesgaden before. But this time they carried a new meaning, for they came from the lips of Adolf Hitler.

The sallow little man standing before him in the private apartment smiled humbly.

"I am pleased and honored that the Fuehrer approves of my work," he whispered, huskily. "If the Fuehrer desires, I can explain the principles on which my time-chamber operates."

Hitler's hand rose to command silence.

"Your theories? My dear Schultz, your theories do not matter. Your time-machine has been inspected, tested, and approved by the most eminent physicists and scientists in the Reich. We of the Reich are thorough. If your claims were not founded in truth, you would not now be my guest in Berchtesgaden."

Adolf Hitler rose, leaned forward. "Ah, no, I do not concern myself with your theories of invention. It is enough that you have achieved the seemingly impossible. You have constructed a working model of a machine capable of transporting men or objects through time itself."

"Yes—"

Hitler's frown cut off the sallow inventor's reply.

"It means victory, do you understand? Victory!"

He advanced across the room to the vast, gleaming silver shell which rested weirdly in the center. His fingers rose to press against the metal surface.

"We of the Reich move swiftly, Schultz," he whispered. "Already the Geopolitik has prepared for me a complete documentary survey of the potentialities inherent in this remarkable invention. It shall be of invaluable assistance to us in the days to come."

Schultz smiled.

"I too have dreamed," he murmured. "We could build many hundreds of these and with them move forward or backwards in time as we willed. We could attack—"

Hitler shook his head.

"The expense is too great. Besides, I have other plans. Plans I mean to execute swiftly. Which reminds me. You have the documents concerning this invention of yours?"

Schultz nervously proffered his briefcase.

"The method of operation is simple. A child could master the controls. Mathematical calculations are almost unnecessary, due to the principles of spatial inhibition embodied in the construction."

"In other words, it is all here in this briefcase—all that is essential to the building and operation of the time-chambers?"

"That is correct."

Hitler smiled.

"Then, Herr Schultz, our little interview is at an end."

His hand went to a buzzer.

The black-shirted man entered quietly. He took Schultz by the arm and ushered him out.

"Heil Hitler!"

Hitler nodded. "Germany will not forget your contribution, Schultz," he said.

THE door closed. Hitler sat alone in the room, staring at the briefcase, then at the silver chamber of the time-traveller.

He pressed a buzzer on the intercommunications system.

"Kellzer? Bauer has taken Schultz. He has his orders. Dispose of the body quickly. Notify his relatives of the accident as planned."

He released his finger. Again Hitler sat back, his stare intensified. Again he sounded the buzzer.

"Kellzer? Send Eglitz to me at once. Eglitz. Gestapo staff. The linguist."

Within a space of a few minutes, young Karl Eglitz clicked his heels smartly before the Fuehrer's desk. "Heil Hitler."

"Eglitz—you have heard of what has been going on?"

"The Fuehrer refers to this Schultz person and his invention?"

"Yes."

"I assisted in drawing up the report on it."

"Good. Then you understand. Eglitz—do you think you could operate this machine?"

"I do."

"Eglitz—do you speak French?"

"The Fuehrer must know that I have lived in France."

"So." Hitler was silent for a moment. "Eglitz—I have heard good reports of your character and ability. You are a reliable man." He paused. "I have a mission for such a man."

"I am honored."

"It is a mission of the utmost importance, and as such it is extremely confidential. No one will know of it but the two of us."

"The Fuehrer forgets that the Geopolitik knows of the uses to which the machine will be put."

"Wrong, Eglitz. This is a mission of my own—one that the Geopolitik never dreamed of. Eglitz, I have conceived of a use for this time-chamber which will stagger humanity. And you shall carry it out!

"It is a mission that will win the war—win the world! It embodies an idea so stunning in its impact that even I, whose inspiration conceived it, am humbled before it."

"The Fuehrer can trust me."

"Then listen, Eglitz. Listen to the mission I have planned for you. Listen intently."

Hitler whispered. Eglitz listened. His mechanical smile never left his face, but as the Fuehrer continued, a little gasp rose involuntarily from his throat. Beads of moisture appeared upon his forehead. His hands clenched. And still Hitler whispered on.

"So. That is your mission, Eglitz. Do you think you can carry it out?" The Gestapo man's voice quavered. "I—might," he managed. "It will take several days of preparation. Research. I must find out when he was in Cologne. We must take the machine there, too. I must study documents pertaining to his daily routine, pick a time."

"The resources of the Reich are yours to command," Hitler answered. "You must not fail. If you succeed, we shall triumph beyond our wildest dreams."

"I shall prepare." Eglitz backed towards the door.

"Heil Hitler."

Hitler sat alone once more, smiling still. Suddenly he rose and walked to a corner ledge.

A little bronze bust rested there—the head of a stout man with piercing eyes; a man whose hanging forelock rested on a majestic brow.

Hitler stared at the bronze head and his smile widened.

"They say you were master of Destiny, too," he whispered. "But I wonder if you ever dreamed of an enterprise as great as this? An enterprise defying space and time? You crossed the Alps—but I cross centuries. Napoleon, the world will soon learn you have a master!"

The time-chamber, the bronze bust, and the ruler of Germany stood motionless in the twilight while Destiny wove a web to enshroud them all.

THE smile had not faded from Adolf Hitler’s face before the wavering outlines of the metal chamber disappeared from sight. The room in Hitler’s Cologne headquarters still pulsed with the humming vibrations of the time-chamber. Eglitz had entered it and disappeared. And now the chamber had disappeared.

For a moment there was nothingness. Then slowly the blurring contours of the silver machine materialized, looming irrationally out of the air in the way a slide specimen emerges from a blank microscopic field. The humming vibration increased as the chamber solidified. Then came silence.

Hitler strode forward abruptly. “Something has gone wrong,” he rasped. “A mistake—”

The compartment door opened slowly in the silver side. The tall figure of Eglitz emerged stooping through the doorway. Eglitz drew himself erect in formal salute.

“Heil Hitler.”

Adolf Hitler stared in astonishment. Eglitz had changed. His usual uniform was gone. Instead he wore a gaudy scarlet coat with green pipings, and his braided yellow trousers were tucked into shiny black boots. A sword dangled from an elaborate scabbard fastened about his waist by a white sash. In one hand he carried a bushy black busby with a green cockade. Moreover, his usual smooth-shaven countenance had disappeared under an imposing false mustache which quite dwarfed Hitler’s own.

“Eglitz—back so soon?”

“Surely the Fuehrer realizes I have been absent a week?”

“A week? Are you raving, imbecile? You have been gone less than ten seconds.”

“Time—a week to me, ten seconds to the Fuehrer. It is relative, as Einstein has it—”

"Do not mention that person's name," Hitler scowled. Then, "Speak up, man! What of your mission? Did you get there? Was he there? Did you bring him?" Hitler's voice quivered with frantic impatience.

"I am pleased to report to the Fuehrer that, according to instructions, I arrived at the Imperial Palace at Cologne on July sixth, 1807, at 9:15 p. m. In keeping with my orders, I assumed the disguise of military attache of the Grand Army—"

"Where is he?"

Hitler's voice was a knife.

"I am here."

THE low tones came from the throat of the man in the doorway of the time-chamber.

Hitler stared.

The short, stocky figure descended. Hitler stared into the swarthy, fleshy face, stared at the majestic brow and the hanging forelock, stared into the deep-set, burning eyes of "Napoleon Bonaparte, Emperor of the French!"

He whispered the words.

The little man inclined his head. "Indeed, sire. And you are—"

"Reichsfuehrer Adolf Hitler."

Two hands clasped. A fat, pudgy hand, and a lean, limp one. Two hands clasped—hands that had held the earth and crushed it, each in their time. Two hands clasped across the centuries. The hands of Napoleon and Hitler. Hands that wrote history.

Eglitz stood there, gaping.

Hitler turned.

"Eglitz—I'd forgotten about you. You may go now. You deserve a rest after your journey to secure our distinguished guest."

"The Fuehrer is kind. I assure the Fuehrer that my task was not easy. This Fouche, the Emperor's Chief of Police, has a system equal to our own Gestapo. In order to—ah—abduct the Emperor—"

"I've no time for that now, Eglitz. You may go. Germany will not forget your contribution, Eglitz."

"Heil Hitler."

Eglitz left.

Hitler's hand went to a buzzer. "Kellzer? Eglitz has just left my apartment. Send two troopers and place him under arrest. No, not the camp. Treason trial. He must be disposed of within the hour. That is all."

Hitler turned again to face his visitor.

"So," he breathed. "You are here." Of the two, Napoleon was more at ease.

"So I observe."

"You are calm."

"Resigned, let us say."

"This must be a strange experience for you."

"I am accustomed to the unusual. Besides, your aide—this Eglitz, is it not?—told me much on the voyage. Despite the fact that he knocked me over the head; virtually kidnapped me as it were, I bear him no ill will. He seemed both friendly and intelligent."

"He was—is," Hitler agreed.

"He told me much of interest. This is 1942, is it not? So much seems to have happened. Naturally, I am still a bit confused as to the reasons for all this."

"Allow me to explain," Hitler urged.

Napoleon smiled.

"Very well. Your french, sire, is somewhat—rusty."

"Perhaps. But I could not risk an interpreter for what I am going to tell you. Please be seated."

EMPEROR and Dictator, seated at a table in the quiet room. Emperor, Dictator, and the time-chamber. Bridge between two worlds of war. The room that had hummed to the vibrations of a machine which defied space and time now held the whisper of voices whose echos had shaken continents.

"And so you see, that is why I brought you here." Hitler was hoarse from his hour-long monologue. "I am the master of my world. You were the master of yours. Together we can exercise twice the power." Napoleon nodded.

"Besides," Hitler murmured, "I need you. I would admit that to no living man. But I need your knowledge of military science—and the inspired genius behind it. I have made—mistakes. Mistakes which must be rectified."

Again the voice droned on, as darkness deepened. From time to time the two men rose and consulted maps, charts, documentary material which was brought from the other rooms.

It was nearly midnight when the two weary men faced one another across the long table.

"But there must be some solution," Hitler sighed.

"Your military position is perilous," Napoleon answered. "What is worse, that position is irrevocable. It cannot be changed." Imperial shoulders shrugged. "It was useless for you to send for me. I had best go back to my own day and place. I tell you frankly—your offer of joint partnership in this war is enticing, but it leads only to a hopeless end."

"You must help me," Hitler grated. "You must! You are Napoleon!"

"Yes. I am Napoleon. But I cannot change what exists," answered the Little Corporal, sadly.

Then his head jerked up.

"Wait. There is our solution!"

A pudgy finger stabbed towards the time-chamber.

"What do you mean? Are you mad?"

"No madder than you, Sire, when you sent your aide to kidnap me through time. My solution is simple. Attend.

"As we have seen, your difficulties began at the outset of this war. In September, 1939. You missed the opportunity to invade England. You did not check Russia. You failed in your mission in the United States.”

“But that is past—over two years ago. It is too late to change.”

“Is it? Why can’t we enter the time-chamber and return to 1939? Return to July of that year and plan the war anew for September?”

Hitler was on his feet.

“Could we—dare we—?”

“You want the world? Very well, we can obtain it. If you have the courage to make the journey. Once in 1939 we can rectify your previous errors, anticipate the others. Profit by experience. The war will be waged properly then, with you and me in command.”

Blurred voices in a midnight room. Blurred figures moving towards the silver machine. A nightmare vision in a nightmare world. Napoleon, Hitler, and a time-machine.

And then—only an empty room, after all. The machine was gone. Somewhere in the reaches of infinity, two dictators sped back to remould the past. The earth trembled in anticipation.

IT was Napoleon who handled the controls. The pudgy fingers of Bonaparte, ex-lieutenant of artillery, mastered the intricacies of the machine’s working parts.

His interest in the principles of operating the chamber had almost exceeded his curiosity regarding the operations of the war itself. But Hitler had been patient. After all, a visitor so distinguished must be humored. And if Napoleon chose to guide the time-chamber, it was well. He, Hitler, had chosen to guide the destinies of the world instead.

So they sat there, in the curiously vibrating metal shell. Napoleon’s hands moved over the silver surface of the panels in silent concentration. Hitler’s hands twisted nervously in his lap.

There was silence, save for the humming vibration—the silence of two men moving through the unknown, the unnameable; twisting through time on a mission to remould the fate of the world.

Just two men—but two men unlike any of the myriad billions who had preceded them on the face of earth. Two men, each of whom in his time had remoulded the face of the earth; remoulded it with ruthless surgery that left it torn and bleeding.

Never two such men before, and never such a journey. . . .

Something of the import must have occurred to them both as they sat there waiting for the vibrations to cease. For they glanced at one another suddenly, and their eyes met.

The eyes of Hitler met the eyes of Napoleon, somewhere within the emptiness of space and time. Met and mingled in a flaming resolve. It was the Fuehrer who addressed the Emperor.

“In just a moment,” he whispered, “we shall arrive. And the work will begin. It was meant to be. You and I—our greatness is such that Fate itself has willed our union. Your sun and my star shall rise together in the heavens.”

It was the voice of the mystic that rose above the humming; the voice of megalomania triumphant.

“Perhaps?” Bonaparte echoed. His dark eyes were filmed with sudden wonderment. “And yet I wonder if man can cheat his Fate?”

“I am Fate.” The harsh voice of the Fuehrer rose. “As you shall see.” His hand rose, extended. “Master of the world, and now master of time and space itself! We have gone far since your day, Napoleon. Your armies would be blasted to bits by a single panzer division. But you’ve seen that. You know how death can leap from the skies, or hurtle through the air from a hundred miles away. You know how death creeps on, above, and under the seas. You know how entire continents may be ravished by the flaming breath of war.”

Napoleon smiled. “I too have made speeches,” he declared, sardonically. “But perhaps I have learned to regret some of the deeds accompanying them.”

“I do not regret and I shall not regret,” Hitler retorted. “We are returning to 1939. This time there shall be no errors. England shall be invaded swiftly.

And France shall—"

He checked himself in time. A frown had appeared on the Little Corporal's forehead. Did the fool suspect? No. How could he? He did not know what had happened to France. He had been taken from Germany in 1807 to Germany in 1942. He didn't know—but Hitler worried about the frown.

"And France?" Napoleon echoed softly. "What of France?"

"France shall share its rightful place with Germany," Hitler amended, hastily.

THE frown disappeared. In its place came a slow smile. For some reason Hitler didn't like the smile any better.

"That is well," answered the Emperor. "France shall hold its rightful place, yes."

Hitler was silent. His thoughts raced swiftly. In a moment they would arrive—arrive in 1939. It would be late summer again. He and Napoleon would enter into council. The war would be plotted afresh; with Hitler's memories of two years to come as an aid. Napoleon would be helpful with strategy, extremely helpful. His unbiased viewpoint would aid in pointing out various weaknesses even Hitler and his staff might overlook.

And then, the war. Hitler's war. For he had decided finally. When Napoleon's work was over, he must go. Hitler didn't trust his frown or his smile. The fool would never stand for what would happen to France. He'd be disposed of—this self-styled Emperor.

Hitler's dream of triumph glittered in his eyes. What a final irony! Men had always compared him to Napoleon. Thought it a compliment when they termed him an equal. Well, Hitler would be superior to the French conqueror. His greatest victory.

"Wait! Do you feel that?"

Napoleon's voice cut through Hitler's meditations.

"I think we've arrived."

Yes. The vibrations were diminishing. The humming and droning within the metal chamber slackened. In a moment there was a curious little bump —not a physically-felt bump, but a sort of shifting and settling sensation in the consciousness of both men. As though they had been spinning in a void and suddenly set down on something solid.

“Yes—we’re here!”

Napoleon rose. His pompous little body moved towards the compartment door. Hitler followed. Now his smile was broad. Napoleon couldn’t see him. Instead he led the way—led the way to Hitler’s triumph and his own doom.

The door swung open as the Emperor’s fingers moved over the bolts and handles. Napoleon stood on the threshold, breathed deeply. Then he clambered out.

Hitler moved forward swiftly. He could hardly wait. To emerge again on the eve of victory—

Hitler stepped out.

Into the arms of two waiting guards.

“Hold this man!”

Napoleon’s voice barked the order.

Hitler struggled in the grip of giant hands.

“What is this? Why—”

He stared upwards into the mustached visages of two Grenadiers. They were huge shakos and gaudy green uniforms. The uniforms of Napoleon’s troops!

Hitler’s eyes roved wildly about the great chamber in which the machine rested. It was a court apartment—luxuriantly appointed in the styles of Napoleon’s day.

And standing before him, no longer an incongruous figure, but with the air of a master in his own time and place, was Napoleon.

Again Hitler saw the smile on the lips of the Emperor.

HITLER heard his voice through a swirling mist.

"We are here, Adolf Hitler—but in a time and place of my own choosing. The hour has arrived—but it is the hour of my destiny, not yours!

"We have returned to the day on which you abducted me. We are in Cologne, in my German palace, in 1807."

"But—"

Again Hitler saw the smile and shuddered. Napoleon advanced and whispered.

"You fool! Did you believe I would forsake my own destiny for yours? I handled the controls—and I set them for this day again. I want to live my own life, complete the mission of conquest on which I embarked. So I have returned to my own time."

Hitler's head whirled. He temporized swiftly.

"But you and I—we could have ruled a greater world together—I offered you everything—"

"Adolf Hitler, I do not want your kind of world." The Emperor's voice rose to a knell of doom. "Your aide, the man who brought me to you, was careless. He let hints slip on the journey through time. He told me what you did to my France."

"France?"

"Did you think I was fooled? No, I knew all along. You and your hordes trampled over my land, ravaged it. And I swore to avenge my country. I shall do so, in my own way.

"Hitler, I am a warrior, a conqueror. But I am not a mad butcher! And I do not intend to unleash you once again upon my people.

"You and your crazy theories of racial superiority—of men who must kill like beasts in order to live! I am going to save France and the world from you."

Hitler wet his cracked lips. "What are you going to do?" he whispered.

Napoleon gestured curtly.

"Guards—place this man back in the machine."

The Grenadiers dragged the Fuehrer across the floor. His face was ashen. His voice rose to entreaty. “What are you going to do?”

Napoleon shrugged.

“There is no place here in my world for your kind. There is no place in the world to come—1939 or 1942, or any year. There never will be a place again for men with your debased dreams!

“In all the ages, I know of only one time when the world would welcome your vile ideas. There you must go, to a world where the weak perish and only the strong survive. And I wish you joy!”

They were inside the chamber now. Napoleon’s hands were moving over the controls. A tinkling sound splintered the silence.

“What was that?”

Napoleon turned.

“I have smashed the adjustment dials,” he announced. “You are embarked on a one-way journey.”

The guards backed out of the compartment. Napoleon followed. He stood in the metal doorway before closing the door.

“Goodbye, Adolf Hitler,” he murmured. “You are going to seek your rightful destiny at last.”

Hitler rose with a snarl, lunged forward.

But the iron door of the time-chamber clanged hollowly in his face. And a humming rose to mingle with Hitler’s anguished scream.

THE humming rose and rose. It filled Hitler’s head, throbbed through it. It was a dark drone, filling his brain with the black muttering of doom.

Hitler lay in the darkness while fear pulsed through his being. Lay there for endless eons, lay there for an eternity—as he sped through eons and eternity alike.

But when the humming finally subsided, he had conquered his dread.

He sat up sharply when he felt the curious adjustment sensation which meant the time-chamber had arrived. Hitler drew a deep breath.

He was here.

Napoleon had done it. The controls were beyond repair. He was here, and he'd face the future unafraid.

Napoleon had outwitted him, yes. But no use crying over spilt milk. The Emperor was crafty—but a fool, for all that! He was back again in 1807, strutting across the stage of history, playing the tyrant—but Hitler knew what Napoleon did not know. Knew that there was a Waterloo lying ahead for the Emperor in eight short years. What sweet revenge! That long exile ahead!

And he, Hitler, had been exiled. But he could still mould his future freshly, in whatever time he found himself.

Hitler smiled grimly. Yes. Napoleon forgot that he, Adolf Hitler, could shape his own destiny. Hadn't he risen from humble house-painter to mighty warlord in the complexity of the modern world? Well, with his brain and vision, his knowledge of men and the future, he could start again.

He wondered where Napoleon had sent him.

"Where the weak perish and only the strong survive." That might be ancient Rome. Barbarian times. Well, that was hardly a sad fate. He'd learn. He'd make adjustments. He knew men and he knew History. Wherever it was, Adolf Hitler could always rule in a world where strength ruled over weakness.

He rose, stepped to the chamber. He unbolted it slowly, pushed it open. He drew another deep breath. The fresh air was sweet and clean.

Smiling, Adolf Hitler stepped out onto a grassy sward. His eyes blinked in the sunlight.

He stood on a hillside which rose like a grassy island amidst a sea of lush vegetation, Why, it was like a tropical forest!

Blinking again, he walked across the turf. The ground was soft, almost steaming with moisture beneath his feet.

Where was he? In what time did he exist? Where were the cities of Germany, the people?

Hitler shook his head. His vision cleared.

Then he saw them emerge from the forest at his right. They came swiftly. He wheeled in panic.

Too late! The others were creeping up on him from the rear, cutting off his return to the door of the time-chamber.

Adolf Hitler stood surrounded by a ring—a ring of advancing figures. He stared at the figures and understood Napoleon's parting words at last.

He stared at a band of ape-like shamblers—shamblers that had only the faces of men. Their shaggy bodies were covered with long, yellowish fur. Blonde fur. They were powerful, grinning in their strength. And their deep, chuckling laughter was filled with hatred—the hatred of the strong for the weak.

Strong. Blonde. Brutes living in a time where he could find his rightful destiny—

As the monsters closed in on him, Adolf Hitler's screams rose from the little forest hillside in the Stone Age.

THE END

Yours Truly—Jack the Ripper

The greatest monster of all time still lives! He's here, among us—leaving his signature in blood. . . .

I LOOKED at the stage Englishman. He looked at me.

"Sir Guy Hollis?" I asked.

"Indeed. Have I the pleasure of addressing John Carmody, the psychiatrist?"

I nodded. My eyes swept over the figure of my distinguished visitor. Tall, lean, sandy-haired—with the traditional tufted mustache. And the tweeds. I suspected a monocle concealed in a vest pocket, and wondered if he'd left his umbrella in the outer office.

But more than that, I wondered what the devil had impelled Sir Guy Hollis of the British Embassy to seek out a total stranger here in Chicago.

Sir Guy didn't help matters any as he sat down. He cleared his throat, glanced around nervously, tapped his pipe against the side of the desk. Then he opened his mouth.

"What do you think of London?" he said.

"Why—"

"I'd like to discuss London with you, Mr. Carmody."

I meet all kinds. So I merely smiled, sat back, and gave him his head.

"Have you ever noticed anything strange about that city?" he asked.

"Well, the fog is famous."

"Yes, the fog. That's important. It usually provides the perfect setting."

"Setting for what?"

Sir Guy Hollis gave me an enigmatic grin.

"Murder," he murmured.

"Murder?"

"Yes. Hasn't it struck you that London, of all cities, has a peculiar affinity for those who contemplate homicide?"

They don't talk that way, except in books. Still, it was an interesting thought. London as an ideal spot for a murder!

"As you mentioned," said Sir Guy, "there is a natural reason for this. The fog is an ideal background. And then too the British have a peculiar attitude in such matters. You might call it their sporting instinct. They regard murder as a sort of a game."

I sat up straight. Here was a theory.

"Yes, I needn't bore you with homicide statistics. The record is there. Aesthetically, temperamentally, the Englishman is interested in crimes of violence.

"A man commits murder. Then the excitement begins. The game starts. Will the criminal outwit the police? You can read between the lines in their newspaper stories. Everybody is waiting to see who will score.

"British law regards a prisoner as guilty until proven innocent. That's their advantage. But first they must catch their prisoner. And London bobbies are not allowed to carry firearms. That's a point for the fugitive. You see? All part of the rules of the game."

I wondered what Sir Guy was driving at. Either a point or a strait-jacket. But I kept my mouth shut and let him continue.

"The logical result of this British attitude toward murder is—Sherlock Holmes," he said.

"Have you ever noticed how popular the theme of murder is in British fiction and drama?"

I smiled. I was back on familiar ground.

"Angel Street," I suggested.

“Ladies in Retirement,” he countered.

“Night Must Fall.”

“Payment Deferred,” I added. “Laburnum Grove, Kind Lady. Love from a Stranger. Portrait of a Man with Red Hair. Black Limelight.”

He nodded. “Think of the motion pictures of Alfred Hitchcock and Emlyn Williams. The actors—Wilfred Lawson and Leslie Banks.”

“Charles Laughton,” I continued for him. “Edmund Gwenn. Basil Rathbone. Raymond Massey. Sir Cedric Hardwicke.”

“You’re quite an expert on this sort of thing yourself,” he told me.

“Not at all,” I smiled. “I’m a psychiatrist.”

THEN I leaned forward. I didn’t change my tone of voice. “All I want to know,” I said sweetly, “is why the hell you come up to my office and discuss murder melodramas with me.”

It stung him. He sat back and blinked a little.

“That isn’t my intention,” he murmured. “No. Not at all. I was just advancing a theory—”

“Stalling,” I said. “Stalling. Come on, Sir Guy—spit it out.”

Talking like a gangster is all a part of the applied psychiatric technique. At least, it worked for me.

It worked this time.

Sir Guy stopped bleating. His eyes narrowed. When he leaned forward again he meant business.

“Mr. Carmody,” he said, “have you ever heard of—Jack the Ripper?”

“The murderer?” I asked.

“Exactly. The greatest monster of them all. Worse than Springheel Jack or Crippen. Jack the Ripper. Red Jack.”

“Eve heard of him,” I said.

“Do you know his history?”

I got tough again. “Listen, Sir Guy,” I muttered. “I don’t think we’ll get any place swapping old wives’ tales about famous crimes of history.”

Another bulls-eye. He took a deep breath.

“This is no old wives’ tale. It’s a matter of life or death.”

He was so wrapped up in his obsession he even talked that way. Well—I was willing to listen. We psychiatrists get paid for listening.

“Go ahead,” I told him. “Let’s have the story.”

Sir Guy lit a cigarette and began to talk.

“London, 1888,” he began. “Late summer and early fall. That was the time. Out of nowhere came the shadowy figure of Jack the Ripper—a stalking shadow with a knife, prowling through London’s East End. Haunting the squalid dives of Whitechapel, Spitalfields. Where he came from no one knew. But he brought death. Death in a knife.

“Six times that knife descended to slash the throats and bodies of London’s women. Drabs and alley sluts. August 7th was the date of the first butchery. They found her body lying there with 39 stab wounds. A ghastly murder. On August 31st, another victim. The press became interested. The slum inhabitants were more deeply interested still.

“Who was this unknown killer who prowled in their midst and struck at will in the deserted alley-ways of night-town? And what was more important—when would he strike again?

“September 8th was the date. Scotland Yard assigned special deputies. Rumors ran rampant. The atrocious nature of the slayings was the subject for shocking speculation.

“The killer used a knife—expertly. He cut throats and removed—certain portions—of the bodies after death. He chose victims and settings with a fiendish deliberation. No one saw him or heard him. But watchmen making their gray rounds in the dawn would stumble across the hacked and horrid thing that was the Ripper’s handiwork.

“Who was he? What was he? A mad surgeon? A butcher? An insane scientist? A pathological degenerate escaped from an asylum? A deranged nobleman? A member of the London police?

“Then the poem appeared in the newspapers. The anonymous poem, designed to put a stop to speculations—but which only aroused public interest to a further frenzy. A mocking little stanza:

I'm not a butcher, I'm not a kid
Nor yet a foreign skipper,
But I'm your own true loving friend,
Yours truly—Jack the Ripper.

"And on September 30th, two more throats were slashed open."

I interrupted Sir Guy for a moment.

"Very interesting," I commented. I'm afraid a faint hint of sarcasm crept into my voice.

HE WINCED, but didn't falter in his narrative.

"There was silence, then, in London for a time. Silence, and a nameless fear. When would Red Jack strike again? They waited through October. Every figment of fog concealed his phantom presence. Concealed it well—for nothing was learned of the Ripper's identity, or his purpose. The drabs of London shivered in the raw wind of early November. Shivered, and were thankful for the coming of each mornings' sun.

"November 9th. They found her in her room. She lay there very quietly, limbs neatly arranged. And beside her, with equal neatness, were laid her head and hearts The Ripper had outdone himself in execution.

"Then, panic. But needless panic. For though press, police, and populace alike waited in sick dread, Jack the Ripper did not strike again.

"Months passed. A year. The immediate interest died, but not the memory. They said Jack had skipped to America. That he had committed suicide. They said—and they wrote. They've written ever since. Theories, hypotheses, arguments, treatises. But to this day no one knows who Jack the Ripper was. Or why he killed. Or why he stopped killing."

Sir Guy was silent. Obviously he expected some comment from me.

"You tell the story well," I remarked. "Though with a slight emotional bias."

"I've got all the documents," said Sir Guy Hollis. "I've made a collection of existing data and studied it."

I STOOD up. "Well," I yawned, in mock fatigue, I've enjoyed your little bedtime story a great deal, Sir Guy. It was kind of you to abandon your duties at the British Embassy to drop in on a poor psychiatrist and regale him with your anecdotes." Goading him always did the trick.

"I suppose you want to know why I'm interested?" he snapped.

"Yes. That's exactly what I'd like to know. Why are you interested?"

"Because," said Sir Guy Hollis, "I am on the trail of Jack the Ripper now. I think he's here—in Chicago!"

I sat down again. This time I did the blinking act.

"Say that again," I stuttered.

"Jack the Ripper is alive, in Chicago, "and I'm out to find him."

"Wait a minute," I said. "Wait—a—minute!"

He wasn't smiling. It wasn't a joke. "See here," I said. "What was the date of these murders?"

"August to November, 1888."

"1888? But if Jack the Ripper was an able-bodied man in 1888, he'd surely be dead today! Why look, man—if he were merely born in that year, he'd be 55 years old today!"

"Would he?" smiled Sir Guy Hollis. "Or should I say, 'Would she?' Because Jack the Ripper may have been a woman. Or any number of things."

"Sir Guy," I said. "You came to the right person when you looked me up. You definitely need the services of a psychiatrist."

"Perhaps. Tell me, Mr. Carmody, do you think I'm crazy?"

I looked at him and shrugged. But I had to give him a truthful answer.

"Frankly—no."

"Then you might listen to the reasons I believe Jack the Ripper is alive today."

“I might.”

“I’ve studied these cases for thirty years. Been over the actual ground. Talked to officials. Talked to friends and acquaintances of the poor drabs who were killed. Visited with men and women in the neighborhood. Collected an entire library of material touching on Jack the Ripper. Studied all the wild theories or crazy notions.

“I learned a little. Not much, but a little. I won’t bore you with my conclusions. But there was another branch of inquiry that yielded more fruitful returns. I have studied unsolved crimes. Murders.

“I could show you clippings from the papers of half the world’s great cities. San Francisco. Shanghai. Calcutta. Omsk. Paris. Berlin. Pretoria. Cairo. Milan. Adelaide.

“The trail is there, the pattern. Unsolved crimes. Slashed throats of women. With the peculiar disfigurations and removals. Yes, I’ve followed a trail of Mood. From New York westward across the continent. Then to the Pacific. From there to Africa. During the World War of 1914-18 it was Europe. After that, South America. And since 1930, the United States again. Eighty-seven such murders—and to the trained criminologist, all bear the stigma of the Ripper’s handiwork.

“Recently there were the so-called Cleveland torso slayings. Remember? A shocking series. And finally, two recent deaths in Chicago. Within the past six months. One out on South Dearborn, The other somewhere up on Halsted. Same type of crime, same technique. I tell you, there are unmistakable indications in all these affairs—indications of the work of Jack the Ripper!”

I smiled.

“A very tight theory,” I said. “I’ll not question your evidence at all, or the deductions you draw. You’re the criminologist, and I’ll take your word for it. Just one thing remains to be explained. A minor point, perhaps, but worth mentioning.”

“And what is that?” asked Sir Guy. “Just how could a man of, let us say, 85 years commit these crimes? For if Jade the Ripper was around 30 in 1888 and lived, he'd be 85 today."

SIR GUY HOLLIS was silent. I had him there. But—

"Suppose he didn't get any older?" whispered Sir Guy.

"What's that?"

"Suppose Jack the Ripper didn't grow old? Suppose he is still a young man today?"

"All right," I said. "I'll suppose for a moment. Then I'll stop supposing and call for my nurse to restrain you."

"I'm serious," said Sir Guy.

"They all are," I told him. "That's the pity of it all, isn't it? They know they hear voices and see demons. But we lock them up just the same."

It was cruel, but it got results. He rose and faced me.

"It's a crazy theory, I grant you," he said. "All the theories about the Ripper are crazy. The idea that he was a doctor. Or a maniac. Or a woman. The reasons advanced for such beliefs are flimsy enough. There's nothing to go by. So why should my notion be any worse?"

"Because people grow older," I reasoned with him. "Doctors, maniacs, and women alike."

"What about—sorcerers?"

"Sorcerers?"

"Necromancers. Wizards. Practicers of Black Magic?"

"What's the point?"

"I studied," said Sir Guy." I studied everything. After awhile I began to study the dates of the murders. The pattern those dates formed. The rhythm. The solar, lunar, stellar rhythm. The sidereal aspect. The astrological significance."

He was crazy. But I still listened. "Suppose Jack the Ripper didn't murder for murder's sake alone? Suppose he wanted to make—a sacrifice?"

"What kind of a sacrifice?"

Sir Guy shrugged. “It is said that if you offer blood to the dark gods that they grant boons. Yes, if a blood offering is made at the proper time—when the moon and the stars are right—and with the proper ceremonies—they grant boons. Boons of youth. Eternal youth.”

“But that’s nonsense!”

“No. That’s—Jack the Ripper.”

I stood up. “A most interesting theory,” I told him. “But Sir Guy—there’s just one thing I’m interested in. Why do you come here and tell it to me? I’m not an authority on witchcraft. I’m not a police official or criminologist. I’m a practicing psychiatrist. What’s the connection?”

Sir Guy smiled.

“You are interested, then?”

“Well, yes. There must be some point.”

“There is. But I wished to be assured of your interest first. Now I can tell you my plan.”

“And just what is that plan?”

Sir Guy gave me a long look. Then he spoke.

“John Carmody,” he said, “you and I are going to capture Jack the Ripper.”

II

THAT’S the way it happened. I’ve given the gist of that first interview in all its intricate and somewhat boring detail, because I think it’s important. It helps to throw some light on Sir Guy’s character and attitude. And in view of what happened after that—

But I’m coming to those matters.

Sir Guy’s thought was simple. It wasn’t even a thought. Just a hunch.

“You know the people here,” he told me. “I’ve inquired. That’s why I came to you as the ideal man for my purpose. You number amongst your acquaintances many writers, painters, poets. The so-called intelligentsia. The Bohemians. The lunatic fringe from the near north side.

"For certain reasons—never mind what they are—my clues lead me to infer that Jade the Ripper is a member of that element. He chooses to pose as an eccentric. I've a feeling that with you to take me around and introduce me to your set, I might hit upon the right person."

"It's all right with me," I said. "But just how are you going to look for him? As you say, he might be anybody, anywhere. And you have no idea what he looks like. He might be young or old. Jack the Ripper—a Jack of all trades? Rich man, poor man, beggar man, thief, doctor, lawyer—how will you know?"

"We shall see." Sir Guy sighed heavily. "But I must find him. At once."

"Why the hurry?"

Sir Guy sighed again. "Because in two days he will kill again."

"Are you sure?"

"Sure as the stars. I've plotted his chart, you see. All 87 of the murders correspond to certain astrological rhythm patterns. If, as I suspect, he makes a blood sacrifice to renew his youth, he must murder within two days. Notice the pattern of his first crimes in London. August 7th. Then August 31. September 8th. September 30th. November 9th. Intervals of 24 days, 9 days, 22 days—he killed two this time—and then 40 days. Of course there were crimes in between. There had to be. But they weren't discovered and pinned on him.

"At any rate, I've worked out a pattern for him, based on all my data. And I say that within the next two days he kills. So I must seek him out, somehow, before then."

"And I'm still asking you what you want me to do."

"Take me out," said Sir Guy. "Introduce me to your friends. Take me to parties."

"But Where do I begin? As far as I know, my artistic friends, despite their eccentricities, are all normal people."

“So is the Ripper. Perfectly normal. Except on certain nights.” Again that faraway look in Sir Guy’s eyes. “Then he becomes an ageless pathological monster, crouching to kill, on evenings when the stars blaze down in the blazing patterns of death.”

“All right,” I said. “All right. I’ll take you to parties, Sir Guy. I want to go myself, anyway. I need the drinks they’ll serve there, after listening to your kind of talk.”

We made our plans. And that evening I took him over to Lester Baston’s studio.

AS WE ascended to the penthouse roof in the elevator I took the opportunity to warn Sir Guy.

“Baston’s a real screwball,” I cautioned him. “So are his guests. Be prepared for anything and everything.”

“I am.” Sir Guy Hollis was perfectly serious. He put his hand in his trousers pocket and pulled out a gun.

“What the—” I began.

“If I see him I’ll be ready,” Sir Guy said. He didn’t smile, either.

“But you can’t go running around at a party with a loaded revolver in your pocket, man!”

“Don’t worry, I won’t behave foolishly.”

I wondered. Sir Guy Hollis was not, to my way of thinking, a normal man.

We stepped out of the elevator, went toward Baston’s apartment door.

“By the way,” I murmured, “just how do you wish to be introduced? Shall I tell them who you are and what you are looking for?”

“I don’t care. Perhaps it would be best to be frank.”

“But don’t you think that the Ripper—if by some miracle he or she is present—will immediately get the wind up and take cover?”

“I think the shock of the announcement that I am hunting the Ripper would provoke some kind of a betraying gesture on his part,” said Sir Guy.

"You'd make a pretty good psychiatrist yourself," I conceded. "It's a fine theory. But I warn you, you're going to be in for a lot of ribbing. This is a wild bunch."

Sir Guy smiled.

"I'm ready," he announced. "I have a little plan of my own. Don't be shocked by anything I do," he warned me.

I nodded and knocked on the door.

Baston opened it and poured out into the hall. His eyes were as red as the maraschino cherries in his Manhattan. He teetered back and forth, regarding us very gravely. He squinted at my square-cut homburg hat and Sir Guy's mustache.

"Aha," he intoned. "The Walrus and the Carpenter."

I introduced Sir Guy.

"Welcome," said Baston, gesturing us inside with over-elaborate courtesy. He stumbled after us into the garish parlor.

I stared at the crowd that moved restlessly through the fog of cigarette smoke.

It was the shank of the evening for this mob. Every hand held a drink. Every face held a slightly hectic flush. Over in one corner the piano was going full blast, but the imperious strains of the March from The Love for Three Oranges couldn't drown out the profanity from the crap-game in the other corner.

Prokofieff had no chance against African polo, and one set of ivories rattled louder than the other.

Sir Guy got a monocle-full right away. He saw LaVerne Gonnister, the poetess, hit Hymie Kralik in the eye. He saw Hymie sit down on the floor and cry until Dick Pool accidentally stepped on his stomach as he walked through to the dining room for a drink.

He heard Nadia Vilinoff the commercial artist tell Johnny Odcutt that she thought his tattooing was in dreadful taste, and he saw Barclay Melton crawl under the dining room table with Johnny Odcutt's wife.

His zoological observations might have continued indefinitely if Lester Baston hadn't stepped to the center of the room and called for silence by dropping a vase on the floor.

"We have distinguished visitors in our midst," bawled Lester, waving his empty glass in our direction. "None other than the Walrus and the Carpenter. The Walrus is Sir Guy Hollis, a something-or-other from the British Embassy. The Carpenter, as you all know, is our own John Carmody, the prominent dispenser of libido-liniment."

He turned and grabbed Sir Guy by the arm, dragging him to the middle of the carpet. For a moment I thought Hollis might object, but a quick wink reassured me. He was prepared for this.

"It is our custom, Sir Guy," said Baston, loudly, "to subject our new friends to a little cross-examination. Just a little formality at these very formal gatherings, you understand. Are you prepared to answer questions?"

Sir Guy nodded and grinned.

"Very well," Baston muttered. "Friends—I give you this bundle from Britain. Your witness."

THEN the ribbing started. I meant to listen, but at that moment Lydia Dare saw me and dragged me off into the vestibule for one of those Darling-I-waited-for-your-call-all-day routines.

By the time I got rid of her and went back, the impromptu quiz session was in full swing. From the attitude of the crowd, I gathered that Sir Guy was doing all right for himself.

Then Baston himself interjected a question that upset the apple-cart.

"And what, may I ask, brings you to our midst tonight? What is your mission, oh Walrus?"

"I'm looking for Jack the Ripper."

Nobody laughed.

Perhaps it struck them all the way it did me. I glanced at my neighbors and began to wonder.

LaVerne Gonnister. Hymie Kralik. Harmless. Dick Pool. Nadia Vilinoff. Johnny Odcutt and his wife. Barclay Melton. Lydia Dare. All harmless.

But what a forced smile on Dick Pool's face! And that sly, self-conscious smirk that Barclay Melton wore!

Oh, it was absurd, I grant you. But for the first time I saw these people in a new light. I wondered about their lives—their secret lives beyond the scenes of parties.

How many of them were playing a part, concealing something?

Who here could worship Hecate and grant that horrid goddess the dark boon of blood?

Even Lester Baston might be masquerading.

The mood was upon us all, for a moment. I saw questions flicker in the circle of eyes around the room.

Sir Guy stood there, and I could swear he was fully conscious of the situation he'd created, and enjoyed it.

I wondered idly just what was really wrong with him. Why he had this odd fixation concerning Jack the Ripper. Maybe he was hiding secrets, too. . . .

Baston, as usual, broke the mood. He burlesqued it.

"The Walrus isn't kidding, friends," he said. He slapped Sir Guy on the back and put his arm around him as he orated. "Our English cousin is really on the trail of the fabulous Jack the Ripper. You all remember Jack the Ripper, I presume? Quite a cutup in the old days, as I recall. Really had some ripping good times when he went out on a tear.

"The Walrus has some idea that the Ripper is still alive, probably prowling around Chicago with a Boy Scout knife. In fact"—Baston paused impressively and shot it out in a rasping stage-whisper—"in fact, he has reason to believe that Jack the Ripper might even be right here in our midst tonight."

There was the expected reaction of giggles and grins. Baston eyed Lydia Dare reprovingly. "You girls needn't laugh," he smirked. "Jack the Ripper might be a woman, too, you know. Sort of a Jill the Ripper."

“You mean you actually suspect one of us?” shrieked Laverne Gonnister, simpering up to Sir Guy. “But that Jack the Ripper person disappeared ages ago, didn’t he? In 1888?”

“Aha!” interrupted Baston. “How do you know so much about it, young lady? Sounds suspicious! Watch her, Sir Guy—she may not be as young as she appears. These lady poets have dark pasts.”

The tension was gone, the mood was shattered, and the whole thing was beginning to degenerate into a trivial party joke.

Hie man who had played the March was eyeing the piano with a Scherzo gleam in his eye that augured ill for Prokofieff. Lydia Dare was glancing at the kitchen, waiting to make a break for another drink. Then Baston caught it.

“Guess what?” he yelled. “The Walrus has a gun!”

HIS embracing arm had slipped and encountered the hard outline of the gun in Sir Guy’s pocket. He snatched it out before Hollis had the opportunity to protest.

I stared hard at Sir Guy, wondering if this thing had carried far enough. But he flicked a wink my way and I remembered he had told me not to be alarmed.

So I waited as Baston broached a drunken inspiration.

“Let’s play fair with our friend the Walrus,” he cried. “He came all the way from England to our party on this mission. If none of you is willing to confess, I suggest we give him a chance to find out—the hard way.”

“What’s up?” asked Johnny Odcutt. “I’ll turn out the lights for one minute. Sir Guy can stand here with his gun. If anyone in this room is the Ripper he can either run for it or take the opportunity to—well, eradicate his pursuer. Fair enough?”

It was even sillier than it sounds, but it caught the popular fancy. Sir Guy’s protests went unheard in the ensuing babble. And before I could stride over and put in my two cents' worth, Lester Baston had reached the light switch.

"Don't anybody move," he announced, with fake solemnity. "For one minute we will remain in darkness—perhaps at the mercy of a killer. At the end of that time, I'll turn up the lights again and look for bodies. Choose your partners, ladies and gentlemen."

The lights went out.

Somebody giggled.

I heard footsteps in the darkness. Mutterings.

A hand brushed my face.

The watch on my wrist ticked violently. But even louder, rising above it, I heard another thumping. The beating of my heart.

Absurd. Standing in the dark with a group of tipsy fools. And yet there was real terror lurking here, rustling through the velvet blackness.

Jack the Ripper prowled in darkness like this. And Jack the Ripper had a knife. Jack the Ripper had a madman's brain and a madman's purpose.

But Jack the Ripper was dead, dead and dust these many years—by every human law.

Only there are no human laws when you feel yourself in the darkness, when the darkness hides and protects and the outer mask slips off your face and you feel something welling up within you, a brooding shapeless purpose that is brother to the blackness—

Sir Guy Hollis shrieked.

There was a grisly thud.

Baston had the lights on.

Everybody screamed.

Sir Guy Hollis lay sprawled on the floor in the center of the room. The gun was still clutched in his hand.

I glanced at the faces, marvelling at the variety of expressions human beings can assume when confronting horror.

All the faces were present in the circle. Nobody had fled. And yet Sir Guy Hollis lay there . . .

LaVerne Gonnister was wailing and hiding her face.

"All right."

Sir Guy rolled over and jumped to his feet. He was smiling.

"Just an experiment, eh? If Jack the Ripper were among those present, and thought I had been murdered, he would have betrayed himself in some way when the lights went on and he saw me lying there.

"I am convinced of your individual and collective innocence. Just a gentle spoof, my friends."

Hollis stared at the goggling Baston and the rest of them crowding in behind him.

"Shall we leave, John?" he called to me. "It's getting late, I think."

Turning, he headed for the closet. I followed him. Nobody said a word.

It was a pretty dull party after that.

III

I MET Sir Guy the following evening as we agreed, on the corner of 29th and South Halsted.

After what had happened the night before, I was prepared for almost anything. But Sir Guy seemed matter-of-fact enough as he stood huddled against a grimy doorway and waited for me to appear.

"Boo!" I said, jumping out suddenly. He smiled. Only the betraying gesture of his left hand indicated that he'd instinctively reached for his gun when I startled him.

"All ready for our wild goose chase?"

I asked.

"Yes." He nodded. "I'm glad that you agreed to meet me without asking questions," he told me. "It shows you trust my judgment." He took my arm and edged me along the street slowly.

"It's foggy tonight, John," said Sir Guy Hollis. "Like London."

I nodded.

"Cold, too, for November."

I nodded again and half-shivered my agreement.

"Curious," mused Sir Guy. "London fog and November. The place and the time of the Ripper murders."

I grinned through darkness. "Let me remind you, Sir Guy, that this isn't London, but Chicago. And it isn't November, 1888. It's over fifty years later."

Sir Guy returned my grin, but without mirth. "I'm not so sure, at that," he murmured. "Look about you. These tangled alleys and twisted streets. They're like the East End. Mitre Square. And surely they are as ancient as fifty years, at least."

"You're in the colored neighborhood off South Clark Street," I said, shortly. "And why you dragged me down here I still don't know."

"It's a hunch," Sir Guy admitted. "Just a hunch on my part, John. I want to wander around down here. There's the same geographical conformation in these streets as in those courts where the Ripper roamed and slew. That's where we'll find him, John. Not in the bright lights of the Bohemian neighborhood, but down here in the darkness. The darkness where he waits and crouches."

"Is that why you brought a gun?" I asked. I was unable to keep a trace of sarcastic nervousness from my voice. All of this talk, this incessant obsession with Jack the Ripper, got on my nerves more than I cared to admit.

"We may need the gun," said Sir Guy, gravely. "After all, tonight is the appointed night."

I sighed. We wandered on through the foggy, deserted streets. Here and there a dim light burned above a gin-mill doorway. Otherwise, all was darkness and shadow. Deep, gaping alley-ways loomed as we proceeded down a slanting side-street.

We crawled through that fog, alone and silent, like two tiny maggots floundering within a shroud.

When that thought hit me, I winced. The atmosphere was beginning to get me, too. If I didn't watch my step I'd go as loony as Sir Guy.

"Can't you see there's not a soul around these streets?" I said, tugging at his coat impatiently.

"He's bound to come," said Sir Guy. "He'll be drawn here. This is what I've been looking for. A genius loci. An evil spot that attracts evil. Always, when he slays, it's in the slums.

"You see, that must be one of his weaknesses. He has a fascination for squalor. Besides, the women he needs for sacrifice are more easily found in the dives and stewpots of a great city."

I smiled. "Well, let's go into one of the dives or stewpots," I suggested. "I'm cold. Need a drink. This damned fog gets into your bones. You Britishers can stand it, but I like warmth and dry heat."

WE EMERGED from our side-street and stood upon the threshold of an alley.

Through the white clouds of mist ahead, I discerned a dim blue light, a naked bulb dangling from a beer sign above an alley tavern.

"Let's take a chance," I said. "I'm beginning to shiver."

"Lead the way," said Sir Guy. I led him down the alley passage. We halted before the door of the dive.

"What are you waiting for?" he asked.

"Just looking in," I told him. "This is a tough neighborhood. Sir Guy. Never know what you're liable to run into. And I'd prefer we didn't get into the wrong company. Some of these Negro places resent white customers."

"Good idea, John."

I finished my inspection through the doorway glass. "Looks deserted," I murmured. "Let's try it."

We entered a dingy-bar. A feeble light flickered above the counter and railing, but failed to penetrate the further gloom of the back booths.

A gigantic Negro lolled across the bar—a black giant with prognathous jaw and ape-like torso. He scarcely stirred as we came in, but his eyes flickered open quite suddenly and I knew he noted our presence and was judging us.

"Evening," I said.

He took his time before replying. Still sizing us up. Then, he grinned.

"Evening, gents. What's your pleasure?"

"Gin," I said. "Two gins. It's a cold night."

"That's right, gents."

He poured. I paid, and took the glasses over to one of the booths. We wasted no time in emptying them. The fiery liquor warmed.

I went over to the bar and got the bottle. Sir Guy and I poured ourselves another drink. The big Negro went back into his doze, with one wary eye half-open against any sudden activity.

The clock over the bar ticked on. The wind was rising outside, tearing the shroud of fog to ragged shreds. Sir Guy and I sat in the warm booth and drank our gin.

He began to talk, and the shadows crept up about us to listen.

He rambled a great deal. He went over everything he'd said in the office when I met him, just as though I hadn't heard it before. The poor devils with obsessions are like that.

I listened very patiently. After awhile I got up and took the bottle of gin off the bar. The Negro nodded, took the money I offered him, and went back to dozing. I poured Sir Guy another drink. And another.

BUT the liquor only made him more talkative. How he did run on! About ritual killings and prolonging life unnaturally—the whole fantastic tale came out again. And of course, he maintained his unyielding conviction that the Ripper was abroad tonight.

I suppose I was guilty of goading him. "Very well," I said, unable to keep the impatience from my voice. "Let us say that your theory is correct—even though we must overlook every natural law and swallow a lot of superstition to give it any credence.

"But let us say, for the sake of argument, that you are right. Jack the Ripper was a man who discovered how to prolong his own life through making human sacrifices. He did travel around the world as you believe. He is in Chicago now and he is planning to kill. In other words, let us suppose that everything you claim is gospel truth. So what?"

"What do you mean, 'so what' ?" said Sir Guy, pouring himself another glass of gin.

"I mean—so what?" I answered. "If all this is true, it still doesn't prove that by sitting down in a dingy gin-mill on the South Side, Jack the Ripper is going to walk in here and let you kill him, or turn him over to the police. And come to think of it, I don't even know now just what you intend to do with him if you ever did find him."

SIR GUY gulped his gin. "I'd capture the bloody swine," he said. Capture him and turn him over to the government, together with all the papers and documentary evidence I've collected against him over a period of many years. I've spent a fortune investigating this affair, I tell you, a fortune! His capture will mean the solution of hundreds of unsolved crimes, of that I am convinced.

"I tell you, a mad beast is loose on this world! An ageless, eternal beast, sacrificing to Hecate and the dark gods!"

In vino veritas. Or was all this babbling the result of too much gin? It didn't matter. Sir Guy Hollis had another. I sat there and wondered what to do with him. The man was rapidly working up to a climax of hysterical drunkenness.

"One other point," I said, more for the sake of conversation than in any hopes of obtaining information. "You still don't explain how it is that you hope to just blunder into the Ripper."

"He'll be around," said Sir Guy. "I'm psychic. I know."

Sir Guy wasn't psychic. He was maudlin.

The whole business was beginning to infuriate me. We'd been sitting here an hour, and during all this time I'd been forced to play nursemaid and audience to a babbling idiot. After all, he wasn't a regular patient of mine.

"That's enough," I said, putting out my hand as Sir Guy reached for the half-emptied bottle again. "You've had plenty. Now I've got a suggestion to make. Let's call a cab and get out of here. It's getting late and it doesn't look as though your elusive friend is going to put in his appearance. Tomorrow, if I were you, I'd plan to turn all those papers and documents over to the F.B.I. If you're so convinced of the truth of your wild theory, they are competent to make a very thorough investigation, and find your man."

"No." Sir Guy was drunkenly obstinate. "No cab."

"But let's get out of here anyway," I said, glancing at my watch. "It's past midnight."

He sighed, shrugged, and rose unsteadily. As he started for the door, he tugged the gun free from his pocket.

"Here, give me that!" I whispered. "You can't walk around the street brandishing that thing."

I took the gun and slipped it inside my coat. Then I got hold of his right arm and steered him out of the door. The Negro didn't look up as we departed.

WE STOOD shivering in the alleyway.

The fog had increased. I couldn't see either end of the alley from where we stood. It was cold. Damp. Dark. Fog or no fog, a little wind was whispering secrets to the shadows at our backs.

The fresh air hit Sir Guy just as I expected it would. Fog and gin-fumes don't mingle very well. He lurched as I guided him slowly through the mist.

Sir Guy, despite his incapacity, still stared apprehensively at the alley, as though he expected to see a figure approaching.

Disgust got the better of me.

“Childish foolishness,” I snorted. “Jack the Ripper, indeed! I call this carrying a hobby too far.”

“Hobby?” He faced me. Through the fog I could see his distorted face. “You call this a hobby?”

“Well, what is it?” I grumbled. “Just why else are you so interested in tracking down this mythical killer?”

My arm held him. But his stare held me.

“In London,” he whispered. “In 1888 . . . one of those nameless drabs the Ripper slew . . . was my mother.”

“What?”

“Later I was recognized by my father, and legitimatized. We swore to give our lives to find the Ripper. My father was the first to search. He died in Hollywood in 1926—on the trail of the Ripper. They said he was stabbed by an unknown assailant in a brawl. But I know who that assailant was.

“So I’ve taken up his work, do you see, John? I’ve carried on. And I will carry on until I do find him and kill him with my own hands.

“He took my mother’s life and the lives of hundreds to keep his own hellish being alive. Like a vampire, he battens on blood. Like a ghoul, he is nourished by death. Like a fiend, he stalks the world to kill. He is cunning, devilishly cunning. But I’ll never rest until I find him, never!”

I believed him then. He wouldn’t give up. He wasn’t just a drunken babbler any more. He was as fanatical, as determined, as relentless as the Ripper himself.

Tomorrow he’d be sober. He’d continue the search. Perhaps he’d turn those papers over to the F.B.I. Sooner or later, with such persistence—and with his motive—he’d be successful. I’d always known he had a motive.

“Let’s go,” I said, steering him down the alley.

“Wait a minute,” said Sir Guy. “Give me back my gun.” He lurched a little. “I’d feel better with the gun on me.”

He pressed me into the dark shadows of a little recess.

I tried to shrug him off, but he was insistent.

“Let me carry the gun, now, John,” he mumbled.

“All right,” I said.

I reached into my coat, brought my hand out.

“But that’s not a gun,” he protested. “That’s a knife.”

“I know.”

I bore down on him swiftly.

“John!” he screamed.

“Never mind the ‘John’,” I whispered, raising the knife. “Just call me . . . Jack.”

You Can't Kid Lefty Feep

What incredible thing had happened here in this home for aged gangsters? Somehow they had a new lease on life!

WHY do I go to Jack's Shack to eat?

The food is nothing to brag about. I suppose my ulcers are getting used to it. And the meals have improved a little lately—since they began to serve bicarbonate of soda as a regular dessert.

Still, I take an awful risk when I eat there. Because I never know when I'm liable to run into my friend Lefty Feep. Jack may dish out terrible food, but Lefty Feep dishes out worse stories. And the food isn't as hard on my stomach as those stories are on my credulity. I usually get a bad case of mental indigestion.

For example—

I was sitting in Jack's Shack just the other night, doing my best to cut into one of his steaks without an electric saw. Suddenly the door opened. I knew it opened because I felt a gust of wind.

Sure enough, on turning around I saw the gust of wind. None other than Lefty Feep himself. As usual, he was dressed in a suit with a sort of rainbow trout effect, but very becoming. Becoming painful to look at.

But the tall, thin man around town who travels in the most vicious circles was more than a sight for sore eyes. He looked youthful, radiant, positively boyish.

I told him so as he sat down next to me.

"You're looking great, Lefty," I said. "Very fresh and young."

Feep moved his chair back a foot and frowned.

"What's the matter?" I asked. "Here I haven't seen you in a month and I tell you how youthful you look. Why get peeved?"

Lefty Feep sighed.

"It is truthful I am youthful," he said. "But I do not wish to be kidded about being a kid."

He sat there sulking.

"For heaven's sake!" I protested. "There's no need to act like a baby about it."

Feep jumped to his feet with a screech. "Don't say that way!" he howled. "I got to squawk about that baby talk. I recently have an experience with a nursery that drives me nerts."

I rose to escape, for I smelled a story coming on. But Feep detained me, with a firm grasp on the collar.

"Nerts, I tell you!" he repeated. "In fact, I will tell you, and drive you nerts along with me."

"Travel alone," I suggested. "Nerts to you, all right. But as for me, I must be going."

Feep nodded. "That is right," he agreed. "You are going to listen to me."

He pulled me down in my chair again.

"But I have an appointment," I protested.

"Make it a disappointment," said Lefty Feep. "Me, I got a declaration in preparation about the younger generation."

Turning his strangely boyish face to me with an earnest stare, Lefty Feep opened his mouth and presented a slice of tongue in a conversational sandwich. The crumbs of wisdom fell.

Said Feep—

I AM personally a very active fellow and about a month ago I get extremely tired of just loafing.

Naturally this harms and alarms me, so I decide to go up and see my favorite cemetery-filler, a Doc by the name of Subconscious Sigmund. Subconscious Sigmund is a psychologist who knows all about nerves and has plenty of his own, but I figure he is just the man to explain the pain in my brain.

Subconscious Sigmund gives me the old hello and what do you know, and I explain to him how tired I get from loafing.

“Tired of loafing, eh?” says Sigmund. “Well, then, what you need is a vacation.”

“Vacation?” I say. “But I am not doing anything now.”

“Then why do you get tired?” he comes back. “Obviously if you aren’t doing anything and you still get tired, there is something wrong. The trouble must be that you can’t relax. So in order to relax, you must take a vacation.”

This makes sense to me.

“Also,” says Sigmund, “it is a good idea if you cultivate a hobby Have you got a hobby?”

I can answer this one, and I do. “Definitely,” I tell him. “Some guys play piano and some guys play violins. But me—I play ponies.”

“A horse-player, eh?” Sigmund barks.

“Yes,” I admit. “And there isn’t any sweeter music than the sound of a horse coming in first.”

“Then why not go to a race-track for your vacation?” asks Sigmund.

“An excellent idea. And I know just where to go now. I am off to Florida.”

Sigmund shakes his head.

“You will not get much of a vacation down there,” he tells me. “The army takes over all the hotels and you will have no place to stay.”

“You are wrong,” I come back. “I will not even try to stay at a hotel. I will stay with Happy Pappy.”

"What in the name of the Id, the Ego, and the Psychic Trauma, is Happy Pappy?" asks Sigmund.

So I explain.

"I take it you never hear of the Crook of the Month Club. It is a very exclusive group of goniffs, yeggs, and heisters from way back in the 1920's and whenever. All of the old-time hoods and molls belong to this organization, which is nothing more or less than a protective association for gangsters.

"In these days they are making a lot of the old mahoola and being careless, nobody socks it away for a rainy day. So Happy Pappy organizes the Crook of the Month Club. Every month these various personalities in the rackets put away a certain amount of lettuce to nibble at in the future when their teeth get dull.

"NOW, twenty years later, most of them are very much retired. Some are retired in various graveyards, and others are retired at Federal hotels. But there are a good dozen of old-time loud noises in the rackets who are still around.

"So Happy Pappy takes the dough they save all these years and buys a boarding house down in Florida. A sort of an Old Crook's Home. They all live there very quietly with their scrapbooks and press clippings and brag about their police records.

"I know there is always an extra room or two, and so I will stay there in Florida with Happy Pappy."

Subconscious Sigmund lifts his hands.

"You still do not tell me who Happy Pappy is," he reminds me.

I oblige. "Happy Pappy," I tell him, "is the oldest pickpocket in the world. He gets his start hoisting purses in the crowd that listens to Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. He cleans up big in the World's Fair of 1893. He is so old he finally goes around in a wheel chair as part of a charity outfit that raises funds. But he still raises most of his funds from other people's pockets.

"Anyhow he finally opens this boarding house for what is left of the Crook of the Month Club. I know he will be very glad to see me and will treat me very nicely. Particularly if I sew up my pockets first."

Subconscious Sigmund shakes his head. "I hope you have a pleasant vacation," he says. "Be sure to take things easy."

"I always take everything easy," I assure him. "Though not as easy as Happy Pappy takes things. He is a marvel."

With these parting syllables I am out the door and on my way to the train. The next morning I am on the floor in Florida.

I am so excited and happy about being here that I do not even check in to the Old Crook's Home, but head right for the tracks to play the ponies. I spend the afternoon listening to a lot of pretty notes—bank notes—and it is almost dark before I grab a cab and drive down to the Old Crook's Home in Miami.

I am feeling so good about my winnings that I do not notice the way the cabby shudders when he pulls up in front of a dark, dingy old barn on a side street.

I march up the rickety steps and ring the bell.

Nothing happens.

I ring again.

All at once a little slot opens in the front of the door and a nose sticks out. A big, red nose, with warts on it.

"What's the password," says the Nose.

"Password?" I say, confused.

"Nobody gets in without a password, buddy," says the Nose.

Sure enough, this joint is rigged up like an old-time speakeasy. Evidently these old mobsters don't realize we are living in a new day and age.

So I decide to humor the Nose.

"Joe sends me," I tell him.

"O.K., then," the Nose grumbles, and opens the door.

I STEP into the hallway. Two arms grab me from behind. In front of me there is an old ginch waving a blackjack.

"Frisk him, boys," cackles the old ginch, through her false fangs. "Maybe he's packing a gat."

Sure enough, they search me.

"No rod," says the Nose, from behind me. He lets me go. The old ginch sighs.

"Too bad," she says. "I'm just dying to conk somebody."

"Cheer up, Bertha," says the Nose. "We'll get a wrongo yet, and then we'll all get together and put the boots to him."

Then the Nose turns to me. He is a little shorty guy, and besides a nose he has arms and legs—but very little else. As a matter of fact, you have to look around the nose to find his face, and when you get to it it's hardly worth the trouble.

Nevertheless he gives me the old inspection section by section, and a very cold glint comes into his eye. Matching the cold glint of the knife he suddenly pulls out of his pants-leg.

"Who are you, buddy?" he asks. "Answer before I let the air out of your tires."

Not wishing to be deflated, I tell him my name and business in a flurry of hurry. "I am an old friend of Happy Pappy," I conclude. "And I wish to spend a few days here with him."

He looks relieved. So do I, when he puts the knife back in his garter.

"Oh, that's different," he says. "You want to hide out here, eh? The heat's on for you up North, I suppose? What you do—rub out a John Law?"

"I am just on vacation," I tell him.

The old ginch cackles. "That's the way," she says. "Play it smart. Don't spill anything. You can't trust these goons around here. Bet you really pull a job! Look like a killer to me."

The Nose smiles. "Meet one of our regulars," he says, pointing at the old ginch. "This is Lower Bertha. Used to work the old Pullman car racket."

"Pullman car racket?" I inquire.

"Tell you how I do it," she confides. "Rent a lower berth in a Pullman, see? Then during the night I take the old brace and bit and drill right through the top into the upper berth, get me? The drill works easy. Usually bores right through the guy sleeping in the upper berth without even waking him up. As soon as I figure he croaks, I just slip out, climb into the upper berth, and goniff with his dough and jewelry. Then I do a quick sneak off the train before morning."

Upper Bertha hands me a dazzling smile with her fake molars, but I do not feel like smiling when I hear this charming bedtime story. I feel like shaking, and do.

The Nose laughs. "Bertha is handing you a line," he tells me. "She does not pull off such a job in the last fifteen years. And she never does it in the old days just to be mean. It is only to help support her dear mother in Reform School."

UPPER BERTHA is very indignant.

"That doesn't matter," she snaps. "I am famous for my bloodthirstiness. Mr. Feep, if you don't believe me, I will be glad to show you my press clippings. They say I am the most coldblooded woman killer of the century. Never mind what this old fogey here says. He's just a cheap axe-murderer. One of the hoi polloi."

"What do you mean, a cheap axe-murderer?" snarls the Nose, offended. "You call bumping off a whole family of seven a cheap job? Why, it takes me an hour just to re-sharpen the axe and have it ready for the cops when they come for me."

I break up this little reminiscence session in a hurry.

"Where is Happy Pappy?" I ask.

"Tell you about that at dinner," says the Nose. "Better come on in. We're just sitting down. You'll enjoy the meal. We got a great cook," he tells me, leading me into the dining room. "Arsenic Arnold. Remember how he poisons his wife?"

So everything is fine. I sit down to dinner with a bunch of murderers and eat a meal cooked by a poisoner.

The rest of the mob is worse. I meet Snake Malone, who sells rotten alky in the Prohibition days, and Torpedo Tony, once known as Public Enemy Number One to Thirteen, inclusive, and an aged tomato by the name of Violent Violet, who once runs her husband through a meat-grinder.

Of course, they are all very old now, and when it is quiet you can hear their arteries hardening. The Nose walks with a cane, and Lower Bertha has false teeth, and Snake Malone has an ear trumpet the size of a public address horn. Torpedo Tony, the Public Enemy, hasn't enough strength left to pull the trigger on a water-pistol, and Violent Violet couldn't turn the handle on a slot machine any more.

But all they talk about is mobs and hiding out and putting the heat on and tipping over joints and taking it on the lam. It is very picturesque to hear all these quaint sayings and it makes me think back to the days of my youth.

Still, it is hard to get along with these old rascals, because they are always bragging about their scrapbooks and who has the longest police record and which one kills the most.

Finally I drag the conversation around to Happy Pappy once again.

"Where is Happy Pappy?" I ask.

A dead silence falls over the table, and does not pick itself up again, either.

"I am afraid he is rubbed out," says Violent Violet, at last. "About a week ago he takes a powder to his old homestead." She sighs. "He says he is coming back in time to listen to the nightly police calls on short-wave broadcast, but he never shows up. And that is seven days ago. Somebody must slip him a Mickey or something."

"This is news to me," I say. "I never know Happy Pappy has any enemies who will lay violent hands on him. Why he is the best-loved pickpocket in the business. And what is all this about an old homestead? I always figure he lives right here."

“He does,” says Arsenic Arnold, coming in with coffee and dessert. “But he also has an old shack back in the Everglades. His folks live there years ago when they smuggle slaves. And he says last week he will go back and visit it after fifty years for old times’ sake.”

I GET up. “You mean to tell me you let an old whacker like Happy Pappy wander around alone? The poor old scoundrel is over ninety. Maybe he’s sick or lost. I’m ashamed of all of you! I’ll go out and look for him myself.”

“Not until morning,” says Lower Bertha. “Those Everglades are pretty mean swamps. Lots of alligators there, and I don’t mean the kind that like swing music, either.”

“All right,” I decide. “But first thing in the morning, I am going to go up there and find out what happens to Happy Pappy.”

I spend the evening quietly, going through a lot of old WANTED FOR MURDER and REWARD posters the gang shows me in their scrapbooks, and listening to Crime Busters on the radio with Snake Malone. Then I have to hear Torpedo Tony tell me how he wins his Junior G-Man badge for eating breakfast food.

I get to bed early, making sure that Lower Bertha isn’t hiding under the mattress with her brace and bit, and by eight the next morning I am driving a rented car up to the Everglades.

Directions are not so good, and I make slow time. If it is not for the fact that the Nose has a lot of stolen gasoline on hand, I would never make it at all.

But I follow the map they give me, and pretty soon I am going down some dark and dismal roads into the Everglade swamps.

There is some pretty creepy scenery here, and enough moss on the trees to make the Smith Brothers green with envy. I twist and turn along the trail, and finally I pull up twenty miles from the nearest hot-dog stand and walk down the road the map shows.

I thud through the mud, I mush through the brush, I wade through the Everglades. Until at last I reach a little ramshackle shack down near the water. This must be Happy Pappy's old homestead.

As far as I can see, the place is deserted. There is nothing around but a bunch of snakes, and none of them resemble Happy Pappy.

I open the door of the shack and look inside. It is dark, but empty.

"Yoohoo!" I mention, in a loud manner.

"Who is it?" says a soft voice.

I turn around and nearly fall down.

There is a brat standing behind me.

A very tiny brat it is, with long golden curls, and a sweet smile, like the moppets in the laxative ads. The funny thing about it is that it wears cast-off clothes that once belong to a large man. The sleeves and pants-legs are rolled up. So are the brat's big blue eyes.

"Pardon me, urchin," I say, very politely. "But can you possibly tell me where in blue-blasted blazes I can find an old baboon by the name of Happy Pappy?"

The urchin grins.

"I am Happy Pappy," lisps the urchin.

"You are slap-happy," I snarl. "Listen, you sawed-off little squirt, I am in no mood for idle banter, see? Where is the old jerk?"

"But I tell you," says the moppet. "I am Happy Pappy."

"Please," I coax him, grabbing him by the neck just to emphasize my remarks. "I am looking for an old fink, see? Happy Pappy is so old he starts out as a card-sharp on Noah's Ark."

"You are mistaken," lisps the tyke. "I am Happy Pappy and I can prove it."

"How?" I inquire.

"Here," says the kid, lifting some articles from his pocket. "This is your watch and this is your wallet—right? I lift them off you while you clutch me by the throat."

I shake my head. Nobody but Happy Pappy has such a delicate touch.

“You are Lefty Feep,” says the moppet. “I remember you, see? And I tell you, pal, I am Happy Pappy all right.”

“But I don’t get it,” I sigh. “How come you are suddenly a little boy instead of an old vulture?”

“IT IS all a mistake,” says the kid.

“I am kind of glad you look me up. I am ashamed to go back to the Old Crook’s Home looking like this. I don’t know what I can do. And what happens to me is so distressing.”

“Tell me about it,” I suggest.

Happy Pappy smiles up at me. “Do you ever hear of Ponce de Leon?” he asks.

“What race does the nag run in?” I inquire.

“Ponce de Leon is not a horse, he is a man,” explains Happy Pappy, tossing his head and waving his golden curls. “He is the personality who looks for the Fountain of Youth.”

“I never go in drug stores,” I remark.

“Let me explain,” says Happy Pappy. And he does. I listen to his story, and it runs something like this.

Ponce de Leon is an old Spanish customer who lives in the days of the conquistadores. Conquistadore is a Spanish word meaning hi-jacker—at least these babies are always hanging around Spanish galleons or whatever, and they come over to this country to heist gold and silver and jewels from the Indians.

But Ponce is a little different than the other hi-jackers. In fact he as a hi-jacker is not so high. He is getting pretty old and cold, and what he is interested in is how he can put his big paunch into a suit of armor these days, and how to keep from doddering.

In a word, he is hot for rejuvenation or whatever. And he hears a song and dance from some Indians in front of a cigar-store in Havana, about a Fountain of Youth. A big stream somewhere in Florida with bubbling waters

. . . a stream that washes away the wrinkles faster than the soap flakes that advertise on the radio. One dip in this stream, say the Indians, and you come out a new man. It takes years off your shoulders.

Nobody knows exactly where this wonder water flows, but the legend says it is somewhere in Florida.

So Ponce gets his trigger men together, climbs in one of these Spanish galleons, and sets sail for the Everglades. He twists the locks on the Florida Keys and lands on the coast. He gallops through the swamps like an old fogey, trying to find this Fountain of Youth and addle his way back to adolescence.

But according to the hysterical accounts, he never finds it. He gets all the way to the Mississippi River and back, and croaks like a frog in the swamps.

Ever since, various explorers and real estate men are searching for the Fountain of Youth. But no score.

That is the way Happy Pappy explains it.

"Don't tell me you find this dream stream?" I explode, when he finishes.

Happy Pappy nods, looking up at me with a grin on his moppet's mug.

"Don't I look that way?" he says.

"But how—why?"

"I come back here a week ago," he tells me. "I figure I will spend a few days alone here in the woods, because I get fed up with that crowd at the Old Crook's Home. They are always after me to teach them tricks and show them how to goniff fillings from teeth and other difficult thefts. At my age it is a little difficult and I need a rest.

"So I sneak down here. And I run right into the very thing Ponce de Leon is looking for, hundreds of years ago.

"OF COURSE I do not know it at the time. Every morning I go down to the water, there, in back of the shack, and brush my teeth. I even drink a little of it from time to time, as a chaser, because I have plenty of alky on hand.

"After a couple of days I do not clean my teeth any more. I just take them out and throw them away.

"Because I find new teeth—not store teeth—growing in my mouth!

"It is then that I make an inspection of my reflection in the water and see that I am growing younger. You can imagine how I feel about this deal. I get so excited I drink about a quart of the stuff before going to sleep that night.

"This turns out to be too much. Because when I wake up the next morning—yesterday—I am nothing but a moppet. Yes, in my sleep I start a one-man youth movement of my own. I go to bed in my second childhood and I wake up in my third!

"So here I am, just a barefoot boy with shoes on."

This is a very remarkable yarn that Happy Pappy untangles for me, and I can only shake my head while I look at his boyish bobbings.

"Don't you believe me?" lisps Happy Pappy.

"Why not?" I say. "But I would like to see this Fountain of Juvenility."

"Come along," says Happy Pappy, leading me with little short steps down the path to the water behind the shack.

I stare down at a wide pool in the swamp, which lies all by itself, surrounded by rocks.

"Looks very much like ordinary water to me," I say with a frown—because if there is anything I hate, it is ordinary water.

"Look again," says Happy Pappy.

I notice this time that the stuff is a little off-color. A very mellow yellow, with bubbles rising from it like champagne.

"I figure there must be a hidden spring underneath," Happy Pappy tells me. "It probably dries up after a while, which is why the pool never grows any bigger."

"What about rains?" I ask.

"The rocks overhanging the pool keep rainwater out and so the stuff stays pure," he mentions.

I walk all around the pool and shake my head.

"I grieve that I cannot believe you," I admit. "But this looks like ordinary mineral water to me."

"Then why not try it?" urges Happy Pappy. "Take a little snort for sport."

"All right," I say. I bend down and start to ulp a gulp.

"Take it easy," yells Happy Pappy. "Just a little swallow or you will be an infant in an instant."

I grin and shake my head, but as I taste the water I get a surprise. It burns like fire and makes me tingle all over as though somebody gives my tongue the hotfoot. All at once I know that Happy Pappy doesn't mean maybe when he says I'll be a baby. Just a few drops trickle over my tonsils and I suddenly feel very different.

MEANWHILE I raise my noggin and stare at my reflection in the pool. My reflection shows a lighter complexion. The wrinkles are coming out of my forehead. The bags under my eyes gradually shrink. To tell the truth, I feel like a youth!

I stare at myself for a long while and all at once I grin.

"Come on!" I shout to Happy Pappy. "We must go to town right away." Happy Pappy shakes his head. "Why do you frown on town?" I expostulate which is even more high-class than asking.

"What can a little boy like me do in town?" he comes back, logically. "I am just a poor little brat now, after drinking too much of this water."

"How would you like to be a rich little brat?" I suggest.

"Try me and see," he says. "But how will I get rich?"

"By making money."

"And how will I make money?"

"You will make money like water," I tell him. "With water. With this water from the Fountain of Youth."

"I will?"

“Better than that, we will,” I correct him. “Every drop of this fabulous fluid is worth its weight in platinum. Don’t you realize that we have here something that will be the rejuvenation of the nation?

“Think of all the old guys with monkey glands and all the over-ripe tomatoes that go to beauty parlors to get their pusses hoisted. With a gulp of this wonder water you don’t need to have your face lifted.

“Don’t you understand? We will start a chain of beauty parlors and clean up. Life begins at eighty, that’s our motto.”

Happy Pappy starts to grin. He catches on.

“Get some bottles from the shack,” I instruct him. “We will take some of this juvenile juice back to town.”

“But we can’t let anyone find out about this stuff,” he objects. “Better leave it all here.”

“We must take some for analysis,” I say. “We must find out just how much of a swallow a person can take to get young, without overdoing it the way you do. We must experiment.”

Happy Pappy agrees. He hustles and rustles up some bottles. We walk back to the pool and fill the bottles with the water. This we stick in the car and we’re off to town.

I still cannot get used to Happy Pappy as a little boy. I have to boost him up into the front seat of the car next to me, and drive very careful over the bumps in the road so he does not fall out, being so light and small.

It is all very vexing and perplexing, and I wonder what the gang at the Crook of the Month Club home will think of it.

In fact I mention this to Happy Pappy as we ride merrily along.

“For the sake of my poor old wife and kiddies in Leavenworth,” moans Happy Pappy, “do not tell those thugs who I am. Introduce me as your nephew or something. They will give me a terrific ribbing if they find out what happens. I will think of a way to break the news gently.”

“All right,” I agree. “You will be my nephew. I will say that I meet you in town on the way back. But what will I report about seeing you at the shack in the Everglades?”

“Just say I am staying there a while longer,” suggests Happy Pappy. “Tell them I am brushing up on my pickpocketing by practising on a window dummy I keep out there. Tell them I am trying to steal teeth from alligators. Tell them a cyclone comes up and I am waiting to pick an air-pocket. Tell them anything but the truth. For you that should be easy.”

I frown at this, but there is no other way out. I will do as he says.

IT IS as dark as Hitler’s future by the time we arrive at the little house on the side street where the gang hangs out.

I go up the steps, leading Happy Pappy by the hand, and carrying the bottles full of age-exterminator along to hide on the porch before the bunch can see it.

Then I knock and the Nose sticks out of the slot in the door. When the Nose recognizes me he lets me in.

“Where do you hide out all day?” he asks. “Where is Happy Pappy and who is this hunk of brat poison?” he inquires, trying to kick the moppet at my side.

“Kindly do not put the boots to my nephew,” I request. “I pick him up in town where he is training to be a jockey. To answer your other questions, I go out to the Everglades and see Happy Pappy but he does not wish to return with me. He is practising up on some new pickpocket tricks.”

“New tricks?”

“Well,” I explain, “with all the women wearing slacks these days, he is learning how to pick slack-pockets as well as he can trouser-pockets. I figure he will be practised up in a couple of days and come home.”

The Nose takes these remarks all right and we go down to the dining room. The rest of the bunch is already hobbling in for gobbling.

I introduce my nephew to Arsenic Arnold and Lower Bertha and Violent Violet and Torpedo Tony and Snake Malone.

“Pardon me, Uncle Lefty,” says my fake nephew. “I will go wash my hands before I eat.”

Everybody looks at him, thinking he is a sissy.

"I never leave finger prints around," he explains. Everybody smiles at this.

"Pretty smart punk," says the Nose, after little Happy Pappy leaves the room. "We can learn such a urchin a lot of things. I will teach him how to handle an axe and Torpedo Tony can wise him up about Tommy-guns."

"It's always good for a growing child to have a proper education," agrees Violent Violet. "They don't teach them anything at Reform School any more." Happy Pappy comes back, and Arsenic Arnold beats it into the kitchen to serve the food.

Then for the next twenty minutes there is silence, except when Lower Bertha hits Snake Malone over the head with a plate for trying to swipe her potato.

Gradually the gravy stains begin to dry on the faces around the table and Arsenic Arnold serves coffee. Everybody drinks.

"Funny-tasting coffee," comments the Nose. "Where do you steal it this time, Arnold?"

"From the regular place," Arnold comes back.

"Well, it tastes stronger. Damn this rationing, anyhow."

"I steal as best I can," objects Arsenic Arnold. "Every morning I walk myself sick just to do my regular daily shoplifting. If you mugs have any complaints you can get a new cook."

"No complaints," says the Nose, in a hurry. "We like your cooking. And this coffee is swell. We'll all drink it down to the last drop."

Which they do. That is, everybody but little Happy Pappy and myself, who never touch anything stronger than whiskey.

I AM just reaching for my cup like the others, when Happy Pappy nudges me. "Shhh," he whispers. "Don't touch it. When I leave the room I pour some of our anti-senility special in the coffee-pot."

“Why do you do such a thing?” I whisper back. “Are you going screwy in your young age?”

“You want to experiment with the stuff, don’t you?” he comes back.

“Well, here’s our chance. I only use a little and we will see how far it works. Also I want to break the news of who I am very gently. This is one way to do it.”

I do not think it is such a good way, but it is too late now. I sit back and watch them finish their coffee and then I watch their coffee finish them.

Because once the coffee is down it gets in its work very, very quickly, and in just a few seconds I see a youth movement sweeping around the room.

Everybody seems to notice this change at the same time. They sit there with mouths hanging open, watching the years roll back.

There is nothing to say, so they all compromise by gasping.

My eyes roll faster than a pair of loaded dice in the hands of a guy with epilepsy. I stare at each changing face. Age is melting off like butter. Wrinkles vanish. White hair darkens. Crows-feet march away.

The Nose is now a guy of about 35, and his schnozz fades from deep purple to a blushing pink.

Arsenic Arnold is a handsome young squirt of 25 or thereabouts, because he takes his coffee without cream in it.

Torpedo Tony sprouts a thick head of hair and a black mustache.

Snake Malone, who is formerly just an old goof, now looks like a young goof.

But the big change comes over the two ginches. Lower Bertha sheds about 60 pounds and turns into a very striking brunette item. Violent Violet is a lovely redhead.

They look at each other and point and gawk, and then they all begin to yammer at once.

“What’s happening?”

“Look at me—how come?”

“Hey—what goes on here?”

Little Happy Pappy climbs up on the table and raps a fork against the Nose's ditto far silence.

Then he begins to explain in a squeaky voice. He tells who he is, and how he finds the Fountain and what I suggest we can do with the juvenile gargle.

His remarks are greeted with cheers. Then everybody rushes for the mirror to take a squint at the strange change.

They are all delighted.

THEY nudge and point at each other and the hoods keep looking at the two molls and whistling, and I stand there and wait for something to happen.

It does.

"This calls for a celebration!" yells Arsenic Arnold.

"Sure it does," says Lower Bertha. "Who shall we kill?"

"That's not what I mean," Arnold comes back. "We ought to go out to a night spot and make whoopee."

"Fine," says Violent Violet. "I haven't been able to dance the Charleston for years."

I grin, realizing that to these personalities, nothing happens since 1925 or thereabouts.

"Let's hop in the car and go out on a good tear," says the Nose.

Which is why, half an hour later, we are all sitting in the Sunstroke Club, one of the most exclusive dumps in Miami.

I stare around the table again, still not quite believing what I see. An hour ago all my friends are old crooks. Now they are young crooks.

For some reason I do not think this is a great improvement. These faces are more youthful, but they look a lot tougher. And my companions are acting a lot tougher, too.

The minute the waiter comes up they begin to yell for liquor. When they get it, they yell for more. This goes on for quite some time. They drink like fish.

I suddenly realize that this bunch is used to drinking in the old Prohibition days where you slug the stuff down and ask what it is later—if you are still alive.

From time to time Lower Bertha and Violent Violet grab a partner and attempt to do the Charleston. This helps the other dancers on the floor like an attack of bunions. In fact, within a very few minutes my friends attract a lot of attention.

Because when they get tipsy they get ideas, and when they get ideas they get active, and when they get active they get results.

To make a long story gory, pretty soon there is nobody left at our table except little Happy Pappy and myself. We look around and try to locate our bunch and see the following interesting items:

(a) Violent Violet is sitting on some guy’s lap stroking his hair with one hand and clawing the hair of his girl friend with the other.

(b) Snake Malone is arguing with the manager over at the next table. He is trying to persuade him to throw out his regular liquor stock and put in bootleg alky. “You’ll do it or else—” he yells, grabbing the manager by the collar and leering.

(c) Lower Bertha is underneath the manager’s table. She crawls beneath his chair and begins to drill up through the seat with a brace and bit.

“We’ve got to get them out of here before trouble starts,” I tell Happy Pappy. “Ill try and locate the others in a hurry.”

I rush around, looking for the missing links in our chain-gang.

Finally, through the swinging doors I detect Arsenic Arnold.

HE IS out in the kitchen, of course, and I can see he is pouring the contents of a little bottle into the consomme. Like all the rest, he is young again and up to his old tricks.

I yank him out of there by the scruff of his neck. In the lounge outside I run smack into Torpedo Tony. He is very busy in a little human weightlifting act of his own. By human weightlifting I mean he is holding up a lot of people.

He has a Roscoe in one hand and is backing the customers up against the wall.

"Stick 'em up," he suggests, waving his not-so-Gabriel heater.

Out of the comer of my other eye, I see Violent Violet wrestling with a dame, Lower Bertha drilling through the manager's chair and part of the manager most likely to be in that vicinity; and Snake Malone is finishing up the liquor in a hurry by breaking bottles over a waiter's head.

Then I stop looking and start hearing.

Sirens wail outside. Somebody calls the police, of course.

I rush into the dance-and-dine room and grab my Scout troop in a hurry.

We reach the door—Violet, Bertha, Tony, Arnold, Snake, Happy Pappy and myself. At the same time the cops break the door in from the other side.

We back away.

"This way!" shouts a voice. I turn around. The Nose stands behind us, waving an axe he grabs from a fire-box on the wall.

He swings the axe into the back door and smashes it open. We run.

I am in the rear, trying to help Happy Pappy with his short little legs.

"What are we running for anyway?" I gasp. "We don't do anything, you and I."

"Oh yeah? says Happy Pappy.

I stare at him. With every step he takes, stuff falls out of Happy Pappy's pockets. Rings and jewelry and bracelets bounce down his trouser-legs. Knives and forks slide from his sleeves. He is back to picking pockets again, too!

We make a sally into the alley and the cops pile out after us. But Snake Malone has the car running when we reach it and we jump on and it's off to see the wizard. Or rather, the lizard. Because Happy Pappy yells, "Head for the swamps!"

We head.

"We'll hide out in my shack in the Everglades," he pants, as we settle down into our seats and Snake Malone shatters the speed record.

THE cops follow us, but after a wild hour they get lost somewhere between the third and fourth alligator as we tear down the dark, winding roads that lead towards Happy Pappy's shack and the Fountain of Youth.

All through the bumping and thumping of the ride, I am doing a bit of heavy thinking.

Happy Pappy makes a terrible mistake when he feeds fresh youth to these old rascals. Now they are back in their prime and they will be a menace to society and so forth. It is most unfortunate. And there is nothing to do about it.

I am not calmed down any by what happens when we arrive at the shack.

We climb out, go in, and sit down at the table after Happy Pappy brings some candles out to light.

Snake Malone is still wandering out in the swamp, parking the car and looking over the lay of the land.

He comes in grinning.

"I just case the joint," he reports, "and it's a pipe! They'll never find us here. And by the way, Happy Pappy, I see this Fountain of Youth you have in the back yard. And it gives me a remarkable idea."

"But we already have an idea, Snake," says Happy Pappy. "We are going to open beauty parlors and make everybody young."

Snake Malone laughs It is a very disturbing sort of laugh, and out in the swamps several alligators run like hell when they hear it.

"No you don't," he informs Happy Pappy. "I have a better idea. We are not going to sell our water to everybody."

"We aren't?"

"Of course not. Why be so common and vulgar? We will sell it only to very exclusive customers."

"Such as?"

“Gangsters,” says Snake Malone. “Gangsters.”

“But there are very few gangsters,” objects Happy Pappy. “Most of them are in the clink. They will not get out of stir until they serve very long stretches.”

“That is just the point. After serving long stretches we catch them at just the very time they need water from the Fountain of Youth. Suppose a judge sends you up for fifty years, when you are only thirty. By the time you get out you are eighty. Wouldn’t you pay heavy sugar for a drink that makes you thirty again?”

Happy Pappy catches on, and so do the rest of them.

“We will be rich indeed,” Snake Malone goes on. “Think of it—we will revolutionize the entire underworld. No crime wave will be complete without our water!

“Nobody will be afraid of having a beak send them up the river. When they get out they plank down their dough, gulp down a drink, and start all over again.”

Everybody slaps Snake Malone on the back and tells him he is a genius. Everybody but Happy Pappy and yours truly, that is.

Snake Malone looks at me with a glare that makes the corpuscles glitter in his bloodshot eyes.

“What do you think of my idea, Lefty?” he asks.

“I don’t like it,” I tell him. “This water can be a great benefit to all mankind. Instead you want it to be a boon for goons.”

“And just what are you going to do about it, Lefty?” asks Snake Malone.

“I am not going to allow it,” I gulp. “I do not think that this wonderful water should be misused. And I will not play the part of a water-boy for a crooked team.”

EVIDENTLY this remark reminds them of a football game, because I am suddenly tackled from the rear. I go down for a loss, and in the middle of the scrimmage I find myself tied up with a stout rope. The Nose and Torpedo Tony bind me to a chair.

“Now,” says Snake Malone. “Any other objections?”

He looks at Happy Pappy. But little Happy Pappy isn’t so happy any more. He stares at me and sighs, and I can see he is sorry about starting all this. But he is too small a fry to tangle with this mob of gangsters.

“No objections,” he squeaks.

“Good,” Snake Malone remarks. “From now on I will take charge. And if I hear a squawk out of anybody I will turn that squawk into a death-rattle. Understand? Now take Lefty into the bedroom and tie him down. Good night and pleasant screams.”

That is how I pass my time the next twenty-four hours. I am tied down in bed.

About noon the next day Happy Pappy sneaks in and feeds me.

“I am very conscience-stricken about starting such a mess,” he confesses. “But what can I do now? It is too late. They are already draining the swamp.”

“Draining it?”

“Early this morning Torpedo Tony goes to town and steals a big truck with a lot of empty tanks in it. Somewhere else he manages to find a pump attachment. The rest of them are out in the swamp all day, siphoning up the water.

“The Fountain of Youth is gone, Lefty. It’s all stored in the tanks now. The swamp is dry.”

“Yes,” says a voice over his shoulder. The Nose is standing there. “Now we are ready to leave this snug little hideout and head for the big town. We’ll be out of reach of the bulls and ready to promote with our rejuvenation juice.”

The others crowd into the bedroom after him. Now Arsenic Arnold sticks his neck out of the mob.

“But first we have a little job to do, Lefty,” he remarks. “That is why we visit you.”

"What is the job?" I ask.

"Why, we are going to bump you off," he tells me.

I shudder. I always shudder when I hear all this 1925-vintage slang. It is very poor English. I do not like the grammar and right now I do not like the idea, either.

"We cannot take a chance of leaving you here, Lefty," says Arnold. "When the cops come you are liable to sing. Surely you understand how it is. We really must kill you."

"You are a dirty, double-crossing crook," I inform him.

"Now Lefty, flattery won't help you any," smiles Arsenic Arnold. "What we must decide now is the method we will use to exterminate you. I suggest a little poison."

The Nose sneers a long sneer.

"YOU and your poison," he says. "All that fuss and bother cooking it up. Let me handle the job with an axe. It will all be over within a second. A split second, if I handle the axe right."

"Too messy," says Lower Bertha. "Let me get him with my drill."

"Oh, you and your old drill!" sniffs Violent Violet. "You'd think nobody else knows how to kill a man around here! There's a meat-grinder in the kitchen. Let me handle this case. Feep would make swell hamburger."

Torpedo Tony shoulders his way through the crowd.

"Trouble with all of you," he says, "is that you're too hysterical. Too flighty, see? We want to get rid of this lug without leaving no messy stains. No clues, get me? Now I'll just take Feep out into the swamp and bury him up to his neck in the mud. The alligators can do the rest. And there won't be no traces, understand? Just a nice, quiet mud-bath out where the Fountain of Youth once is."

"Maybe you're right," says the Nose.

He grabs my legs. Tony grabs my arms. They carry me out bade of the shack. Sure enough, I see that the Fountain of Youth is gone. Nothing but an empty mud-swamp remains. Next to it stands the big enclosed truck with the tanks inside, all filled up with water.

"Dump him," says Tony. I flop in the mud.

"Now we will dig a little hole and plant this lily," the Nose suggests.

I roll around in the sticky wet mud while they make with a shovel. I am on the edge of the grave, you might say.

They get a nice deep hole. Then they lift me up. I am dripping with mud, and also perspiration. It looks like my pals are going to do me dirt.

"Cheese it, the cops!"

The voice roars into our ears.

Snake Malone comes roaring into our midst.

"I'm playing lookout up the road a way," he pants. "Just now I see the bluecoats heading into the swamp on motorcycles. We've got to scram."

"What about Lefty?" says Tony.

"Throw him in the back of the truck," yells Malone. "We're all packed, ready to go. We can't wait and let the law find him. We'll drop him along the road somewhere."

So everybody runs around collecting their stuff, and tossing it in the back of the truck between the tanks. This stuff includes me. I land with a dull thud and pass out.

When I come to, we are jolting along. The whole crew sits up in front and I am alone in the back, bouncing up and down. The tanks full of water from the Fountain are bumping around close to my head.

I sit up and strain at my ropes. The mud is drying all over me.

All at once the ropes come loose. I wonder why, because they are tied very tight, when I get trussed up last night. Now they are loose. Why?

THEN I understand. I just get a mud-bath. The mud comes from the Fountain of Youth. The water in the mud makes me younger. I must lose an inch or so of girth around the middle and a little around the wrists and ankles. Now I can wriggle out of my ropes.

I do.

Then I get to work.

As we roll along the road, I grope in the back and find Lower Bertha's brace-and-bit. She throws the drill into the back when we leave. Now I have it and I use it.

There is only one thing to do. I can't let these crooks sell Fountain of Youth water to a bunch of criminals the way they plan to do it. So I bore into each tank with the drill. One by one, I empty the tanks. The water splashes out of the sides and runs into the road behind.

I keep out of the way of the stream and watch it trickle in back of the truck. Wherever it hits the asphalt, the cracks and wrinkles in the road disappear and the road looks new and fresh again.

It makes me heave a sigh to see millions just evaporating like this, but what can I do?

It makes me heave a groan when I feel the truck stop after a long while, but what can I do?

We are pulling up on the side of the road. I look out and see a New Jersey highway marker.

Suddenly I realize I must be unconscious for maybe 24 hours in back of that truck instead of a few minutes. It is now late afternoon again—but I am out for almost a day.

Here we are, stopping in New Jersey. The water is gone, thank goodness. But now they will come around and find me, and I will be gone, too.

But I am helpless. I hear them talking and grumbling up in front. And then footsteps approach the rear.

"Looks deserted all right," says the Nose.

"We'll toss him into the cranberry bogs over there," Snake Malone snarls.

"Sure is good to get a rest," sighs Violent Violet. "A full day of driving like that is enough to make anybody sick. No stops, no food, nothing to drink."

“Stop squawking,” Arsenic Arnold tells her? “We have to drive like this to shake off the law. Now we’re safe. We can rub out Feep and head for the big town right away. Let’s go.”

The voices get louder.

I crouch there in the back of the truck, waiting. I have no weapons but the brace-and-bit and it is no good against Snake Malone and the rest. I remember Torpedo Tony has a gun. He also has a temper, and when he sees what I do to the water from the Fountain of Youth, I am sure I will be bogged down in the cranberries very shortly.

The Nose sniffs into the back of the truck.

“All right, Lefty,” he calls. “Here’s where you get off.

“What the blazes?” he inquires earnestly. “You aren’t tied up any more.”

“No,” I sneer. “But you’ll be fit to be tied when you see what I accomplish.”

THEY haul me out and look at the tanks.

I am ready to die now. Because, at least, I give all these dirty crooks the shock of their lives.

“You blasted such and such!” howls Snake Malone. “You drain our tanks on us!”

The rest of them take a squint and begin to jump up and down in rage.

Only Happy Pappy is quiet. He sneaks up to me and whispers, “Good work, Lefty. I’m proud of you. I will try to come back and see that you get a nice funeral.”

This is not very consoling. Neither is Snake Malone. He clips me one on the side of the noggin and hauls me down. Torpedo Tony caresses my ribs with his gun.

“Oh, oh, oh!” wails Arsenic Arnold. “You have to go and spill all that wonderful water and spoil our plans! I figure I will be rich and open a lovely restaurant.”

“I plan on a hamburger stand,” says Violent Violet, beginning to sniffle.

"I expect to corner the alky racket in six states," Torpedo Tony sobs. "It is enough to drive a man to drink."

"Yes," yells Arsenic Arnold. "Give me a drink! Give us all a drink before we rub out this louse who spoils everything!"

"I'm dying for a shot," says Lower Bertha. "Look—he's ruined my drill, too!"

Happy Pappy comes forward with a grin. He pulls a flask of colorless stuff from his hip pocket.

"You want a drink?" he says. "Here it is. I figure on this and save some gin for us. Everybody have some."

Arsenic Arnold grabs the bottle and opens it.

Then he frowns.

"Oh no," he says, softly. "I know your tricks, Happy Pappy. You put Fountain of Youth water in our coffee and we get young. I bet you have such water in the flask, too. If we drink it we turn into babies and then you and your pal Lefty will be free. None of your tricks, Happy Pappy."

He throws the flask away. Happy Pappy sigh and shrugs.

"We will drink from my bottle," says Arsenic Arnold. "Good whiskey."

And they do.

They spin the bottle around and I watch it drain dry.

This is one time in my life I would appreciate a drink, but nobody offers it to me. They swallow and let me wallow.

And then the whole gang marches me off into the swamps in the twilight. We go into the bog and I walk my last mile. Torpedo Tony holds the gun at my back.

"Here," he says, when we get way off the road.

"Now," he says.

And now is when it happens.

All at once I notice his voice get squeaky. High. And then I look at him. He is not so high. He is low. Low and tiny. And getting smaller.

I stare around the circle. They are also smaller. They scream, but their voices break like the whimpers of moppets, and the gang doesn't even come up to my waist.

In a minute I grab the gun from Torpedo Tony's tiny fingers.

"All right, kids," I say. "Come on. Follow me."

They do.

BY THE time we reach the truck again I almost have to carry the littlest ones. I pile them into the front seat, crying like mad, and Happy Pappy and I drive off.

Of course, on the way down the road Happy Pappy tells me how he fills up a flask with water from the Fountain of Youth. He knows they will not drink it if he gives it to them, so he plays a little trick. He colors it up a little to look like whiskey.

Being a pickpocket, he switches flasks with Arsenic Arnold in the truck while they drive, so Arsenic Arnold really has the kiddy cocktail in his bottle.

They drink it, and we escape.

So I drive here from Jersey in two days, and when I arrive I take all the children to an orphanage and leave them.

I hope they get the right training in the orphanage, so when they grow up again they will be decent, law-abiding citizens instead of a bunch of crooks.

* * *

LEFTY FEEP sat back as he finished his story.

"That is the truth about the Fountain of Youth," he said.

I nodded. "Very interesting," I told him. "And quite convincing."

Feep nearly jumped out of his chair.

"What?" he yelled. "You actually believe me for once?"

I smiled. "Why not?"

"No foolish questions about why things happen?"

"Why should there be any questions, Lefty? You've explained everything." Feep scratched his head. "I don't get it," he confessed. "You usually are such a critic."

I cleared my throat. "Just one thing puzzles me, though. A very minor thing. You say it only took one day for the gang to drive from Florida to New Jersey."

"Right."

"But after the gang became children it took you two days just to get from New Jersey to New York. Why did it take so long?"

"Oh, is that all?" exclaimed Lefty Feep. "That I can explain very easy. It is just that you do not understand how very young this water makes my gangster friends."

"Very young?"

"Sure." Feep grinned. "They are extremely young children, those gangsters. That is why it takes me so long to drive a short distance.

"You see, every couple of miles I have to stop the car and take out Torpedo Tony or Snake Malone and change their diapers."

Fairy Tale

It's easy to find a tenant for property these days. But if the house proves to be already occupied, trouble can result

"THERE is fairies in the bottom of my garden," said the guy. "The hell you say!" yelled Tim Booker.

"No. I don't say 'the hell.' I alia time say there is fairies in the bottom of my garden."

Tim Booker blew up completely and almost dropped the telephone from his hand.

This was the last straw. For five years Booker had been sitting at the phone in his rental agency office, listening to insults from tenants. That was his job at the agency—to take insults, note them down, and refer them to the boss. His not to reason why, his but to listen and lie.

During these five years, Tim Booker prided himself that he had heard everything. He knew the story of leaky plumbing by heart. The tales of noisy radiators, no heat, dripping faucets and loud neighbors were old stuff to Mr. Booker. He could handle anything from a squawk about the rent ceiling to a plea for redecorating a bathroom.

But now his nerves gave way. When the loud voice over the telephone said, "There is fairies in the bottom of my garden," Tim Booker just couldn't stand it any longer.

He lost his temper. Somebody was kidding him. Fairies in the bottom of his garden, were there?

"What am I supposed to do about it?" snarled Mr. Booker. "Do you want me to come down and wave a magic wand at them? You're drunk—get off the wire!"

"I'm not drunk," insisted the soft voice at the other end. "I'm Tom Rowland of 711 Honeysuckle Drive. And if you don't come out here right away, I'm gonna tell the Rent Control Board on you."

Tim Booker felt an icy chill take liberties with his spine.

"No," he gasped. "Not that—anything but that! I'll be right out, Mr. Rowland."

He hung up, trembling. His natural subservience returned. Through long habit he was once again a servant of the rental agency, and like a good servant he cringed at the very mention of the Rent Control Board.

Even fairy-befuddled drunks were easier to handle. Tim Booker sighed, reached for his hat, and left the office. Shuddering at the vibrating needle on his gas gauge, Mr. Booker swung his car out into the traffic and guided its squeaky chassis towards 711 Honeysuckle Drive and Mr. Thomas Rowland.

711 Honeysuckle Drive proved to be a most imposing mansion set back on a wide, tree-bordered lawn. Spacious grounds stretched out in back, and Thomas Rowland stretched out on the spacious grounds.

At least, he guessed it was Mr. Rowland who lay on the back lawn with a bottle resting against his chin.

As Tim Booker turned in the drive, the recumbent gentleman rolled out of the way and waved his bottle in greeting.

"Welcome to Honeysuckle Drive," he called, wobbling to his feet unsteadily. "Have a drink. "Place's yours. All yours! You're my pal, real life-saver!" He halted and assumed a look of grim belligerency. "Say, who the hell are you?" he sneered.

Tim Booker climbed out of the car. "I'm the man from the agency. I've come to see about those fairies in the bottom of your garden."

Mr. Rowland's sneer deepened.

“Who told you?” he demanded truculently. “Who alia time told you?”

“Why, you did!”

“Oh!” The smile returned to Rowland’s flushed face. “Then you’re alia time my pal. I remember, now.”

Tim Booker sighed. He had been right. Little Mr. Rowland was very drunk indeed. And this affair was just another wild goose chase.

MR. ROWLAND floundered around exactly like a wild goose as he led Tim Booker down the path towards the garden back of the house.

There really was a garden—a large and pretty area with trellises and a swing, and a pebbled pathway leading to a rock garden at the rear of the place. Flowers bloomed in luxuriant profusion. Tim Booker noted one incongruity. The grass needed cutting badly.

“Don’t you mow your lawn?” he asked. Mr. Rowland swung around and blinked blearily.

“O’Driscoll mowed it. He was alia time mowing it.”

“O’Driscoll? Who’s O’Driscoll?”

“Emmett O’Driscoll. He was my gardener. He got drafted last month. Now I alia time got nobody to mow my lawn.”

“Too bad.”

“He brought the fairies with him, see? They alia time come with his family, he said. And now’ he’s drafted. They took him away and left me with the fairies all alone. Alla time alone.” Mr. Rowland sobbed a little.

“I wish to Gawd the army would alia time draft them, too. What’s happening to me shouldn’t happen to Hitler!” He tapped Tim Booker on the chest with a trembling finger.

“You ever see snakes?” he demanded. “Pink elephants?”

“No,” Booker admitted.

“Well I have, brother. I alia time see such things. They aren’t pretty. But I’d a damned sight well rather see a zoo-full of them than these fairies. Fairies! Gawd—alia time fairies!” Abruptly he recovered himself and sighed. “You wanna know why I’m drunk?” he asked, sorrowfully. “You wanna know why I’m alia time drunk?” Mr. Booker didn’t want to know, but he couldn’t help it, so he nodded weakly.

“All right, if you gotta be nosey,” said Rowland, triumphantly. “I’ll tell you why I’m alia time drunk. On account of I’m alia time drinking, see?” This startling explanation would have held Tim Booker for a while, but Mr. Rowland insisted on continuing.

“And why am I alia time drinking? Because I alia time see those blasted fairies. That’s why I drink! Jeez, I wish I was drunk now!” exclaimed Mr. Rowland, falling down.

Tim Booker, wondering how he would end this maudlin session and get out of the place, helped little Mr. Rowland to his feet.

“Why don’t you go inside and lie down for a while?” he suggested.

“Because I alia time want to show you these fairies first,” Rowland muttered. “Then we’ll both go inside and lie down.”

“Very well,” said Tim Booker. “Where are these fairies?”

Mr. Rowland reeled down the pebbled pathway towards the rock garden. He paused before a cluster of rocks, his red-rimmed eyes revolving woozily as he scanned the underbrush.

“Here,” he exclaimed. “Here are the little stinkers now!”

Smiling superciliously, Tim Booker joined Mr. Rowland and peered down at the shrubbery.

“I don’t see any—” he began.

“Holy jumping smokes!” he yelled, leaping backwards across the path. “What are those?”

“Fairies,” chanted Mr. Rowland patiently. “Alla time fairies!”

Fairies, they were.

TIM BOOKER stared down at a cluster of tiny faces, rising impudently from the bushes at his feet. Marvelously, incredibly tiny faces—unmistakably human in features—barely six inches from the ground!

Bright, beady eyes twinkled from shrewd, wrinkled countenances. Tim Booker caught a glimpse of ragged garments clothing arms and legs thin as pretzel sticks. For one unbelievable moment he saw the pattern of a minute hand, no bigger than a single cornflake, as it rested against a leaf.

There was a shrill tinkle of high-pitched laughter, a sudden scurry, and the figures and faces disappeared.

The fairies were no longer “alia time.” They were gone.

Tim Booker blinked.

“I—I can’t believe it,” he whispered.

“Why don’t you alia time write to Ripley?” suggested Mr. Rowland, taking a hasty swig from his almost empty bottle. “Me, I’m getting out of here.”

“What?”

“I’m leaving,” said Mr. Rowland, wobbling back up the path, “I’m alia time through with fairies.”

“But that means breaking your lease,” gasped Tim Booker.

“I don’t care if my lease smashes to bits,” replied Rowland.

“You can’t do such a thing!” Tim Booker shouted, horrified by such blasphemy against all landlords.

“All right, so we’ll alia time take it to court. Or the Rent Control Board. You want I should tell those guys about how you have alia time fairies in your garden?”

“No,” whispered Booker. “No, we don’t want that.”

Triumphantly, Mr. Rowland rounded the corner of the house on one leg and disappeared.

Tim Booker climbed wearily into his car and fumbled with keys and clutch.

Suddenly, from the depths of the garden, he heard the sound of shrill, mocking laughter.

He zoomed down the drive in high, but the laughter followed him to the street, and clung to him that night in dreams.

TIM BOOKER would gladly have forgotten about the fairies at 711 Honeysuckle Drive, but Desmond Goudger wouldn't let him.

Desmond Goudger was Tim Booker's Boss—with a capital "B." He was the kind of an employer who will always be thought of with a capital "B"—even though the "B" doesn't necessarily stand for "Boss."

It was his Boss who started all the trouble.

"What's this about 711 Honeysuckle Drive?" he demanded harshly, pausing at Tim Booker's desk the next morning. "You let a tenant go without holding him to the lease?"

"He was drafted," Booker lied, nervously watching the telephone tremble in its cradle as the Boss's voice boomed.

"Well, hurry up and rent that dump," ordered Desmond Goudger. "With the housing shortage, you ought to have a client ready to move in tomorrow."

But Tim Booker didn't have a client the next day, nor the next. He hoped to heaven he never would. Explaining those fairies would cost him his job.

On the third day, the Boss stalked out of his office and chewed his cigar against Tim Booker's ear.

"What's the matter with you, Booker?" he growled. "Haven't you got a sucker for that 711 property yet?"

"I don't think so—you see, that is—"

"Listen, Booker," grunted Desmond Goudger. "I'm going to give you a piece of my mind."

"I don't see how you can spare it," Tim Booker almost said. What he really did was cringe and listen. For five minutes, the Boss distributed a portion of his mentality gratis. His conclusion was masterly, but Tim Booker didn't appreciate it.

"You'll damned well have that joint rented by tomorrow," he snapped, "or else."

With a final bite on his frayed cigar, Desmond Goudger strode off.

Tim Booker sat at his desk for a long moment. Twice his hand went out towards the volume of rental applicants. It would be so easy to pick a name from the list and call. He didn't try.

It was no use. He couldn't. Suddenly Tim Booker straightened up. Resolution kindled, flamed in his eyes.

He got up, grabbed his hat, left the office, climbed into his car, and drove to 711 Honeysuckle Drive. In the grip of his determination, all these actions seemed part of a single resolute gesture.

It was not until he was actually walking down the pebbled pathway of that deserted back yard that Tim Booker realized what he was actually going to do.

He, Tim Booker, fully (if sloppily) dressed and in his right (if slightly vacillating) mind—he, Tim Booker, was actually going to talk to the fairies!

Booker glanced nervously over his shoulder. There was nobody around. The garden gleamed in the afternoon sunlight. It looked peaceful, placid. The long, uncut grass at his feet rustled in a gentle breeze.

Everything was the way it should be. Normal. There were no fairies. It was all a mistake. There were no—

"Ouch! It's stepping on me yez are, gossoon!"

TIM BOOKER jumped like a kangaroo.

Peering up from between his turned-in toes was an incredible little figure. He drew his shoes back in dismay. The tiny mannikin stared up at him, squinting as though trying to focus his vision on something far distant.

"Och, and it's you again," said the mannikin, petulantly.

"Why not?" Tim Booker recovered a little of his composure. After all, there was nothing to fear from a creature six inches tall. He bent down, crouching on his knees, and scrutinized the tiny being before him.

The fairy was certainly no more than six inches in height, and yet there was nothing dwarfed or misshapen about his perfectly proportioned little body. Tiny, tight brown ringlets covered a head the size of an apricot. A face scarcely bigger than the circumference of a walnut regarded Tim Booker gravely, as Booker gazed in fascination at the truly pipe-stem limbs, covered with minute pinpoint freckles. The fairy, save for a sort of apron around the waist, was naked.

Booker didn't know why the fairy's woolen apron attracted his attention, but there was something familiar about it.

"And what may yez be starin' at with yer saucer eyes?" demanded the fairy, in a shrill, exasperated tone. "If it's the breach I'm after wearin' to cover me nakedness, why then 'tis but an ould sock of Emmett Driscoll's. He knitted it for me, fine gentleman that he was. Sure, and as for the hole in the toe, it's sewed up it is entirely, so the wind doesn't whistle up the small of me back."

Tim Booker remembered the story of the drafted gardener who had been responsible for the presence of the fairies. He began to formulate an argument.

"O'Driscoll was a pretty nice guy, I hear," he observed.

The mannikin nodded. "Sure and he was that. 'Twas O'Driscoll who built us the rock garden. Kind he was, and understandin' of the needs of the wee folk. He chased the accursed dogs and cats away. He was forever seein' to it that we got the dew fresh from the lawn.

"Many's the bit of clothing he's fashioned for us, to ward off the damp. As for Rowland, and may a blight rest forever on his name, he never bothered his head about the garden when Emmett O'Driscoll was here.

"Yes, O'Driscoll served us well—and why shouldn't he, I'm askin' ? Have not the wee folk served the O'Driscolls for generations past on the Ould Sod? Sure and I can be after rememberin' Rory O'Driscoll, his grandsire, and a fine strappin' bucko—"

Tim Booker cut through this flood of stage-Irish brogue and planted his planned suggestion.

"There's just one thing I don't understand," he said, naively. "Why did you folk desert O'Driscoll? Why didn't you go with him when he was drafted?"

THE fairy laughed, making a sound like a Crackerjack prize whistle.

"Sure, and what would we be doin' in the military, I'm askin' ? We'd be forever racin' about at the blast of a bugle . . . sleepin' on a parade ground where there's no dew, and a great lumberin' tank forever about to roll over yez! No, we stay here until O'Driscoll is back from the wars."

Booker took this statement impatiently. Then he hit on another argument.

"But isn't it bad for you to be here all alone? Who'll make your clothes now? What about this Rowland fellow?"

"Och!" The fairy looked doleful for a moment. "Rowland alone is a different matter entirely, that he is! After O'Driscoll left, he took to comin' out into the garden to sleep off his rampages. He trampled down the flowers and murthered them."

"So maybe you'd better leave," Booker suggested.

"Why? It's gone he is now entirely, thanks to yez," chirped the fairy, making a little bow. "We're free to stay here and wait for O'Driscoll to polish off the haythens and come back to us. It's the run of the place we have here now."

"But that's just it," said Tim Booker, in exasperation.

The fairy paid no attention to him whatsoever. He had turned, and was now beckoning in the direction of the shrubbery.

"Come out," he called. "Come out and meet the fine, grand gentleman to whom we are bespoken for his kindness."

With florid gesticulations, he ushered forth five more tiny figures. Bowing and curtseying, the fairies presented their grinning faces to Tim Booker.

"I'm Nubbin," said the first fairy, before introducing his companions. "And this, sir, is Sib."

Sib was quite elderly for a fairy, in Tim Booker's opinion—a little wizened, monkey-like figure with white hair and a wrinkled face the size and texture of a prune.

"And Slip."

Slip, by virtue of a ragged handkerchief cut like a dress, proved to be a lady. Her age was evidently equal to Sib's, and she greeted Tim Booker in a piping squeak. "Sure, it's a plasure to meet up with yer worship, that it is."

Nubbin introduced the others.

"Here's Gandy, sir."

Gandy was a snub-nosed youngster with an impudent smirk. Booker, gazing at him, was reminded of a miniature Mickey Rooney.

"How's tricks?" asked Gandy, in a surprisingly blasé voice with but a trace of brogue.

"Yeah. What's buzzin', cousin?" drawled a new voice—if you can imagine a flute drawling.

Tim Booker stared down at a saucy, pert, girlish face. The female fairy had red hair. With a shock, he realized that the obliging Emmett O'Driscoll had give her a pair of improvised slacks to wear.

"This is Dunnie," said Nubbin. "And a wild colleen she is."

The five fairies crowded about Booker's knees, gazing at his face and limbs with open curiosity and whispering behind their petal-like hands.

"You're after fergettin' me," squealed a small voice from the bushes. A sixth fairy emerged.

"Oh, Thomakin!" Nubbin exclaimed. "I did forget, truly."

"It's a noble pleasure to be beholdin' yer august and illustrious countenance, that is a fact," said fat little Thomakin. He bustled forward, wearing his bandana handkerchief toga with pompous dignity. He halted at Booker's side and lifted a hand.

TIM BOOKER, with equal gravity, made an attempt to shake hands. He could scarcely feel the tiny paw lost in the immensity of his own great palm.

"We're that grateful to you," said Thomakin, "for providin' us with this great, grand house."

Booker bit his lip.

"I'm glad to hear that." He hesitated, then plunged on. "But that's just what I've come out here to tell you, folks. You can't have this great, grand house."

"What?"

"I'd like you to have it, sure. If it were mine, I'd give it to you. But it isn't mine, don't you see? It's owned by my boss, Desmond Goudger. And I'm going to have to rent it to a new tenant right away. He sent me out here to tell you to vacate the premises."

"Vacate the premises?"

"Get off the property?"

"Leave?"

Tim Booker nodded.

Dunnie faced him, tossing her carrot-curls. "And what if we don't choose to leave?" she asked, mockingly. "What then?"

"Then we'll sue you," said Booker, weakly. He realized how meaningless the threat was as soon as he uttered it.

"Very well," said Gandy, suddenly impudence itself. "Sue and be damned to yez, says I."

"We'll not get off, and that's final," added Dunnie.

It was then that desperate Tim Booker made an unforeseen decision.

He rose to his feet and scowled.

"So you won't get off?" he muttered. "All right, to hell with you! I'll move into this place myself!"

THREE days later, Tim Booker and his wife, Mildred, moved into the house at 711 Honeysuckle Drive.

Tim had no trouble with Mildred when she heard the news. A single mention of that exclusive suburban address more than persuaded her the house must be ideal. Her flying visit was unnecessary—she had scarcely bothered to look at the place. Tim didn't show her the garden and she didn't bother to look for herself. Mildred was too busy making the kind of squeals women always make when confronted with something expensive.

“Oh, it’s wonderful, Timmie dear,” she gurgled.

Tim Booker didn’t even frown at his nickname when it fell from her lips. He was too happy about the whole thing.

Now Desmond Goudger wouldn’t be on his neck about renting the place. Mildred wouldn’t be nagging at him because she wanted to get a better address and crash society.

Whatever the financial sacrifice, Tim Booker wanted to keep his boss and his wife happy. Only when they were happy were they quiet. Tim Booker needed quiet after his experiences.

He only hoped to heaven, that Mildred wouldn’t find out about the fairies in the garden.

During the first three days she was completely engrossed in unpacking household belongings and putting them in the wrong places. On the fourth day she rearranged everything, and on the fifth she switched the rearranged furniture around again. Tim Booker buried himself in work at the rental agency and waited.

It wasn’t until the weekend that Mildred got out into the back yard at all. Tim Booker reluctantly guided her down the path, keeping a wary eye peeled for sudden movements in the long grass.

Nothing happened. The fairies had discreetly retreated to their rock-garden grottoes.

Emboldened, Booker steered Mildred over to the rock garden itself and beamed as his wife gasped in the sort of ecstasy women can summon up at will.

“How perfectly wonderful, Timmie!” she cooed. “A rock garden! The whole place is charming. We must buy some of those deck chairs and lawn umbrellas at once!”

“Timmie,” groaned, but inwardly.

“And you must mow the lawn right away,” said Mildred, cocking her head and critically surveying the tall grass. “Then we’ll be all set.”

“All set for what?”

“It’s a surprise,” said Mildred, happily. “Now why don’t you just run in and get the lawn mower and start cutting the grass right now?”

Tim Booker, who had at least eight good reasons why he didn’t want to mow the lawn this particular afternoon, obediently went in and got the lawn mower and started cutting the grass.

Mildred watched him for quite a while. She hummed gaily. Tim sweated and looked for the fairies. Not a one emerged. They were probably hiding from his wife—and in a way, he envied them.

For a brief moment he held a wild hope that perhaps the wee folk had vanished, after all.

That hope was dispelled the following morning, replaced by gloom.

TIM BOOKER, coming out to the back doorstep for the Sunday paper and the cream, found that his milk had curdled.

He said nothing. Later that morning he ran down to the shopping district and bought fresh milk.

But on Monday morning, Mildred secured the milk and opened the bottle at breakfast.

“Timmie, this milk is sour!” she announced.

“Mummph—is it?” Tim Booker played dumb.

“I’ll speak to the milkman about it,” Mildred announced.

Tim Booker had other ideas. That morning he tiptoed down the path and halted beside the rock garden.

“Hey, there!” he hissed, in a loud stage-whisper. “Hey, you guys!”

Fat little Thomakin peered around a rock.

“Good morning to yez,” he said. “And what can we be after doin’ for yer honor this morning?”

“You can damned well be after not tampering with my milk,” said Tim Booker, tactlessly.

Thomakin frowned.

“Oh, and it’s the curdled milk that’s bothering yez?” he commented.

“You did do it, didn’t you?” Tim Booker accused.

“Of course we did that,” answered Thomakin. “And beggin’ your pardon, sir, we’ll be after doin’ it again unless yez heed the warnin’.”

“What warning?”

“Don’t use the lawn-mower,” said the fairy.

“Don’t use the lawn-mower?” Tim Booker echoed.

“Absolutely not! The wee folk do detest the livin’ presence of iron.”

“Oh.” Snatches of ancient legend returned to Booker. “You don’t like iron, do you? I suppose that’s the real reason you wouldn’t hang around an army camp.”

“Correct yez are entirely,” said Thomakin. He studied Tim Booker’s face, hanging high above him, and a shrewd gleam came into the fairy’s pinpoint eyes.

“Sure, and it’s readin’ your mind I am,” accused Thomakin. “And you’d best be droppin’ such daft notions. If yez think to clear us out of here with iron, then badly mistaken yez are. For we’ll curdle your milk and sour your preserves and plague yez in a hundred ways.”

“No lawn-mower?” sighed Tim Booker. “I must let the grass run wild?”

“Precisely,” answered the fairy.

Booker shrugged and walked back up the path. He didn’t say anything to Mildred and hoped she wouldn’t bring the subject up.

THAT evening, when he came home from the office, Mildred met him at the door.

“Timmie, dear,” she chortled. “It’s been such a hot day! I do wish you’d sprinkle the lawn before you come into the house.”

Tim Booker didn’t need any bulletins on the weather. He had spent a sweltering day at work, and what he wanted most right now was a good cold shower for himself.

Instead, he obediently trotted out to sprinkle the lawn. He dragged the hose up from the basement, connected it, and stalked out into the back yard.

Muttering grimly under his breath, he angrily yanked the nozzle of the hose and let the spray fly. He turned the water up full force and spattered the walk, the grass, and then the pebbled pathway.

Just when the hose hit the rock-garden, Tim Booker didn't know.

A startled squeal brought the matter to his attention.

"Oouueee!" piped the voice.

Tim Booker glanced down just in time to see Nubbin run across the pathway, vainly trying to dodge the stream from the hose.

"Turn it off, man!" yelled Nubbin. "It's drenchin' me, yez are!"

For the first time that day, Tim Booker's spirits soared. Deliberately, he played the hose on the spluttering Nubbin. The little fairy was literally swept off his feet by the force of the water.

"So you won't clear out?" grinned Booker. "Well, then, stay here and take it."

Relentlessly, the hose pursued the fleeing Nubbin, hunted him out between the rocks. Tim Booker lost all sense of dignity and decency. He'd show these fairies! It was bad enough to have a wife and a boss to order him around, but when supernatural midges, six inches tall, tried to do the trick—

"What the—?"

Booker glanced down. The water had suddenly ceased to flow from the hose. A few drops dribbled weakly towards the soggy ground.

He turned quickly, and beheld a horrid sight.

Far up the pathway, five tiny forms crouched over the length of rubber hose.

He recognized the five other fairies. They were bending down to the hose, pressing their faces to it, and—

"By heaven!" yelled Tim Booker," "you've bitten my hose in two!"

He charged towards the wee folk furiously. They scampered off with derisive hoots and made for the tall grass along the fence.

"Don't you know there's a rubber shortage?" Booker screamed.

As they reached protection, the rearmost figure turned. It was Gandy. Incredulously, Tim Booker halted and stared as Gandy paused and deliberately thumbed his nose at him.

IT WAS a declaration of war. Tim Booker found that out when he returned home again the following evening.

An angry Mildred met him at the door.

"Somebody's been breaking in and stealing my preserves!" she chattered. "Some vandals are loose in the neighborhood, Timmie. Five jars of my best cranberries are gone. I want you to call the police, immediately."

Tim Booker winced.

"Now wait a minute," he temporized hastily.

"And another thing," Mildred shrilled. "Come here a minute. I want you to take a look at this!"

She marched Booker down the pathway into the back yard.

"Look at these flower beds," she exclaimed. "All trampled down. I tell you, some hooligans have been at work here."

Booker nodded. He knew exactly what she meant, even if she didn't. The war had started.

"You don't seem very upset," Mildred declared. "One would think you would be, after the rascals had nerve enough to write about you."

"Write about me?"

"Look there."

Booker followed his wife's frantic finger as it pointed off in the direction of the board fence. His eyes goggled with disbelief.

There were legends on the fence—legends scrawled in chalk, written in wavering letters close to the ground. Tim Booker read the legends, and reddened.

"TIM BOOKER IS A LYING SCOUNDREL"

"BOOKER BEATS HIS WIFE"

“A FOUL MURRAIN ON TIM BOOKER AND ALL HIS ILK”

“THE BACK OF ME HAND TO BOOKER”

“BOOKER HAS HOLES IN HIS SOCKS AND WE CAN SEE THEM”

“BOOKER HAS FLAT FEET”

“What in blazes!” Tim Booker inquired, dancing up and down in the intensity of his emotion. “I haven’t got flat feet or holes in my socks! Why it’s—”

Mildred giggled.

“I think they’re kind of funny,” she admitted. “I don’t see why you have to fly into a rage over a little thing like that when some thieves have been stealing my preserves and doing something really dreadful.”

Booker stared at her, open-mouthed.

“Just get a rag and wipe off those chalk-marks,” she commanded. “We don’t want them up there tomorrow afternoon.”

“Why not?”

“Because of the garden party, stupid.”

“Garden party?” groaned Booker.

“Of course. I had meant it as a surprise, but you might as well know now. I’ve ordered some nice lawn chairs and tables—those lovely metal ones—and some beach umbrellas and games and everything. And there’ll be special entertainment and oodles and gobs of people and—”

“Garden party,” said Booker, dully.

“And guess what, Timmie? Oh, I’m so excited! I’ve even persuaded Mr. and Mrs. Goudger to come. And some of their fine society friends! This is our big chance, Timmie. They’ve already accepted the invitations, and seeing tomorrow is Saturday we’ll start out at noon. It’s so wonderful!”

“Garden party,” whispered Tim Booker. “That’s all I needed!”

“I’m going in now and phone the society editor,” gushed Mildred, happily. She skipped up the pathway.

BOOKER stood there with his hands in his pockets. With a hollow groan, he edged over to the rock garden and bent down to whisper.

"Come on out," he pleaded to the empty air. "I want to talk to you." There was no response.

"You must listen to me," he begged. "Please—please—whatever you do, behave yourselves tomorrow afternoon! I've got to hold this garden party here in the back yard. For heaven's sake, don't start anything!"

No reply came from the empty twilight.

"I'll do anything you want if you'll help me out," Booker panted. "Anything at all. I'll never mow the lawn or sprinkle the grass again. I'll even sell my car so the exhaust fumes won't bother you. I'll—I'll build you a swimming pool, that's what I'll do! Anything, just so you keep out of the way while my guests are here. Please, please cooperate!"

Silence greeted his implorations in the dusk.

It was only as he started back up the path that Tim Booker heard, faintly borne on the twilight air, the faint, mysterious sound of an elfin razzberry.

THE garden party was in full swing.

Tables and chairs were set all over the lawn, and colorful, striped awnings had been hoisted, with much painful grunting, by Tim Booker early that morning.

It had taken him until noon to get everything in place, and served as an excuse for not cutting the long grass—though Mildred had given him a good tongue-lashing about that little matter.

Now, sweating freely in his new gabardine sports suit, Tim Booker wandered around and watched Dinah mix drinks at a table set up near the rock-garden. Dinah was very large, very black, and very busy. Mildred had hired her for this affair, and she plunged into her duties with gusto—particularly when it came to mixing drinks with gin in them.

Booker was in the very act of snatching a glass for himself when Mildred came up and yanked him by the arm.

"Come on, Timmie," she commanded gaily, pushing his drink away. "I want you to meet some of the guests."

Under her breath she muttered, "Quit mooching drinks, and for heaven's sake, smile!"

So Tim Booker smiled, as Mildred dragged him around by the elbow and introduced him to his new and aristocratic neighbors—a prime bunch of stinkers, if you asked him.

But nobody asked him.

"Oooh!" squeaked Mildred a moment later. "The Goudgers are arriving!"

Sure enough, Desmond Goudger and his wife, Mimi—a fat, gushing woman with dyed hair—were waddling down the pebbled pathway.

Mr. Goudger came with the inevitable half-chewed cigar working between his lips, and Mrs. Goudger—to Tim Booker's horror—came with her poodle.

It was a horrid little beast, that poodle; round and fat, with frizzy fur that bore signs of artificial curling. Tim Booker was certain Mrs. Goudger had used her own curling iron on its hair.

Introductions were effected, and Mrs. Goudger, simpering, included her poodle. "And this is Fluffy," she said, giggling.

Tim Booker forced a smile. "Hello, Fluffy," he said, bending down to pet the beast.

Fluffy smiled, wrinkled her nose, and promptly nipped at his ankle.

Booker jumped a foot backwards and sat down, rubbing his leg, as Fluffy yapped hysterically from between Mrs. Goudger's fat calves.

"Playful, isn't she?" grated Tim Booker, with a ghastly leer. He wondered if you could stuff dog-biscuits with dynamite.

Mildred took charge of the situation.

"Get up and stop clowning, Timmie dear," she cooed. "Let's all sit down at a table. Dinah will be here with some drinks directly."

Dinah brought the drinks. Booker could hardly wait to grab his highball. He needed it. While Mr. and Mrs. Goudger sipped, Booker gulped and glanced nervously about the garden. He was looking for the fairies.

They had kept out of sight, so far. Tim Booker hoped to goodness they would continue to do so.

Handling these guests was going to be enough of a problem. Booker saw them sitting at the other tables, drinking and gabbling away. The men, for the most part, seemed a decent sort—confining their activities to drinking. But their wives spent the time criticizing the chairs, the colored awnings, the garden in general, and Mildred's lawn dress.

"NICE place you have here." Goudger thrust his smouldering cigar in Booker's face.

"Oh—yeah, we like it a lot," Booker answered.

"I don't see how you can afford it on your salary," said Desmond Goudger.

Mildred promptly nudged Booker. She wanted him to ask for a raise—he knew it. Tim Booker gulped and dutifully opened his mouth. But Goudger beat him to it.

"No, I don't see how you manage it," he smiled. "And it's going to be harder after I cut your salary next month as I've planned."

Tim Booker gulped again.

"Thought I'd let you know," chuckled Goudger. "We've got to pare down expenses—it's wartime, you understand."

"But, Mr. Goudger—"

"Eeeeeek!"

Mimi Goudger made the sound, and a face.

"What is it, darling?" snapped Desmond Goudger.

"Oh—nothing." Mrs. Goudger subsided, squirming uncomfortably.

"About that salary proposition—" said Tim Booker.

"Eeeeyow!"

This time Mimi Goudger rose completely from her chair. Her face crimson, she turned to Booker.

"You pinched me!" she accused.

"I—what?" gasped Tim Booker.

"You deliberately pinched me," said Mrs. Goudger. "At first I thought you were only trying to be playful, but this is too much."

"But you must be mistaken," spluttered Booker. "I haven't let my hands leave my lap."

Mildred and Mr. Goudger glared at him. The unhappy Booker cast an imploring glance at his accuser.

"Where did you get pinched?" he inquired.

"What a question to ask a lady!" cried Mrs. Goudger. "But if you must know, it was between the second and third rung of my seat."

Tim Booker cast a quick glance underneath the lady's chair—just in time to see the tiny figure of Nubbin disappear in the rustling grass.

The fairies were at work again!

With a muttered, "Pardon me—explain it all later," Tim Booker rose and fled.

It was useless to try and pursue the malicious sprite. He was going for a drink.

At the liquor table, Dinah confronted him with a bewildered flutter of her ham-like hands.

"Lawsy, Mistah Bookah," she said. "You-all is got some mighty peeculyah guestses! Somebody done stole a whole quaht of Irish whiskey from this heah table."

"Oh gosh!" said Tim Booker, snatching the nearest bottle and draining a great gulp of the fiery liquor.

WITH tears in his eyes, he turned to face a strange spectacle. A brawny man in a leopard-skin and a thin, earnest-looking blonde girl in a bedsheet stood at a corner of the lawn.

Mildred was talking to them as Booker stumbled over.

"What kind of a freak show is this?" he demanded.

Mildred flashed him a scornful glance. "Lady-pincher!" she sneered.

“Never mind that—who are these people?”

“Haven’t you ever heard of Valour and Chrystis, the celebrated Grecian dancers?” she asked him.

“Is that some kind of a trick question?” Booker shot back. “I assume you are trying to tell me that these two are Valour and Chrystis, the celebrated whatever-they-are. What I want to know is—what are they doing on our lawn?”

“They’re going to dance, stupid!” said Mildred. “Greeks always danced on the lawn.”

“Not on my lawn they didn’t.”

“But this is my biggest surprise, Timmie. Mimi Goudger is just crazy about artistic things. She’s a patron of the dance.”

Tim Booker eyed the muscular man, and his lanky feminine partner with illy-concealed distaste.

“Mean they’re going to clodhop around barefoot?”

A blast from the portable phonograph on the back porch settled the question. Dinah had put on a record, and now Mildred stepped to the center of the lawn, clapping her hands. Hastily she introduced the two celebrated devotees of Terpsichore, and the leopard-skinned giant and his agile partner scampered to the center of the greensward.

Helplessly shrugging his shoulders, Tim Booker floundered back to the table and joined the Goudgers.

They were staring at the dance team as they cavorted in a semi-adagio over the lawn.

Absent-mindedly, Desmond Goudger’s hand fumbled for his drink and the cigar he had placed on the edge of the table.

Then he poked Tim Booker.

“Did you steal my drink, Booker?” he demanded, in a thunderous whisper.

“Of course not,” Booker replied. “I’ve one of my own here.”

But when he looked, his own drink was gone.

“But I did have,” he protested. “Just a—”

“Quiet!” snapped Mildred, digging him in the ribs.

Booker cast a quick glance at the grass beyond his feet. Sure enough, bobbing across the lawn, apparently moving of its own volition, was a whiskey-glass. Following it came a tall highball glass. Bringing up the rear like a miniature torch, was Goudger’s smudging cigar.

“Those damned fairies,” muttered Tim Booker. “They stole the whiskey—they’re drunk, that’s what they are! Drunk!”

“Who’s drunk?” yelled Desmond Goudger. “I tell you you stole my glass and you accuse me of being drunk. Listen here, Booker—”

Booker didn’t listen. He stared in rapt horror at the dancers on the lawn.

Something was going wrong with their routine. Something was going very much wrong. The two dancers were giggling and lifting their feet in awkward haste.

Grass rippled at their feet. Only Booker saw the tiny scurrying figures, hidden by the tall grass-blades, who tickled the bare toes of the pair.

AND as the babble of audience comment rose, only Booker could detect shrill voices, grumbling a few audible words.

“Trampling down the grass . . . it’s fixing them we are . . .”

The dancers were rapidly being “fixed.”

But the fairies had further plans. Tim Booker suddenly was aware of movement under his very feet. Fluffy, the poodle, was jumping around, uttering hysterical yaps.

Tim Booker shot a glance beneath the table, just in time to see Dunnie, her red hair flaming, rise from the grass and stick Fluffy in an exposed flank with Mrs. Goudger’s hat-pin.

Then Dunnie disappeared. So did Fluffy.

With a shrill yelp, the poodle charged across the lawn. Goaded by pain and indignation, Fluffy swept forward, yapping and yipping, straight for the dancers.

Leopard-skin had his partner balanced on his back at the very moment that Fluffy bore down on them.

He began to yap a little himself, and ran around through the grass. Then Fluffy caught up with him and it was all over.

The three disappeared in a whirling ball that struck the ground.

It was a sublime spectacle, but nobody even noticed it.

For at that moment, the gay, striped umbrella awning over the table suddenly collapsed and fell down upon Desmond Goudger, his wife, Mildred, and Tim Booker.

Pandemonium, true to tradition, reigned.

Floundering, gasping, choking beneath the canopy, Tim Booker fought his way free. Twice he was bitten by somebody as he was bending over struggling to his feet. He thought at the time that it was probably Mrs. Goudger, but decided not to mention it.

It was bad enough to face her and her irate husband when the awning was finally thrown aside.

Mildred saved the day. Laughing merrily, she smiled at the bewildered assemblage.

“Just a little accident,” She giggled. “Wasn’t it, Timmie?”

“Timmie” rubbed his shins and choked up a fearful smile.

“Let’s all have a drink,” Mildred suggested. “Then I’ve got something else on the program.”

For once she had come out with the right suggestion. Booker noted that she was diplomatically putting a double shot of whiskey in each drink she mixed. Within a few minutes the drinks were distributed and peace was restored.

By this time the liquor was actually taking hold of the crowd. The peaceful mood was usurped by a sudden gaiety. Everybody began laughing too loudly or shrilly.

Mildred, pleased at the change, quickly served another round of refreshments.

Booker drank both drinks and sneaked a few more. The warm glow was all he had to fortify him. He kept glancing around, waiting for the next move on the part of his tiny tormentors.

It didn't take a second glance at the nibbled ropes to tell him who was responsible for the fallen awning. He watched the grass, but saw no movements. Maybe they were all so drunk by this time that they'd crawled into the rock-garden to sleep it off. Booker felt like crawling in with them.

He didn't have a chance.

Because at that very moment, Mildred announced, "Now everybody's going to play croquet."

SURE enough, Dinah was coming down from the porch with an armful of mallets, balls and wire wickets. She set them up from a hastily-scrutinized map in her hand. Meanwhile Mildred laughingly recruited the men to push tables and chairs out of the way.

"Croquet!" muttered Tim Booker, savagely downing another drink. "That does it!"

Everything got blurry, then. The trouble was, it wouldn't stay that way.

Booker was perfectly conscious when his wife grabbed him by one hand, thrust a croquet mallet into the other, and simpered, "We're playing partners, dear. Against the Goudgers."

"On this lawn?" moaned Booker.

"Must we?" He glanced helplessly about as he saw the other couples gathering. The fairies wouldn't like their lawn trampled down—they wouldn't approve of all these wickets and pegs. And they were liable to do something about it.

"Let's have another drink first," Booker suggested, sparring for time.

"You've had enough," Mildred snapped. "Come on. Grab your mallet and let's go to work—or play."

Then everything got mercifully blurry again for Mr. Booker. He saw his wife and the Goudgers doing things with mallets and large wooden balls that rolled through wire wickets.

But he also saw something else.

The grass at the edge of the lawn was moving. Moving and bending! Bobbing above the tops of the blades he saw heads—small heads that wobbled in drunken rage. Over the click of the mallets and the squeals of the guests, Booker's alcohol-attuned ears heard the high, shrill whispering.

"It's abusin' our lawn they are, with their iron wickets."

"Begorra, and we'd best be after takin' matters in hand."

"Dunnie, dear, and did ye bring the whiskey?"

"Whist! We'd be up and at 'em."

Booker knew he was drunk. He tried to imagine that he had hallucinations, and didn't succeed very well. He knew those fairies! Slip and Sib and Gandy and Dunnie, Thomakin and Nubbin were crouching there in the grass—

"Watch this one now!"

Desmond Goudger's great voice boomed in his ears. The red-faced man mangled a cigar between his molars as he stepped up and swung his mallet.

"I used to be a champion at this sort of thing," he asserted. "I played polo for a while, too."

"Who rode you?" squeaked a voice.

"What's that?" yelled Goudger, glaring at Tim Booker.

But Tim Booker hadn't said a word. The voice came from somewhere behind his knees. He wheeled around, but the fairy was gone.

"Huh!" Goudger grasped his mallet and bent down to hit the ball.

He jumped as if stung.

"What's the matter, dear?" asked Mrs. Goudger bewilderedly.

Goudger got redder, but said nothing. He shifted his legs and prepared to take a swing.

"What in perdition?" Goudger straightened up, glowering.

"What is it?" insisted Mimi Goudger.

Goudger looked very embarrassed. "I don't like to say it," he blurted, "but somebody seems to be pulling my socks down on me."

“Don’t look at me,” said Tim Booker, hastily. “Why should I pull down your socks?”

“To spoil my stroke,” Goudger answered.

“I wouldn’t spoil your stroke. Go ahead and have it—I hope it’s apoplexy.”

“What?” roared Goudger.

TIM BOOKER wheeled again. He hadn’t said anything. The shrill voice came from his side, on the ground.

“Timmie, that isn’t funny,” whined Mildred, simpering at Desmond Goudger. “Go ahead, Mr. Goudger.”

The boss put his foot on the ball for a tight croquet stance. Then he started to swing.

“Oooooh!” gasped his wife. “Something bit my ankle.”

“Mosquitoes,” said Tim Booker.

“Nuts!” yelled Desmond Goudger. “You’ve put me off again.”

Desperately, he swung. The wooden ball rolled for the wicket. They stood watching it.

“Perfect,” said Mildred.

At the last minute something happened. The ball did not swerve through the thick grass—but suddenly the wicket seemed to jump to one side.

Open-mouthed, they saw the ball continue, while the wicket turned on one end and swung away from its path.

“How in the—”

Goudger’s question was never finished. From all around them came a series of simultaneous gasps, oaths, and startled cries.

Tim Booker, through blurry eyes, saw that the rest of his guests were having the same odd difficulties. All over the lawn, wickets were moving and turning. Men and women were pulling up their socks and stockings.

To Booker’s horror, a fat man suddenly tripped over a wicket and sprawled on the turf. A moment before there had been no wicket in his path.

"What kind of a circus is this?" Goudger exclaimed. "My drinks are stolen, my wife is pinched, awnings fall down, and now your croquet game goes whacky. Damn it all, I'm not licked yet. I don't know how you're managing to cheat me, Booker, but I'll show you."

He swung at the ball madly. His mallet came down with a sharp click. At the last second it swerved aside and hit Goudger's ankle.

"Ouch!" thundered Desmond Goudger.

From behind him, out of nowhere, a new croquet ball came sailing through the air. As Booker watched, it rose and smacked Goudger smartly on the back of the head.

"Ooooof!" Goudger gasped.

Booker stared at Gandy in the grass behind. He had thrown the croquet ball.

He was still staring as Desmond Goudger, bellowing like a bull, charged down on him.

"Curse you, Booker!" yelled the baffled man. "You threw that ball at me."

"I saw him, too!" added Mimi Goudger, glibly.

"Brute!" sobbed Mildred.

THE blur faded from Booker's brain. Suddenly he saw them all as his mortal enemies. He crouched, waiting for Goudger's spring, and gripped the mallet in his hand.

"I hit you, eh?" he shouted. "All right, I'll do it again, too!"

Raising the mallet, he swung it outward.

Desmond Goudger ran right into it, stomach first.

Right then and there the riot started.

Mimi picked up a croquet ball and hit Mildred. Mildred tripped Mimi. A man fell over Mimi's legs and promptly lashed out at his neighbor.

And Tim Booker, yelling like an Irish banshee, charged on the mob, waving his mallet like a shillelagh.

“Out of my garden!” he screeched. “Out of here, all of you! You worthless, lily-livered bunch of croquet-playing fools! I’d rather have a hundred fairies on my hands than an ill-tempered gang of mortals like you!”

Behind him came the high, squeaking battle cry of the wee folk.

A shower of croquet balls rose from the grass to pelt the fleeing guests. Wickets rose out of nowhere to trip their flying feet. Mallets launched themselves miraculously from the grass and thudded into backsides.

And with oaths and imprecations, Tim Booker whirled his weapon and drove them from his garden. They ran for their cars, they ran for their lives—and Mildred and the Goudgers led all the rest.

Only when the last car whirled out of the driveway bearing the final group of frightened guests and Mildred as well, did Tim Booker check his rage.

He stood slumped in the twilight, sick with the realization of what he’d done. He’d lost his reputation, his job, and his wife, all in one fell swoop.

Panic gripped him.

“I’ve got to get out of here,” he muttered. Without a backward glance, he turned and ran towards the house to pack his trunk.

THE panic was gone from Tim Booker’s soul when he dumped his grips and trunk on the bed in the YMCA.

There was no frown on Booker’s face. Surprisingly enough, he was grinning cheerfully as he sat down on a chair and removed his shoes.

This was the life, after all. For the first time he realized he hadn’t lost anything that really mattered. He spoke aloud, sorting his random thoughts.

“Mildred and I were through a long time ago, I guess. I just didn’t dare admit it to myself, that’s all. Now I’m free, and she can find somebody else to nag.

“And I haven’t got an old tyrant like Goudger on my neck, either. I’ll find a better job right away.”

He opened his suitcases, humming under his breath.

"Guess I owe those fairies a debt of gratitude after all. Good little people, those fairies. Hope they enjoy themselves there with the house to themselves."

He unstrapped his trunk and fumbled for a key.

"Come to think of it," he breathed, "I'm rid of them, too. Not that I don't appreciate what they've done for me. But spending my whole life with that crew of leprechauns would be pretty wearing. I'm glad that adventure is over."

He opened his trunk, began to take out his clothing. Then he stepped back, stiffened.

The drawers of the trunk were slowly opening outward. Booker's eyes popped.

From each of the six drawers a tiny face peered up at him with an elfin grin.

"You!" whispered Booker. "Here!"

"That's right," squeaked Nubbin, gaily. "It's here we are, my fine sir! After the fine way you protected us from those guests, did you ever for a minute think we'd be desertin' you? Ah no, me dear man—we've switched allegiance. From now on we're not Emmett O'Driscoll's wee folk any longer—we were after playing stowaway in yer trunk—and now we belong to you."

"You belong to me," said Booker, dully.

"For life!" answered Nubbin.

Booker held his head in his hands as he watched the six fairies scamper from the trunk and dance down across his bed.

This was the end. He'd have the fairies on his hands for the rest of his days now. How could he get a fresh start? How could he hope to carry out his plans—get a job in an airplane factory, for example.

An airplane factory!

Suddenly Tim Booker sat up and grinned.

"You're mine for life," he said. "You'll serve me faithfully?"

The six tiny heads nodded.

“Then listen here,” said Booker. “I’ve got some orders.”

For ten minutes the wee folk clustered about Tim Booker, climbing across his lap and nodding as he spoke.

Only once was there an interruption.

“But the iron—” said Thomakin.

“It’s for your country!” snapped Tim Booker. “Remember that. We’re all making sacrifices. And you’ll stand contact with iron for such a cause.”

They nodded again.

So Tim Booker, smiling happily, went to the telephone and called Washington, long distance. He waited for his connection, got his party, gave his name and address, and stated his business. It was a long conversation, but Booker got to the point.

“That’s what I thought, sir,” he said. “I’d read you were using midgets to crawl up inside and weld those tiny airplane parts. But I think I’ve got some workers who will do even better for you.”

He glanced happily at the fairies on the bed.

“No, sir,” said Tim Booker. “They’re not exactly midgets. But you’d better hire them anyway. I can tell you one thing—I’d rather have them fighting for me than against me. And that’s no fairy tale.”

Black Barter

Would you believe it, the guy was so lonely he longed even for the sight of a vampire, a werewolf and centaur!

1. Stone Broke

WELL, I'm back again.

Remember me? I'm the fellow who got a job with Julius Margate. Margate, the sorceror, who lived in the big mansion and had a hobby of collecting monstrosities.

No, I'm not one of the monstrosities he collected. I just took care of them. That was my job—to act as a sort of nursemaid to mythological entities.

For example, it was my duty to feed Mr. Simpkins. He was a vampire, you may recall.

I recall it too, with shudders.

Then I took care of Jory the werewolf, and Gerymanx, who was a centaur. I also had charge of Myrtle, the hamadryad—a tree nymph. And of course, there was my special pet, Trina the mermaid. I built her a swimming pool and my gifts of herring showed that I was caring.

Oh, we were a happy little family, all right! Margate was so proud of his unusual collection of monsters, and I grew fond of them all.

Then came that ghastly day when Margate received a new pet for his collection. Nothing less than the hideous Medusa. And the sight of her turned Margate and his companions to stone.

How I got rid of the Medusa is another story.

But when the Medusa was finally reduced to rubble, I was left all alone in Margate's big mansion, with nothing but stone statues for company. The stone images of Margate, Jory, Mr. Simpkins, Gerymanx, and Trina—and a stone tree on the lawn that was once Myrtle the hamadryad.

I used to sit in Margate's study, a huge room where he kept his collection of books on goety and necromantic divination, and brood despondently. I fingered his alembic, his bottles of root-extracts and poisons. There was one bottle I didn't dare touch—one that housed a geni.

After a few days I stopped fingering bottles and began to drink from them. For Margate had a stock of fine liquor in his cellar, right next to the coffin that once housed Mr. Simpkins, the vampire.

Who can blame me? I was so lonely! Lonely for a sight of my unusual friends. I used to brush the statues every day with loving care. Particularly the statue of Trina the mermaid. Ah, there was a girl! I sighed when I thought of her, and the wonderful times we'd spent together. She and I would sit in the magic moonlight and I would toss her a fish. The sight of her piquant face as she twisted her neck and caught the fish in her mouth—it haunted me with wistful poignancy.

A man can stand only so much of such moon-drenched memories. I had to do something.

Of course, I could have left the mansion and sought a job elsewhere. But if I went away, who would brush the dust from the faces of my stone friends? Into what unsympathetic hands would I entrust the statues? I couldn't bear the thought.

SO I stayed. Stayed and studied. Studied sorcery in the great black library of Julius Margate. Studied sorcery in the shadowed silence of dust-shrouded shelves.

I pored intently through endless pages, peered at passages in musty, iron-girdled tomes, perused with a perilous purpose.

For I was seeking a spell—an evocation—a rune or incantation—a rite or ritual—whereby I could summon my friends to animate life again. I sought to shatter that shroud of stone that swathed their souls.

Somewhere I must stumble across a solution, a means to kindle living flesh from marble. A mystic Pygmalion, I sought the formula to evoke a half-dozen Galateas. There must be a way!

I read, and shuddered. Here and there were hints. Only a linguist could hope to translate Greek, Latin, medieval French and German, Sanskrit, Arabic and Hebrew. Once translated, only a devotee of mantic arts would risk his soul to perform the dark offices necessary to conjure up Those who might grant the baleful boon of forbidden life.

But I searched. Day after day, night after night. When the autumnal skies were black as my despair, I read on. When the ravening winds howled as mournfully as the sighs that rose in my throat, I pondered over the yellowed, crumbling pages.

The wings of ancient evil brushed my face and left deep lines etched about my eyes, but I read on. I sat till dawn, forever seeking a solution for my dark desires.

Seated one night in the study, I heard a knock on the great outer door.

I rose, startled. Wryly, I thought of Poe's Raven. But dismissing the absurd fancy with a grin, I shook off my bemusement and stalked down the hall.

As I went striding along, blood flowed back into my cramped limbs. I began to feel a little foolish about the whole thing.

I was going to see another human face finally, and I was self-conscious about the way I'd been spending my time.

More than that, I experienced a curious elation. I didn't know who in the world would be knocking on Julius Margate's door around midnight, but anyone would prove a welcome visitor to me. I thirsted for companionship.

Just the mere act of answering the door brought my spirits up with a bound.

I unchained the door, fumbled with the lock, threw the door open wide.

There was a sudden swoop.

A broomstick hit me in the face.

Riding the broomstick was a witch!

2. Black Massacre

I LAY flat on my back and stared up as the witch swooped into the hallway on her broomstick.

“Whoa, there,” muttered the witch, and the broomstick clattered to a halt on the floor. The witch climbed off slowly. A dog and a cat jumped down from the shaft of the broomstick behind her. The witch dumped a large satchel on the floor.

All the while, I stared, recognizing her for what she was. Oh, she was a witch, all right! The broomstick proved it—and so did the beaked nose, the wrinkled face, the gray, disheveled hair.

My first impulse was to stay right where I was, on die floor. It seemed somehow safer there. But the witch gave me a withering glance.

“Up off the floor with you,” she snapped. “Is that any way to greet a guest?”

She placed her broomstick neatly in the comer.

I rose and faced her, mumbling my name. I didn’t have the courage to hold out my hand in greeting.

She took no notice of the omission. A smile revealed her toothless gums.

“I am Miss Terioso,” announced the witch. “An old friend of Julius Margate’s.”

“Is that so?” I answered, brilliantly.

“Used to see him around at covens,” the witch explained.

“Covens?”

"Witch Sabbats," Miss Terioso enlightened me.

"But I didn't know he went in for such things."

"Oh, it was just a hobby with him. He dabbled a bit in witchcraft. Dabbled in everything, did Julius Margate. A bit of a dabbler and a bit of a babbler. Eh?"

Miss Terioso laughed. Some of the more sadistic radio advertisers might have liked that laugh for a spot announcement I didn't care for it, myself.

"Aren't you going to ask me in?" she demanded. "Where's your courtesy, young sir?"

I indicated the parlor with a weak gesture. Miss Terioso's bent figure crept across the hall. She turned an evil profile toward me, and Ell swear she looked like something only a vulture would love. A mother vulture, at that.

"By the way," she screeched, "better get some milk for my dear pets here. My familiars, dear little lambs."

I stared at the snarling, mangy dog and the hissing, scrawny black cat. They padded towards me stealthily.

HASTILY, I backed into the hall and ran to the kitchen. Returning with a saucer of milk, I found the witch and her two familiars in the parlor under the lamplight.

"That's a courteous young man," approved Miss Terioso. "Let them sup on milk. Of course it's not as good as the real red stuff, but it's better than nothing. Eh?"

I nodded, but the last half of the nod was a shiver.

"Look at the darlings," commanded the witch. "My two sweet lovelies!"

"What are their names?" I asked, just as if I wanted to know.

"I call the cat Fido and the dog is named Puss," she told me.

"Very nice," I answered.

The witch sat down and raised her legs. With a shock I noticed that she was wearing slacks under her black skirt.

“Those slacks—” I began.

She giggled softly, like a wounded tigress.

“What’s wrong with them?” she demanded. “Nothing immodest about slacks, young sir! I have to wear them. I’m certainly not going to min a good pair of silk stockings riding a broomstick.” This sounded logical.

“As it is, I’m worried about a straw shortage for my broom,” Miss Terioso complained. She opened her big satchel and took out a woolen knitting bag and two knitting needles.

“Do you knit?” I asked.

She giggled again. “Not exactly.”

Reaching into the knitting bag she extracted a tiny wax mannikin and began to stick her knitting needles into its body.

“Just a poppet,” she explained. “Do you mind if I work while we talk?”

“Not at all,” I gulped.

She put the poppet away and reached into the big satchel again. When her hand emerged again it was clutching something.

A human arm!

She reached in again and drew out a leg. A shapely leg, but a severed limb, for all that.

“Murderess!” I choked.

Miss Terioso smiled. “Flatterer!” she cooed. “I haven’t really murdered anyone in years! No, young sir. These are not human limbs. They are the limbs of a window dummy. Here.”

She began to bring out more appendages from her satchel. Another arm, another leg. A torso. And finally, a lovely head with a red wig.

Expertly, she fitted the various parts together. Soon a complete window dummy stood before us. A very pretty redheaded window dummy—distinctly female.

“Just a notion of mine,” Miss Terioso explained. “I began to think that my poppets were too small to really get delicate work into them with the needles. So I bought this window dummy. It’s still a wax figure, but a life-sized one. Clever, eh?”

"Clever is no word for it," I said. And it wasn't.

Suddenly Miss Terioso shrugged.

"But let us get down to business, then," she declared. "I am here for a definite reason. I want Julius Margate."

"You can't see him." I spoke too rapidly to be cautious about it. "You can't see him. He's turned to stone."

The witch grinned.

"I know. I know all about it. He's stone and the rest of his freaks are statues, too. And I want him."

"You want his statue?"

"Yes."

Was I crazy, or did Miss Terioso blush slightly?

"I—I used to have a crush on die old fool," she explained. "I'd like to have him around for sentimental reasons." Somehow this didn't sound convincing. She looked about as sentimental as a barracuda.

There was more here than met the eye, I decided. So I also decided on a little strategy.

"By the way, Miss Terioso," I began. "Before we get down to details—would you care for a little refreshment?"

The witch simpered. "Don't mind if I do, young sir. Have you a bit of human—" She checked herself hastily. "No, I don't suppose you would," she sighed. "Be right back," I promised.

AND I was. I went down to the cellar, rummaged around, and emerged with a fifth of Irish whiskey and two glasses. Bearing the refreshments back to the parlor, I poured out two neat shots. Miss Terioso drained her glass.

I refilled it.

Miss Terioso drank the second as a chaser, so I refilled it again.

"Very pleasant," she told me. "I enjoy something mild for a change."

"One of Margate's prize bottles," I remarked.

"Speaking of bottles," she interrupted, "I meant to tell you this before. I not only want to buy Margate and the other statues, but that geni in the bottle as well. He has a geni in a bottle, hasn't he?"

I admitted it. "But what I want to know," I said, filling her glass for the fifth time, "is what you want with those statues."

She drank. I refilled her glass.

"I told you," she repeated. "I am sentimental about the old son of a poltergeist. I'd like to have him around to look at. eh?"

The liquor was working. The witch was getting slightly tipsy. I refilled her glass once more and proceeded artfully.

"Come now," I coaxed. "We're friends, aren't we? You can tell me tire truth. What do you really want with those statues?"

"Ha!" cackled Miss Terioso. "He's so artful, this kind young sir. Methinks he wants me to betray the fact that I intend to re-animate those statues myself and bring them back to life. But he'll never squeeze a word about it from me, he won't! Eh?"

I smiled and pressed my fingers together judiciously before my face.

"Suppose someone wanted to bring the statues back to life," I said, just as if I'd never heard her maunderings. "Would it be possible through sorcery?"

"Anything is possible through sorcery, my pet," said the witch, "If one is willing to pay the price."

She cackled, grabbed the bottle, and clawed it to her scrawny bosom.

"Now the price for a fine young man like you would be high," she mumbled. "But an old hand like myself—blast you, there are ways and means of paying very little. Of striking bargains, as it were. I should conjure a demon . . . a friendly one, of course . . . and I should not sell my soul. I could not, for I sold it long ago. Long, long ago."

The witch began to sing Long, Long Ago in a voice like a tugboat's whistle. I coughed discreetly.

"Eh? It's the problem of animating those statues, isn't it, dear sir?" Miss Terioso smiled. "I have a sort of a due bill on Hell, so to speak. There are certain powers and perquisites coming to me. I should just summon my demon, ask the boon, and the statues would be warm flesh and blood in the twinkling of an owl's eye!"

She drank again.

"But how do you summon demons?" I demanded.

"You hold a Black Mass," she answered. Everybody knows that." Suddenly a look of crafty reticence spread over her wrinkled countenance. "But I'm talking too much. I see that now. I'll not tell you how to hold a Mass to Satan, never fear. I'd be such a silly to tell you, eh?"

I was prepared for this. For suddenly I saw a way of bringing back my friends. So I proceeded deliberately about my appointed task.

"You can't fool me," I mocked. "You and your talk about Black Masses and witchcraft." I rose and smiled. "You and your ridiculous little wax figures. And this foolish looking window dummy here!" I tapped the red-headed dummy with an accusing finger.

"You aren't a witch," I told her. "Just a broken-down dressmaker, I'm thinking! All this is nonsense."

She rose to the bait.

"Nonsense, is it?" screeched Miss Terioso, "I'm not a witch, eh? I, the most famous sorceress in three continents and four dimensions?"

"Black Mass," I chortled, scornfully. "That's horseplay of another color."

Miss Terioso gulped the last drink in the bottle and lurched to her feet. She stared at me with bloodshot eyes.

"You can't hold a Black Mass," I snickered.

"Oh, can't I?" snarled tire witch. "I'll show you! I'll not only hold a Black Mass—I'll blessed well hold one with stripes if you like!"

3. The Mass Is a Mess

MISS TERIOSO swayed out into the wide hallway. I followed at her rundown heels, gasping in mingled apprehension and excitement.

Then we stood in the huge room that held the statuary. I lit a lamp and revealed the stony images of my friends. There was pot-bellied little Julius Margate, his face a marble mask of bewilderment. Gaunt Mr. Simpkins hovered, his false teeth forever frozen in an embarrassed grin. Jory, as a stone wolf, held a petrified paw in the air. Gerymanx was a noble Grecian centaur and looked somehow natural in stone. And Trina made a beautiful mermaid. She had a gorgeous shape-plenty of these and those, and fins, too.

I sighed.

The witch wheezed alcoholically in my face.

"Think I can't do it?" she muttered.

"A Black Mass? It's ridiculous," I told her. "I understand you must draw a pentagon in blue chalk, and use holy wafers and sacramental wine; And you intone the Lord's Prayer backwards in Latin, and use the body of a naked woman for an altar."

"Right," said the witch.

"Well, you haven't got the facilities, so that's that!" I jeered.

Miss Terioso tittered drunkenly.

"I'll fix that," she promised. "You've got some chalk, haven't you, dear boy? Margate must have some around for his own spells."

I rummaged through the library and returned with a stub of blue, phosphorescent chalk.

I found Miss Terioso on her way back from the kitchen, laden with packages. "Here's the chalk."

She set to work on hands and knees, drawing a glowing blue line. Panting, she arose.

"That's no pentagon," I exclaimed.

"There's only four sides to it."

"Ran out of chalk," mumbled the witch. "It doesn't matter, really."

She faced me and began to chew on something.

"Holy wafer?" I asked.

"No," said Miss Terioso. "Haven't got any. This is a graham cracker. Same thing, almost."

She drank something out of a cup.

Sacramental wine?"

"Coca-cola," the witch explained. "They will probably never know the difference."

Suddenly she ran tipsily out of the room and returned with the window dummy, which she placed across two chairs.

"We have no naked woman for an altar, so the dummy will have to do," said Miss Terioso. "Here goes for the invocation."

As the phosphorescent chalk glowed in the darkness, the witch crouched over the window dummy, mumbling sonorously.

"Wait a minute," I interrupted. "That doesn't sound like the Lord's Prayer backwards in Latin."

"Don't remember the Latin," sighed the witch. "I'm using pig-Latin."

She continued. After a moment she began to make passes with her clawlike hands. Her voice deepened, then rose shrilly. I recognized rumbling syllables and shrieking vocables.

The cadence was rhythmic. In my fancy the blue lines of the pentagon began to dance in pulsation with her pronouncements.

It wasn't fancy. The lines moved. The room swayed. Her voice shrieked.

Miss Terioso turned blue in the face. Her drunken mumblings slurred oddly. She began to sway.

The sight was very impressive. She looked just as though she had been given a Mickey Finn.

With a supernatural belch, Miss Terioso slid to the floor in a dead faint.

"Out like a light," I sighed. "Oh well, I might have known the old hag couldn't do it."

"Do what?"

"Why, that she couldn't—hey!" I wheeled suddenly as I realized that a strange voice had addressed me.

Staring across the blue line I saw the strange owner of the strange voice.

This time I almost slid to the door.

But not quite. I gazed at the presence on the other side of the pseudo-pentagon.

Was it a demon?

If demons have red, scaly bodies like gigantic lizards, and semi-anthropomorphic limbs, slick hairless skulls, and faces like grinning death—then it was a demon, all right.

Or a demon, all wrong.

Because despite this terrifying aspect, there was something horribly bedraggled about this apparition.

HIS eyes were bloodshot. His cheeks were scratched. His arms hung limply, and his chest rose and fell in despairing gasps. I noticed that his tail was dragging.

“Go ahead,” said the deep voice, in accents that congealed my vertebrae. “Go ahead, make sport of me! You accursed human midge! You enscorcelled scum, you foul thaumaturgical impostor! You’re not fit to be impaled on a spit for a weenie roast in hell!”

“What do you mean?” I gulped.

“What do I mean? The infernal impudence of the nigromantic nincompoop! I mean you bungled the whole ceremony! You used the wrong materials, you gave the wrong accent to the invocations, you even left out part of the Gloric Chant!”

“But—”

“And what does that mean? I’ll tell you what,” snarled the demon, and his eyes flashed at 400° Fahrenheit. “It means I was dragged bodily through five-dimensional space. It means I was twisted through the veritable warpings in the spatial continuum! I was bruised and battered and banged and buffeted, and nearly annihilated before I got here! My mundane simulacrum was almost impossible to assume.

“And why? Because an amateur sorceror like yourself didn’t know how to call me. Why you don’t know enough to raise the dead! Why don’t you read the rule books?"

"Wait a minute," I temporized. "I didn't call you. She did—Miss Terioso. the witch. She was drunk and forgot a lot of things."

"Drunk, eh?" said the demon, with a self-righteous smirk. "Serves her right. Never touch the stuff myself. Wine is a mocker."

I nodded.

The demon did an alarming thing. He thrust his head out on his rubbery neck. It stretched a good foot.

As he darted his skull forward and back restlessly, I diffidently jumped a yard to one side.

"Well, now that I'm here, what are you going to do about it?" demanded the demon. "Have I wriggled through the dimensions all for nothing? I want something to eat, something to kill, or something to bargain over."

"I'll bargain with you," I said boldly.

"You?" The demon sniffed. "You aren't a sorceror. What can you offer me? Your soul?"

"I don't think so," I hesitated.

"Current rate of exchange is very favorable," said the demon suddenly all coaxing smiles. "I pay highest prices."

"Not interested," I insisted.

"Then I might as well go," the demon sighed.

Inspiration smote me.

"Wait a minute," I snapped. "I'll give you a wonderful trade. How would you like to own a geni?"

"A geni? You have a geni?" The glare on the demon's face registered red incredulity. "I doubt that very much."

"I have a geni in a bottle," I told him. "Wait right here and I'll be back in a flash with the flask."

He waited, and I was.

Barely a minute passed before I returned, bearing the curious old bottle from Margate's library. Within it gurgled the geni, like a shrunken mermaid.

The demon goggled.

"You have got one at that," he admitted. His eyes narrowed to cunning slits. "What are you asking for it?" he purred. "A boon."

"Be specific."

"I want these statues reanimated," I said, waving my arm to embrace the stone images around me. "I want their souls, or life-force, to return to flesh instead of stone."

"That's very difficult," said the demon, thoughtfully. "Couldn't you settle for something easier? How about a blonde? Lots of you magicians seem to go for deals involving blondes. A nice blond succubae, now, with big—"

"Never mind," I insisted. "I want those statues alive."

The demon shrugged. "I don't know."

"Think of the geni," I said, shaking the bottle. "One of your own kind. A helpless prisoner in a bottle. How would you like to be shut up in a bottle, like—like an olive?"

The demon winced. I knew I had him. "I am too soft-hearted," he rumbled. "But I'll do it. Or try to do it. A most unusual request, and there's so much to arrange."

"Get to work," I said. "I'll toss you the bottle in a moment."

"Hold on," advised the demon. "This is liable to be a bit messy."

It was.

I didn't mind the way the air changed colors as the demon crouched in the center of the room, croaking gutturally as he squatted like a malignant frog.

I didn't mind the great quaking wind that rose to howl through my hair.

I didn't mind the smoke and the flame.

But when the chandelier crashed from the ceiling and hit me on the head, I minded very much indeed.

The world went black and I went to sleep beside Miss Terioso on the floor.

There was a confused impression of a gigantic hand grasping the geni-bottle, a muffled illusion of smoke and shouting, and then I went out, like the proverbial light.

The next thing I knew I was awake, spitting out a mouthful of broken glass.

“What a hangover!” I whispered.

“Oh, yeah?” said a strange voice.

4. A Bunch of Busy Bodies

I SAT up. Miss Terioso and the shattered chandelier still lay on the floor. But the demon had vanished from the chalk formation, and the bottle with the geni was nowhere to be seen.

I groped for the light, seeking the source of the voice.

Radiance flooded the room and I stared at the statues.

Statues no longer!

They were alive. I saw familiar flesh once more. The grotesque bodies of men and the wolf and the centaur and mermaid were moving.

I ran over to Trina. The beautiful mermaid with the lovely green hair stared up at me with a radiant smile.

“Trina, darling!” I whispered, taking her in my arms.

“Get away from me or I’ll kick your teeth down your throat with my hoofs!” boomed a gruff voice.

“But you have no hoofs, dear,” I laughed. “You’re a mermaid. You have a—”

“Don’t you call me ‘dear,’ you oaf! I’m a centaur!” growled the voice.

I stepped back in dismay.

That voice—I recognized it—was the voice of Gerymanx the centaur! But it came from Trina’s body!

I rushed over to Gerymanx.

“Hello, my friend,” came the calm words. Again I recognized the voice from the centaur’s body. It was the voice of Julius Margate!

“Who—who are you?” I whispered. The centaur smiled. “I’m Margate, of course. Who else would I be?”

I gulped. “You’re sure?”

“Of course.”

“Come here.” I grabbed the centaur’s arm and led the figure over to a full-length mirror.

“Take a look,” I suggested.

HE looked at himself—at the horse body projecting behind him. When he saw what he was dragging around in the rear, the man almost collapsed.

“But I’m Margate!” he wailed. “What am I doing in Gerymanx’s body?”

“What is Gerymanx doing in Trina’s body?” I asked.

“Who is in my body?” Margate suddenly yelled. He ran over to confront his body and reached out a cautious hand to grasp the chest.

“What are you reaching for, dearie?” lisped a high voice. “Be careful how you handle my trunk.”

“Myrtle!” whispered Margate. “Myrtle, the hamadryad.”

“Of course,” answered Myrtle. “Can’t you recognize my limbs?”

“What is all this?” demanded the rasping voice that had roused me from unconsciousness. I turned to face tall Mr. Simpkins.

“Why am I not a wolf?” demanded the voice. “Who stole my form? Why am I a wolf in Mr. Simpkins’ clothing?”

It was Jory the werewolf, in the vampire’s body. As I expected, the vampire was now wearing the wolf-form instead.

“Is this a way for a self-respecting vampire to be?” groaned the wolf. “Going around on all fours like an animal?”

“Something terrible has happened,” I gasped. “You’re alive, but your souls got into the wrong bodies. The demon made a mistake. You’ve switched.”

Then I remembered. Gerymanx was in Trina’s body. But where was Trina?

I stared out the open window. Then I saw it—the tree, the tree of Myrtle the hamadryad. Trina had to be in the tree! It must have been transformed through the open window like the rest of the statuary.

Running across the room, I bounded out on the lawn and threw my arms around the tree-trunk.

“Trina,” I whispered. “Trina, darling!”

There was no answer.

“Trina, speak to me!”

Not a leaf rustled.

I stumbled back into the room. “Trina,” I groaned.

“Here I am, darling!”

The familiar voice fired my blood.

I turned my head.

Coming toward me was—the red-headed window dummy!

She fell into my embrace, the lovely waxen figure, and we kissed.

I shuddered. She was alive—but still wax.

Now I understood. In the mixup, the window dummy, having no soul, probably entered Myrtle’s tree. Trina entered the body of the window dummy.

So there we stood.

A vampire in a werewolf’s body, a werewolf in a vampire’s. A man in a centaur’s form, and a centaur in a mermaid. A mermaid in a window dummy, and a tree nymph in the shape of a man.

And I myself, in one hell of a mess!

5. A Witch Flies Off—in a Rage

MISS TERIOSO couldn’t have picked a worse moment to regain consciousness. Which is probably why she picked this moment.

The witch rose from the floor and her bleary gaze swept the room more thoroughly than her broom could have done the job. In a moment comprehension came to her.

"So you made your own bargain with the demon," she scolded me. "Gave him the geni, I warrant? A clever young sir, aren't you. I've a good mind to—"

Then she saw the face of Julius Margate.

Instantly a change swept over Miss Terioso. I remembered she had admitted having a crush on Mr. Margate—and her actions now confirmed the fact.

She simpered coyly, straightened her stringy hair, and assumed a smile such as one sees on the face of a particularly hungry crocodile.

"Why Julius, my dear!" she gushed, advancing on Mr. Margate with a sickening leer. "I'm so glad to see you."

"Keep your hands off me, you old cow!" shrilled a high voice.

Miss Terioso halted and stared at the man.

"Don't look at me that way, you Walpurgistic wench!" said the voice from Margate's body.

Miss Terioso, not realizing that Margate's body was now inhabited by Myrtle the hamadryad, was confused.

"Here I am," called another voice. "It's me, Julius Margate, over here."

The witch turned to face, the centaur. Her face was shock-proof, but her lips twitched.

"Don't you recognize me, sugar?" asked Julius Margate,. waving his tail coyly.

Miss Terioso gaped at the centaur.

"Who is making sport of me?" she snapped. "What sort of jest are you playing?"

"Nobody's making fun of you," insisted Margate. "Come on over and get friendly. I'll give you a ride around the block if you like."

The witch froze. "I don't want a ride around the block," she announced. "I'm getting out of here."

She swooped across the hall and returned with the cat and dog under her arm. She set her satchel and broomstick down.

"I'm leaving, baggage and broomstick," sniffed Miss Terioso. "Oh, yes, I must take my window dummy, too."

"Not me," said Trina.

The witch goggled at the red-headed wax dummy.

"Did you speak?" she demanded.

"Of course. What's the matter with your ears, outside of their looks?" Trina replied.

"Something is very much wrong here," the witch declared.

"I've been trying to tell you," I said. I explained briefly.

Miss Terioso nodded.

"Nevertheless, the window dummy is mine. It's my poppet, and I shall pop off with it."

"Go fly your broomstick," shrilled Trina the mermaid. "And don't call me a dummy, you Halloween hag!"

"She's right," said Margate, from the centaur's body. "You have no claim on a soul. You'd better go now."

"You dare to order me out of your house?" screamed the witch.

"I dare to throw you out," said Margate.

Miss Terioso made for the door, hastily. She mounted her broomstick and turned.

"Very well," she sniffed. "Good riddance to all of you. And as for you, Julius Margate, you're just a—oh, go look in a rear-view mirror and see what you are!"

The door banged shut behind her.

THERE was an ominous silence. I felt the danger of that silence. I knew my peculiar friends. They were bad enough to handle in their own weird bodies. But now that those bodies were all mixed up, I'd better do something in a hurry.

"You must be hungry after such an ordeal," I said. "Let's all go out to the kitchen and I'll whip up a snack to eat." We did.

They ate ravenously. The sight of a mermaid eating oats and a centaur smoking a cigar rather spoiled my own appetite. And the clumsiness of all of them in their new forms did something to general table manners. But hunger ruled for a while. Then they finished, and gloom reigned. “This is a fine mess,” sighed Gerymanx. “What do we do now? Usually after a meal I go out for a brisk trot around the stable and grounds. But now I’m a mermaid. I can’t even canter.”

“I’d like to go out and have the birds perch on my limbs,” sighed Myrtle. “But I can’t, in this man’s body. It’s so difficult. I doubt if I can even get a robin to build a nest in my hair.”

“Don’t you dare put bird-nests in my hair,” yelled Margate, from the centaur’s body.

“Your hair?”

“That body you’re wearing still belongs to me,” Margate insisted. “I expect you to take good care of it.”

“What about me?” asked Jory, disconsolately. “I’d like to howl in the sunshine at dawn. But in a vampire’s body I’ll have to sleep all day in a musty old coffin.”

“That’s nothing,” responded Mr. Simpkins the vampire. “Just look at me in this wolf’s form! I’m afraid I’m going to shed all over the place. And I can’t seem to get the knack of changing back into a man! You’ll have to give me some lessons soon, Jory.”

“Your troubles are mild,” insisted Julius Margate. “How can I go out in polite society in a centaur’s body? It’s enough to give anybody a fright.”

Trina pouted at me from the window dummy’s body.

“Can I take a swim in the pool?” she whispered.

“No. Your wax will spoil,” I told her sadly.

“We’ve got to settle this problem somehow,” said Julius Margate. “Wonder if we could call up that demon again and make him put us in the right bodies?”

“Not without selling somebody’s soul,” I told my employer. “I’ve made the only trade I could, and from now on, souls are the articles of exchange.

And I won't sell my soul, I'll tell you that!"

Margate shook his head.

"We'll have to figure it out," he declared. "It can't go on like this forever. It isn't natural for a werewolf to be a vampire, and a centaur to be a mermaid. "It isn't natural for a mermaid to be a window dummy either," said my redheaded companion. "I'm dying to be tearing a herring."

Her words smote my heart.

"I'll think of something, folks," I promised. "Tomorrow night, when Mr. Jory wakes up at sundown in Mr. Simpkins' body, we can get together again and figure something out. Right now we all need sleep after this excitement."

So, yawning at dawning, we went to bed.

I fell asleep as soon as my head hit the pillow. But I didn't dream.

The way things were going, I was having my nightmares when I was wide awake.

6. A Slightly Cracked Beldame

"WE'VE got to do something, right now!" insisted Julius Margate, over the supper table.

The heads of his bedraggled companions nodded in eager assent.

"I'm sick of sleeping in a coffin," said Jory the werewolf. "I want to go back to my dog kennel." He shot a malicious glance at Mr. Simpkins in his wolf's body.

Simpkins wagged his tail. "What about me?" he complained. "I turned into a man in the daylight but when the sun set tonight I became a wolf again. And I don't like it. I think I'm getting the mange." Gerymanx the centaur, in his mermaid form, propped both elbows on the table and sighed. "Being a mermaid is no fun, either," he declared. "I can't go near that swimming pool unless I get a pair of water wings.

"Imagine a mermaid who doesn't know how to swim!"

He started to expand on the theme, then turned in shocked surprise to survey the body of Julius Margate. Julius Margate's human body rose and began to divest itself of clothing.

"What goes on here?" I asked, in a startled voice.

"Oh," said Myrtle the hamadryad, from within Margate's body. "I'm just pruning off these clothes, that's all. I can't stand the pressure on my limbs."

"Please, for the sake of decency," I protested. "Wait a while. I'll find a way to restore you all to your proper shapes."

"Hurry, darling." It was the voice of Trina in my ear. The wax dummy leaned dose. "I do so want to kiss you," said the girl, wistfully. "But every time I try it, my head falls off."

"Yes, hurry up," yelled Julius Margate, from the body of Gerymanx the centaur. "I'm afraid to visit the barber shop to get my tail clipped."

"Too bad," I sympathized.

"And that's not all," sighed Margate. "I wish you'd go and steal the witch's broom and use it to sweep out the stable."

"There's an idea!" cried Trina.

"What?"

"Why don't you go and visit the witch tomorrow? Persuade her to hold another Black Mass."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, she has some kind of a due-bill on hell, hasn't she? She can get the demon to switch us back into our regular bodies. Then we can be self-respecting mermaids and vampires and werewolves again."

"Brilliant!" said Julius Margate.

"But the witch is mad at us," I objected. "Then you must soften her up," Margate told me. "Make love to her, or something."

"Make love to a witch? A dizzy old spinster like her?"

"She's not so bad," Margate lied.

"She's not exactly a spring chicken, either," I answered. "She's more like a vulture."

"It's the only way out," Margate snapped. "You'll have to do it. You can't let us down this way."

I sighed and nodded.

Trina nibbled my ear with waxen lips. "Just remember," she whispered. "Make love to her, but no funny stuff. I get jealous so easily. Why it makes my wax melt to think of you in her arms."

"It makes my blood freeze to think of that," I replied.

"Even if you have ice-cubes in your veins, you must go through with it," implored Julius Margate. "Tomorrow you woo the witch."

And so it was decided.

NEXT afternoon, after getting directions from Julius Margate, I left the mansion on the hill and set out along a winding path through the woods to the house of Miss Terioso.

Carrying a basket on my arm, I approached the cottage feeling like Little Red Riding Hood on her way to Grandma's house.

Miss Terioso's cottage looked something like Grandma's house at that—except for the red and green smoke that poured from the crumbling stone chimney as I walked up the path.

The smoke assumed ghastly, billowing shapes, and I averted my eyes. I preferred to read the signs on the cottage lawn.

"MISS TERIOSO—BLACK, WHITE, & ALL COLORS OF MAGIC"
"LOVE PHILTRES. FORTUNES TOLD. PSYCHO-ANALYSIS"
"UNFAMILIAR SPIRITS KEEP OUT"

I knocked on the door, letting my trembling wrist provide the leverage.

Miss Terioso stuck her head out. "We don't want any," she said. "Oh, it's you, young sir. Step in, won't you?"

I would, and did.

There was a bearskin rug in the hallway. As I put my foot on it, it grunted horribly, and the gigantic head rose with gnashing teeth.

“Down, Bruno!” commanded the witch. The rug subsided, and regarded me through malevolent glass eyes.

I stood in the witch’s cottage, glancing around at the ancient furniture—1890 vintage, and typical of an old maid’s home.

Miss Terioso resumed her. seat by the fire and took up her knitting. She was silent, absorbed.

I looked at the placards on the walls. There was a Charter Membership in Local Coven Number 9, and a neatly embroidered motto, decorated with mandrake roots, reading “A Fiend in Need Is a Fiend Indeed.”

Then I broke the silence.

“What are you knitting?” I inquired.

“Oh, just a shroud,” said Miss Terioso, brightly.

I coughed. “I’ve brought you a little present,” I coaxed.

Her eyes brightened. I handed her the basket. She opened the cover.

“What is it?” she asked.

“Just a little wax fruit.”

“Wax fruit?”

“To melt down into poppets,” I explained.

Miss Terioso favored me with a warm smile.

“How kind of you,” she gushed.

I turned on the charm. “I was so delighted to see you the other evening,” I said, sitting down. “I admired you greatly.”

“You did?” She positively simpered. “Yes. I said to myself, now there’s a girl with real high spirits about her,’ that’s what I said.”

“Flatterer! I usually consort with low spirits,” Miss Terioso gurgled.

“I was wondering if you’d care to have a date with me,” I ventured. “How about going out tonight?”

“Why, there’s no Sabbat tonight.”

“I wasn’t thinking of a Sabbat,” I answered. “Just a little stepping. You know, hitting a few high spots.”

“You really want to?” beamed the witch. “Definitely.”

She blushed. “Very well. But first I must go to the beauty parlor. I’ll drop you off at home on the way and then pick you up afterwards when we go out.”

Miss Terioso rose and bustled over to her broomstick.

I gulped.

“We’re not going to ride that thing, are we?” I asked.

“We must,” she declared. “Haven’t you heard about gas rationing?”

Trembling, I mounted the broomstick behind her. She opened the cottage door, muttered a few words under her breath, and we were off in the twilight.

7. Tree’s a Crowd

I DON’T know whether or not you’ve ever ridden a broomstick, but it’s not an experience one is likely to forget. I don’t like to think about that soaring sweep through dusk-driven skies. All I can say is that for my money, the broomstick will never replace the horse.

When I was finally dropped off—literally—at my destination—Miss Terioso waved farewell and called that she would come back from the beauty parlor and pick me up again.

For several minutes I wondered if she would have to pick me up, actually, before I’d be able to stir. But after a time I groaned, stood up, and hobbled into the house.

The gang bombarded me with questions.

“Did you see her?”

“What did she say?”

“Did you make a date?”

I answered definitely. “I’m taking Miss Terioso out to dine and dance this evening,” I announced. “Margate, I’m borrowing one of your tuxedoes. And about $30 in cash.”

Trina walked up to me, her wax arms swinging in agitation.

"I'm jealous," she confessed. "Take me with you as a chaperone."

"Impossible," I sighed.

"Then I'll go alone, with Myrtle in Margate's body," she declared. "I don't trust you with that baleful hag."

"I'll hitch up the station-wagon," Margate chimed in. "Then I'll harness myself to it and pull the rest of you into town."

I protested.

"Do you want to spoil everything? You'll make a terrible scene in human society! Leave everything to me," I argued.

"But—"

There was a thump from upstairs.

Miss Terioso had made a three-point landing on the roof.

"Get out of sight," I commanded. "Don't let her see you and arouse her anger. I'll skip upstairs and change and crawl out the skylight to join her. Now all of you stay here and behave. I'll have you back in your bodies before morning."

They scattered, and I scampered.

Five minutes later I joined Miss Terioso on the roof.

I stared at the vision in the starlight.

For Miss Terioso was changed. The magic of the beauty parlor had wrought a startling transformation.

This was no old crone who awaited me, but a radiantly lovely woman—a vivid brunette with lips as red as love's own fire, Tier eyes sparkled and she smiled with pleasure as she noted my reaction.

"Life in the old gal yet, eh?" she said. Her voice was low, husky.

I said nothing, but mounted the broomstick and put my arms around her. Her nearness was intoxicating.

We sailed up toward the stars. Her hair streamed in the wind, mingling with the moonlight.

I enjoyed the ride.

All incongruity was forgotten. By the time we landed on a fire-escape and clambered down to reach a night-club entrance, we were chatting merrily.

We swept into the lobby of the club and Miss Terioso checked her broomstick in the cloakroom.

A waiter led us across the dance-floor to a table.

“Champagne,” I ordered.

I didn’t need it. I was intoxicated, as I say, by her presence. But revolving drunkenly in the back of my brain was the consciousness of my purpose.

Soon I would artfully wheedle and cajole her into changing my friends back. But the evening was young now, and I could enjoy myself first. Enjoy her company. Gaze into those burning black eyes. Hold her flowery-fragrant fingers.

We lifted our glasses.

“Here’s to you,” murmured Miss Terioso.

“Here’s to—us,” I corrected.

“Yes,” she sighed.

We drank.

After that I tried to sit on her lap.

Now, thinking back, I know what must have happened. Miss Terioso was an old hand at the game.

She’d probably anticipated this, the old she-wolf, and slipped a love philtre into my drink.

But the effects were startling.

All at once I knew that I was madly in love with Miss Terioso. The thought of my friends, the thought of Trina—all was forgotten.

SHE gave me a demure glance and I held her hand and stared into her inscrutable eyes and I leaned forward over the table, and then I got hit in the head with a human leg.

Yes, a human leg sailed through the air and hit me on the back of the head!

That’s one way to sober a fellow up.

I turned quickly and stared.

Lying on the floor was a leg. With a shock, I recognized it. Trina’s leg, from the window dummy!

Employing my knowledge of trajectory, I wheeled around and stared at a table across the way.

Sure enough, Trina had made good her threat! She sat at another table with Myrtle in Margate’s body.

I collected my scattered wits hastily. Then, bending down, I collected the scattered leg, rose politely, mumbled an excuse to Miss Terioso, and stalked over to the table carrying the wax leg.

“Pardon me, madam, but I think you’ve lost something,” I said, for the benefit of eavesdroppers. Trina accepted the leg, bent down, fastened it on again, and winked.

“What the hell’s the big idea?” I whispered, furiously. “I thought I told you to stay home.”

“We’re going to keep an eye on you,” Trina answered. “After getting an eyeful of that glamorous hag, I don’t trust you any further than I can throw my limbs.”

“We’re all here,” added Myrtle, from Margate’s body.

“No!”

But as I glanced around, I saw Mr. Simpkins and Jory at another table, in each other’s bodies. Jory’s body had resumed human shape.

“Margate and Gerymanx are outside, in the centaur’s and mermaid’s bodies,” Myrtle added. “They came in the wagon.”

“I hope to heaven they stay there,” I sighed. “What if the customers saw those monsters?”

It was a hideous thought. As things were, the situation was bad enough. No sooner had I uttered the words than I caught a snatch of conversation between Myrtle and a stranger at the adjoining table.

Myrtle, in Margate’s body, had probably been drinking. The stranger certainly had. His little bloodshot eyes revolved woozily as he mumbled.

"Pardon me, sir," he hiccuped. "But that lady at th' table wish' you—has she got wooden leg, huh?"

"Sure," answered Myrtle, gaily.

"Mos' unusual," said the drunk.

"What's unusual about that?" demanded Myrtle, suddenly argumentative. "Why shouldn't she have a wooden leg? Me, I'm all w-ood!"

Under the influence of liquor, Myrtle forgot she was in Margate, and thought of herself as still being a hamadryad in a tree. But the drunken stranger didn't know this. He peered incredulously.

"You're all wood?" he echoed.

"Of course," said Myrtle. "Do you want to examine my trunk?"

"You're crazy!" sneered the drunk, wobbling to his feet.

"I am not," said Myrtle. "I can prove that I'm a tree. Why, I even have termites!"

"I wouldn't brag about it, sir."

"Say, who are you calling 'sir' ?" shrilled Myrtle. "I'll have you know I'm a lady! A hamadryad."

The drunk stared at Julius Margate's body.

"I wouldn't admit such a thing," he declared, passionately.

"What's wrong with that?" Myrtle flung back. "Some of my best friends are hamadryads! And if you don't stop annoying me—I'll have my girl friend throw her head at you!"

The drunk drew back in panic.

Mr. Simpkins, in Jory's body, stalked Over to the scene and quickly led Myrtle away in time to prevent mayhem.

Jory, in Mr. Simpkin's body, quietly left the room.

Out of the corner of my eye, I saw Miss Terioso advancing on me. I kicked Trina's Waxen shin.

"Keep quiet from now on," I ordered. "Nearly had a riot as it is. Now I'll steer Miss Terioso away from here before she recognizes you."

I turned, bowed to the advancing witch.

"Let's dance," I suggested.

I danced with the witch on the nightclub floor, while my window dummy sweetheart regarded me with a smouldering light in her lovely glass eyes.

8. One Man's Meat Is Another's Man's Corpse

FORTUNATELY, I was dancing and didn't see the scene in the outer bar. But I heard about it later—plenty.

Mr. Simpkins, in Jory's body, had retired to the bar for a quiet and meditative drink.

"What'll it be?" asked the bartender.

"Got any bl—give me Scotch," said Mr. Simpkins, quickly erasing his original thought.

The Scotch arrived. Simpkins paid for it with a $20 bill.

The sight of the greenback fluttering in the breeze acted as an unwitting signal to a tall blonde draped over the end of the bar. She uncoiled herself and advanced sinuously on Mr. Simpkins.

"You look sad, Mister," she observed. "Are you lonesome?"

This remarkable technique overpowered Mr. Simpkins quite completely. He was pretty unworldly, being a supernatural entity.

"I am sad," he sighed.

"Tell Olga what the matter is," coaxed the blonde, summoning the bartender and ordering a Silver Fizz. "Why are you sad?"

"Well," breathed Mr. Simpkins, "I used to be a vampire, but I'm not any more."

Olga blinked. This stranger was pretty drunk.

"You know how it is," he mournfully observed. "I'm hungry for blood. Now all I get is dog biscuits."

"Say," said Olga, perturbed. "Who do you think you're kidding? That's a funny line for a guy to hand out to a girl. You look like a wolf to me."

This was definitely the wrong thing to say.

"I am a wolf," muttered Mr. Simpkins.

“What do you mean, you’re a wolf?” laughed Olga, back on familiar territory again. “You’ve got to show me, brother!”

Mr. Simpkins, naive soul, sighed.

“Right here?” he asked.

“Sure. Why not?”

“All right,” said Mr. Simpkins. “I’ll show you.”

He descended from his bar stool and crouched on the floor. He threw his head back and began to whimper. Suddenly his body seemed to quiver. A plastic horripilation coursed through his frame. His forehead melted to a slant. His nose lengthened. His arms and legs furred.

Mr. Simpkins turned into a werewolf on the barroom floor.

Olga saw and was convinced. She was so convinced she began to scream.

About that time, Miss Terioso and I were dancing near the doorway. Miss Terioso heard the scream and turned her head.

She looked out.

Her gaze was not attracted by Mr. Simpkins, but by Jory. He stood at the checking counter, and he was grabbing Miss Terioso’s broom.

“Come on,” gasped my dancing-partner, running off the floor.

“Where are you going with my broomstick?” she yelled at the fleeing Jory.

“I’m just borrowing it to use outside,” he called. “Don’t forget, Margate is in Gerymanx’s body out there.”

“Come back here,” yelled the witch, leaping after him.

Hell broke loose with a vengeance.

Miss Terioso clawed at Jory. She beat the poor man over the head with her broomstick, uttering shrill imprecations.

A flying form launched past me as I wavered in the doorway.

It was Trina, in the window dummy’s body. She hurled herself on Miss Terioso, valiantly coming to Jory’s aid.

Miss Terioso turned.

Before I could intervene, she grappled with the red-headed dummy. Before the eyes of the shrieking spectators, she tore the window dummy apart, literally limb from limb.

A torso, a head, and pairs of arms and legs fell to the floor.

Behind me came another scream. I turned in time to see Myrtle, in Margate's body, exchanging wild blows with the drunk from the next table.

"Good God, what next?" I gasped.

I started toward the howling wolf on the floor. Then something thundered past me from the outer door.

Margate, in the body of the centaur, charged into the night-club lobby. Squirming in his arms was the mermaid—Gerymanx. Stamping his hoofs, the terrible apparition, bearing its hideous burden, roared down the bar.

"What is all this?" boomed Margate, flicking his tail and neighing wildly.

Arms encircled me. I turned to face Miss Terioso, brandishing her broomstick.

"Let's get out of here, eh?" she panted. "Get on the broomstick before it's too late."

I mounted in a daze.

The howling wolf, the prancing centaur, the fighting man, and the dismembered body of the window dummy blocked our path. We sailed over them all.

Sailed over them—and into the arms of the police!

9. A Judge Loses His Judgment

JUDGE NUMBOTTOM heard the story.

First he heard it from the drunk who insulted Myrtle. Then he heard it from Olga the come-on girl. After that he got a few stumbling sentences out of me.

Finally he listened to Patrolman Lossowitz as he explained the whole thing, from ghastly beginning to untimely end.

“So she says she’s a tree, Your Honor,” mumbled Lossowitz, unemotionally. “Meanwhile out in the bar this guy is telling Olga he used to be a vampire but now he’s a werewolf. And he turns into a wolf.

“Meanwhile the witch tears this other woman to bits, and then the centaur and the mermaid run in, and the witch tries to beat it on a broomstick with this guy here.” Lossowitz pointed to me.

Judge Numbottom pointed to Lossowitz. His face was purple and he could hardly speak. The veins bulged on his bald forehead.

“Stop that kind of talk,” he gasped, weakly. “After all, this is a night court, not a bedtime story session. I’m a grown man, Lossowitz, am I not?”

“Yes, Your Honor,”, said Lossowitz, meekly.

“Yes, what?”

“Yes, you’re not,” Lossowitz declared, uncertainly.

“Shut up! You can’t think straight or talk straight! Admit you were drinking in this night club!”

“No, Your Honor. Not a drop.”

“You don’t drink drops, I realize that. Probably a bottle,” decided tire terrible old man. “But drunk or sober, you couldn’t see such things. Bring in the prisoners, Lossowitz, and let me question them myself.”

Obediently, Patrolman Lossowitz marched out and returned with Myrtle, Trina, Margate, Gerymanx, Jory, and Mr. Simpkins in tow. Miss Terioso marched before them, indignantly waving her broomstick.

Judge Numbottom took one look at the man, the centaur, the window dummy, the mermaid, the second man, and the wolf. Then he hid his face in his hands.

“No, no!” he murmured. “Cover them up. Lossowitz! Get blankets and at least cover some of them up. That horse-thing and that human fish, anyway!”

It was a matter of minutes before Judge Numbottom raised his haggard face. He winced as he stared at the motley assemblage. Finally his eyes lighted on Miss Terioso as the most attractive and normallooking prisoner.

“Will you please step forward and answer a few questions,” he said, controlling his voice.

Miss Terioso advanced.

“Your name?”

“Miss Terioso.”

“Your—your occupation?”

“Oh,” she replied lightly. Tm just a witch.”

Judge Numbottom began to turn purple again. “I beg your pardon,” he rasped. “I must have misunderstood you.”

“I’m just a witch, Your Honor,” she said. “I ride broomsticks.”

“Go on,” sighed the Judge. “You nauseate me strangely.”

“Well, it all started when these people turned into statues,” said Miss Terioso.

“Statues?”

“Yes. Marble. Stone, you know. They’re all statues, really.”

“Looks like a statue-tory offense,” put in Lossowitz, unhelpfully.

“I don’t understand,” sighed the Judge.

“This man can confirm my story,” said Miss Terioso, pointing her broomstick at me.

“That’s right,” I answered. “These people were once statues, in my charge. But as you see, they’ve undergone a change, Your Honor. That’s simple enough. I haven’t got all my marble statues any more.”

“You haven’t got all your marbles any more, you mean!” snarled Judge Numbottom. “Step down, you two. You’re driving me crazy!”

Margate, in Gerymanx’s body, sidled forward.

“Let me help you,” he suggested. “I owned these people before they were statues.”

JUDGE NUMBOTTOM looked at the horse’s body protruding from under the blanket. He favored Margate with a long, painful scrutiny.

“Who and what are you?” he whispered.

“I’m a centaur.”

Lossowitz interfered again. “The guy is lying, Your Honor!” he bawled, excitedly. “He ain’t no centaur. I seen lots of centaurs when I was in Washington!”

“Shut up!” thundered the Judge. “Let me speak to the others.”

He addressed the mermaid in the centaur’s arms.

“What about you, young lady?” he asked, forcing a smile, “What is the reason for your—ah—piscatorial disguise?”

“Who are you calling a lady?” snarled the voice of Gerymanx from the mermaid’s body. “And what kind of a fishy remark are you making about me being piscatorial?”

Judge Numbottom was sorry he started the whole thing.

“Can’t any of you talk sense?” he begged.

“Let me help you,” said Jory, from Mr. Simpkins’ body. “It’s very simple. You see, I used to be in that body over there.”

He pointed at the wolf form now worn by Mr. Simpkins.

“You were in the body of that animal?” Judge Numbottom’s eyes started from their sockets.

“Why not?” piped the wolf.

“A talking wolf?” moaned the Judge.

“Well, if it disturbs you so much,” sniffed the wolf. He bent forward and began to go through contortions. It was a fascinating if repulsive spectacle. Slowly, the wolf turned into a man.

“You see?” he asked.

“I don’t want to see!” groaned Judge Numbottom.

“Then look at her!” suggested Lossowitz, pointing at Trina in the body of the red-headed window dummy.

The window dummy was red-headed no longer. With a clatter, the dummy’s head dropped to the floor.

“So sorry,” said Trina. “Looking at a sight like that wolf is enough to make anyone lose their head.”

She stooped and picked up her head slowly.

Judge Numbottom’s eyes were almost resting on his cheekbones.

“It’s sorcery,” he sobbed. “Sheer black sorcery! And how can I press a sorcery charge at election time?”

I stepped up.

“Listen, Your Honor,” I whispered. “I think I have a way to straighten this matter out. Never mind getting the story straight. I know a way to restore these people to their rightful forms. Then we can forget the whole thing.”

“How?” gasped the Judge.

Briefly, I told him about Miss Terioso holding a due bill on hell. She could evoke a demon and order him to restore my friends to their rightful shapes.

“Incredible,” objected the Judge.

“No more incredible than what you’ve seen here,” I reminded him.

“Why doesn’t she do it, then?” he asked.

“She’s stubborn. I suggest that you force her to do it.”

“How?”

“Issue a court order commanding her to evoke the demon and make the change.”

The Judge sat up.

His eyes flashed fire. “I’ll damned well issue the order,” he snapped. “If not, I’ll have the lot of you jailed for the rest of your unnatural lives.”

10. Marbles Never Cease

“HAVE you got your due-bill on hell ready?” I whispered nervously, crouching next to Miss Terioso in the darkened courtroom.

“It’s right here in my satchel,” replied the witch. During the past hour her glamor had fallen away, and she was once again the familiar crone-like figure, as she puttered around making passes in the air.

Judge Numbottom had ejected the drunk, the come-on girl, and Patrolman Lossowitz from the chamber, leaving us in privacy.

A bailiff had been dispatched to secure the ingredients Miss Terioso required for the ceremony of the ritual, and now she went through the parody of the Black Mass and the moment for evoking the demon neared.

My fine finned and furry friends moved restlessly to and fro as her voice rose in awesome crescendo.

The climax came.

Amidst a shaking of walls and a rumbling of far-off vortices between the stars, the red demon slithered into tri-dimensional being in the center of Judge Numbottom's court.

A gasp rose from the assemblage.

"To think of me, acting as an accessory in this black magic," hissed Judge Numbottom morosely. "Oh, Lord—what's that?"

He saw the demon.

So did my friends.

The demon stretched a rubbery red neck and blinked with nyctaloptic eyes.

"It's you again," he growled, squatting near me.

I shrugged. "Not at all. This lady called you."

I indicated Miss Terioso, who nodded. The witch swept commandingly before the creature of darkness.

In low tones she conversed with the entity.

"You want me to switch them?" the demon asked.

"Yes."

"And you have a paper entitling you to—ah—services?"

"Here it is."

Miss Terioso fluttered a piece of paper.

"Very well," sighed the demon. "Here goes."

He paused. "I shall have to freeze them into marble again before I unscramble their psyches," he said.

"Very well."

"Don't worry," I told Trina, moving close to her. "It will just be a minute."

That is all it took, and I was glad.

For my very spine shook at the violence of the psychic force that concentrated itself in the room.

Gazing through the phosphorescence of the chalk lines, I saw a horribly unnatural transformation. Men, mermaid, centaur, and wolf, turned to gleaming white stone. They froze in marble attitudes on the floor.

"So," breathed the demon. He was sweating horribly, as sparks rising from his body attested.

"Now for the second step," he muttered. "But give me the due bill first."

His voice addressed the witch. But his eyes couldn't reach her.

It was I who finally located Miss Terioso in the darkness. She stood by the window, the open window, and she was already bestriding the broomstick.

"She's not going through with the deal!" I yelled. "She's double-crossing us and making a getaway!"

It was true.

The demon realized it instantly.

"Come back!" he shouted.

"Farewell!" called the witch.

She rose in midair.

The demon, like a gigantic rubber ball, bounded after her.

He soared, with dynamic propulsion, through the window.

I rushed over to the ledge and peered outside.

Hovering in midair, witch and demon clawed wildly in writhing tangle of arms and legs. She was trying to hold on to the piece of paper. He enfolded her in his red arms, hissing.

The broomstick wobbled violently.

SUDDENLY came a cataclysmic crash of thunder, a burst of eye-ball searing luminance, and then—nothing.

Witch and demon were gone.

The charred handle of a broomstick fell to clatter in the courtyard below.

It was over. I turned wearily to face the marble statues of what were once my friends.

Now they were statues again, statues forevermore.

“Trina,” I whispered.

A lifeless window dummy stared at me with glassy eyes. Arms were still outstretched in entreaty, but their embrace was cold.

Judge Numbottom switched on the lights.

He rubbed his eyes.

“It is the order of this court,” he whispered, “that these statues be confiscated. Immediately. And taken out of sight. Not a word of this must get out. You understand?”

I nodded.

“Julius Margate’s house will be put up for sale under court order,” he added.

“The window dummy?” I whispered.

“Will await claim by rightful owners,” he told me. “Sorry, my friend. You’d better go now.”

I went. What else could I do?

And so it ended. I left Margate, his friends, and his house. And now I try to forget.

Of course, I still see the window dummy every day.

That’s all I have left, you know. All I have to prove that it really happened.

So I see the window dummy every day. And you can come and see her yourself if you like.

She’s the third one from the left—in our biggest department store window.

A Horse On Lefty Feep

When the hour for unmasking came, a ghastly thing happened—for none could say which was the mask and which the real thing

WHEN I sat down in Jack's Shack the restaurant was almost empty. The breakfast crowd was gone and the luncheon crowd hadn't arrived. Jack took my order and I sat back to wait.

Over in one corner a waiter sat at a bare table with a child, evidently his small son. He was apparently doing his best to teach the boy a few professional secrets. At any rate, Jack's waiter was reciting the alphabet to him. I listened.

"A is Appetite, you come here to feed it; "B's for Bicarbonate—when you eat here you need it; "C's for Convulsions—"

I stopped listening and whirled around. Somebody had tapped me on the shoulder.

I blinked, shuddered.

"Lefty Feep!" I gasped.

Lefty Feep was something to shudder at, particularly in the morning. His face was as pale and weak as a cup of Jack's coffee. The circles under his eyes resembled doughnuts.

To make it worse, Feep's suit was ripped to shreds. It had once been very loud, but in its present state it was only a whisper.

Feep stumbled into a chair and slumped across the table.

I struggled to conceal my surprise.

"Good morning," I said.

Feep's eyes popped.

"That's what it is!" he muttered. "I suspect it all along. No wonder everything is so faint and quaint. It's morning!"

"Of course it's morning," I told him. "That big yellow thing you see up in the sky is called the sun. And those people running around on the street are going to work."

"Sky!" groaned Feep. "Work!"

"Cheer up, Lefty," I said. "You're old enough to know about such things, I think."

He moaned his order to the waiter and sat back. From time to time he examined his tattered clothing and shook his head.

"What happened to you?" I inquired. "You look as though you've been kicked in the face by a horse."

"Horse?" screamed Lefty Feep. "Who tells you about a horse?"

"Nobody," I answered. "Just a figure of speech, that's all." I forced a chuckle. "As a matter of fact, I'd merely imagine you were returning home from an all-night party."

"Party?" Again Feep shrieked. "Who is the smarty who spills about this party?"

"I'm only guessing."

"Your guessing is most distressing," sighed Lefty Feep. "As a matter of fact, I am very coarse with a horse recently, and that is responsible for my present fickle, ickle fate."

His eyes began to light up. I knew the sign, so I began to get up.

"Let me spill you a few beans about this recent and indecent affair," he urged.

"Sorry, Lefty—I've got a quick date down the street."

"Never mind about your hasty girl friends," grunted Lefty Feep, hauling me back into my chair. "Last night I experience the strangest thing that ever happens to me."

“What did you do—start telling the truth?” I muttered. But he didn’t hear me.

“Yes,” said Feep, grabbing me firmly by the shoulders, “what happens to me is so unusual that the queerness of it makes it positively extraordinary, to say nothing of being remarkably different.”

“Something screwy?”

“The very word!” snapped Feep. “I wish I have your education so I can express myself.”

“I would like to express you—to Alaska,” I whispered. Once again Feep didn’t hear me. He was coiling and uncoiling his tongue.

“Listen to this and see how it strikes you,” he said.

I listened. He struck me right between the eyes with a verbal barrage.

* * *

YESTERDAY afternoon I am marching my arches down the drag getting ready to run into a tavern. Instead I run into Dime-Mouth McCarthy.

I think I mention this personality to you before. Dime-Mouth McCarthy is a very scholarly type of jerk, and a great reader. In fact he once reads meters for the gas company.

“Greetings!” I remark.

“Well, if it ain’t my old pal Lefty Feep! How are youse?” asks my scholarly friend. “Youse coitenly look in the pink.”

“You are mistaken,” I tell him. “There is nothing in the pink about me except my tooth-brush. I personally am in the red.”

“I am extremely murderfied to hear this,” says Dime-Mouth. “Because I figure I can perhaps negoat-she-ate a modest loan from youse. Let us say ten dollars.”

“Let us say nuts to that idea,” I suggest. “But just for the sake of argument, why do you need ten dollars? I figure canned heat only costs you a quarter.”

Dime-Mouth McCarthy gives me the old wink and blink and waves his mittens in the ozone.

"What is the matter with youse?" he inquires. "Don't youse remember that tonight is the night for the big fancy dress ball?"

"Fancy dress ball?"

"Coitenly. The big masquerade brawl for the Anti-Amusement League."

All at once I do recall. Tonight is the big evening. Once a year everybody puts on a costume and heads for the headquarters of the Anti-Amusement League.

The Anti-Amusement League is a sort of club we have in the neighborhood. It gets its name from the fact that all the members are pledged not to indulge in any amusements—such as opium smuggling, counterfeiting, bankrobbing, or plain and fancy homicide.

Of course there is no harm in such business operations as gambling or drinking, so the members have a pretty good time after all. Everybody belongs—Gorilla Gabface, down at the pool hall, and Subconscious Sigmund the psychiatrist, and all the rest of the gang.

As a matter of fact, I am anxious to go to this massacre myself, and make a date with a ginch for that purpose, only it slips my mind.

So I am very rejoiceful when Dime-Mouth McCarthy mentions this item.

"But why do you need ten guilders?" I ask him.

"To rent a costume. Everybody must come there in a disguise, see?"

"And just where do you figure on renting a costume?"

"Why, at Out-Of-Business Oscar's," he tells me. "Out-Of-Business Oscar is the only fink in the neighborhood with costumes to rent. I am on my merry way down to his hockshop now, only I do not have any laughing lettuce with which to pay for no outfit, understand?"

"Well, maybe I can help you out," I decide. "Only not ten guilders worth, I'm afraid. Now that I come to think of it, I need a costume for tonight myself."

"It's getting late," says Dime-Mouth McCarthy. "Tempus phooey, as the old saying goes. We better hurry if we want to drape our shapes. Youse can come along with me right now."

SO WE scramble and amble down the pavement until we come to Out-Of-Business Oscar's pawn shop, which he recently redecorates very fancy and now runs under a classy reading:

YE OLDE HOCK SHOPPE

We march in and Out-Of-Business Oscar extends his chin in a grin.

"Well, if it isn't Lefty Feep!" he yaps. "And that notorious bum and moocher, Dime-Mouth McCarthy." Dime-Mouth gives him a dirty look. "Kindly do not refer to me as notorious," he says. "That is an insult."

"My apologies," says Oscar. "And what can I do for you?"

"Drop dead," says Dime-Mouth.

But I ignore this tiny talk and proceed to go stepping up to the counter.

"I am going to a masquerade party tonight," I tell him. "I don't want anybody to recognize me."

"Why don't you go disguised as a gentleman?" Oscar cracks.

"Never mind the sour-chasm," yells Dime-Mouth. "Me and my friend Lefty want a couple of those old Spanish costumes youse hand out."

"I would like to rent you a costume," says Oscar, "but they are just about all gone. Nearly everybody in the neighborhood is going to the Anti-Amusement League masquerade tonight, and they all come in and pick out costumes already. I do not think I have anything left over for you."

"But we can't go without a costume," wails Dime-Mouth, getting very excited in his scholarly fashion. "That would be a discrepancy."

"Well, look over discrepancy if there's anything you want," says Oscar, pointing to a pile of dirty costumes on a table.

We paw around for a while. Dime-Mouth holds up some rags.

"Would youse like to go as Little Bo Peep?" he asks me.

I shake my head and my fist.

"How about a nice suit of armour?"

"Can't wear it," Oscar interrupts. "Priorities."

"Well what do we do?" I inquire. "We both need costumes. And I can only lay out about $3.75 for them." Oscar shrugs. Then he stares at us. "You both need costumes. And all you have is $3.75. Well—I might give one costume for the two of you."

"One costume for two of us? How will that work out?"

"Wait and see!"

Oscar dives into the back room. He begins to bang around in there. After a while he comes out, dragging something after him.

"My Gawd, a horse!" yells Dime-Mouth McCarthy.

"A horse costume," Oscar corrects him. "Yes, gentlemen, I have here a really unusual masquerade disguise. This fine trick horse costume. It comes in two sections, as you see—the front legs and head, and the hind legs and . . . associated regions. One of you wears the front half, the other wears the back half. Put them both together and you have a really lovely horse."

"A Charley horse from stooping over in the thing!" I yell. "No, Oscar, that won't do! I don't want to be a horse."

"But you have no choice," Oscar reminds me. "If you want to go to this masquerade ball you'll have to be a horse and like it."

"I may be a horse but I won't like it," I insist.

"Maybe we better take it, Lefty," says Dime-Mouth. "Why you'll look swell in that horse," Oscar flatters us. "You'll be the sensation of the ball. Probably win a prize."

"What kind of a prize, a bag of oats?"

"Maybe. Because something tell me this horse was made for you. You'll look natural in it, really you will."

WELL, I am a sucker for flattery.

Or maybe I am just a sucker. But anyhow, I put down the money and we walk out of there with the horse costume in two parts.

"Getting late," I mention to Dime-Mouth. "Let's go up to my place and put on the costume. I've got to call for my ginch."

So we go up to my dump and haul out the costume.

“Wait a minute, now,” says Dime-Mouth. “We have a problem to decide.”

“What problem?”

“Well, who is going to be what in this horse?”

I never think of this before, but it is a delicate problem at that.

We stare at the two ends of the horse costume.

“I pay for it,” I remind Dime-Mouth.

“That does not matter,” he tells me. “It is the principle of the thing.”

“There is more air for the guy in back,” I coax. He can stick his head out of the hole in the middle.”

“Well, then youse are the fresh air fiend, so youse be the back end,” Dime-Mouth suggests.

“But I am healthier than you,” I tell him. “You need the air. So I will make a sacrifice and you can be the back end.”

“I will not permit youse to be so generous,” Dime-Mouth assures me. “Youse may be the back end. It is an honor, but youse really deserves it.”

“To hell with that,” I mutter. “We will toss a coin. Or rather, I will.”

“Heads or tails?”

“That’s right. Heads or tails.”

So I pull out a penny and throw it up. It comes down like a dive bomber and lands on the carpet. We look at it with much interest.

“Tails,” whispers Dime-Mouth. “Youse get tails.”

“Yes,” I groan. “I get tails. It’s a horse on me.”

“Well, let us put on our costume,” grins Dime-Mouth. “It is getting late.” So we put on the two ends of the horse. Dime-Mouth has the head over his head, the shoulders over his chest, and the front legs down over his legs. Just like a complete suit. And a piece of the horse’s body sticks out in back, to be joined with my end.

I have the hind legs over my legs, and the tail hanging down my back. My head and arms are inside the body of the horse. But when I want to stand up straight my head and arms stick out of it—so that I am like a horse from the waist down and a man from the waist up.

“Stick your head back in,” Dime-Mouth tells me, “Then we can join together at the middle.”

So we join together. Dime-Mouth looks out of the eye-holes in the horse-head and sees us in the mirror.

“Very nice,” he says. “Very nice. And youse look so very natural, Lefty.”

This burns me up, since I am entirely concealed in my end of the horse.

“Now we must practice walking together,” says Dime-Mouth.

I HAVE eye-holes in the horse’s stomach, but it is awful to walk all bent over, holding on to Dime-Mouth so the horse stays together. The idea of doing this all evening does not appeal to me. And it will not appeal to my date, either. She will feel a little cut off from me.

To make it worse, walking is very difficult. I find it hard to keep in step with Dime-Mouth. We prance around the room, and Dime-Mouth lets out a couple of neighs just to make it look good.

“Phooey!” I mutter. “I can’t do this all night. It’s hot inside here. Besides, I detect that you eat garlic for dinner today.”

“We can break up at the ball,” Dime-Mouth tells me. “Though I know I am going to feel lost without youse.”

“All right,” I grumble. “Come on. I am going to call for my ginch.”

“The ginch, by all means!” agrees Dime-Mouth.

We trot down the stairs and up the street, carrying the costume under our arms—but trotting just for practice. Finally we arrive at the home of this ginch of mine. She is a little item by the name of Josephine, but I call her Ration because she is my sugar.

We arrive at her door-step and I get ready to ring the bell. Then Dime-Mouth taps me on the shoulder.

“Wait a minute,” he whispers. “Why don’t we surprise this tomato of yours? Let us slip into our Hi-Ho Silver outfit and make like a horse. She will be very much amused and confused.”

“Why not?” I shrug. “She will have to get used to it anyway, I suppose.”

So we put on our horse, stand together, and then Dime-Mouth rings the door-bell with his hoof.

Josephine comes to the door and opens it. She stands there blinking at us.

“Why if it isn’t Lefty Feep,” she says.

This burns me up, considering the fact that I am wearing this particular disguise. I do not know how she recognizes me and I do not wish to guess.

“Say, this is splendid,” she giggles. “You couldn’t choose a cuter costume.”

That makes me feel better, because I worry that Josephine will not approve of it. But she seems to be crazy about the idea.

“Just the thing,” she murmurs. “A horse! Because I am coming as Annie Oakley the Queen of the Western Plains—and you can ride me over on your back!”

Sure enough, when she steps out I see she is dressed like a cow-girl. Being bowlegged, she looks quite becoming in the outfit. But when I think of having to carry her around on our backs, it is not so good.

But she insists and we bend down. She climbs on. “Giddyap!” she yells. Also “Whoopee!” And digs her spurs into my ears. We are off.

It is quite a ride. I am very glad the streets are pretty deserted. And I am gladder still when we pull up at the hall where the Anti-Amusement League is holding this masquerade. Because Josephine is quite a load to carry, bouncing around the way she does.

“You boys will win all the prizes,” she tells us, as we go in.

Dime-Mouth and I prance into the ball room and look around.

THE brawl is already under way, and there is a terrific crowd. Dime-Mouth and I separate and stand up to take a look around, each of us wearing our half of the costume.

I spot a number of familiar personalities. For example, there is Gorilla Gabface. He comes over when he sees me and flashes a big smile. “How do you like it?” he asks.

He is wearing a gorilla costume, and a very realistic one.

“Very nice,” I sneer at him. “But why don’t you wear a costume of some kind?”

“But I am—oh, I get it!” he snarls. “You think you are sharp, Lefty. You should talk, in that outfit of yours. You look like a fugitive from a brewery wagon!”

“Hello, Lefty, you’re looking great!” It is Out-of-Business Oscar who interrupts us. He is wearing a long white nightgown and a gold crown. Under his arm he carries a sort of combination seashell and old fashioned victrola horn.

“Who are you and what is that?” I inquire.

“I am King Croesus,” he tells me. “And just to symbolize the fact that I am rich, I carry this Corncupia. The Horn of Plenty.”

He reaches down into it and pulls out a handful of fake money which he scatters on the floor.

This amuses me, because the only way to get Oscar to let go of a dollar is to cut off his hands. The Corncupia looks plenty corny to me.

All at once I spot Subconscious Sigmund. He waves at me and comes over.

“What in the world are you supposed to be?” I gasp.

The psychologist smiles. “I am not anything in the world,” he says. “I am something in my own mind. I represent the Infantile Stage of the Ego. The childish emotional level of the intelligence.”

“You can say that again,” I remark.

Because Subconscious Sigmund is dressed like a baby, in a long bib and a bonnet. He still smokes a cigar, though, and I detect a flask bulging under his diapers.

“By the way,” says Sigmund, “I have a guest with me. A visitor. Gentlemen, meet my distinguished European friend, exiled from Germany—Herr Tonic.”

Herr Tonic comes up and bows. He is a tall, bald-headed baby wearing a big purple robe all embroidered with stars and crescents. In one hand he carries a funny-looking cane, or stick.

"What kind of an outfit is this?" I ask.

"This is a magician's robe," he tells me. "And this, of course, is my magic wand."

"That is cute," pipes up Josephine. "Coming disguised as a magician."

Herr Tonic gives her a scowl and shrugs. But before he can say anything, Gorilla Gabface lurches over.

"Let's throw our toes," he suggests. "The band is getting out of hand."

So Josephine and Gabface dance away.

Subconscious Sigmund pulls me into a corner with this Herr Tonic. Dime-Mouth McCarthy follows.

"Let us have a drink," says Sigmund, waving his flask.

DIME-MOUTH nods politely and then wrenches the flask out of Sigmund's hand.

We spin the bottle.

"Isn't this jolly?" says Herr Tonic, looking around with a smile on his grim puss. "I am pleased to see peoples enjoying themselves, ja? And such a pretty costumes!"

Dime-Mouth nods. "Ain't it the truth?" he says. "I always like fun because it is so amusing, particularly if you want to enjoy entertainment."

Herr Tonic looks at Dime-Mouth and I can see he is impressed by his intelligence.

Dime-Mouth is encouraged to start blabbing.

"Youse want to know something?" he says. "When I come in here tonight to this fancy-dress ball, I say to myself, I say, 'Dime-Mouth, doesn't this remind youse of the story of Cinderella?' And it soitenly does."

"Cinderella?" I ask. "What's that?"

He turns to me. "Do youse mean to say youse never heard the story of Cinderella?"

"I don't go to stag parties."

“But this is a fairy story for the brats. It is very famous. Don’t youse ever hear it at your mother’s knee?”

“When I am on my mother’s knee years ago,” I inform him, “I am always facing downwards and I cannot hear anything but the sound of a paddle.”

So Dime-Mouth McCarthy, being educated, tells me the story of Cinderella. He uses a lot of ten-cent words, but translated into English, it runs like this.

Once upon a time there is a little frail by the name of Cinderella who lives all alone in the woods with nobody for company except a step-mother, two step-sisters, and a step-ladder. The other ginches are called step-sisters because they are always out stepping, but Cinderella has to stay home and rattle the Venetian blinds while her old lady and the other tomatoes hit the high spots. One day they get a fancy bid to a brawl at the king’s castle. And off they go, leaving Cinderella parked in the kitchen to manicure potatoes.

She is sitting there crying the mascara out of her eyes because she doesn’t promote an invite to this shindig, when all at once an old bimbo appears and asks why she is making shed with the tears.

Cinderella hands her this hard-luck story and the old wrinkle smiles. She waves her hand and turns into a beautiful chorus girl with wings.

“I am your fairy godmother, Cinderella,” she pipes.

“Don’t hand me that stuff,” says Cinderella, who is no rummy.

“But look at my magic wand,” says the beautiful fairy. “I am going to send you to the party in style. I will wave this wand and you’ll see.”

So she waves the wand, and Cinderella find her slacks are now a lovely evening gown. Another wave of the wand and she has a permanent. A couple of waves fixes her up with a chauffeur and a new car. The fairy almost breaks the wand trying, but finally manages to even produce tires for the car.

Cinderella is off to the brawl.

“Whatever you do, get back here by midnight,” says the fairy. “And take good care of your shoes.”

Because along with the dress, Cinderella is wearing a pair of fancy glass slippers, like goldfish bowls.

Cinderella promises to get back and the fairy disappears. Well, the party is a great success. Cinderella meets up with Prince Charming, the king's son, and gives him the old come-on. Pretty soon they are dancing around, and the step-sisters are left out in the cold—because once Cinderella gets her hooks into a guy, he is sunk.

But she hoists a couple too many and at midnight she is still shagging around the dance-floor. She hears the clock strike and remembers. She runs like hell, and loses a slipper on the way out, but by the time she hits the air and sobers up, her fancy clothes are gone and she is back in slacks.

Meanwhile Prince Charming finds the glass slipper and figuring out that anybody who can afford glass slippers must have a lot of mazuma, he says he will marry the girl—if he can find her. So all the local ginches try on the slipper because if it fits, it proves who the girl at the brawl was. Only it doesn't fit. Finally the Prince's stooges come to Cinderella's dump with the brogan. They blow a shoe-horn and announce tire royal proclamation. So Cinderella's step-mother and step-sisters try the slipper On, and it's no go. Then Cinderella tries it. It fits perfectly, of course.

So the Prince marries Cinderella. And the moral of the whole story seems to be that you'll get your man if you have size 16 feet.

I THINK it is a pretty foolish story, and tell Dime-Mouth just that.

"But it is only a fairy story tale," says Dime-Mouth. "It does not happen, remember. Just a fragment of the imagination, see?"

He takes another drink. So does Sigmund and Herr Tonic—who is lucky he isn't a lobster, because he is pretty boiled.

"Youse don't catch the insignificance of the story, Lefty," Dime-Mouth complains. "It is just a legend, see? And this masquerade reminds me of it. But don't get the idea I fall for such stuff and nonsense."

"Nonsense, you call it?"

It is Herr Tonic who speaks.

We stare at him.

"You dare to call it nonsense? Why I have such a magic wand as you describe right here."

He taps the long cane he is carrying. I smile.

"I know, but you're just wearing a disguise," I tell him.

"What gives you that idea? Sigmund invites me here as his guest. I am not in any costume. This is what I wear when I arrive here from the old country. I am a magician."

"Youse cannot hand us that," says Dime-Mouth. "Youse are not one of these fairy godmothers."

Herr Tonic, what with the liquor he drinks and the rage he is in, now looks as red as a sloe gin fizz, and twice as deadly.

For the first time I realize how tall he is, and how black his eyes are, set in that bald forehead of his. He stands there in his long robe, waving his arms so the embroidered stars and moons glitter like his eyes do.

"So," he mutters. "I am not a fairy godmother, hein? Aber nicht a magician? I, the greatest evocator and necromancer of all the covens of the Hartz Mountains?"

Subconscious Sigmund looks worried and grabs Herr Tonic by the sleeve.

"Take it easy," he mumbles. "Please—don't do anything rash."

But Herr Tonic shakes himself loose. He holds up his long cane or stick. For a minute I get a close gander at it and realize it is covered all over with carvings—dragons and skulls and other pleasant things.

"And this is not a magic wand, ja?" yells Herr Tonic. "Well, I shall give you a demonstration."

"No—stop!" yells Sigmund.

But it is too late. Herr Tonic backs away and brings his wand up. "Anything can be transformed," he growls. "I can take any one of you and change you. But somehow, I think you are all better just the way you are. If you are really that way."

I cannot understand what he means.

Then he waves his wand, and I understand only too well.

Herr Tonic waves his wand, all around the ballroom. All around. And he whispers some words under his gin-soaked breath.

Then there is a scream, rising higher than the clarinet in the band.

Because people change.

Or, rather, they do not change.

They stay just as they are—only real!

Gorilla Gabface is the first to notice it. He is dancing with my ginch Josephine just as Herr Tonic waves his wand. All at once he lets go of Josephine and also lets go with a roar.

"Ooooorph!" yells Gorilla Gabface. "Aaaaargh! Gurrrrrr!"

And he begins to tear at his gorilla costume. Only it does not come off. And Gorilla Gabface finds it hard to tear at anything because his arms are now long enough to touch the floor with his elbows.

"Gosh!" squeals my ginch Josephine. "Gorilla Gabface is really a gorilla!"

Then I understand, like I say. Herr Tonic has a magic wand, and he merely waves it and turns everybody at the ball into just what their costumes represent.

I LOOK around. Dime-Mouth McCarthy is standing there in the front half of the horse. Only now he is actually that—the front half of a horse. The head is real. He looks like a horse's neck to me.

When I see him he starts to neigh and whinny and one of his two hoofs comes up and points at Subconscious Sigmund. I stare at Sigmund.

At first I cannot see him. Then I look close to the ground. Subconscious Sigmund is down there, on his hands and knees. He is crawling around in his baby costume, looking plenty confused.

He stares up at me and waves his cigar.

“Da da!” he lisps. “Lefty Fweep! You muff: do somefing! Stwop Herr Twonic from getting away—make him change uf bwack into pweople agwain! Oh, this is tewible!”

It is indeed terrible. All around me people are yelling and pointing at each other. The fake clowns are real clowns now. The disguised pirates actually are running around with cutlasses. The women who come as senoritas are gabbling in Spanish. It is a mess.

I observe all this from behind a curtain at the side of the hall, just sticking my head out.

Josephine comes running up to me, with her spurs jingling.

“Oh, Lefty—what’s the matter?” she cries.

“Plenty,” I mutter.

“Everybody’s changed!

“You’re telling me?”

“What are you doing hiding behind that curtain, Lefty?”

“Nothing. I like it here.”

“But we must do something. This is no time for horseplay.”

“Don’t say such things!” I snarl.

“But Lefty—everybody’s changed!”

“I know it,” I shriek. “And what do you suppose happens to me?”

I come out from the curtains and let her look. She almost faints.

“You’re—you’re half horse!” she gasps.

It is true. I stare down at myself again. A minute ago I am standing up with my head and arms and shoulders sticking out of the rear end of the horse costume that covers my legs and hips.

Now I am still standing up. My head and arms and shoulders are still sticking out.

But from the waist down I am a horse!

I have two hoofs and a long, silky tail.

That is what happens to me when Herr Tonic waves his wand.

From the waist up I am human. Otherwise I am like one of these centaurs in the legends, but with one set of horse legs instead of two.

"We must do something," Josephine whispers. "People are starting to go crazy out there."

"They are not the only ones," I tell her. "What about me? How can I live this way? Why my trousers won't even fit any more. And I will probably have to get myself a jockey and a stable boy."

Subconscious Sigmund crawls up to me, followed by Dime-Mouth and Gorilla Gabface.

"Gurrrrrulgh!" moans Gabface.

"Nyaaaaaaa!" neighs Dime-Mouth.

"I wanno change bwack!" lisps Subconscious Sigmund.

"Where's that Herr Tonic?" I yell. Looking around all of a sudden, I do not see him in all this confusion.

"He disappweared!" Sigmund chokes out. "He wan away!"

"We must catch him and make him change us back!" Josephine says, excited.

"But what about all these people here?"

"We must keep them here in the ballroom until Herr Tonic returns to change them to normal bodies again."

"How do we do that?" I ask.

Then I see the answer.

OUT-OF-BUSINESS Oscar lurches by. He is still wearing his King Croesus crown, and a very sick look. The sick look is easy to explain. Because he carries this big Horn of Plenty under his arm. And now he is dipping into it and tossing out money.

"I can't stop—I can't help myself!" he groans. "I must give away money."

"Good," I tell him. "You stand right here at the door and keep it up. Give away dough. People will scramble for it. That's the only way to hold them here until we find this magician and make him change us back."

"I must keep giving away money?"

"You can't stop anyway. And if you ever want to stop in the future, we better find Herr Tonic," Josephine tells him.

So he shakes his head and begins to scatter coins and bills.

Meanwhile the rest of us head for the door.

"He can't go far," I mutter. "He's a stranger in town, isn't he, Sigmund?"

"Yef. And he is so drunk he pwobabwy just wants a dwink down the stweet."

"Come on, then—we'll comb every bar in the neighborhood until we locate that human dandruff."

Out we go. Dime-Mouth prances on ahead. Josephine clanks her spurs behind him. Gorilla Gabface hulks along, making ape noises, but he carries little Subconscious Sigmund under his arm. I bring up the rear—and I do mean rear, with my particular costume now a regular part of me.

We hit the street, and feel lucky that it is empty. The sight of a cowgirl leading the front half of a horse, followed by a gorilla carrying a baby, and a human centaur—well, it might attract a little comment. To say nothing of hysterics.

"There's a bar!" I yell, spotting a gin-mill across the street. "Maybe he's wandering with his wand in there."

"We can't go in this way," Josephine objects. "They have some awful funny customers in there, but we are more awful than funny."

"You go in alone," I tell her. "We'll wait outside."

So in she goes. We stand there.

Pretty soon everybody gets impatient. Dime-Mouth is neighing and pawing the ground with his hoofs. Gorilla Gabface looks unhappy because his knuckles scrape the sidewalk. Subconscious Sigmund, baby or no baby, is still a little tipsey and very weepy.

"Baw!" he whimpers. "I wanna dwink!"

And so do I. I cannot help glancing behind me and whenever I do, I get a shock. I must quiet my nerves.

"All right," I decide. "We'll go in. But we must behave, see? Dime-Mouth, you wait here, and Gabface stays with you. Come to think of it, Subconscious Sigmund wouldn't look so good in a tavern either. I will go in alone."

But this idea does not seem to go over.

"You chiseler!" mutters Sigmund in his weak baby voice. "We all gwo in or nobwody doef!"

I shrug and flip my tail. "O.K. But remember—we must pretend we are still masquerades, see? With very realistic costumes on. That goes for you, Dime-Mouth, and you too, Gabface. And Sigmund is supposed to be a real baby. Understand?"

They all nod and we walk into the tavern.

THERE is quite a loud crowd in there, and it takes a minute to spot Josephine standing at the bar. It takes a minute for the crowd to spot us, and by that that time we are way down on the end of the bar where it is dark.

"Do you see this Herr Tonic?" I whisper to Josephine.

"No. He is in here about ten minutes ago, the bartender tells me, but now he is gone. Let's get out of here—you look awful."

"Get in the booth," I whisper to Dime-Mouth and Gabface. "I'll pass drinks in to you. Josephine, hold Sigmund and remember he's your baby. I'll stand at the bar with you. From the waist up I look all right, and the bartender can't see over the bar."

That is the way we work it. The bartender comes up.

"What'll it be, folks?" he asks.

"A Tom Collins," says Josephine.

"Make mine whiskey," I tell him. "Three whiskeys."

"Three?"

"Of course. One to drink, one for a chaser, and one to take the taste of the chaser out of my mouth."

He shrugs and pours. I pass two whiskeys into the booth for Dime-Mouth and Gabface when he isn't looking. Then I drink the third.

“My, you certainly can put them away!” comments the bartender, looking around at my empty glasses.

“Don’t fogwet baby!” lips Sigmund, from Josephine’s arms.

“Why of course,” says Josephine, smiling. “Baby wants his bottle, doesn’t he?”

“We have no milk, lady,” says the bartender.

“Milk, hell!” bawls little Sigmund. “Give me a bwottle of gin!”

The bartender’s eyes pop. Sigmund ignores him and pulls out his old cigar, which he lights up and puffs.

“What kind of a baby is that, lady?” he asks.

“A bottle baby,” I explain.

“Are you its father?”

“Of course.”

“But he doesn’t look like you.”

“I should hope not,” giggles Josephine.

The bartender is too curious. He leans over the bar to stare at me and gets an eyeful of my hoofs and tail.

“Jumping Ike!” he yells.

And just at that moment a couple happens to blunder into the booth where Gorilla Gabface and Dime-Mouth McCarthy are hiding.

“There’s an ape in my booth!” yells the girl.

“Never mind about your boyfriend,” I come back, but too late. Her escort now notices Dime-Mouth.

“There’s a horse drinking in my seat!” he shouts.

Between the two of them and the bartender, everybody is staring at us.

Dime-Mouth and Gorilla Gabface join us at the bar. I prance around waving my tail. Because I spot the bouncers bearing down on us from the rear of the tavern.

“Out you go, you freaks!” screams the bartender. “I don’t know who you are or what you are, but I don’t want a gang of monstrosities in my joint!”

“Who else would come into this dump?” I want to know.

And that is the signal for the riot.

IT is very hard to remember details. I can recall Gorilla Gabface swinging by his long arms from the chandeliers and making sounds like King Kong after a bad night. I remember Dime-Mouth McCarthy biting a bartender’s toupee off with his horse-teeth. I have an impression of Subconscious Sigmund running along the top of the bar with his baby legs and hitting people in the head with ash trays. I myself am plenty busy kicking out at faces with my hind legs.

But it is Josephine who gives everybody the biggest surprise. She begins to hurl bottles and glasses at bartenders, and her shots never miss. Naturally—because she is now actually as good a marksman as Annie Oakley.

The rest is just a mess. We fight our way out to the street at last, in triumph. And in a Black Maria. Because somebody calls the cops, and we run right into a patrol wagon.

Twenty minutes later we are all lined up at night court in front of Magistrate Donglepootzer.

Hiawatha Donglepootzer is an old fudge of a judge who I tangle with long, long ago. He is a very grim sort of personality with a mind like a calendar—in fact all he can seem to talk about is “thirty days” or “six months” or “five years at hard labor.”

And from the minute he sets eyes on us, I can tell he is ready to give Father Time a real workout.

The sergeant that books us steps up and reads the charges.

“Assault and battery. Disorderly conduct. Contributing to the delinquency of minors. Indecent exposure. Your Honor, it’s all the work of these people here.”

Magistrate Donglepootzer peers over his high desk. He peers again. He takes off his glasses, wipes them, and puts them on. Then he takes off his glasses and throws them away.

“People,” he whispers. “What people?”

“Why these here people, Your Honor.”

“I don’t see any people,” snarls Donglepootzer. “I see a young lady, yes. She is wearing cowboy pants but I imagine she is a young lady. I hope so anyway. And the others—"

Donglepootzer sighs.

"The others," he says, "I can't seem to classify. There is a child, yes. A child with a cigar. And a gorilla. And the other two seem to be parts of a horse, cut in half. Except that one of them has a human body and a human face. Though not a very human face."

He is speaking to me, and I resent it.

"Now, then," he tells the sergeant, "would you mind explaining those those charges once more?"

"Well, it's this way, Your Honor. The lady comes into the bar alone and asks if anybody sees a magician with a magic wand."

"Drunk and disorderly, eh?" says Donglepootzer. "Continue."

"Then the next thing you know, this horse—or man—or half and half thing—comes in and stands next to her. And all at once this cigar-smoking baby is with them. They stand there, drinking—"

"The baby, too?" asks Donglepootzer.

"Yes, The baby has a bottle of gin. And the horse-man is drinking whiskey three shots at a time and talking to the lady. It is quite a party, they tell me."

"I can imagine it," sighs Donglepootzer. "But I don't want to."

"Then all at once the customers find this gorilla in a booth, drinking with the front half of a horse—"

"Must you talk that way?" groans Donglepootzer.

"But it's the truth, Your Honor. Then the fight starts and the baby hits a bartender in the head with an ashtray. You ought to hear the baby cursing —"

"Stop!" yells Donglepootzer. "I can't stand any more!"

"But—"

"Never mind. I believe all the charges. Now, before I lock you all up forever, is there anything you can possibly say to explain this—this nightmare?"

I MAKE up my mind in a hurry.

There is only one way out and that is to tell the truth. I clear my throat and step up.

"I will explain, Your Honor," I tell him. "To begin with, it is all a mistake. There is nothing wrong with any of us."

Donglepootzer closes his eyes.

"Good—good God!" he whispers. "Nothing wrong with you?

"Of course not. This gentleman over there is Dime-Mouth McCarthy. He is a gentleman and a scholar."

"You mean the front half of a horse?" asks Donglepootzer.

"But that's just it. He's not a real horse."

"He looks real. I'm a pretty fair judge of horse-flesh myself. Offhand, I'd say he was a mudder."

"No children at all," I tell him. "It is just a masquerade costume he wears. He has the front end and I have the rear end. Sort of fifty-fifty."

"Is that true, McCarthy?" booms the Magistrate, looking at him. Of course Dime-Mouth cannot answer. He just tosses his mane and neighs. A horrid sound.

"Are you giving me the horselaugh?" snarls Donglepootzer.

"Don't mind him, Your Honor. He's just feeling his oats."

"Yes," adds Josephine. "After all, he's drinking a lot, you understand. Like the old saying. You can lead a horse to water, but he'd rather have whiskey."

"I don't want any of your old sayings," groans Donglepootzer. "I want some new facts. What next? I suppose you'll try and tell me that gorilla isn't a gorilla."

"Certainly not," I grin. "That is Mr. Gabface who runs the pool hall. Don't you recognize him?"

"But he looks like an anthropoid—"

"He forgets to shave today," I explain.

Donglepootzer blinks. "All right," he murmurs. "All right. Now—about that baby. The one that drinks gin and hits bartenders and curses."

"He's not a baby. He's Subconscious Sigmund the psychiatrist."

"That baby is a psychiatrist?"

"Sure. Don't you ever hear of a child psychiatrist?"

Donglepootzer starts to tremble.

"But he's a baby—a mere babe in arms."

"Who is a baby, sir?" lisps Subconscious Sigmund. "I'll hwave you know I am an eminwent pfychiatric authworitwy, wif a Ph.D. and a graduate cwertificate fwom the beft colleges in the cwountry. And you, sir, are a clear cafe of dementwia pwaecox!"

He blows smoke in Donglepootzer's eyes.

"Maybe I'm crazy after all," he mutters. "I never expect such language from a baby. Confess—you're a midget in disguise, aren't you?"

"Of course." Subconscious Sigmund plays up to him.

"And this is all a practical joke. You people are just wearing costumes, as you say?" Donglepootzer is almost pleading. He wants to believe it for the sake of his own sanity.

"That's it exactwly!" lisps Subconscious Sigmund, through his baby bonnet. Then he lets out a sudden wail. "Oh gwacious! I think I will need to be changed!"

"Have you got a diaper handy, Your Honor?" asks Josephine.

THAT does it.

Donglepootzer jumps up.

"Eminent psychiatrist, eh?" he shrieks. "A psychiatrist who needs a change of diapers! And a gorilla who scratches himself for fleas; and two ends of a horse—the front end can't talk but the rear end can!

"Lock them up!" he yells at the sergeant. "Lock them up and throw away the keys!"

The cops advance on us. The jig is up. The hour of doom is at hand.

The hour of——

Just then the clock over the desk begins to strike.

"Midnight!" I whisper.

And—it happens.

All in a moment. Subsconscious Sigmunds lets out a yelp and slips from Josephine's arms. He is growing—bigger and bigger. Suddenly he stands there, a normal man, in his baby costume.

I look at Gorilla Gabface and Dime-Mouth McCarthy. They are slipping out of their costumes. My own costume falls away.

"You see?" I yell at Magistrate Donglepootzer. "We're all right. It's you who must be crazy."

With a wild scream, Donglepootzer jumps off the bench and runs out of the room.

"Go away," he yells. "Go far away. Get out!"

This is excellent advice to follow. We take it. On the lam.

"Like Cinderella, Lefty," Dime-Mouth tells me. "Youse see? I am right when. I compare our masquerade to Cinderella's brawl. We change back at midnight. That is what Herr Tonic does to us with his magic wand or whatever. Changes us until midnight, only."

"Then the folks at the ball must be returned to normal too," Josephine says.

Subconscious Sigmund nods. "Of course," he says. "I must apologize for this nasty trick on the part of my friend Herr Tonic. Of course he is a real wizard and able to perform such feats. But he would not do such a thing unless he were drunk and insulted. Just bad temper on his part."

"We will forget him," I say. "But what a night! I need a drink before I turn in."

"Let's stop here," suggests Josephine, pointing out a cafe. We go in.

Standing at the bar, high as next next year's taxes, is our old wonderworking friend, Herr Tonic.

"There he is!" I whisper. "Let's get him!"

We sneak up very quietly. He doesn't have a chance.

I get his wand. The others hold his arms and legs.

"What are you doing?" he splutters.

“Never mind,” I say, very grim.

“Two can play at this magic game.”

So I make up my mind and wave the wand. Then I break it over my knee.

“What are you doing?” Subconscious Sigmund gasps.

“This is too dangerous to have around,” I tell him. “And especially in the hands of a foreigner with a bad temper. He should be interned anyway because he is not a citizen.”

“He certainly isn’t—any more,” says Josephine.

And he isn’t. We take him outside. The others go home and I dispose of Herr Tonic and come in here for breakfast. But what a night!

LEFTY FEEP sat back and mopped his forehead.

“Quite a remarkable adventure,” I agreed. “No wonder you are touchy about mentioning horses. I’d say you had a real kick coming.”

Feep winced.

“But there’s one thing you forgot to mention,” I told him. “You say you caught this magician, Herr Tonic, and took his wand away and broke it.”

“Right.”

“But before you broke it, you waved the wand at him.”

“Also right.”

“Tell me, Lefty,” I said, fixing him with an accusing stare, “Just what did you turn him into?”

Feep blushed.

“I am afraid you ask me that,” he said. “But I suppose I might as well admit it. We get Her Tonic down, and then Dime-Mouth McCarthy and I put the horse costume on him. Complete. And I wave the wand over him.”

“You mean to tell me Herr Tonic is now a horse?” I gasped.

Lefty Feep shrugged.

“Well, if he isn’t,” he chuckled, “then the glue factory I just sold him to will be awfully disappointed!”

Mystery of the Creeping Underwear

It was the most potent formula Mr. Fooze had ever mixed—the elixir of life itself!

LITTLE Mr. Fooze walked up the front steps to the door of his neat suburban bungalow. His jaw was squared with determination.

Tonight he was going to have it out with Professor Beaker once and for all.

"Things," brooded Mr. Fooze, darkly, "have gone far enough. Dora shouldn't have taken him as a boarder anyway. I admit we could use the money and the spare room was going to waste. But why did she rent it to a crazy chemistry professor?"

Sidney Fooze halted before the door and hesitated before announcing his arrival. He needed to work his courage up a little more. He paced back and forth, remembering the insults and injuries caused by their boarder.

"The first thing he did was to move in all those chemicals of his," muttered Mr. Fooze. "Then he began to make those foolish 'experiments.' Wouldn't tell what he was doing or why. Nothing leaked out about them except the smell."

Mr. Fooze wrinkled his nose reminiscently.

The smell had been terrible. Mr. Fooze and Dora would wake up in the middle of the night and sniff at what was coming down on the air from the attic where Professor Beaker lived and worked.

That was bad enough. And then Professor Beaker had set fire to his room one Sunday morning.

Mr. Fooze had wanted to throw him out then, but he paid so promptly and pleaded the urgent necessity of his "great experiment" and Mr. Fooze had let him stay.

Last week there had been a flood.

Three days ago he had brought ten live chickens into the attic and turned the place into a shambles of feathers.

Mr. Fooze was sick and tired of his star boarder and his antics. No matter what he was "experimenting" on—perpetual motion or a rocket to the moon—Professor Beaker must go. If he wouldn't tell what he was doing or let anyone into his room, that was tough. He'd better hire himself a padded cell and continued his chemical research there.

"And another thing, Professor!" growled Mr. Fooze, raising his voice and sneering at the imaginary figure cowering in his brain. "You can kindly take your whole apparatus and—"

"Sidney!"

Mr. Fooze jerked out of his twilight day-dream suddenly. Dora, his wife, stood on the doorstep.

"Hello, dear," he said, meekly.

"What in the world are you talking to yourself for?" she asked.

"I was just rehearsing," Mr. Fooze explained. "I'm going to tell the Professor off tonight."

"No, Sidney."

"What do you mean—no?"

"You won't be able to, I'm afraid."

"Why not?"

"Well—you see, he left here rather suddenly today."

"Left here suddenly? How?"

"Through the roof," Dora told him.

"No!"

“Yes. Poor Professor Beaker,” sighed Dora. “He was always afraid he’d go to pieces over his work.”

“You mean he blew himself up?”

“That’s the direction he was going,” Dora agreed.

“Then what about our roof?”

“The insurance men are going to put on a new one,” said Mrs. Fooze. “The police were here, of course.”

“Did you send for an undertaker?”

“There isn’t any need to,” said Dora, simply. “So far all they’ve found is part of his upper plate. It landed on the school-house roof three blocks away.”

She kissed Mr. Fooze on the nose. “But let’s not stand here gabbing,” she said. “Supper’s getting cold.”

MR. FOOZE shook his head. After three years of married life, he still couldn’t figure it out. The boarder blew himself to bits and took the roof off, and all Dora could do was worry about supper getting cold.

He sighed and went in to dinner. After supper he explored the attic room.

Sure enough, the roof was gone—a big chunk of it, anyway. Twisted debris was all that remained of a bunsen-burner unit and laboratory table. The Professor’s room itself was a shambles. Mr. Fooze waded ankle-deep in broken glass from beakers, retorts and bottles. Walls were stained weird hues from the splashing of exploded and spilled chemicals. The Professor’s notes and laboratory papers were a soggy mass buried under the broken glass and powdered crystals.

“The men are coming tomorrow to fix the roof,” said Dora. “I’ll have them clean up this room, too.”

“Good idea,” said Mr. Fooze.

“You should have heard the explosion,” Dora told him. “It made so much noise I could hardly hear my serial program.”

“Quite likely.”

"I wonder what he was doing up here?" Dora asked. "I often meant to ask him. But there was always so much to do during the day I never had a chance."

"You mean so many radio serials to listen to," said her husband, sarcastically.

"That's right," Dora answered. "Ooh, hurry downstairs, dear! There's a program on tonight I can't miss!"

She scurried down the steps and Mr. Fooze followed, shrugging helplessly.

Dora sat in the parlor fiddling with the radio, and Mr. Fooze stared at the tiger-skin rug on the floor. The tiger head winked up at him and Mr. Fooze winked back. Women were funny.

Gradually he dozed off and forgot about it.

He was walking in his sleep when he went up to bed that night. He turned in without any consciousness of what he was doing.

He was still snoring when Dora jerked him violently by the shoulder.

"Whzzmattr?" he inquired, digging his face into the pillow.

"Wake up, Sidney! It's five o'clock!"

"What of it?" grunted Mr. Fooze.

"You've got to be at the office at eleven," Dora reminded.

"Buzz' only five," groaned her husband.

"But you'll have to get up and do the washing first," said Dora.

"Washing?"

"With all that excitement yesterday, I forgot to wash," Dora explained. "And you'll need fresh clothes when you go to that big meeting today."

Mr. Fooze groaned and crawled out of bed. Once in his innocent honeymoon days he had volunteered to "help around the house." He had been so gallant.

Now he was just plain stuck. He crept into his oldest shirt and trousers.

"As long as you're up," Dora suggested, "you might as well go into the attic and pick up some of that broken glass. Carry it down to the basement when you take the wash."

MR. FOOZE shivered his way up to the attic and Professor Beaker’s ruined room. He dumped a lot of glassware into the laundry basket on top of the clothes and carried the whole mess down to the basement.

He stacked bottles and vials on the floor and then began to do things with the laundry.

Cursing sweetly, he dumped underwear, shorts, panties, shirts, socks, gloves, neckties, dresses several pairs of wash pants into the washing machine.

The machine began to clank and grind. So did Mr. Fooze who was singing “Rinso white” in a hideous falseto.

After a while Mr. Fooze got pretty sick and tired of the whole business—but mostly tired. He lay down on the basement floor and went back to sleep.

“Sidney!”

His wife called from the head of the stairs.

“Yes, dear?”

“Did you remember to put in the blueing?”

“Oh, sure,” lied Mr. Fooze, who had done no such thing.

He got up, rubbing his eyes, and searched the basement shelves for the bottle of blueing.

Yawning, he spied the little blue bottle on the floor, twisted the cap, and poured in a generous measure.

Then he lay down on the coal pile.

“Sidney!”

He sprang to attention. “Yes, sugar?”

“I forgot to tell you—the blueing is upstairs in the kitchen,” Dora called down.

“Oh, oh!” grunted Mr. Fooze, under his breath. He glanced in the washing machine. He hoped he hadn’t made a mistake and put some ink into it. Stooping, he examined the blueing bottle.

No label. And the stuff smelled funny. But it was blue. And the clothes didn’t look spoiled.

He hoped for the best as he carried his basket of wet wash out to the yard. The clothes-line flapped in a strong breeze. Good. The garments should dry in an hour or so with this wind.

Mr. Fooze hung clothes and then lay down in the back yard for his delayed nap.

This time he actually slept.

It seemed to Mr. Fooze that he had a horried dream, A most real and ghastly dream.

It seemed as though Mr. Fooze woke up two hours later. The first thing he noticed was that the breeze had died down—died down completely.

Then he glanced at the clothes-line and gasped.

There was no wind, but the clothes were moving!

Shirts and shorts danced up and down the line, instead of dangling decently. For a moment, Mr. Fooze had tire confused impression that the laundry was—somehow—alive.

He walked over and felt the edge of a chemise. It was perfectly dry. Good! He could take this stuff down, iron it, and leave for the office.

HUMMING under his breath, Mr. Fooze began to unpin the wash and drop garments into the basket.

That's when he realized he must be dreaming.

Mr. Fooze reached up and unfastened a long union suit. As he did so, the garment seemed to slip from his fingers.

It did not fall to the ground.

Instead, the union suit stood beside him in the yard!

Stood there on woolen legs, arms resting jauntily on the hips!

Mr. Fooze stared with jaw agape, as the union suit suddenly turned its back on him, disclosing a gaping open flap in the rear.

He reached out to grasp the unnatural object, but the union suit swiftly moved away.

Mr. Fooze lost his temper and lunged.

Immediately, the union suit started to run! Wobbling grotesquely, it scampered across the back yard, with Mr. Fooze hot on its ankles—for a union suit has no heels.

“Come back here!” yelled Mr. Fooze, scarcely realizing what he was shouting. He glanced around wildly. What if neighbors should see?

The union suit played tag around the clothes posts, its open flap fluttering coyly.

Mr. Fooze went slightly berserk, then. He jerked down the end of the clothesline and coiled the rope purposefully.

The union suit danced just out of his range, like a headless ghost, taunting him and waving its wrinkled arms.

But Mr. Fooze was ready. He twirled his clothesline and it settled—like a lasso—over the bewitched garment.

Cursing furiously, Mr. Fooze dragged the union suit to his side, stooped down, and thrust it, still squirming, into the clothes basket.

Then, as he lifted the basket full of writhing garments, he suddenly stumbled and went down. The force of his fall knocked the wind out of him.

And it jarred his senses still more. For he realized, in a hideous moment, that he was not dreaming. He was wide awake. And his laundry was alive!

Arms and legs waved from the basket, as imprisoned clothing squirmed. Mr. Fooze held on tight and stared.

He didn’t know what had happened, or why. But there was only one thing to do with clothes, alive or dead. That was—iron them. Iron them and lock them into drawers where they’d be out of sight.

Muttering under his breath, Mr. Fooze carried the laundry basket into the house, set it down on the kitchen table, and put up the ironing board.

He was grateful to see that Dora didn’t enter the kitchen. She was listening to a program in the parlor.

While he waited for the iron to heat, Mr. Fooze tried to figure things out.

Obviously, something had happened to the laundry. But what?

Then Mr. Fooze remembered the blueing he had dumped into the wash—the blueing that was not really blueing.

It had come from a blue bottle, he remembered. A blue bottle on the basement floor. On the basement floor, where he had dumped the bottles he carried from Professor Beaker's room.

Could it have been a bottle of chemical from the Professor's experiments?

Perhaps.

But what kind of a concoction could bring clothes to life?

MR. FOOZE tried to think. He stared at the laundry basket in apprehensive horror. The thought of ironing these unusual garments dismayed him. What if they didn't like heat? What if the pants refused to be pressed?

There was only one worse alternative—and that was what Dora would say to him if she found this out. That must never happen. He had to iron the clothes and hide them.

Mr. Fooze approached the clothes basket. To his relief, he found the garments lying still. Nothing rustled or slithered or waved to and fro.

He touched the top garments gingerly. They did not move.

Perhaps the effects of the strange chemical had worn off. He hoped so. He began to iron at top speed. First some underwear, then a pair of socks. He'd need them to wear today to the office.

After that he pressed a green wash tie. That was also a part of his wardrobe.

Then Mr. Fooze got to work on the real job—ironing the brown slack suit he must wear at the office today. The boss had insisted he wear the horrible ensemble.

As he ironed, he glanced at his watch. Only an hour left!

There was no time to finish ironing the rest of the garments. Fluttering in haste, he hurriedly jammed the rest of the wash back into the basket, picked up the ironed garments, and lugged the load up to the bedroom.

To be on the safe side, he stuffed all the unpressed clothing in his wife's bureau drawers and locked them up.

Then he took a pair of green shorts, underwear, the green tie, socks, and his slack suit, and sat down on the bed.

He dressed swiftly—but without a hitch. The garments didn't try to run away. At last he stood before the mirror in slack suit and necktie. He looked perfectly normal in his attire. Stepping into a pair of sandals, he turned and made for the stairs.

Going downstairs, his trouble started.

He remembered the blue bottle in the cellar. Some inner instinct told him not to leave without looking at it again.

Mr. Fooze made for the cellar. Sure enough, there stood the unlabelled bottle, right where he had left it. The blue glass tingled against his palm as Mr. Fooze lifted it up and took out the cork. He sniffed at the liquid. It smelled faintly of ether. But there was nothing very unusual in that.

His eye lighted on the bar of soap on the wash tub. With trembling deliberation, Mr. Fooze tilted the bottle gently. A drop fell squarely on the soap.

Mr. Fooze saw the liquid fall. Then he grinned. Nothing happened. The soap still rested there.

Then—

The soap jumped.

Mr. Fooze saw it jump, and his mouth opened.

That was bad, for the soap sailed in the direction of Mr. Fooze's face, and landed squarely in his open mouth.

He groaned and spluttered as the soap suddenly bounded from between his teeth and began to hop around on the floor. Mr. Fooze made a dive for it, but it jumped into a rat-hole and disappeared.

He stood there, trying to control his trembling fingers.

It was true then. This blue bottle—Professor Beaker's bottle—contained some mysterious ingredient that had the power of animating objects. Making things come alive.

Mr. Fooze shuddered.

Something must be done, but there was not time to decide right now. He had to get to the office.

HE WENT up the stairs, carrying the blue bottle carefully in his hand. He'd better not drop it, or the steps might suddenly spring to life and start clattering all over the house!

Mr. Fooze headed straight for the parlor. While the tigerskin rug glared up at him accusingly, he put the blue bottle in the upper drawer of his desk and locked the desk.

Still shaking, he went back down the hall and slipped out of the house. Dora was listening to the radio, and he didn't disturb her. He was afraid to tell her.

All Mr. Fooze could do was hope and pray. Hope and pray that the newly-washed clothes he was wearing would behave. Perhaps the ironing had done the trick. He had always known that clothes make the man—and he was only afraid that they might make the man crazy. Well, it would all come out in the wash.

It took all of Mr. Fooze's powers of concentration to find his street car corner—because by this time he didn't know if he was coming or going.

His slack suit was not moving, but he held his hands close to his sides, just in case. When the street car arrived, he got on cautiously and took a seat in back, all by himself.

For a few blocks he rode in peace. Then the car began to fill up with passengers. He eyed them malignantly, hoping no one would choose the vacant seat at his side.

A fat lady bustled down the aisle and caught his eye. She returned his stony stare with an obvious sniff, and plopped her poundage squarely next to Mr. Fooze, squeezing him against the window.

The pressure irritated Mr. Fooze. It also seemed to irritate his clothes.

For suddenly Mr. Fooze felt, his slack suit squirm. The arms flapped out and the trousers showed a tendency to cross. Inasmuch as his legs were not crossed, the trousers ballooned forth very obviously. Mr. Fooze struggled silently to maintain his composure—to say nothing of his sanity.

Suddenly his necktie flew up and began to curl around his neck.

The fat lady turned and noticed the green, snake-like tie as it squirmed along his throat.

Mr. Fooze forced a smile. The fat lady grunted.

He pushed the tie down hastily. But he was beginning to perspire.

Once again the tie flew up. It crept across and brushed the fat lady’s fourth chin.

Mr. Fooze tried to yank his tie back. But too late. It wrapped itself around the fat lady’s neck.

“Eeeek!” she complained, shrilly. “Take it away!”

SEVERAL passengers turned their heads and stared. It was a bad moment for Mr. Fooze, who was pulling at his necktie with both hands. To the spectators, it looked as though he were trying to strangle the woman with his tie.

Evidently she had the same opinion. Bringing up her heavy purse, she banged Mr. Fooze across the top of the head. The purse opened and Mr. Fooze received a shower of powder grains and hairpins on his head.

“Pardon me,” he wheezed. “My tie is caught—wait—”

He snapped the tie back and tucked it inside his slack shirt. The fat woman glared but settled back in her seat.

Mr. Fooze really was perspiring, now. He reached into his trouser pocket and pulled out a handkerchief to mop his face.

“Why you beast!” screamed the fat lady, rising to her feet.

Mr. Fooze glanced down. He was mopping his face with his handkerchief—what was wrong with that?

Just one thing. What Mr. Fooze held in his hand was not a handkerchief.

He was mopping his face with a pair of pink bloomers!

How the bloomers had become lodged in his pocket he didn't know. Perhaps they had climbed in of their own accord, he thought wildly.

As if to prove it, the bloomers suddenly slipped from his hand to his lap. There they stood up on their diminutive legs and began to dance. A hideous quivering convulsed the panties as the bloomers shimmied.

"Beast!" shrieked the fat lady. "Take them away!"

"They're not mine," yelled Mr. Fooze. As if to prove it, he rose to his feet and bolted down the aisle of the street car.

Passengers turned and giggled. Mr. Fooze heard guffaws and titters. He paused in his frantic race. Paused and stared at the pursuing pink panties.

The bloomers were chasing him down the aisle!

In a panic, he turned and headed back for his seat, jumping over the pink barrier. Almost at once the bloomers followed him. Back to the fat lady he ran, with panties at his heels.

She was on her feet, waiting for him.

"These bloomers—I swear they're not mine!" repeated Mr. Fooze desperately.

"Oh!" wailed the fat lady. "Do you mean to say those are my bloomers? Then you must have—oh, you monster!"

Down came the purse again, splitting on Mr. Fooze's head. The fat lady charged, and he ran; glancing back he saw her trip over the dancing panties as he jumped off the street car on the corner stop.

"Merciful God!" breathed Mr. Fooze, in a truly devout voice, as he regained his breath on the corner.

He turned and trudged the remaining three blocks to the office. He slowly recovered his composure as he noted that his clothing was unruffled. Nothing moved unnaturally. Perhaps his troubles were over. The effect of the strange liquid must be wearing off. At least, he hoped it was.

His coming ordeal would be bad enough without further complications.

Mr. Fooze entered the office and tensed himself for the business at hand.

It was five minutes to eleven by the office clock.

At eleven o’clock he would be on the spot. On the spot before a microphone in the big showroom on the second floor.

MR. FOOZE’S office was not, strictly speaking, an office. It was the business quarters of the Hummenkapper Clothing Company—manufacturers and designers of an exclusive line of men’s clothing.

In the office downstairs, Mr. Fooze, along with a large staff, labored over plans for “merchandising campaigns” and “men’s style shows” designed to sell Hummenkapper garments to out of town buyers for men’s shops all over the country.

Today such a style show was in preparation. At eleven, a hundred clothing buyers and style specialists would gather in the showroom on the second floor. One by one, fashion models would walk out and display Hummenkapper styles for the coming season, while an announcer read his script over a public address microphone.

Mr. Fooze was to be that announcer.

It was really a spot. His boss had chosen him for the assignment after long deliberation.

“You’d better do the trick,” he had snarled. “Hummenkapper needs to push merchandise. Write a script and read it as if you meant it. If not—”

The boss had made a familiar gesture, drawing his thumb across his throat.

Mr. Fooze was afraid of public address systems, but he was more afraid of his boss. Mr. Gnasher, of the Hummenkapper Clothing Company, was a hard man. A very hard man. It was a common rumor around the office that Mr. Gnasher had been named after his teeth.

Therefore, Mr. Fooze had worked hard on his script. He had rehearsed the reading of it for many hours. When they told him at the last minute he would have to appear in a slack suit—a new Hummenkapper style—he hadn’t dared refuse.

That was why he had the ridiculous garment on. He hoped it would behave.

Glancing at his tie in the mirror and fixing the crease of his rumpled trousers, Air. Fooze glided into the office, ignored the giggling stenographers, grabbed his script, and raced upstairs.

They were all up there—all the house salesmen and officials, sitting down in front on hard chairs. On either side, the buyers lolled, puffing cigars and exchanging the kind of stories salesmen always exchange.

Mr. Fooze looked through the curtains at his audience and gulped. The script rattled in his hand as he saw a spotlight go on from the back of the house and focus at the microphone that stood on the bare platform before the velvet curtains.

He would be standing out there in just a minute.

Mr. Fooze glanced nervously at the audience once more. Hard, brutal faces—coarse, crude men who would undoubtedly snicker when they saw him in a slack suit. Their business was selling new fashions, not wearing them. Most of them were dressed in unpressed, sloppy tweeds.

The models began coming out of their dressing rooms and lining up behind Mr. Fooze. As he gave them their cues from the script, they would come out and parade on the platform. Mr. Fooze looked at their calm self-possession and trembled. How could they take it so casually?

On his next peek, Mr. Fooze saw his boss, sitting down in front.

Mr. Gnasher was glancing at his watch and frowning. As little Mr. Fooze stared, the boss began to mutter something under his breath and tap his foot on the floor.

It was time to start.

Tugging his necktie into place, Mr. Fooze wobbled out onto the platform, his script waving in his jittery hand.

Clutching the microphone for support, he began to read the opening greeting of his script.

THE sound of his own voice, magnified by the microphone, reassured him. Ignoring the murmurs from his audience, he settled down to delivering his message before introducing the first clothing model.

“And so I say to you,” Mr. Fooze orated, “that if you men stock up on the new Hummenkapper fall models, you will have a record of sales this year that you will be proud of. As a matter of fact, this should be one of your most fiscal years! And now, I present to you—”

An indignant grunt came from somewhere in the audience. Mr. Fooze paused to locate it. Just as he feared, it had been Mr. Gnasher’s grunt.

Mr. Fooze started again. Again, the grunt.

What was wrong?

Fooze looked down at his script. Then he saw it.

Stabbing at his script—sticking straight out from his neck in a livid line—was Mr. Fooze’s elusive necktie!

Mr. Fooze clutched the devilish cravat in his right hand and crammed it back into his slack shirt.

He opened his mouth to speak, then let it hang open in amazement.

Something moved on his neck. Something moved swiftly. He glanced down as a whistle came from the audience.

His necktie was untying itself!

Faster than his eye or clutching hand could follow, the green cravat slithered off his neck!

Like a wriggling worm it crawled down the side of the microphone. Mr. Fooze dropped his script and tried to grab it. Too late. The audience was in an uproar.

As he stooped to pick up his script, Mr. Fooze felt strange movements across his chest. One by one, the buttons on his slack shirt slipped from their buttonholes. His shirt opened by itself!

Mr. Fooze threw his hands over his head in dismay.

This was the wrong thing to do. It gave his shirt a perfect opportunity to bunch up and shoot over his head. He felt the sleeves crawl over his arms. In a second, his entire shirt had twisted itself from his torso.

“Take it off!” yelled a raucous voice from the crowd. Above it Mr. Fooze heard the barking cough of Mr. Gnasher. He tried to locate the boss in the audience.

As he peered, something happened at his waist. Looking down, he saw the belt of his trousers unbuckle suddenly, swiftly. His pants marched down his legs!

Mr. Fooze almost tripped as the trousers bunched at his ankles. He leaped aside and they came off, pulling his sandals with them. Mr. Fooze stood before the laughing throng in his underwear, as his socks joined the parade and wiggled off his bare toes.

In utter horror he saw his shirt, trousers, necktie and socks fluttering before the microphone in mid-air. He made a grab at the garments.

“What’s coming off here?” he shrieked.

He got his answer very promptly.

As though the words were a cue, his underwear quickly unbuttoned. The sleeves crawled up his scrabbling arms, jerked past his shoulders. The garment fell. So did Mr. Fooze. He lay on the platform, kicking his legs as the underwear crawled off his body.

Clad in a pair of bright green Hummenkapper shorts, Mr. Fooze wobbled to his feet.

Amidst the screams of the mob, he dashed up and down the platform, chasing his clothes. His underwear was bowing to the audience, and as the applause rose, his pants dipped in recognition. The shirt had both sleeves over its head in a prize-fighter’s gesture and the socks were jumping over the wriggling necktie.

Mr. Fooze made one despairing dive for his galloping garments. As he did so, his shorts started to join the party.

It was too much to bear—and much too much too bare.

With a yowl of panic, he bolted from the stage. Bursting through the excited knot of models on the side, Mr. Fooze ran a naked race through the hall.

COMING upon a window dummy in the corridor, he yanked savagely at the clothing adorning it. He pulled on a shirt, a pair of pants, and a suit coat. The outfit was a good eight sizes too large for him, and the coat rose almost to the top of his ears, but Mr. Fooze didn't care. He felt like hiding.

Ignoring the shouts from the stage behind him, he galloped down the stairs and out of the building. He clambered aboard the first street car and headed home, his senses reeling.

Mr. Fooze was a broken man, and he knew it. His spirits fell when he thought of telling his wife, and so did his oversize trousers.

Mr. Fooze staggered into the house, dragging both his saggy face and saggy trousers.

Dora was waiting for him in the hall. She ignored both his long face and long pants and flung her arms around his neck.

"Oh, darling!" she whispered. "You're wonderful!"

Mr. Fooze raised his eyebrows. Then he stepped back, clutched at his belt buckle, and raised his drooping trousers.

"What do you mean?" he muttered. "Mr. Gnasher called up from the office," Dora told him, ecstatically. "He said he just couldn't wait to congratulate you."

"Congratulate me?"

"Oh, don't be so modest, Sidney! Mr. Gnasher told me all about your stunt, and I think it was so cute. Mr. Gnasher said your new strip tease method of displaying men's fashions will have the whole industry interested."

"Ulp!" gulped Mr. Fooze.

"He said he doesn't know how you did it, but if you can teach it to the rest of the models he'll make you promotion manager. He said all the buyers are talking about it—they got such a kick out of the novelty."

"So I'm not fired?" whispered Mr. Fooze, under his breath.

"What did you say, darling?"

"I said, it's just the way I figured," Mr. Fooze lied. "Well, that's that."

“I’m so proud of you,” Dora breathed. “You know, Sidney, I’ve been thinking. A man like you—in the style business—must really look his best. And I think from now on I ought to do the washing and ironing.

Really. I’m getting pretty sick of radio serials anyway.”

Mr. Fooze beamed.

“Well, all’s well that ends well,” he murmured, taking Dora in his arms. Suddenly his wife drew back.

“Oh, I almost forgot!”

“Forgot what?”

“There’s a visitor waiting to see you in the parlor.”

“Visitor? Who?”

“He wouldn’t give me his name. Said he had to wait and see you. It was very important. Maybe you’d better go in and find out what he wants.”

“Awferheavensakes!” growled Mr. Fooze. “Another salesman! Watch me get rid of this baby.”

Pulling up his trousers, the little man walked briskly into the parlor.

IT WAS dim in the fading twilight. The tigerskin rug glared up with eyes and teeth. It looked rather ghastly.

Then Mr. Fooze saw the glare of other eyes and other teeth—the eyes and teeth of his visitor. These eyes and teeth were worse than those of the rug, he quickly decided.

The visitor sat in the easy chair. He was a tall, thin man with a huge, domed forehead. His bald, bony head bobbed, and he raised a gaunt, lined visage to confront Mr. Fooze with a knowing grin.

A claw-like hand reached out, and a long finger stabbed at Mr. Fooze’s chest.

“Here you are,” rasped the stranger. “You’re Fooze, eh?”

“Yes. Who are you, might I ask?”

“You might.” The bony man grinned. “And I might tell you. I’m Doctor Kranoff.”

"Doctor Kranoff?"

"That's right. A friend of Professor Beaker's."

"But Professor Beaker is not here. He—"

"I know all about it. And that's why I'm here." Again Doctor Kranoff grinned. Suddenly he erased the grimace from his gaunt features and rose to tower over Mr. Fooze.

"Where is it?" he grated.

"Where is what?"

"You know—the stuff," said Doctor Kranoff, hoarsely. "Where is the Elixir?"

"I don't know what you mean."

"Don't try and deceive me," growled Doctor Kranoff, his bony fingers writhing in excitement. "Where is the Elixir of Life?"

"Elixir of Life?"

"Of course, you stupid dolt! What do you think old Beaker was working on in his chemical laboratory upstairs? A bio-chemical formula, a synthesis of protoplasmic forms capable of rendering inanimate objects animate. Elixir of Life is what the ancients called it. They never found the formula. Beaker did. He was completing it and I knew it. I wanted to share the discovery. He wouldn't let me. Now I'm here to get it."

"But I don't know anything about Beaker's work," objected Mr. Fooze, hastily.

"Then I'll have to search the place," said Doctor Kranoff.

"Look here now—this is my home. You can't go searching my house this way."

Doctor Kranoff laughed. There was nothing funny for him to laugh at, and there was no mirth in his cackle.

"Listen, friend," he whispered. "Do you think I'm going to be stopped at the last moment? Nothing will stop me from getting my hands on this great discovery, after all I've done. Who do you suppose slipped the nitroglycerine in old Beaker's mixing vat the day he went through the roof?"

"You mean you murdered Professor Beaker?" gasped Mr. Fooze.

"Exactly," said Doctor Kranoff. "And I'll do as much for you unless you let me search the house."

Mr. Fooze realized that Doctor Kranoff was a man of his word, because the tall, gaunt scientific figure suddenly pulled a pistol from his hip pocket and levelled it at Mr. Fooze's falling waistline.

"Let's try the attic, first," suggested the Doctor, pleasantly. "By the way—not a word to your wife. Or I'll have to use two bullets."

Mr. Fooze couldn't have said a word if he wanted to. His throat was dry—parched. And he couldn't very well move his tongue anyway, for his heart was in his mouth.

Silently, he led Doctor Kranoff up the stairs. The pistol prodded him in the small of the back.

ONCE in the attic, the Doctor set to work. He ransacked the piles of debris on the floor. His clawing fingers swept through the remainder of the bottles and glassware.

"Cagliostro's curse!" he growled. "Nothing here! Let's see your cellar."

Obediently, Mr. Fooze led his ghastly guest down the stairs.

Dora was listening to the radio as they passed through the parlor.

"Where are you going?" she called.

"I'm just taking this man down to look at the furnace," lied Mr. Fooze.

Dora returned to her radio and Mr. Fooze entered the cellar. The Doctor quickly surveyed the old bottles and miscellany of scientific paraphernalia gathered from Professor Beaker's room.

"It isn't here," he muttered.

"You see," said Mr. Fooze. "That proves there is no such thing."

Doctor Kranoff patted his pistol. He smiled sweetly.

"Not so fast," he answered. "Did you move this junk down here to the cellar?"

"Why—yes."

“Then you found the Elixir of Life,” the Doctor declared. “Found it and hid it away somewhere in the house. Come on—we’ll search every room until I get my hands on it.”

Silently they ascended the stairs.

“Where is the bedroom?” demanded the Doctor.

“This way.”

They entered the bedroom. Doctor Kranoff dived for the closet. He rummaged around, always keeping Mr. Fooze covered with his pistol.

Mr. Fooze got nervous. He knew the blue bottle was safely locked in the parlor desk downstairs. If he could only head this madman off somehow!

“By the way,” he gulped, “just why do you want the Elixir of Life, anyway?”

“Oh, that?” chuckled Doctor Kranoff. “It so happens I have a few cadavers knocking around my own laboratories. Medical specimens—condemned and executed criminals, mostly. I think it might be interesting to reanimate them, don’t you?”

“No!” wailed Mr. Fooze, emphatically.

“Well, either I find the Elixir and use it on those corpses,” said the Doctor, “or else I’ll be adding a new corpse to my collection shortly.”

Mr. Fooze felt his heart sink within him at these words. His trousers sagged considerably, too. He pulled them up.

Doctor Kranoff was going through the bureau drawers now, ransacking them with muttered oaths and imprecations.

“Not a damned thing!” he snorted.

“Really,” said Mr. Fooze. “You’re making an awful mistake, Doctor. There’s no such thing as an Elixir of Life around here. It must have been blown up with Professor Beaker.”

“Say, I never thought of that!” exclaimed Doctor Kranoff. “Do you really think so?”

“Sure. It was a terrific blast. The whole attic went through the roof. Practically everything was lost.”

“Just my luck!” groaned the Doctor. “I used too much nitro-glycerine, I suppose.”

“Everybody makes mistakes,” Mr. Fooze consoled him. “You can see there’s no Elixir of Life in this house. Why don’t you just forget about it? Go home and play with your corpses or something.”

“Maybe I’d better,” sighed the demented medico. “Just this one drawer here. Your wife’s things, eh? Well, looks like nothing doing—oooops!”

DOCTOR KRANOFF opened the top bureau drawer to reveal a stack of pink lingerie. As he reached in to ruffle the garments, something stirred.

Something uncoiled like a serpent—like a pair of serpents. Something raised a brown, sinuous length from the bureau drawer.

Doctor Kranoff drew back aghast as a pair of silk stockings rose from the drawer, jumped lightly to the floor, and began to march around the room.

“Aha!” yelled Doctor Kranoff.

He plunged his hand into the drawer. A pair of gloves suddenly scuttled forth to the bureau top. Two spiders poised before the Doctor’s image in the mirror.

Scampering up the shiny surface, the right glove thumbed the Doctor’s nose in the mirror. The other glove began to open a powder box.

“So!”

Doctor Kranoff wheeled and held the pistol at Mr. Fooze’s chest.

“Come on,” he said. “You’re through fooling, now. You almost got away with it, but not quite. You have that Elixir—this proves it. You’ve hidden it away. Lead me to it.”

“But—”

“Lead me to it this minute,” said Doctor Kranoff, “or I’ll arrange matters so that you’ll need the Elixir of Life for yourself.”

Mr. Fooze gave up. He paused only long enough to recapture the gloves and stockings and replace them in the drawer.

“I’m licked,” he sighed. “The bottle is downstairs, in the parlor. Follow me.”

Down the stairs they marched. Mr. Fooze felt the muzzle of the pistol boring into his back. He had never been quite so bored in all his life.

The Doctor forced him into the parlor so quickly he almost tripped over the rug.

“Hand it over,” snapped Doctor Kranoff. “Quickly, now.”

Mr. Fooze, trembling violently, tottered over to the desk. His shaking fingers fumbled with the key.

He pulled the drawer open. He groped for the little blue bottle, found it.

He drew it forth, held it up to the light. It was half-filled. Elixir of Life!

His hands shook.

But Doctor Kranoff’s hand, holding the pistol, was quite firm and steady. So was his voice.

“Hand it over,” said Doctor Kranoff.

Mr. Fooze extended his hand . . .

SOME ten minutes later a haggard Mr. Fooze lurched out of the parlor and fell into his wife’s waiting arms.

“What happened?” gasped Dora. “All that noise—”

“Elixir of Life!” grunted Mr. Fooze.

“What Elixir?”

So Mr. Fooze told her. Told her about the blue bottle and the clothes, and Doctor Kranoff, who murdered Professor Beaker to get his secret concoction. He told about giving the Elixir of Life to Doctor Kranoff at the point of a gun.

“But I don’t understand, Sidney,” said Dora. “What was all that screaming and yelling in the parlor? And what did I see when I looked out of the window—that Doctor running down the road with that awful whatever-it-was at his heels?”

“Never mind,” smiled Mr. Fooze. “It’s all over, now. The Doctor is gone for good, I imagine, and so is the Elixir. Let’s forget the whole thing ever happened.”

“Tell me what happened,” Dora demanded. “What was all that growling and shrieking?”

“It’s very simple,” Mr. Fooze explained, happily. “You see, Doctor Kranoff was chased out of the house.”

“Don’t tell me that—”

“Right,” grinned Mr. Fooze. “My hands trembled so that when I held out the Elixir of Life, I dropped the bottle. Spilled it right smack in the middle of our tiger skin rug!”

THE END

It's Your Own Funeral

With great care Stanley Colfax laid his plans for his own funeral—except for the nails in the coffin! It was murder!

STANLEY COLFAX pounded desperately at the lid of his coffin. He exerted all his strength but the hinges scarcely budged. Panting, he lay back against the satin lining of the box and stared up into the darkness—the stifling darkness, the darkness of the grave. His lips shaped words that echoed hollowly against the coffin-lid pressing down above his face.

"This is swell," whispered Stanley Colfax. "Couldn't be better, as I live and breathe!"

Once again he pushed at the lid. This time the coffin opened with a slightly perceptible squeak of the oiled hinges, and Stanley Colfax sat up in his casket and smiled.

The tall, thin man with a touch of gray about his temples looked the picture of radiant health as he stepped out of his coffin and jauntily dusted his tweed suit with a pocket handkerchief.

Colfax hummed under his breath as he surveyed the room in which the coffin rested—one of his private apartments in the Colfax mansion.

Expensive furnishings and lavish wall-panelling barely hinted the extent of the fortune of Stanley Colfax, the oil magnate. Perhaps the best indication of Colfax's riches lay in the coffin he had selected for himself—a bronze and silver box with chased handles in solid platinum. Nothing was too good for Stanley Colfax; he was going to be buried in style.

"All the trimmings," Colfax chuckled to himself, as he bent over the table and desk in the corner.

"Yes, it's all here," he mused. He examined the papers pertaining to his burial plot and the documents made ready for cemetery officials. He fingered his burial permit absently, shuffling through his papers until he found what he was looking for.

"Ah, there it is!" he exclaimed. "My death certificate!" Admiringly he held the paper to the light. It was a beauty, to be sure—signed, sealed and delivered.

"In perfect order," he nodded. "Doctor Daroff's signature—yes—and here's the cause of my death. What did he put down? Coronary thrombosis? Good! I've always wanted to die in style, and coronary thrombosis is a good rich man's death."

Stanley Colfax wandered over to a mirror and regarded his lean image sardonically.

"Guess I'm ready to die," he told himself. "Never felt better in my life."

Abruptly, he turned to a dressing-table and rummaged around in the top drawer. His hands, emerging, clutched a number of articles. Hair-dye, a pair of horn-rimmed spectacles, a blond false mustache, spirit-gum.

"All here," he concluded. "Guess I've practised the walk enough, and the mannerisms. Must remember not to smoke any more when I get this stuff on. Wardrobe is all set, too. With the new initials embroidered on my shirts and handkerchiefs."

Colfax secured an overnight bag and bundled the disguise into it. Then he stepped to a telephone and lifted the receiver.

"Henshaw? Still there, eh? Thought this was your afternoon off." A frown creased his brow. Then he smiled. "Oh, just leaving, eh? Well—will you bring the car around to the front driveway before you go? I'm off on an errand."

Colfax went down the hall carrying the bag. “Now to dump this stuff at the hideout,” he determined. “When I return Henshaw will be gone for the day. The coast is clear. I’ll get it over with in a hurry.”

HENSHAW was waiting with the car. The bald-headed, bespectacled man-servant and major-domo of the Colfax mansion offered his master a furtive smile.

Colfax grinned back at him. “Little do you think,” he inwardly chuckled, “that this is the last time you’re going to see me alive. If you knew, then you’d break your jaw smiling, wouldn’t you. Dirty sneak!”

Aloud he merely remarked, “Nice day, Henshaw. Have a good rest.” Colfax climbed into the car and wheeled down the drive. It was a nice day. Nice day for a murder. Nice day for a funeral. But tomorrow would be a damned sight nicer.

Tomorrow he would be lying in his coffin. And his relatives would come. His sister, her husband, the kids. And his stupid uncle, Professor Crowley. A fine crew of leeches and parasites.

They’d all be on hand for the funeral—and for the reading of the will afterward. They’d crowd around his attorney, Jeremy Fuller, waiting for the big moment.

How he longed to see their faces when the will was read! Two million dollars in perfectly liquid assets—the last will and testament of Stanley Colfax; unmarried, no direct descendants. Henshaw would be expecting his cut; Colfax knew his unfailing servility masked an avaricious nature. And his greedy sister and her covetous husband would expect a big bequest. Their oily friendship didn’t fool him. The children, too, were little hypocrites. He was sure of it.

Yes, they’d hang on Jeremy Fuller’s words. And when they saw Rufus Tate come in they’d stare at this intruder—this almost unknown nephew from California. They would smile secretly at one another, nudge knowingly. Here was an outsider who couldn't hope to be cut in on the gravy!

And then Fuller would come to the bequests. What a moment! "I hereby leave my entire estate to my dear nephew, Rufus Tate."

How he would love to see their foolish faces then!

But he would see them.

For he would be Rufus Tate!

It was a fool-proof scheme. Colfax gloated over it as he deposited his overnight bag at the apartment he'd rented. He hugged the thought as he drove back to his home.

For years now he'd been a prey to gnawing suspicions regarding his business associates, his friends, his relatives. Stanley Colfax had fought his way up to the top of his heap and found only a lonely eminence on which to stand. His relatives thirsted for his money. He was sure of it. They hung around like a group of friendly buzzards, waiting for him to die. Still in his early forties, Colfax had the uncomfortable feeling of an octogenarian with cancer.

Well, he was sick of it. He couldn't take it. He found no pleasure in business any more; no sense to piling up a further fortune. If he could only get out from under, get away, start life anew and enjoy himself. But Stanley Colfax, the millionaire, would always be a prey for swindlers, wherever he might go. He would be a sucker, a soft touch, an easy mark.

There was only one solution. Stanley Colfax must die. That would rid him of his business obligations, his relatives, and his cursed reputation of wealth in one fell swoop. As Rufus Tate he would live.

THE simple details of the scheme were easy to arrange.

Colfax smiled cynically as he thought of how Doctor Daroff and his attorney, Jeremy Fuller, had consented to the plan. They were like all the rest—he bought their professional honor for a few paltry dollars. Fuller was bribed to carry through the scheme with the will. Doctor Daroff, his personal physician, was a weak-willed drug addict. Colfax knew it. He had agreed without any trouble. He'd forge the death certificate, give Colfax a simple cataleptic agent.

So now it was arranged. Colfax had only to walk into his empty house, drink the potion—as Juliet drank the potion given to her by Friar Lawrence—and wake up in a coffin in the cemetery.

The grave-earth would be loosely packed; he'd seen to that end of it with Jeremy Fuller. And his coffin-lid would not be nailed down. He'd awake, rise from the grave, retire to his previously-rented apartment, don his disguise, and appear at the reading of the will as Rufus Tate, a nephew.

Fuller had given him papers, credentials, identification galore. There was even a Social Security number and a draft card. Fuller was unscrupulous but thorough. And neither he nor the Doctor would dare to double-cross him.

Colfax smiled as he re-entered his driveway. He parked the car, entered his house, went upstairs to the bedroom, and produced the potion from a cabinet.

This powder, in a glass of water—

He felt excited, exhilarated. "Funny," he mused. "I've never felt so good in all my life—just the thought of dying makes life worthwhile."

Now for thirty-six hours of dreamless sleep. It was a pity he wouldn't be conscious during the funeral. He'd enjoy that. Some asinine preacher delivering the conventional rich man's eulogy over his body. And the company would send banks of flowers. Wreaths from cold-blooded business men who were glad he'd passed on. Another competitor gone—good riddance. Send the old vulture a "floral tribute" and let's see how we can cut in on his business now that he isn't around to bother us.

Colfax poured the potion into the water-glass with steady fingers. A white powder; it would dissolve readily, leave no traces. There wouldn't be a single clue, not a slip-up. The press would report death by coronary thrombosis and let it go.

Newspapers! He'd have to get the papers after he awoke. He wanted to read his obituaries, of course.

Colfax thought of P.T. Barnum and smiled. The old showman had been scuffing his feet on death's doorstep when a premature report of his demise was made. The papers had printed long articles lauding his illustrious name. Barnum read the publicity in bed, and the tributes kept him alive for several days longer.

Colfax shrugged, glanced at his watch. Five o'clock. Good—just right! That would bring him out of it at dawn, day after next. He'd be buried tomorrow—Doctor Daroff had promised to rush it through for him. Let's see, he'd drink it now. Daroff would come in to "discover" his body at six. Then he'd phone, arrange burial permits, and the funeral would take place tomorrow at sunset. Just the proper eccentric touch.

"I'd better make sure," Colfax murmured.

HE DIALED an outside number.

Daroff's office. He answered the phone. Fine—his girl was gone. No eavesdroppers.

"Hello, Doc," he said.

"Yes, Mr. Colfax."

"All set."

"Good. I'D be right over."

"Step on it." Colfax grinned. "I'll be lying on the bed, by the way—not the floor. Don't want to spoil the crease in my trousers."

Stanley Colfax hung up the receiver. He stepped to a mirror, regarded his image in the glass. Then he raised the potion to his lips in an ironic toast.

"Here's looking at you," he said. "The king is dead—long live the king." He drank the whitish liquid at a gulp. Tasteless, odorless, harmless—

A fog crept from the corners of the room, stretching forth its moist and clammy arms to embrace him. The fog slithered up to grasp his naked brain, caress its convolutions with damply pressing fingers that burned into his skull with white fire. And Stanley Colfax slid down into the fog, his brain burning as it mingled with the mist that swept over him. He kept trying to imagine what the fog might be, where it might come from. His last conscious thought brought recognition. Stanley Colfax knew what the fog was now. It was the breath, the icy breath of death.

CHAPTER II
A Grave Mistake

SOMEBODY was breathing in Colfax's ear. Somebody was gasping, his inspiration a rasping rattle that tried to gulp precious air.

Somebody was pounding with bruised and lacerated fists; pounding against an immovable barrier above.

Somebody was sobbing hysterically in a high, gasping shriek.

Somebody was staring blindly into Stygian darkness, staring with horrified eyes that tried to tear away the eternal prison of night.

Somebody was—he, Stanley Colfax!

Consciousness came on the wings of terror. Where was he? What was he doing?

The darkness answered mockingly. He was in his coffin. What was he doing? He was trying to get out.

But why couldn't he breathe? Why was he sobbing and struggling so?

Because . . . he couldn't get out!

The realization smote him. He'd been fighting madly to claw open the coffin. And the coffin was sealed.

He lay back on the satin, hearing the faint rustle of his shroud mingle with his shredded breathing in a counterpoint of pure horror.

Colfax tried to subdue his pantings. The air was foul, oxygen almost exhausted. How long had he lain here? How long must he lay here—forever?

The thought was hideous in its intensity of torment. His bleeding fingers rose to scrape the immovable lid of the coffin, pressing down on his body with the kiss of death.

Nails held. They had been pounded home, pounded with a heavy mallet that sealed the coffin, sealed his doom.

“No!” The cry rose from his lips, shattered the silence of the sepulchre.

He had to be calm. He must relax, think. From now on it was a matter of time. Each moment was precious. A life-or-death matter. A death-struggle.

Somebody had been very clever. He must be cleverer. Who had done it? That didn’t matter now. The problem was to undo the state of affairs—before it undid him.

A nailed coffin. His nails against the nails of steel. Steel. Steel against steel.

His belt!

Perspiring hands crawled down to his waist. Yes, he wore a belt, with a metal buckle. But to remove it in the cramped confines of the coffin was torture.

That torture was as nothing compared to the agony of prying up the nails with the steel belt-tongue. He worked slowly—despite his frantic efforts to be swift—loosening the wood around the nails, splinter by splinter. At last he had removed eight—the eight directly above his head. He could exert pressure now with arms, head and shoulders. He heaved. A lungful of mephitic air seared his body with pain.

The coffin-lid didn’t budge.

Another lunge. No result—but his head swam, he felt a burning sensation in his chest, and fell back gasping. A rattle rose in his throat. Death-rattle?

With every fibre of his being, Stanley Colfax threw his body upward. Bloody fingers pressed, sprained wrists tautened, cramped shoulders surged. And the coffin-lid rose up—earth tumbled into the coffin.

COLFAX writhed like a worm beneath the deluge of debris. He choked, felt the horrible savor of grave-earth in his nostrils, pressing against his shredded lips.

His fingers clawed upward. Damp clods, loosely packed, gave way as he burrowed madly. Then began a nightmare ascent. Stanley Colfax was no longer a man. He was a graveyard maggot, a wriggling worm that twisted through the pits beneath the tombstones. The clammy, rotten stench of death clung to him, and the clammy, rotten earth shrouded his struggling body as he fought his way to the surface.

And then the outer crust gave way, he pulled himself over the lip of the grave's yawning mouth, he saw the crimson promise of dawn in the blessed sky above—and Stanley Colfax lay unconscious but alive on the edge of his grave.

Dawn was no longer a promise, but full reality when Colfax opened his eyes once more.

He blinked, shuddered, drew his bruised body erect and stared down at the handsome headstone.

Yes, there it was. "Stanley Colfax—b. 1900, d. 1943."

"Yes," Colfax murmured. "I'm dead, all right. Or almost dead."

He wondered who had double-crossed him. Who had driven home the spikes?

For a wild moment he had an impulse to scratch a message across the tombstone at the head of the grave. "Opened by Mistake."

Then he frowned wryly. The sickish-sweet scent of the floral tributes rose to his nostrils. He stared down at the brown clods of grave-earth.

Grave-earth. An open gravel.

He glanced around abruptly at the deserted cemetery in the dawn-light. Then he hastened down the path. A greens care-taker's toolshed stood beside a cluster of trees. He tried the door. It opened. He fumbled in the darkness of the little room.

Colfax emerged carrying a shovel.

With a sigh, he began to fill in his grave.

Whoever had planted him—they must never suspect that he'd managed a resurrection. The plan must proceed on schedule; the grave would be filled in.

Panting, Colfax concluded his labors, returned the shovel to its proper place in the shed, and tried to brush some of the mud from his grimy, caked clothing. He made a poor job. He looked like a tramp.

And like a tramp, he stole furtively from the cemetery. Like an outcast he slouched along. But then, he was an outcast. An outcast from life. A nameless entity, a dead man—a zombie, a walking ghost.

He would be a ghost now until he reached his hide-out and donned the disguise of Rufus Tate. Then he'd be an important figure once more. From ghost to million-heir in one easy lesson.

Yet his lesson had not been easy. It had almost cost him his life. Somebody had planned to plant him. Doctor Daroff? Lawyer Fuller?

Well, there'd be plenty of opportunity to find out, at the reading of the will.

Yes, this afternoon would be time enough. Now to go to the apartment, rest, dress, don his disguise, and show up at the Colfax residence at two.

WEARY feet carried him to his new hiding-place. Colfax found his key under the mat, opened the door, and staggered in. He fell on the couch and slept—deeply and dreamlessly.

The sun's slanting, rays struck the bridge of his aquiline nose with noonday violence when Colfax awoke.

His eyes blinked at the face of the clock.

"After one," he muttered. "Must hurry. One time I must be prompt!"

Hurry he did. Bathing, shaving, the donning of new garments and adjustment of his disguise—all actions were completed shortly before two.

And then Rufus Tate, a blond, bespectacled young man with a wispy mustache, minced down the stairs and summoned a passing taxicab.

Drawling an address, Colfax leaned back and contemplated his new image in the rear-view mirror.

Not bad. He was unrecognizable. The spirit-gum tickled his upper lip, but the disguise tickled his fancy. He was on the way at last.

On his way to—what?

Just what was he stepping into when he decided to go through with the plan, continue with his masquerade just as though nothing had happened?

For the first time since his vivisepulture, Colfax pondered the situation.

He was taking a risk showing up at the reading of the will. Surely, whoever had nailed his coffin shut must have known of the plan. It didn't look accidental. And with the assurance that he was really dead, perhaps the situation had been altered. But there was nothing else to do but carry on and meet emergencies as they arose.

Stanley Colfax smiled grimly at his unfamiliar image in the cab mirror.

Somebody would be very surprised to see him show up.

But who? That scoundrel Fuller? Or that drug-doomed sneak, Doctor Daroff? Perhaps Henshaw—he'd had opportunities to eaves-drop during the weeks that the plan was being developed. For that matter, others could have overheard telephone discussions with either Doctor Daroff or attorney Fuller. His sister and her husband were around the house often. So was his uncle, the Professor.

Colfax clenched his fists at his sides.

He'd find out. His appearance would cause a betraying sign on the part of the guilty one.

"The guilty one," he murmured aloud, as the cab purred along. "My guess would be Fuller. He'd figure on killing me and then altering the will again. Or using the old will. But then—in either case, some relative would get the money.

"How would Fuller benefit? Unless, of course, there was collusion—a split afterward. Well, I'll find out soon enough."

The cab was wheeling up the driveway of his estate. Colfax glanced at the cheap wristwatch he had secured for "Rufus Tate" and then shook his head. Two-fifteen. A bit late.

"Better late than never," he mused, paying the driver and sauntering up the walk with a grin under the false mustache. "Yes—much better late than never!"

EXCITEMENT gripped him as he reached the door. Now he must control himself. His new disguise would be a test of all his ability. He must carry it off successfully, under the eyes of half-a-dozen people who knew him since childhood.

And there was a further test. One of those people was his attempted murderer. He'd be matching wits in a deadly game.

Colfax brought his hand up to press the buzzer, then noted the door was ajar.

Acting on sudden impulse, he kicked it open. It swung to reveal an empty hallway.

A faint trickle of conversation came from the library doorway to the left of the entrance. They must be gathered in there to hear the reading of the will.

Good. He'd make a dramatic entrance now, mince in with his "Rufus Tate" walk and surprise them.

Or—

He hesitated, noticing that the library door was partly opened. Better take a look first and see if everything was clear.

Yes, they were all there. He recognized the faces, and the backs of heads. His sister, her husband, the children, gathered around the table. Doctor Daroff standing to one side. Henshaw solicitously hovering in the background. And presiding at the end of the table, Jeremy Fuller with his briefcase.

All present and accounted for.

Now to make the grand entrance—

A clatter of heels on the outer porch caused Colfax to wheel suddenly.

Someone else was coming to join the party! An unexpected guest.

Colfax noted the portieres next to the library doors and quickly moved behind the concealing drapes. He'd better take a look at this newcomer as he rang the bell. Best to know everything in advance.

But the newcomer did not ring. Seeing the open door, the stranger walked right in; taking short, mincing steps.

The stranger headed for the library without hesitation, brushing within a foot of Colfax's concealed presence.

Colfax stared, gasped, clutched at the portieres for support as his mind reeled under the staggering impact of what he saw.

For the mincing stranger had blond hair, spectacles, and the wisp of a mustache clinging to his upper lip. The stranger was disguised as his identical double—Rufus Tate!

CHAPTER III

Murder, He Says

THE rest was nightmare. Colfax gripped the wall and stared through the curtains at the scene beyond in the library.

He saw the gathering turn heads as though actuated by the command of a single neck and regard the blond stranger.

He heard their exclamations of surprise, just as he had imagined hearing them when he made his appearance.

That was bad. But it was worse to hear the stranger—the double imposter, speaking in the drawling voice he had personally planned to use while posing as "Rufus Tate." It was all nightmare.

For "Rufus Tate" was speaking. He introduced himself. The California nephew. And now he was producing papers and handing them to Attorney Fuller. Credentials. Colfax could swear he saw a Selective Service card in the lot.

Sweating, Colfax saw this mysterious stranger carrying out, word for word, the entire dialogue he had planned to use.

Was he mad? Everything—the grisly struggle in the grave, the strange upset in his plans, and now the appearance of this masquerader—might be merely a hallucination of his diseased mind. Perhaps he was dreaming, and would awaken.

Awaken where? In that mouldering grave?

Colfax pressed trembling fingers to his dyed temples and tried to contain himself. He'd anticipated problems, but this was too much.

Now Jeremy Fuller was suggesting that they all sit down and listen to the reading of the will. The last will and testament of Stanley Colfax, deceased.

Stanley Colfax had looked forward to enjoying this moment when his will was read.

Now he ignored it. He was frantically scanning each face, each figure in the room. He must find a betraying gesture, a sign.

His mind scurried like a frantic rat in the bony prison of his skull.

He was analyzing—searching for motives—clues.

His attention shifted from face to face.

THERE was his sister, Regina Basset. A fat, perpetually smirking woman with peroxide curls. She sat there now with a mourning veil over her triple-chinned face. What black secret did that veil hide? The veil of hypocrisy . . .

Next to her, Andrew Basset, her husband. A weak-chinned failure. Always the hearty "good fellow" type, but Colfax didn't trust his insincere flattery. Perhaps he'd ignored Andrew Basset too blithely. The weak chin might hide a strong ambition. An ambition that stopped at nothing—even murder.

The children sat beside their parents. Three good reasons why the Bassets might kill.

Colfax thought of how they had treated him. His sister had suggested moving in, keeping house for him. Just an excuse, of course, to saddle him with the whole family. She was always pitying him for his "loneliness" and urging that he marry. It hadn't fooled him. She was after the fortune.

Suppose she or her husband had stumbled on this plot of his, decided to take advantage of it by hiring their own "stooge" to play the part of the nephew from California?

Still, the Doctor and Fuller wouldn't be likely to agree. And neither his sister nor her husband could force them.

But maybe one of the children might exert pressure.

Colfax's suspicious gaze fell on the younger members of the family.

The towheaded one was Bill. Twenty-two, an instructor in the Civil Air Corps, but a snob. A chaser of society girls.

Bill had demanded a sports roadster from him two years ago. He knew where the money was, all right. Would he have the courage to go after it—in the worst way?

Maybe it was Tommy. He was older, twenty-five, with a wife. A young lawyer, already itching to get into politics. Ambitious, like his mother. Hard-headed. Hard-headed enough to plan a murder?

Cynthia. Just eighteen. A girl, but with all the mother's ruthless determination.

The whole family must hate him for his money. A lone bachelor—why was he entitled to so much when they had so little? Kill him—

Colfax scowled. He glanced at Henshaw; Henshaw the imperturbable. The secretary and man-of-all-work stood inconspicuously in shadow. Why? To hide the gloating, secret smile on his face?

Henshaw was always smiling. For ten years he'd served Colfax in this big house, and always he smiled. What in hell did he have to smile about? Unless he were hugging a secret in his breast—a cherished plan.

He'd had opportunities to listen in on the phone, to overhear conversations when plans were laid. Perhaps he'd stumbled on the plot and acted. Had his cold, bony hands driven home the coffin nails?

Colfax's glance fell on Professor Crowley. He started. Hadn't noticed his elderly uncle before—but then, nobody ever paid any attention to Professor Crowley.

Perhaps that was a mistake—not paying attention to Professor Crowley.

Come to think of it, he knew very little about his eccentric uncle. He was a poor chemistry professor in a local-university, and he was always at the point of asking Colfax for funds to set up a private research laboratory. But the bent little man had never come out pointblank with the request. He merely scurried in and out on hasty visits, said little, but sat there with a wry grin while he puffed on his pipe and regarded Stanley Colfax with myopic eyes.

An eccentric professor—serving the cause of Science—Science was a jealous master and demanded tribute. A tribute of blood for the great cause of research? Why not?

One of those things, perhaps.

COLFAX watched Jeremy Fuller as he read the will. He had a bland, purring voice; the voice of a sleek cat. And he resembled a sleek cat with his corpulent paunch, his slick grey hair, his slanted eyes and well-kept nails long as claws.

An unsavory character, Jeremy Fuller. A lawyer who wriggled his feline way through loopholes in legal fences. A cultured cat who would wallow in any garbage-pail if the pickings were rich, but who purred oh so gently when stroked the right way.

Fuller knew the plan. But would he have the guts to attempt such a thing?

Doctor Daroff, now, was a different proposition. The gaunt doctor with the mane of bushy black hair sat hunched forward in his chair. His unnaturally bright eyes gleamed beneath sabre brows. He pulled at his mustache with long white fingers. Fingers skilled at administering hypodermics—to others, and to himself.

A cokey. A hop-head. Brilliant, but thoroughly unprincipled. And perhaps not altogether sane. Those eyes of his had narrowed to black slits when Colfax promised him ten thousand dollars for the fake death certificate. Doctor Daroff loved money. It might be that he loved it enough to kill for it. And he’d had every opportunity to take advantage of the situation. He was “in” on the plans. He and he alone was master of the situation.

Colfax watched him carefully now, through the curtains, as Doctor Daroff listened to the purring recital of Jeremy Fuller.

The climax had come. Every head leaned forward as Fuller began to read the portion of the will pertaining to bequests.

Here it was now.

“Entire estate to my dear nephew, Rufus Tate.”

That was a shocker!

Colfax could swear that he read genuine astonishment on the faces of all those present. But anyone clever enough to plan this situation would have sense to restrain natural emotion.

And there was one unknown quantity. The false nephew. The stranger. “Rufus Tate” sat there calmly.

“This is all so sudden,” he told the gathering. “So unexpected.”

But he didn’t look surprised. He didn’t look flustered. Whoever he was, he knew what he was doing—stealing two million dollars from a supposed dead man!

“I don’t know what to say,” he drawled. “Why—Uncle Stanley—I hardly knew the man.”

“Uncle Stanley” behind the curtains had a grim smile on his face. This last statement was certainly a true one!

As Jeremy Fuller concluded the reading of the will, Colfax pondered. This “Rufus Tate” imposter, now—suppose that he were really the instigator of the plot? Suppose he, whoever he was, had managed by some accident to get wind of the affair and had acted on his own. Then everyone else’s surprise was genuine. Perhaps Doctor Daroff and Jeremy Fuller thought that this man was really Colfax in disguise. They might be fooled, too.

If so—who was “Rufus Tate?”

COLFAX’S head was spinning. All this intrigue, this mystery—and he alone to play detective and find the man who had attempted to kill him.

Or the woman. He must move quickly, take steps at once.

Should he step into the library, confront the imposter and blurt out the whole story? Tell them to their faces what he had done and why he did it?

That would be the best way. Except—

Except that nobody would believe him. Doctor Daroff had faked a death certificate. Jeremy Fuller had acted illegally in reading the will of a man he knew to be alive. They would have to deny his story. He couldn't choose the easy way out. So he had to proceed the hard way. But how?

Colfax stared again at the scene in the library.

"I'm so overwhelmed," the new heir was babbling. "Really, Aunt Regina, I don't know what to say."

Regina Basset and her husband didn't know what to say, either. They could scarcely conceal their active hatred. A glum look had settled over Professor Crowley's wrinkled face. The three Basset children were muttering between themselves.

Henshaw had turned away. What secret lay buried behind his bespectacled gaze?

Doctor Daroff was tapping a corner of the desk with nervous fingers as Jeremy Fuller fumbled with his briefcase.

Only "Rufus Tate" seemed to be at ease. He smiled now, clapped Andrew Basset on the back.

"Let's all have a drink," he suggested. "I think we need it."

There was no command in his voice, merely suggestion—but Henshaw seemed to sense the presence of a new master in the house. He scurried off.

Colfax waited, debating his next move. Henshaw returned with decanter and glasses on a tray. He poured. Fuller assisted him in passing the glasses around. Even teetotaller Professor Crowley took the whiskey.

"Rufus Tate" raised his glass and smiled. "To the memory of Uncle Stanley," he toasted.

The company drank.

Stanley Colfax tensed himself. This was the moment to act, to stop the farce. He would take off his mustache, go in there, and—

Empty glasses fell to the floor. Mouths gaped open in horror. Eyes goggled madly.

For Doctor Daroff had risen from his chair. He stood there, sabre brows raised, his eyes staring glassily at nothing. Long fingers stroked the side of his throat absently. Daroff's mouth opened. He took a step forward.

A voice—a choking strangled croak—welled from the red cavern of his throat.

"You—fiends!"

Regina Basset screamed as Doctor Daroff pitched forward on his face.

For a moment, nothing shattered the fear-etched tableau in the library. Then Jeremy Fuller sighed, heavily.

"This," he whispered, "is murder!"

CHAPTER IV

More Fun—More People Killed!

MURDER—police. Police—investigation.

It was a simple equation. Stanley Colfax solved it at once. He slipped out of the house without a backward glance and raced down the driveway as fast as his feet would carry him.

He hailed a passing cab at the corner and gave his new address—the address of the hideout.

There was work to be done and he must think.

If Colfax had any doubts about the seriousness of a murder plot before, they were dispelled now. One of his suspects was a murderer. But now there was one suspect less. The Doctor couldn't be guilty of the plot, because he was dead. And why was he dead? Because he knew too much?

Better decide that when he arrived at the apartment. One thing he knew—he couldn't have stayed there at the house when the police arrived. The presence of two gentlemen named "Rufus Tate" would be difficult to explain. He couldn't explain it himself.

There was a lot he couldn't explain. Colfax thought about it later, pacing up and down the floor of the apartment.

He still didn't know who'd tried to kill him; his sister, her husband, one of the children, Jeremy Fuller, Professor Crowley, Henshaw, or the fake nephew."

He still didn't know who the fake "nephew" could be.

He still didn't know who killed Doctor Daroff, or why.

Three mysteries to solve!

Colfax decided to take the last one first. Doctor Daroff. He had been in on the plot. Apparently somebody desired to remove him—perhaps because be knew too much about one of the other mysteries, or held the key to the situation. A fair surmise.

But who did it?

Henshaw had brought in the drinks, including the poisoned whiskey. Therefore Henshaw was the most logical suspect.

Yet suppose this were true and Henshaw had intended the poison for someone else?

That was a subtle complication.

Still, Colfax could feel fairly certain that the police would reason as he did, and hold Henshaw for the murder of Doctor Daroff.

That would release the other suspects at once: Crowley, Fuller, Regina Basset, Andrew Basset, the children, and the fake "nephew." No need to even think about Stanley Colfax. They wouldn't have a clue to make them suspect the affair demanded further investigation.

So Colfax would have to discover his own attempted murderer himself. And, of course, he'd have to discover the identity of the second "Rufus Tate."

Two cigarettes later, Colfax began to think about that imposter. The man wearing his disguise, the man with his credentials, duplicated. The man who walked in and nonchalantly took a two million dollar bequest.

Who was he?

In the answer to that question lay the key of the mystery.

How was it that this man was wearing the identical disguise Colfax had selected for himself?

Somebody obviously had tipped him off to the plot.

Even so, where would this stranger procure such a disguise?

Colfax grinned.

“Why didn’t I think of that sooner?” he muttered. “There’s only one place he could get it, of course. At the same place I got mine! Racker’s Costume Shop!”

IT WAS obvious, now. In order to make sure of duplicating the hair-dye and the false spectacles and the blond mustache, the man must have patronized the shop that Colfax had gone to.

He’d stopped in about a week ago and purchased his supplies from Mr. Racker in his seedy shop in the slum district. It had seemed safe, harmless enough. But this stranger had been on his trail and duplicated his purchases.

Colfax’s life was just one taxicab after another. He called one now, and hastily gave the address of Racker’s Costume Shop.

“Now we’re making progress,” Colfax told himself. “Mr. Racker will be able to tip me off on who came in and asked for the same things I bought. I’m wearing the stuff now—I’ll tell him I’m going to a costume party this evening.”

The excuse would sound logical, Colfax reasoned. For as the cab drew up to a curb along one of the tangled streets, he realized that dusk had fallen. The red sunset crept off to die behind the looming walls of the squalid tenements that huddled along the street.

In the twilight, Colfax hurried along to the fly-specked window bearing the sign of Racker’s Costume Shop. He descended the steps to the basement entrance and opened the door.

A pasty-faced blonde girl was leaning over the stained counter in the gloomy little shop. Colfax approached her.

“I’d like to speak to the gentleman who waited on me last week,” he began. “Mr. Racker, that would be?”

“He’s out,” said the girl. “Can I help?”

“Perhaps.” Colfax forced a smile. “Do you happen to know of any customer who has come in during the past seven days and bought a pair of hornrimmed spectacles like these? And a false mustache like the one I’m wearing? And hair-dye—ash blond dye?”

The girl noted his disguise now and shrugged disdainfully. “Uh-uh,” she grunted. “I don’t remember. Racker might know, but he’s out. Whyn’cha come back tomorrow?”

“Guess I’d better.” Colfax smiled and turned away. The girl’s watery blue eyes followed his retreating shoulders.

“Screwball,” she muttered.

Colfax emerged upon a darkening street. The cab had departed. Should have told the driver to wait. Now he’d have to walk. And the prospect of a walk through this deserted slum area was depressing.

Tomorrow he’d come back bright and early and talk to Racker. Too bad Racker was out. Wonder where he’d gone to.

And then—Colfax knew.

It hit him like that. All at once.

He remembered Lou Racker. A tall man. About his own height. A man in his early forties. His own age. A man who knew what disguise he was planning to assume.

A man who could assume that disguise himself!

The fake “Rufus Tate” might he Lou Racker!

Colfax was passing the alley behind the costume shop as the thought struck him.

It hit him with such a staggering force of realization that he didn’t notice the figure creeping behind him; the figure slinking along the alley with blackjack poised to strike.

And so it happened.

The thought hit him—and then, out of the gathering twilight, the blackjack hit him.

Colfax spun around, saw the crouching figure raise a long arm to strike again. He tried to dodge, but too late. The blackjack came down in a vicious arc, and Colfax fell.

His last conscious vision was of the coffin in the cemetery—the waiting coffin of Stanley Colfax which would be filled now, after all.

CHAPTER V

The Suspense Is Killing

WHEN "Rufus Tate" returned to the Colfax mansion, it was well after dark. He adjusted his mustache before ringing the bell, and patted the bulge at his hip pocket reassuringly. That blackjack sure came in handy!

He smiled.

There was no copper on the door. Good. The excitement was all over. There had been a brief questioning period, and then the cops had taken Henshaw off to a cell. Obviously, since he served the drinks, he planted the poison.

After that, everybody was free to depart. Just enough time to go back to the shop, wait for Colfax to show up—as he surely would, after seeing another "nephew" appear—and slip him the business.

Everything clicked. And now to show up again, just to nose around. Lull suspicion a little. And find out a few things—see how the rest of them felt, if they were still hanging around.

And they were. "Rufus Tate" found the entire gathering intact in the parlor. Of course, Henshaw wasn't there to serve any drinks. And Doctor Daroff was busy attending a post-mortem. His own.

"Rufus Tate" suppressed a grin and adjusted his spectacles as he entered the parlor.

He had to match the funereal air reflected by the others. And it was thick in there.

"Rufus, you're back!" Regina Basset swayed up to him. The fat woman had been crying, and her powder was streaked with mascara stains.

"Yes, Aunt Regina." He sighed, heavily.

"I know how you feel, dear boy. That horrible scene—coming right on top of Stanley's death! Poor Stanley!" The woman sighed. "I can't stop thinking about him."

She lowered her voice. "I'm afraid we weren't very good to him when he was alive. I was always nagging him about getting married, or coming in to keep house myself. I didn't realize the poor man wanted to be alone. He was an introvert. No wonder he left you his money—you were the only one who didn't pester him."

"Rufus Tate" stared at Regina Basset. There was no trace of envy in her voice. Apparently being cut out of a two-million dollar will didn't bother her in the least.

"How do you feel, Rufus?" Andrew Basset, her husband, joined them in the doorway. "Better get some rest. This must come as a shock." His weak chin wobbled. "Stanley was a wonderful character. Wouldn't think he'd have such a double-crossing sneak as Henshaw around."

Not a word about the will from him, either. "Rufus Tate" was surprised. You'd think they'd hate the old guy's guts—his guts, too. Well, that's life for you. And a good break. They weren't suspicious.

DELIBERATELY he walked toward the table where the three children sat. Towheaded Bill, curly-haired Tommy and the girl, Cynthia, flashed him a sad smile. Their grief seemed genuine, and therefore harmless.

Out of the shadows rustled Professor Crowley. "Mr. Fuller is expecting you," he said. "He's upstairs in the private study, going over the papers of the estate. I suppose he wants to clear up the final details."

“Thanks,” said “Rufus Tate.” He eyed the elderly scientist closely. What did this old bird think about it all?

Unexpectedly the answer came. A birdlike claw was thrust into his palm.

“I know how you feel, my boy,” whispered the oldster. “Your Uncle Stanley was a great man. We all miss him. But it’s up to you to carry on now, as head of the family. Good luck.”

“Tate” turned away, moving towards the stairs. A funny bunch. Apparently they had all admired Stanley Colfax—God knows why. He hadn’t done anything for them, and he’d cut them all out of his will. Too bad he couldn’t reconsider the matter. But it was too late now. Much too late.

“Rufus Tate” smiled as he went up the stairs.

So Jeremy Fuller was in the private study, eh? Going over papers, was he? Well—it was time for him to take a hand in this business of “settling the estate.” He’d settle a few other matters with Fuller, too.

Brushing the slick gray hair from his forehead with his long-nailed fingers, Jeremy Fuller regarded his visitor with a detached amusement glinting in slanted eyes.

His purring voice was bland.

“I’ve been expecting you,” he said. “Close the door and sit down. Everything—work out?”

“Perfect job,” said “Rufus Tate.”

“Thanks to me.” Jeremy Fuller rose. “Lucky I saw that reflection in the hall mirror and realized old Colfax was hiding behind the curtains this afternoon when the will was read. God knows what he might have tried to pull off. I still don’t know how he popped out of the grave, though.”

“He’s ready to be popped back into it,” chuckled “Rufus Tate.”

“Fine.” Fuller rubbed his hands. “Are you sure?”

“Sure as I’m alive. I slugged him back of the costume shop, dragged him in, and tied him up—out like a light.”

“You’ve been busy. Well, so have I,” smiled the lawyer. “I managed to pin the poison job on Henshaw and cleared the law out in a hurry. Nobody suspects and the whole family is ready to forget all about it."

"YOU haven't told me yet how you got rid of Daroff," said "Rufus Tate," sitting down beside Fuller.

"Didn't you guess? It was simple," the lawyer grinned.

"To begin with, I've never told you my original plan, have I? That was before you came into the picture.

"Colfax had worked out this scheme to disguise himself as his own nephew after pulling off a fake death. Daroff and I planned it for him, of course. But I got to thinking. Why not let him really die, and then hire somebody to pose as the nephew and split the loot with him?

"Naturally, I thought of you, and sent Colfax to your shop to buy his disguise so you could size him up nad see if you could carry it off. I knew you used to be an actor and were the same build as Colfax. So—"

"Skip the ancient history," snapped "Rufus Tate." He rose. "What's this about the Doctor, now?"

"Well, you know how we figured it. Doctor Daroff would simply give Colfax real poison instead of the sleeping potion. To make doubly sure, I'd nail down his coffin-lid. Which I did.

"But Daroff must have had a plan of his own. He didn't administer the real poison after all. Of course, he didn't know I'd nailed down the coffin-lid, but apparently it worked out the same way. Colfax got out, somehow, and showed up.

"At that time Daroff planned to go to him and tell him that I wanted to double-cross him and poison him. He thought Colfax would reward him for exposing the scheme.

"But I'd found the real poison here in the house that morning. I knew it hadn't been used. A pinch would do the trick. I kept the pinch in my pocket.

"When I saw the reflection of Colfax in the hall I knew he'd storm in pretty soon. Daroff would speak up and we'd be cooked. So you suggested a drink. Henshaw brought it in—but I helped him pass the glasses. And I made sure that the poison was in Doctor Daroff's glass. Simple?"

"Very. And clever."

"Thank you." Jeremy Fuller smiled his feline smile.

"After that it was all routine. Of course I knew Colfax would head for the costume shop sooner or later when he left here. So when the cops left I sent you to follow him. The rest is history.

"But now let's talk about more pleasant things." Again Jeremy Fuller rubbed his fat hands together. "With your acting ability and my brains we can go a long way. A very long way on two million dollars! We'll make a very jolly twosome."

"Rufus Tate" towered over the lawyer.

"Not so fast," he whispered. "There's one flaw in your plan."

"What's that?" Jeremy Fuller's purr had disappeared.

"Guess, master-mind!"

"I don't see—"

"Then I'll tell you." The voice of "Rufus Tate" was harsh. "I don't need you any more. I've got the money now, through the will, and you're through. If you want to tell the police, go ahead. You'll go to jail for murder. And you can't implicate me for anything except impersonation."

"Yes? What about Colfax?" Fuller spoke through trembling lips.

"How can you prove I murdered him? Where's the body?"

JEREMY FULLER was no longer a cat. He was a tiger. He launched himself through the air, but "Rufus Tate" was ready. The blackjack whirled, and Fuller fell across the chair, holding his jaw.

"Now," said "Rufus Tate."

"What do you want me to do?" whispered Fuller.

"Just write it all out—everything you told me here. Sign a little confession."

Fuller's eyes darted helplessly. He gazed at the waving blackjack as though hypnotized. Slowly, he fumbled for a pen, drew blank paper before him. He wrote.

"Rufus Tate," waving the blackjack, stood over him.

And then, without warning, the door opened behind him. Fists flailing, young Bill Basset charged.

"I heard you," he grunted. His fist swung upward and "Rufus Tate" ducked just in time. The blackjack came up.

Jeremy Fuller scuttled around to grab him from the rear. But "Rufus Tate" turned and brought his weapon down on the lawyer's skull. There was a sickening thud, and the fat attorney dropped.

But Bill Basset and his brother Tommy closed in.

"Let him have it—the filthy swine!" Bill grunted.

"Rufus Tate" dropped the blackjack, held up both hands.

"No," he gasped. "Don't! Can't you see—I'm your uncle, Stanley Colfax!"

CHAPTER VI

Where There's a Will, There's a Way

THE gathering in the parlor was considerably more cheerful half an hour later. Jeremy Fuller was not present. He had left, escorted by blue-clad figures summoned by phone. The blue-clad figures had also taken a neat document along—Fuller's confession, ornamented by a shaky signature. Henshaw would soon be released on the strength of it.

And now Stanley Colfax, minus mustache and glasses, and with a hint of natural darkness at the roots of his dyed hair, was finishing his story.

"You can see how it happened," he said. "Fuller's plot worked perfectly. His stooge, Racker, posing as 'Rufus Tate' actually did knock me out and tie me up in back of the costume shop. That is—he started to tie me up, when I recovered consciousness. As he bent over me I got the blackjack out of his pocket and turned the tables. When I left the shop, he was unconscious and tied. The police will find him there now, I'm sure.

"Then, naturally, I had to come here. I planned to pose as Racker posing as me—knowing that the instigator of the plot, whoever he was, would betray himself.

"It worked. I've told you how Fuller disclosed the whole story. I had him up to the point of writing this confession without revealing my identity. Then the boys came in, and that's that."

"Nice work, Uncle Stanley," grinned Bill.

Stanley Colfax shook his head.

"It wasn't so nice," he said. "I'm ashamed to tell you these things. As I look back on it now, my whole plan was the greedy concept of a small, suspicious mind.

"I thought to spite my own relatives, my own flesh and blood, with the help of a shady doctor and a crooked lawyer. That's pretty contemptible, when you come to think of it, isn't it?

"But I've learned my lesson—the hard way. When I came here tonight as 'Rufus Tate' not one of you had anything but honest sorrow in your hearts over my supposed death. I'd been fooling myself all along that you were after my fortune. What an imbecile I've been!"

Stanley Colfax smiled.

"From now on things will be different," he promised. "Tommy—"

"Yes, Uncle Stanley?"

"Tommy, you're a lawyer. I want you to do something for me."

"What is it?"

"Draw me up a new will," said Stanley Colfax. "And leave plenty of room for bequests—because you'll all be in it!"

1944

Lefty Feep's Arabian Nightmare

Ali Ben Alikat had eight snakes and a mission in life. Since he was not able to handle both at the same time, Lefty Peep got the reptiles!

MEOW!" yelled Lefty Feep. "Take it away!"

I stared up at the tall, thin racketeer raconteur as he stood trembling before my table in Jack's Shack.

"Grab loose," pleaded Feep. "Remove it out of here."

"What's the matter?" I asked. "Why are you so upset when you see me eating spaghetti?"

"Spaghetti?" Feep breathed a sigh of relief. "I am nearly beating it when I see you eating it."

"Why should spaghetti affect you?" I asked, as Feep sat down at the table beside me. "Doesn't it agree with you?"

"It is not a question of my digestion," said Lefty Feep. "I take one look at the spaghetti and I think I am seeing snakes."

"Snakes?"

"Snakes give me the shakes," Feep muttered. "I am not in hep style over a reptile."

"Don't like snakes, eh?"

"A boa constrictor is not a pretty picture, and I am not much fonder of an anaconda."

I shook my head. “I don’t understand this, Lefty. Have you been drinking and seeing snakes—is that it?”

Feep nodded slowly.

“When I’m drinking, from snakes I’m shrinking,” he admitted.

I smiled. “Then if I were you, I’d stop drinking. If you stop drinking you won’t see any more snakes.”

Feep frowned. “But I do stop and I still see snakes,” he told me. “I see serpents in the present tense.”

A peculiar gleam came into Lefty Feep’s eyes. I recognized it only too well. Lefty Feep had another story. When Feep gets a gleam in his eyes, I generally get a pain in my ears. This time I decided to make my escape in a hurry. I rose from the table.

“I must be going,” I remarked.

“Exactly,” said Mr. Feep, pushing me back in my chair. “You are going to hear my story.”

“But—”

“I must tell you this,” said Feep. “I have a snake tale.”

“Sorry,” I murmured. “I am not interested in your peculiar anatomy.”

“Allow me to twist this tale for you,” said Lefty Feep. He held me very firmly in place.

I sighed. There was nothing else to do but sit there while Feep began to wail his tale.

“It all starts,” said Lefty Feep—

ALL starts the other day.

I am feeling down in the dumps the other day, which is not surprising, because I am down in a dump—a place called the Oasis.

The Oasis is a little tavern located in a desert of clip joints. It has a sort of oriental atmosphere—because it is never aired out.

Part of the desert charm lies in the fact that it is usually deserted. Then, of course, there is the sand and the palms.

The sand is in the cuspidors, and the palms belong to the waiters, who are always holding them out for a tip.

The owner of the Oasis is an oriental character generally known as the Sneak of Araby.

I do not know why I mention all this, because I am not particularly interested in the atmosphere of this joint. I am in here trying to drown my sorrows—only from the rate at which I inhale, I am more likely to drown myself. The more I spin the bottle, the soberer I get.

Do not get the wrong impression. I am not a drinking man. I seldom drink any more—any more than I can get. But there is a reason.

To speak rankly and frankly, I am in love with a dove—but she flies too high for me. The ginch in question is a burlesque cutie; a beauty but very snooty. Her name is Fanny, and for a while she and I are closer than Siamese twins.

But a few days ago she comes and tells me that she is going to abandon her art and try for a job in a classical ballet. She is getting persnickety about terpsichore, and sure enough, she lands a spot in the rehearsals of a ballet troupe.

Right away she starts putting on the dog about going from Minsky to Nijinsky in one easy lesson, and I can see that she is giving me the colder shoulder.

I question her and find out she has a new flame—none other than the personality who is backing the ballet. He is Herman Sherman, an overgrown hunk of vermin.

I do not like Herman Sherman, or classical dancing, or her attitude. But instead of punching Herman Sherman in the nose and spoiling Fanny’s chances, I walk out of her life like a gentleman. I am really gone on the damsel, and so I bow out gracefully and head for this Oasis tavern like I say. And there I stand all alone at the bar in the afternoon, trying to drown my sorrows.

I am just going down for the third time when I happen to notice this whisker standing next to me at the bar.

He comes in very quietly, because I do not hear him approach at all. The first thing that attracts my attention is when I reach for a glass and get a handful of beard instead.

I put the beard back on the bar, not being a beard-drinker, and stare at the face attached to it. It is a dark brown face, hiding in back of a big nose. It is not exactly the kind of a face you find on bar-room floors, so I examine the owner more carefully.

He is dressed in a long white night gown and has a towel wrapped around his head. Unless he is a fugitive from a Turkish bath, I cannot place him.

Then I notice he carries a big, long wicker basket. And I think I figure things out.

He must be the Oasis version of a cigarette girl. I know there is a shortage of help these days—they can't get cigarette girls because they are all working as welders.

THE whisker smiles at me, but I pay no attention you can mention to this clown in the nightgown, because I am too busy drinking. In fact, I am getting wobbly. Almost at the stage where I expect to see snakes.

I do.

Suddenly, on the bar in front of me, I see the snakes gliding along. They are lean, mean, and green.

I mutter and utter a swell yell, then cover my face with my hands. I do not like to see snakes. I wish that they would go away.

But they don't.

When I look again, the snakes are still there.

I cover my eyes once more and brace myself. It can't be true. I sneak another peek, very meek and weak. And then I shriek.

Because the snakes are more than just wriggling on the bar, now. They are coiled up. Coiled up in front of me. Coiled up, five of them in a line. They twist and turn and then lie still. And I see they are coiled up in a word.

Yes, those snakes are lying on the bar, each with its body twisted to spell out a letter. All together, they spell out the word—"S O U S E."

I can’t understand it.

And I can’t stand it!

Five snakes, spelling out the word, “SOUS E,” in front of me on the bar!

One flash and I am ready to dash. I get myself braced to run out of the joint.

At this moment the guy in the night gown suddenly notices the snakes. Fie just blinks and winks. Then he bends down and whispers to them.

Yes, he whispers through his whiskers at the snakes!

“My little green friends,” he croons, “It is very naughty of you to escape once more.”

Naughty is no word for it—revolting is my idea. But the whisker is not revolted. He grins at the serpents and then he reaches into his nightie and pulls out a little two-by-four tuba and begins to blow it.

He begins to blow this tuba, and it is lucky for him that there is nobody in the joint and the bartender is sweeping the floor, because he really sets up a squeaking that is reeking.

The tune he plays is certainly an eerie earful, but it is evidently number one on the snakes’ Hit Parade, because they suddenly uncoil and wriggle back into the wire basket from which they emerge. The snake that makes the “E” in “SOUSE” almost fractures its pelvis trying to uncoil again.

I almost fracture my neck staring at this far from delectable spectacle.

The whisker notices my noticing, and when he finally puts the lid back on the basket, he blinks his lids at me with a smile. At least I think there is the sunshine of a smile lurking under the silver lining of his beard.

“Ten thousand apologies, my honored and esteemed sir,” he says, in a high voice. “I am humbly sorry if my little friends in any way disturb you. You like my little friends?”

“They are no friends of mine,” I tell him. “I do not care to have any friends that crawl around on their bellies and make fun of honest drunks.”

“Allah willing, it shall not happen again, I assure you,” says the whitey in the nightie.

THEN curiosity gets the better of me. “Am I nuts,” I inquire, “or do I see these snakes spell out a word?”

“Your sanity is sublime and beyond question,” the dark man assures me. “The serpents do indeed spell out a word.”

And he goes ahead talking, introducing himself to me. He is Ali Ben Alikat, an ornamental oriental from Iraq and Mesopotamia. An Arab, in other words. He claims that back in the East he is a sort of priest—only in his country the term is “dervish”. He is one of these whirling dervishes, and according to him, he certainly gets around, until Axis gunfire disturbs his sleep one Arabian night.

I ask him why the Axis should bother him, and he bows and tells me.

“It is because of the treasure, of course,” he whispers, waggling his beard and looking around to see if we are still alone.

“What treasure?”

“The sceptre,” he mutters, from under his beard. “The sceptre of the great Caliph, Haroun Al Raschid.”

“Come again?” I invite him. “Haroun Al Raschid, Caliph of Bagdad,” he tells me. “It is a sacred relic, hidden and guarded by dervishes throughout the centuries. If the Axis could but lay hands on it, they would boast of this possession. Legend has it that he who owns the sceptre is a conqueror none can stand before. And my simple countrymen, learning that the Axis has the sceptre, would bow before German agents and give in. As a dervish, it is my sacred duty to guard that sceptre with my worthless life.”

He goes on to mention that he flees to this country with the sceptre and also takes the snakes. The sacred snakes.

“Sacred snakes?” I inquire.

“Ah, but yes, effendi,” he answers. “Feep is the name,” I come back. “But what is this about sacred snakes?”

“Hatched under the Kaaba stone,” he whispers. “In the holy of holies. Raised in the mosques by the followers of the Prophet. Full of the wisdom of the serpent.

“Direct descendants of the serpent in the Garden of Eden.”

“What good are they?”

“Ah, effendi, they constitute what you in the west would call oracles. They can be used in soothsaying. When I play to them the music of the dervishes, they will give warnings and foretell the future by spelling out words,” explains this Bagdaddy.

“Wait a minute, now,” I object. “That I cannot swallow. I hear a lot about snake-charmers, I admit, but I still think I have hallucinations when I see them spell out a word.”

“Behold, then,” drones Ali Ben Alikat. “By the beard of the Prophet, observe.”

And he whips the cover off the wire basket. I take a look. Then I wish to take a powder. Eight snakes are coiled there on the side and bottom of the basket.

“By the sacred cuticle of Mohammed,” says the dervish, “this is not the work of djinn or efreet. There is no sorcerous enchantment involved. These are the veritable serpents of wisdom, who foretell the future and act as auguries, divinators, and—”

“Snakes alive,” I interrupt. “Kindly close the basket. I don’t like the way they look at me.”

“They will not harm you,” says Ali Ben Alikat. “Wait, and I will introduce you. My little ones, meet Lefty Feep.”

“Hello,” I gulp, having nothing else to say.

THE snakes writhe into a heap and suddenly they are lying coiled up in the bottom of the basket, spelling out the word, “H E L L O.”

Absolutely, that’s what they do!

And as the snakes coil, I recoil.

“Why do you carry them around?” I gasp.

“Merely to warn me if the Axis or its agents get on my trail,” explains Ali Ben Alikat.

"But you're not a Bagdad lad any more," I reason with him. "You escape, don't you?"

"The Axis has agents everywhere," Alikat sighs. "And they still wish to secure this sceptre. I am going to give it to a museum for safe-keeping, I believe. But I have not made arrangements to turn it over. Consequently it is still in my possession."

"Where is it?" I ask.

"Here," says Ali Ben Alikat. He whips up the corner of his nightie. I bend down and see it strapped to his leg. Sure enough, it is a long golden sceptre, with beautiful designs on it.

"The serpents will warn me and tell me when to turn this over to authorities in your country," the dervish explains. "They are my spiritual guides. Are you not, my little green brothers?"

He smiles at the snakes in the basket and lowers his nightie again.

Suddenly he frowns. He stares down and points at the snakes with a skinny finger. I look at them. The serpents coil up furiously and I read their message. "LOOK OUT," is what seven of the snakes spell, and the eighth one is just trying to form itself into an exclamation point when—

The lights go out.

So do I, almost. Because I hear a swish and a thud behind my ear. I duck just in time. I hear Ali Ben Alikat screeching in the darkness, and know he is fighting some one or some thing. I turn and grapple with a figure. And when I grapple, I really grap. There is a lot of howling and yelling and cursing, and then the lights go on again and I am standing there with my foot caught in a cuspidor.

Ali Ben Alikat is leaning against the bar, clutching his basket of snakes. His turban is a little unravelled, and he is breathing hard, but he is not hurt. He gives me the old glare and stare.

"Dog of a dog!" he howls. "Pig of a pig! Mule of a mule!"

"Make up your mind," I suggest.

"You are a spy," he accuses. "You put the frame around me, eh?"

"I don't frame you," I object.

"You turn out the lights and let them attack me," he wails. "Then they steal my sceptre."

"Nobody steals a sceptre," I tell him.

"Look," yells Ali Ben Alikat, lifting his skirts. "It is gone from my leg. It is stolen!"

"It is not stolen," I reply. "When the lights go out, I take the sceptre from your leg, yes. And I use it to hit the attackers over the head. That's how I drive them away. Take a look."

AND I show him the sceptre in my hand. It is not damaged, even though I do use it to work on our mysterious enemies, whoever they are.

"Allah be praised!" gasps the dervish. "You are indeed my preserver, my benefactor. I rub my forehead in the dust to you, oh brave effendi Feep."

"Think nothing of it," I say, handing him the golden sceptre, which he stows away once more in his garter.

"This settles it," he sighs. "It proves the Axis is on my trail. Tomorrow I shall go to the museum—there is to be a director's meeting—and I shall turn the sceptre of Haroun Al Raschid over to them in the name of my government."

"Very sensible idea," I agree.

"Until that time," says Ali, "you must keep the snakes."

"Me? But why?"

"Because you are now in danger. This attack proves it. Since you save me and the sceptre, they will be on your trail too. I insist that you keep the snakes to warn you, to protect you from our evil assailants."

He hands me the basket.

"Tomorrow night we will go to the museum together," he says. "Now I shall leave and make arrangements. I am staying at the Ardlore Hotel. Call me there, and I shall be your humble servant in any enterprise you desire. Until then, farewell."

Before I know it, this dervish has me whirling. Half an hour ago I never set my orbs on him in my life. Now I am already mixed up with Axis spies, a golden sceptre, and a nest of snakes. More than that, he is ready to leave me holding the bag.

Or holding the wire basket, rather. I stand there trying to figure things out, and he slips the tin tuba in my hand.

“When you desire information from the sacred snakes,” he says, “then you will blow upon this. Do you know how to blow?”

“Yes,” I assure him. “I know how to blow.”

So I pick up the tuba and the basket, and while he is bowing and scraping, I blow.

I blow out of the Oasis and wander down the street, hugging the tuba and lugging the basket of snakes under my arm.

I walk down the street, pretty glad that it is a quiet evening by this time, and there is no one to notice me and what I am carrying.

But I do not get very far before I go from glad to bad. I am in fact also sad and mad—because coming down the sidewalk towards me is none other than that fascinating female, Fanny.

Sure enough, my ex-girl friend is waddling and toddling in my direction. It is too dark to see her face, but her wiggle is familiar.

And here I am, stuck with a basketful of snakes! A mess from Mesopotamia!

I HAVE a sneaking hunch that Fanny is not fond of serpents. And I don’t dare to ditch the sacred snakes. Being a woman, she will ask me what I have in the basket, and I can not think of a quick answer unless I say, “I am taking some food to my Grandma.”

This will not do either, since Fanny knows my Grandma and anyone who knows my Grandma will realize that she does not care for any food except gin.

So I am definitely on the spot.

There is only one thing to do and that is to get rid of the basket.

As I see Fanny coming down the block, I duck into a doorway and open the basket. I grab a handful of snakes and stuff them into my pockets and then throw the basket away.

I do not know if you ever have a pocketful of snakes in your life, but take it from me, you feel very wormy and squirmy.

But I do not mind, because I am really hot to patch things up with Fanny. I step out on the sidewalk and give her a big smile.

She is in a good humor, because she smiles right back.

"Why Lefty Feep, of all people," she giggles. "How are you?"

I take her arm and tell her how I are, and steer her into a conversation, to say nothing of a hot-dog stand on the corner.

"This meeting calls for a celebration," I tell her. "How about a hamburger?"

We sit on a couple of stools and order, and she begins to exert tongue and lung about her ballet dancing.

"The final rehearsal is over," she tells me. "We open tomorrow night. I am dancing in Schtunkowski's ballet, La Spectre de la Retch. And guess who the conductor is?"

Me, I do not care who the conductor is, or the motorman either, but I can see she is very excited about her professional debut as a ballet hoofer. So I listen to her and nod my head over the hamburgers.

"You will want to see the performance," she tells me. "Here is a complimentary ticket, Lefty. I get them from Herman Sherman."

I take the ticket, but even though it is a front row seat, my eyes do not pop over it.

My eyes are popping over something else.

When Fanny mentions the name of Herman Sherman, something happens. Two snakes slither out of my pocket and wriggle to the floor. And they coil themselves into the shape of a swastika.

"Herman Sherman," she says, and the snakes make a swastika on the floor of the hamburger joint.

My eyes pop and my heart starts to hop. But nobody notices the serpents, and in a minute they crawl up the side of the stool and get back into my pocket.

STILL, I am doing a lot of thinking.

These snakes are supposed to warn me. And if they make a swastika—

“Pardon me, honey,” I say to Fanny. “But this fellow who is backing the ballet—”

“You mean this impresario?”

“That is not a very nice thing to call a guy,” I tell her, “but maybe you are right. What I mean to ask—is this Herman Sherman by any chance a German?”

“Why, yes, I think he is,” Fanny tells me. “Why?”

“I don’t know,” I answer. But I do know. “Herman the German,” I mutter, under my breath. I have this hunch. Can it be that Fanny’s new boy friend is one of the Axis agents Ali Ben Alikat is afraid of?

“What is the matter with you, Lefty?” asks Fanny. She notices that I am squirming around in my seat. Of course I cannot tell her that the snakes are getting warm in my pocket and doing a little exploring.

“Nothing at all,” I tell her. And just to keep her from noticing too much, I slip the little tin tuba out of my coat pocket and wave it around.

“Why Lefty, don’t tell me you are a musician,” Fanny gurgles.

“All right, I won’t tell you,” I say.

“I never know you are artistic,” says Fanny. “I adore artists, you know. Poor boy, no wonder you are nervous and fidgety. You must have an artistic temperament.”

What I really have is snakes in the shorts, but I don’t dare mention it. Still, if Fanny likes artists and musicians, then that’s my cue.

“I do a little something along that line,” I admit.

“Then we are twin souls,” Fanny sighs. “Lefty—you must play something for me.”

“Not now,” I stall. “Not here.”

“Why not?” she coaxes. “There are no other customers.”

“But I can’t—”

“You play something or I’ll never speak to you again!” she says, temperamental—though she is more temper than mental.

“All right,” I sigh.

But I do not have to play the tin tuba. There is an unexpected interruption.

As I reach for the tuba, Fanny reaches for her hamburger. Only a snake gets there first. When she looks down, there is a serpent, nibbling at her bun.

“Eeeeeeek!” she comments.

She grabs for her purse to run, but there happens to be another snake crawling around there. It is staring into the pocket mirror as if it wants to powder its nose.

I STARE around and see that my snakes are breaking loose. The whole hamburger stand seems to be full of them. They smell food and they are wriggling and writhing all over the place.

“Great snakes!” yells the guy behind the counter. He dives for them with his cleaver.

I do not know if he is attacking them or stealing them on account of the meat shortage.

I swing into action, chasing them and trying to stuff the snakes back into my pockets.

“What are you doing?” Fanny shrieks.

“Can’t you see?” I gasp. “I’m trying to get them back into my trousers.”

She hits me over the head with a bottle of ketchup.

“I’ll have nothing to do with a man who keeps snakes in his trousers,” she rages.

“But Fanny—” I yell. It is too late. Jumping over the snakes on the floor she starts bawling while they are crawling, and then she runs out of the joint.

I watch the hamburger stand attendant do a little snake dance behind the counter, and then swing into action to catch the wrigglers.

By the time I stuff them back into my pockets I am tired and perspired. I pay for the hamburgers and march out. “A fine kettle of fish,” I think. “A fine nest of snakes.”

I stumble wearily and drearily home to bed. I take off my clothes and hit the hay without delay. I am in bed a few minutes and then the snakes crawl in with me to keep warm. I am too fagged out to object, and fall sound asleep.

Drinking and fighting and excitement really get me down, I guess, because when I wake up it is very late the next morning. In fact it is so late it is almost twilight of the afternoon.

I bound out of bed, partly because I realize I oversleep, and partly because one of the snakes is trying to coil up in my pajama trousers.

“I must call Ali Ben Alikat,” I remember, and dial the Ardlore Hotel and ask for him.

“Mr. Alikat is out,” says the room clerk.

“Where is he?” I persist. I must tell him at once that I suspect Herman the German.

“He is meeting a Mr. Herman Sherman,” says the room clerk.

“What?” I yell, my heart sinking.

“Mr. Herman Sherman, director of the Cosmopolitan Museum,” the clerk adds.

My heart sinks still further. It would take a diving bell to get it back up. Because now I know Herman Sherman must be the guy responsible for this mess. There is no Cosmopolitan Museum in town, and he is luring Ali Ben Alikat into a trap.

I hang up and hang my head.

What can I do?

I must find Ali Ben Alikat. But where? Where is he meeting Herman the German? How can I find out my next move?

Glancing down at the floor, I notice one of the snakes, coiling around the little tin tuba.

And I get an idea.

Ali Ben Alikat tells me to play the tuba when I want a warning or some advice from the serpents!

I may not know which way to turn, but the snakes do.

So I pick up the tuba and begin to blow.

The snakes glide off the bed and onto the floor. I really let go with a blast of reptile hep style.

SURE enough, the snakes glide around for a while and then head in a body for the carpet. All eight of them.

I watch while they form out a word. Just one word.

"F A N N Y."

It fascinates me to see them arch their backs to form the angles. Then I stare at the message.

"FANNY."

What does it mean? I want to know where to go to find Ali Ben Alikat and they spell out the name of my ex-girl friend. She is mad at me. How can she help? Besides, she is appearing in a ballet tonight at the theatre.

Then I remember—she gives me a ticket to the show. Can it be that I am supposed to go there?

It's a hunch.

I dress in a hurry and then ponder. Should I take the snakes with me? Remembering what happens last night, I don't want to. But from now on I'll need lots of advice.

So I stuff the sacred serpents in my pockets again, grab the tuba, and rush out to the street to grab a cab.

Off to the theatre I go, to catch Fanny before the show starts. She will give me information, if the snakes do not double-cross me.

I head for the stage door and the first person I run into is Fanny's maid, Sciatica.

"Oh Mistah Feep!" yaps Sciatica. "Ah nevah been so glad to see anybody like Ah is you."

"What kind of talk is that—'I is you' ?" I ask.

But Sciatica doesn't bother to explain.

"Sump'n awful's done gone an' happened," she bawls. "Miss Fanny's havin' a hystericals all ovah de place. Mistah Herman Sherman don' show up foh de perfohmance at all so fah. An' he ain't got no orchestra comin' foh to play tonight, neithah. We is in a mess. Maybe you-all can help Miss Fanny to calm down."

"Lead me to her," I say, and she does.

Fanny is in her dressing-room, in costume, and when I come in she is gnawing at her rhinestones and crying.

"Oh, Lefty!" she sobs. "Isn't it awful? Herman Sherman has left the show in the lurch. We are going on in ten minutes and there's no music. Who ever hears of a ballet without music?"

"Never mind that," I snap. "Where is Herman Sherman?"

She doesn't know.

"Does he ever speak of Ali Ben Alikat?" I ask.

"Lefty!" squeaks the girl. "I am in trouble and you ask me about alley rats!"

I frown. Evidently the snakes make mistakes when they direct me here. Fanny does not know anything about Herman the German and his plans.

All she can do is blow about the show.

"Almos' curtain time. Miss Fanny," says Sciatica.

Fanny bawls again. Then she notices that I am carrying my tuba.

"Lefty," she says. "You can save us! This is a modernistic ballet. I am going to be Scheherazade. All I need is a little oriental music. Now if you will play your tuba—"

"But I can't," I pant. "You don't know—"

"Just fake it," she pleads. "Interpretive stuff. Just to please the audience. To save the ballet. My reputation is at stake. Oh you must do this for me, Lefty."

SHE FALLS on my neck. Meanwhile Sciatica falls on me from behind. The two of them just about carry me out to the orchestra pit. They shove me down the steps in the darkness.

I can't escape. I hear the warning buzz. The house is packed. I sit there clutching my tuba, getting ready to run. It all happens too quickly for me—I am bewildered.

Then the curtain rises.

Six chorus girls scamper out against an oriental backdrop and begin to exhibit their oriental backdrops, kicking their legs in unison.

I pick up the tuba and begin to blow into it softly, trying to keep the snakes in my pocket from hearing it.

Meanwhile I watch the stage. After a little scampering around, Fanny makes her appearance—and that is just what she makes, in the little pile of beads they string together for her costume. She might just as well be back in burlesque.

But the audience gives her a hand and I give her the old tuba. Fanny really works on this, I can tell, because she begins to dance like mad all over the place, jumping and bouncing around.

I realize how hard she is trying and how much this means to her, so I warm up and try to pick out a real tune on the tuba. I blow until I glow, and put my heart and both lungs into my work, until I am blasting away and making as much noise as a whole orchestra.

It is too bad I get so wrapped up in my work. Because when I look at the stage again, it is too late.

Without my noticing it, the snakes creep from my pockets, all eight of them. They head for the stage. Of course they are flat behind the footlights and the audience cannot see them, but the six girls can.

Suddenly their dancing changes. They begin to run. And the snakes chase them. The snakes crawl up their legs while they dance.

In a minute there is no ballet going on any more. There is a good old-fashioned shimmy and hula-hula contest.

Fanny gets her share of attention from the reptiles, too. She screams and shakes, and in a minute Fanny is really wiggling ditto.

The audience begins to howl and hoot and whistle and applaud and the girls begin to shake and quake and quiver and shiver and the snakes begin to worm and squirm and there is one swell riot. Really hell to pay for the ballet.

I stop the tuba but too late. The house comes down with applause.

Then the curtain comes down, and so do the girl's costumes.

The jig is the only thing that is up.

While the girls run screaming from the stage, I dash up, cursing, and corral the eight snakes.

I have only one idea, and that is to get out of there. Now I know where I stand with Fanny, and all I can do is rave. Those snakes queer my life for me with their bum advice, and I figure the hell with what they spell.

I emerge from the stage-door entrance with only one ambition—to go home and make some snake soup.

But in the alley there is something else cooking.

As I step out, a fat man comes up behind me and begins to scrape at my ribs with a wicked-looking razor.

“Kindly do not sharpen your razor on my spine,” I say, mildly.

BUT the guy does not go for this suggestion. Instead he goes for my liver with his knife.

"Hold very still," he advises me. "You are Lefty Feep, are you not?"

"How do you guess?" I ask.

"Herman tells me to keep on the lookout for a stupid-looking jerk," he comes back.

"Herman!" I exclaim the name. "Herman Sherman?"

"None other, brother," says the fat man. "He sends me to find you."

"I am looking for him, too, I tell the fat party. "And I am looking for Ali Ben Alikat."

The fat man chuckles softly, like an erupting volcano. "You are looking for him, eh?" he remarks. "Well, you will never find him. And it is better for you if you forget there ever is such a person."

"Don't tell me you kill him," I gasp.

"What makes you think that?" inquires the oversized guy.

"I know all about Herman Sherman," I blurt out. "I know he is after that sceptre of Haroun Al Raschid. I know he is an Axis agent and that he wants to steal the sceptre and take it back to Iraq to impress the natives there. I know he lures Ali Ben Alikat somewhere by pretending to be the director of a museum."

"You know a lot of things," says Fatty. "In fact you know almost too much. But I know a couple of things about you, too."

"For instance?"

"For instance, you have the sacred snakes that come from under the Kaaba stone," the guy tells me. "And you play a tuba so that the snakes will spell out words and give advice. That is why I am here to interview you. I must take those snakes with me."

He reaches into my pockets and grabs a handful of squirmers. I do not object, because he keeps his razor very close to my spinal cord.

"Why do you want the snakes?" I ask, politely.

"Because I will take them to this Ali Ben Alikat and tell him you are really the Axis agent who is on his trail. I will tell him you engineer that attack in the tavern last night. I will help Herman Sherman to convince him he should turn over the sceptre to us. You see, right now he believes Herman Sherman is from the museum. Once he hears you are the Axis agent he will be so grateful to us that we will get the sceptre without any violence. And we hate violence," says the guy, jabbing me with the razor and laughing.

I shiver and look down the deserted alley as he takes the rest of the snakes.

"Now hand me the tuba," suggests Fatso. I do so.

"That takes care of things, I think," he tells me. "Oh, just one thing more. I owe you this for hitting me with the sceptre in the tavern last night."

And he raps me over the skull with the tuba.

Never before do I know a tuba can produce such music. There is a ringing and a roaring in my ears and I go down for the count in the alley as the fat party scrams.

He waits until a car drives up and then hops in and beats it to the hideout of Herman the German. This turns out to be the cellar of an old house over on 22nd Street.

The reason I know this is because I am hanging on to the spare tire and rear bumper. I manage to crawl on my hands and knees when the car pulls up in the alley, and I hang there for dear life as we drive through the dark streets. I am woozy and weak, but I know I must go through with this.

WE PULL up in front of this dark house. It looks sleepy but creepy. Fatty and the chauffeur get out and go down the steps to a cellar entrance. I quietly fall off my perch and crawl up to the cellar window on my hands and knees.

I look in and see a candle flickering on a table in the dingy cellar room.

Fatty and the chauffeur are inside talking to a little baldheaded lout who is strictly from sauerkraut. I guess this must be Herman the German. He is waving his arms, and when he sees the snakes and the tuba he rubs his hands and glances at a wristwatch.

Evidently AH Ben Alikat does not arrive yet, because I do not see him on the premises.

After a little pantomime, the three of them leave the room. The snakes and the tuba are on a table. The snakes crawl around, and so do I.

I crawl up and test the cellar window. It gives. In a moment I am inside the cellar room. I reach for the tuba and pocket it. Then I grab for the snakes, but there are footsteps outside. The Axis axes are returning.

Up to and out of the window I go, with just the tuba, and I hide in the bushes. But they are in the room before I can close the cellar window again.

Herman the German notices it is open.

“Himmel!” he yells. “Somebody in here sneaking is! Somebody crawls the window through and the tuba steals.”

“Looks that way,” says the fat party. “Wonder why?”

“Dumkopf, do you not standunder?” yells Herman the German. “When Ali Ben Alikat here comes this enemy will the tuba play so the snakes will him warn, nein?”

“You mean you believe that wild story about these snakes?” asks the fat lug. “That they can curl themselves up into letters and spell out a warning?”

“They can of course so do,” says Herman. “But Ali Ben Alikat must not a warning get. He will in a few minutes arrive and we must before then the snakes gefix.”

“How do you intend to gefix the gesnakes?” asks the chauffeur, a thin droop.

“Thus and so,” says Herman the German. He stares at the snakes and produces a bottle of whiskey.

“Whiskey?” gurgles the fat personality. “That’s for snake-bites, isn’t it? These snakes can’t bite anybody.”

“I dunno,” says the chauffeur. “They look like adders to me.”

“They can’t do mathematics too, can they?” asks the fat party.

“Never mind,” Herman the German snarls. “I am going to the snakes gefix so they will give a warning won’t, nein?”

Staring at the snakes, he pours a part of the whiskey on the table in a pool.

I get his idea and I am horrified.

The snakes are petrified. At least, they are in a few minutes. Because they begin to lap up the whiskey. In a few minutes more they will be too drunk to spell any words, no matter how I play the tuba. My little scheme is knocked flat.

And it looks like I will be knocked flat myself.

Because Herman the German turns to the fat party and says, “Now you will out go and the grounds search. If the party who crawls through the window you find, you will please his throat cut. Nein?”

And Fatty nods and brings out his razor. He heads for the door. But as he does so, Ali Ben Alikat, wearing his nightie, walks up the path and down the cellar steps.

FATTY is at the door so I dare not call out. Ali Ben Alikat goes into the den of thieves.

The jig is definitely up.

Herman Sherman gives him a bow and a nod and a greasy smile and Ali Ben Alikat gives him the sceptre.

At least he pulls it out of his garter and holds it up. The golden sceptre of Haroun Al Raschid glitters in the dim light and so do the eyes of the three Axis agents.

Then he notices the snakes, lapping whiskey on the table. Fatty starts to tell him the fake story—how I am really an Axis agent and arrange this attack on him, and how he finds me and takes the snakes away again. Ali doesn’t know what to believe, but I can see he is falling for it.

“I appreciate your kindness,” says Ali. “Making this meeting a secret so Feep and his gang will not discover us. And on behalf of my government I present you, as Director of Cosmopolitan Museum, with this sacred relic—the veritable sceptre of Haroun Al Raschid, Caliph of Bagdad, Protector of the Poor, Lord of—"

"What is?" yells Herman the German, suddenly.

Because I am crouching outside the window, blowing the tuba. I know the snakes are drunk, but I hope against hope. It is all I can do, against three men.

And my effort is in vain. The snakes are really woozy by now. Nobody could read their writhing.

They squirm a bit when they hear my tune, but all at once they just lie still. They do not form any words. Some are all curled up in a ball and others just lie out straight, full length.

But no words.

No hope.

Nothing!

The dervish squints at them when he hears the music. The Axis agents stare at Ali Ben Alikat. He shrugs, stares at the snakes, and smiles.

Then he hands them the sceptre.

Herman the German reaches for it.

And suddenly the dervish starts to whirl!

I never see a whirling dervish in action before, and it is something to behold.

Ali Ben Alikat spins himself like a top. He stands there, turning around faster and faster until you can not see his face or figure—just a whirling body with a blowing beard. And as he whirls he moves. He moves forward, fast.

His figure, like a human top, careens into Herman the German and knocks him over a table. Fatty gets out his razor, but somehow Ali Ben Alikat, still whirling, grabs the sceptre and bounces it off the fat party's skull.

The chauffeur has a pistol in his hand by this time—and I come through the window just in time to grab it.

Ali Ben Alikat, whirling like mad, pockets the snakes as they lie coiled up and stretched out. He waves the sceptre in farewell. Maybe it is just a dervish trick, but he spins faster and faster and faster—and then he isn't there any more.

Yes, the dervish disappears into thin air. One last twist and he is gone.

I am left holding a pistol, pointing it at the three Axis agents on the floor.

So it works out, after all.

I turn them over to the authorities right away. Ali Ben Alikat saves his sceptre. Everything is strictly on the up and up once more.

The way it turns out later, I discover that Fanny isn't even sore at me about the snakes.

It seems the owner of the Oasis—the Sneak of Araby—happens to be in the audience at the ballet and when he sees her shimmy he signs her up at a big salary for the cafe.

So she is practically back in burlesque after all, and I am tops with her again.

Yes, everything works out for the best, because those clever snakes warn Ali Ben Alikat.

* * *

LEFTY Feep sat back, but not for long.

I grabbed him by the collar.

"Listen," I snapped. "How could those snakes warn the dervish? I thought they were drunk."

"Only pretending," Lefty told me. "They are smart, see?"

"You mean they spelled out a word when you played the tuba outside the window?"

"Right," Feep told me. "When I play the tuba, they tell Ali Ben Alikat to beware."

"But you said the Germans didn't see any word," I persisted.

Feep smiled. "Of course not," he chuckled. "The snakes are very clever. They know they are in the hands of the enemy. So this time they don't spell out a word regularly. Remember, I mention some of them are curled up in a ball and others are stretched out full length?"

"You mean—?"

"Exactly," said Lefty Feep. "The sacred snakes spell out their warning in a new way I teach them before they are stolen. They give Ali Ben Alikat an S.O.S.—but this time they do it in Morse Code!"

THE END

It's A Small World

For two tiny, bewildered people, it was a struggle for survival in a world of toys

IT WAS Christmas Eve. Family men in their cozy bungalows hummed cheerfully as they put the finishing touches on Christmas trees. Men of affairs slapped each other affably on the back and toasted the season in the lounges of exclusive clubs. Merrymakers crowded the public streets and filled the taverns to overflowing. Children caroled gayly in church services. Mothers smiled their secret smiles as they wrapped presents.

And Clyde Hilton worked like a lousy dog in Propper's toyshop.

The funny part of it was, Clyde didn't care. He was as happy as the rest. Twelve hours on his feet today—facing mobs of customers gone frantic with the necessity of making last-minute purchases—that was Clyde's lot, but he was still smiling.

From time to time the redheaded young man grinned and patted the left-hand pocket of his suitcoat. Deep down inside reposed a little plush-covered box. The box contained an engagement ring.

Clyde fingered it and grinned—grinned at the girl behind the counter across the aisle.

Gwen Thomas was worth grinning at. A pert, trim, dark-haired girl with milk-white skin and perfectly modeled features—she had the delicacy of a china doll. “Exquisite” is a somewhat precious word, and yet it exactly described Gwen’s miniature-like beauty.

Clyde waited for the moment that he would slip the ring on her dainty finger. This would be a Christmas they’d both remember. To top it off, Old Man Propper had promised Clyde a raise. He’d winked indulgently at this romance between his two clerks, and the holiday spirit had him in its grip. They’d have a little party after closing-time, and then Clyde would give Gwen the ring and Old Man Propper would say, “Bless you, my children.” Just a slice out of Dickens.

Meanwhile, Clyde scribbled furiously in his order book, wrestled with the wrappings of a hundred packages, tangled himself in yards of twine and ribbon, punched the cash-register until his fingers were blistered, and kept up a running fire of sales chatter.

He had just sold a toy train to the fat lady and her husband when he saw the man.

It had been a job, selling this expensive model, but Clyde was something of an expert in the train field and he rejoiced in the opportunity of turning on high-pressure tactics. So he was quite elated, and finished his wrapping with deft fingers.

But he almost dropped the twine when the man came in.

The door opened. The toyshop was crowded, and ordinarily an entering customer couldn’t be detected in the throng—but this man was plainly visible.

Clyde stared.

The man wore a black overcoat with a turned-up collar that reached his chin. He was hatless, and his wiry gray hair stood up in a bushy mop upon his skull.

The man had a great beaked nose, and a curiously red mouth. Despite gray hair, his face was absolutely unlined. Not a wrinkle disturbed the pristine pallor of his long face. It was a perfectly blank background for the blazing intensity of his eyes.

If his hair denoted age and his unlined face indicated youth, then his eyes were—eternal.

They were black, but shining—shining radiantly with a penetrating fire. Two fountains of strength. Clyde saw the eyes before he saw anything else, and the rest of his scrutiny was just incidental. He gaped, fascinated. For some reason a strange fancy occurred to him. During his lifetime, he mused, he must have seen a million pairs of eyes—but never until now had he realized what power the eye could contain. Black, blazing fountains.

There was one other slight excuse for Clyde's interest in the stranger.

The man was seven feet tall.

He was not a giant, in the ordinary sense of the word—not one of those tall, thin glandular monstrosities. The man was adequately proportioned to his height. His shoulders spanned the doorway. The chest bulging under the overcoat was massive. Clyde saw the man reach up and adjust his collar—and his hand was the size of a dinner plate.

CLYDE watched the massive figure move through the milling crowd towards his counter. It was only as the gigantic bulk loomed directly before him that Clyde realized he was leading a small boy.

The child was an insignificant midge, contrasted to his huge companion. His tousled head scarcely reached the big man's knees, although he was large for a boy of seven.

Abruptly, Clyde tore his attention away from the ponderous stranger and concentrated on the boy. That was sensible sales psychology—experience had taught him that a clerk must study the child and try to anticipate his wants.

Clyde got another shock when he scrutinized the boy. Here, in miniature, was as strange a creature as the giant.

For one thing, the boy's clothing was adult. Not a smart boy's shop imitation of "grown-up" attire—but adult. His little topcoat was an authentic replica of his immense companion's garb. The boy's hands were buried deep in the pockets, and he walked with truly adult nonchalance. His carriage and demeanor were adult.

But the boy’s face presented the strangest paradox.

Clyde couldn’t remember seeing a child whose face didn’t light up immediately upon entering the toyshop. Even the children of the rich would squeal and giggle, their eyes would roll, and they would gesture with frantic excitement.

This boy was different. His stare was cold, unemotional. His pale face was as unwrinkled as the curious face of the huge man beside him.

And—his eyes were the same! Deep, black, disturbing eyes; the eyes of an adult in the face of youth.

Now giant and infant faced the counter before Clyde. He quickly mastered his curiosity and assumed his professional poise.

“Good evening,” said Clyde. “Can I help you?”

“I wonder,” said the tall man. His voice had a curious depth; it rolled sonorously down upon Clyde’s ears. Clyde stared up into the white face and the glittering eyes.

But the big man had turned to the child.

“What would you like, son?” he asked.

The child shrugged. It was a strangely sophisticated shrug, a shrug of boredom.

“There is nothing here that interests me,” he lisped in a childish treble.

CLYDE did his best to hide his strange irritation at the child’s nonchalance. He smiled down.

“Isn’t there anything you’d like Santa Claus to bring you?” he asked.

“Santa Claus?” said the boy. He gazed at Clyde. And then he laughed.

The laugh did something to Clyde. Perhaps he was tired. Perhaps he was overwrought. Perhaps his imagination was playing tricks.

But the laugh was adult. Sardonic. More than sardonic. It was—evil.

An evil, knowing chuckle from the lips of a child . . .

No. It couldn't be. Clyde knew he was weary, confused. He fought down the feeling of frustration.

"How about an electric train?" he coaxed.

"I've got one, thank you."

"A sled?"

"Hardly."

"We have some wonderful new chemistry sets——"

"I think not."

Curiously, the boy and the old man exchanged glances. The boy didn't laugh but his eyes twinkled mockingly.

Clyde stood there with obvious bafflement written on his face. The giant stranger seemed to sense it.

"Perhaps we'd better not detain this young man, Roger," he said. "We'll look around for ourselves, sir. We might find something we fancy."

"Very well."

Clyde moved down the counter.

The crowd had thinned out in one of those temporary lulls that inexplicably occur in any shop. Clyde saw that Gwen was unoccupied at the moment. He stepped around the side of the other counter and joined her. Her tiny hand found his under the concealing counter and they stood together, smiling.

Then Gwen gestured at the curious pair on the other side of the shop. Her eyes clouded, and she repressed a hasty gasp.

"There he is again!"

"Who?"

"The giant;—the tall man."

"You've seen him before?"

"Yes. He came in several days ago, when you were out on a delivery."

"Who is he?"

"I don't know. I watched Mr. Propper wait on him. He said he didn't want anything—he was just looking around. And then he stared at me."

"Stared at you?"

"Yes. Did you notice his eyes? They're awful, Clyde. Like the eyes of a statue. His eyelids don't blink, did you notice?"

"Maybe he takes drugs," Clyde grinned. But he didn't feel any amusement. Gwen had noticed the eyes, too. . . .

"Oh! There it is again—that stare——"

It was true.

Turning, Clyde saw that the tall man was peering across the room. His gaze fastened upon the girl at Clyde's side. Intense, penetrating, beating down like a palpable weight, his stare consumed the girl.

And the tiny eyes of the boy added to the barrage of scrutiny. The two of them were smiling—giant and dwarf, smiling alike, as they stared. And now, unobtrusively, the giant bent his massive head and listened as the boy whispered something to him. His stubby finger gestured their way. The man smiled, shook his gray mane.

"Clyde, I don't like that man," whispered the girl.

"Never mind, darling. He's just a screwball. I'll get rid of him now." Clyde patted Gwen's shoulder and stepped briskly around the counter. He marched over and confronted his unusual customers.

"Did you find anything?" he asked. It was hard to keep his voice from quivering, strangely difficult to keep his face from betraying the repulsion he felt.

THE tall man bent his great head and smiled benevolently at Clyde. That is, his face smiled. His eyes merely flamed.

"Not for Roger, here," he said. "But there's another little boy I'd like to select a gift for. I think I'll take that tricycle over there."

A finger the size of a wax taper stabbed suddenly in the direction of a tricycle.

"Yes," piped Roger. "We'll take that." The child's face was suddenly animated, purposeful.

"Good. That will be $10.95. Shall I wrap it up for delivery?"

“If you will please. I notice you have facilities for gift-wrapping in the back room. Would you mind——?”

“Not at all.”

Clyde grasped the tricycle and lugged it back to the room behind the curtains. As he passed Gwen he flashed her a smile. Her responding glance held a nuance of peculiar entreaty.

Nerves. Clyde pondered on the question as he wrapped the gift. Long hours and grueling work took their toll. He’d reached the point where he was imagining things. Just because an unusually tall man had a bored brat of a son, he had let his fancy run riot.

Maybe the old boy did take drugs. Perhaps the kid was a prodigy, or at least precocious. What was so unusual in that? Much ado about nothing.

Well, in an hour the toyshop would close and he’d give the ring to Gwen, and they’d go somewhere and have a quiet holiday drink together—forget all this nonsense about giant’s eyes.

There!

Deftly, Clyde completed the giftwrapping, his red hair hanging over his forehead as he frowned in concentration. Brushing back the loose strands, he grasped the package and marched back into the shop.

The crowd was thicker now. But as his eyes moved over the confines of the toyshop, Clyde realized that the old man and his son were gone.

They had disappeared!

A curious tingling crept along his spine. Hastily, he glanced behind the counters on either side of the toyshop. Where was Gwen?

The tingling merged into a lurching shudder.

Gwen had vanished!

Mustering his confidence, Clyde strode down the counter. Old Propper’s bald head gleamed as he bent over a tray of toy soldiers.

“Pardon me, Mr. Propper,” Clyde murmured. “Have you seen Gwen?”

“Gwen? She was over there just a minute ago. Talking to the big man.”

“But he’s gone.”

“I know, Clyde. I saw him go out with the little boy.”

“Gwen didn’t leave with them, did she?”

Clyde felt foolish as he asked the question, but he couldn’t hold it back.

Propper stared at him. “Of course she didn’t,” he snapped. “She must be in the back room. Where else?”

Clyde didn’t answer. He knew Gwen wasn’t in the back room. Still, he stepped through the curtains once more.

The room he had just quieted was still empty. And over on the wall were the hangers. Hangers that held Gwen’s fur coat and perky little green hat.

She couldn’t have run out into the snow without putting them on.

Heart pounding, Clyde retraced his steps. He surveyed the toyshop quickly. He tried to recollect his movements.

He had gone in to wrap the tricycle. He had left the giant standing there, behind that counter near the corner. And Gwen had been across the aisle.

All very simple. And what did it matter? The giant wasn’t an ogre, or a demon. He couldn’t have whisked Gwen through the walls. Besides, Mr. Propper had seen the tall man and the little boy go out of the shop—alone.

Still, Gwen was gone.

And the tall man and the child had whispered together and pointed at her . . .

CLYDE knew he was behaving like a fool as he rounded the counter in the corner. Here was an alcove hidden from the rest of the shop. A little recess in the wall.

The giant had stood near here. If he beckoned Gwen over, they’d be standing unobserved.

Still, what good would that do? What did it mean ?

Then Clyde’s moving left foot encountered a soft, tangling encumbrance.

He almost stumbled over the pile. Hastily he glanced down. Glanced down and saw the disheveled bundle on the floor.

Gwen’s clothes!

There was her black dress. Yes, and beneath it her stockings, still in her shoes! And beneath that, a brassiere, a slip.

Clyde knelt and fingered the garments.

They were still warm, still bore the imprint of Gwen's body.

Gwen's clothes, in a tangled heap on the toyshop floor.

And where was Gwen?

Clyde's groping fingers encountered a small, hard length lying against the counter. He grasped a hidden object, held it up.

A pencil stub. A pencil stub from Gwen's order book.

He ran his right hand in swift exploration across the floor near the pile of garments.

In a moment he found Gwen's order book, raised it.

The top sheet was covered with a sprawling scrawl—not the neat lettering of Gwen's precise handwriting on an order—just an awkward scribble.

But as Clyde read it, his senses spun.

Merely a name, and an address. But somehow, Clyde know there was a connection. He deciphered the wobbly lettering:

"Simon Mallot. 4954 Archmore Court. Clyde——"

Just that, and nothing mor*e. "Clyde,"* was the last word. The end of the "e" had been abruptly drawn out in a jagged slash across the page. As though Gwen had been interrupted in her message.

As though Gwen had shrieked for help just as a hand closed over her mouth. A hand like a dinner plate. The hand of a giant!

CHAPTER II

The Giant's Castle

THE streets of Manhattan were thronged with holiday revelers. Scarcely ten minutes had elapsed since Clyde had read the peculiar scrawl on Gwen's order book, and yet swift strides had already carried him far uptown, towards Archmore Court.

Old Man Propper had accepted his hastily-worded excuse and let him go with a curt nod of his bald head. Now, his overcoat wrapped tightly around him as a shield against the fine-spun snow, Clyde forced his way through the mob with flailing arms.

It was impossible to find a cab, and his impatience brooked no delay. His pace increased, his stride lengthened.

Curious thoughts churned through his head.

Christmas Eve!

Bells tolled their rejoicing in his ear, and yet Clyde heard only the resonance of a funereal note—a note of doom.

Holiday merrymakers called their cheery greetings—Clyde listened to a voice within himself: the voice of Gwen, screaming his name.

Christmas time . . . festival time! Clyde thought of older, pagan festivals. Festivals dedicated net to a kindly Christ-child, but to older, darker gods. Gods of blood and sacrifice. Gods that granted black booms—and took a grisly toll. Gods that were worshipped by pale-faced men with set and staring eyes. Deep-set, fanatical eyes . . . like the eyes of the giant . . .

Simon Mallot.

That was his name. But who was he, really? And what was he?

4954 Archmore Court.

Where was it, and what was it?

Clyde clutched the order book in his pocket and hurried along.

His way led him now through quieter side streets. Streets where no Yuletide lights shone in the windows. Streets given over to winter wind and midnight shadow. Streets that coiled and twisted their snowy surfaces beckoning down to darker depths.

Clyde felt like a pigmy running along on the back of some fabulously enormous serpent. A snow-serpent wound around between the looming buildings. Soon he would reach the serpent's head, the serpent's fangs, the serpent's blazing eyes.

Blazing eyes——

Clyde saw the lights before him. He knew, instantly, that this was the place. The great house stood set back from the street. A stonewall guarded the tree-girdled grounds. But the huge structure loomed above it on a little eminence of land. From a block away, Clyde could see the glittering lights in the lower windows.

Fantastically enough, the brightest cluster radiated from a rainbow-hued Christmas tree set fully visible against broad French windows on the ground floor.

Clyde paused before the outer gate long enough to read the numerals. 5954. This was it!

He marched up to the steps, faced the outer door. Then, and only then, did he pause.

What would he do?

Clyde knew how to gain admittance. He had Gwen's scrawled order slip with Simon Mallot's name on it. And he'd hastily wrapped a small package. He was there to "deliver" it.

But after that Clyde didn't know. Would he accuse Mallot of murder? Kidnaping? Forcing Gwen to do a strip-tease?

It didn't make sense. Only his hideous hunch made him persist. It might all be a hysterical fantasy, a delusion. But he had to find out. He had to get inside this house and see Mallot. Maybe there'd be a clue—or, on the other hand, a perfectly sensible and obvious explanation. Maybe he'd end up in jail for creating a scene and making ridiculous accusations.

HE HAD to take the chance.

His fingers, numb with cold, reached out and groped for a bell buzzer.

The great oaken door was smooth.

Stabbing pain lanced his finger-tips. Pain? Cold. Icy coldness, as he felt a round object under his palm.

A door-knocker.

Clyde raised it, let it fall. A hollow clang resounded.

The wind drowned all sound of approaching footsteps from within. But suddenly the door swung open, a fan of light poured forth.

Clyde looked up automatically, anticipating the seven-foot bulk of the giant.

But it was a small man who answered his summons. A small man dressed in discreet evening clothes. A butler.

"Yes sir?"

"I'm from Propper's toyshop," Clyde explained. "I've this package for Mr. Mallot." He extended his slip and revealed the brown parcel in his pocket.

"Very good." The butler took it and prepared to turn away.

"It—it isn't paid for," Clyde mumbled. "I was told to wait."

The butler frowned. "This is rather unusual," he said. "Mr. Mallot left no instructions." He coughed. "I'll call him."

The door began to close.

Clyde stepped forward hastily. His foot wedged in the doorway with all the dexterity expected of a Fuller Brush man.

"Could I wait inside?" he asked. "It's rather brisk out here."

The butler hesitated, shrugged.

"Very well," he said. "You may wait in the hall if you like."

Clyde entered the spacious hallway.

Burdened by suspicion, Clyde was prepared for almost anything. He expected a long, dimly-lighted corridor; gloomy, paneled walls, ancient tapestries.

Instead, he stood in a completely modern hallway, brilliantly illuminated to highlight cream-colored walls. Silver mirrors added a cheerful touch.

The butler faded from view. Clyde stood there, fidgeting and gazing down at the French blue of the carpeting.

There was a sliding door open at one side. A still greater brilliance coruscated from the room beyond. Clyde stepped to the doorway.

He stared into a spacious side parlor. The room was immense, with high walls running up to an adroitly domed ceiling. One side only was graced with long French windows. Against the windows reared the dazzling ornamentation of a tremendous Christmas tree.

The tree cast glowing benediction over the room. Sparkling lights were strung through the pine bows. Great globular and pendant ornaments flashed and shone on the branches. Icicles and tinsels festooned each twig.

There was something soothing and reassuring in the sight of this holiday emblem. Clyde's unformulated fears fell away. Surely there was some mistake. There was nothing but Christmas in this house.

As if to confirm this judgement, the rest of the room offered mute testimony in corroboration. Clyde saw that the floor was covered with gift packages and parcels in gay wrappings. Toys were scattered about in abundance. Blocks, tin soldiers, roller skates—he recognized the familiar offerings of the Yuletide. Around the entire room ran a border of steel in the form of tracks for a toy railroad train.

This must be Roger's playroom. The typical playroom of a rich man's son. Now it was cheery and homelike, in keeping with the Christmas spirit.

CLYDE sighed. There must be some mistake! Could it be that the giant had given the wrong name and address? Could he have been clever enough to know that Gwen might leave it as a clue?

It was probably so. Clyde had been sent off on a wild-goose chase. He must retrace his steps to the shop, start all over again. For surely there was no evil here.

He'd only be making a fool of himself if he stayed. When a stranger came down to pay him, he'd be in a mess. He could sneak out right now. No one would notice. Perhaps . . .

Then Clyde heard the voice.

It was like the voice of Conscience—faint and far away. High and shrill, from inside his brain.

“Clyde!” the voice wailed. “Clyde. I’m here. Save me!”

Nerves. He was tired. Hallucinations mast be shaken off, ignored.

“Clyde!”

No! The voice was not illusion. He did hear it; a tiny wailing from far away. Heard and recognized the thin cry.

“Clyde! Look at me here—here I am.”

He whirled around, startled. His eyes searched the room. Of course there was no one visible.

Could it be coming through the floor, the ceiling, the walls? No. It wasn’t muffled. The sound, however faint, was clear and unblurred.

“Over here! Hurry!”

The voice came from near the windows. Clyde moved closer to the tree. The brilliant light threw every inch of the room there into high relief. He saw nothing.

Clyde stared dully at the tree, and the voice wailed higher and higher.

“Here I am, darling. Here,” the voice implored. “Here I am—on the tree!”

Suddenly the world exploded. Through the mist came a crimson flash of comprehension. Clyde stared at the Christmas tree and saw.

Hanging from an upper branch of the Christmas tree, midway between an ornament and a candy cane, was a cellophane envelope. It dangled by a length of blue ribbon and swung to and fro.

Within that envelope, neatly wrapped in cellophane, was the writhing figure of Gwen.

Gwen—shrunken to two inches in height!

CHAPTER III

The Tall Man Again

“CLYDE, I knew you’d come! Thank heaven you found me in time!”

Clyde struggled to control his voice and features as he stared at the incredibly tiny figure on the tree. “What happened?” be muttered hoarsely.

“It was the tall man,” answered the girl. Her voice came faintly through the cellophane. Clyde bent closer and scowled.

“I knew it!” he sighed.

“He sent you into the back to wrap a package. That was a trick. He must have planned it that way. Because he beckoned for me to come over.

“He and the boy were standing next to the alcove in the far corner. He had a toy in his hands and he asked me how much it cost.

“All the while he kept staring at me with those eyes of his. Those eyes! I told you how I remembered them from the time he’d come in before. Deep, burning eyes.

“But as I stood there, I realized he had never really looked at me until now. He gazed at me . . . and through me . . . and then into me.

“I could feel it! His eyes reached inside of me and plucked out my consciousness. I knew it. Knew he was hypnotizing. But all the while another part of me knew that he was going right on talking, smiling, behaving normally in case anyone happened to look into the alcove. Only his eyes held me, and gloated and stared.

“I couldn’t look away. I swear it—I’d have given my soul to look away, but I could not. And once he looked at me, I no longer had a soul to give. He was drawing it into his eyes. Into those deep, dark glowing pools, as he stood there with His red lips smiling in his huge white face . . . I felt the world swim around me . . .

“His long, slim hands reached into his pocket and pulled out something. I couldn’t see what it was.

“I managed to choke out something. I had to speak, pretend I didn’t know what we both knew—that his eyes held me so.

“I asked him for his name and address and if he wanted this toy delivered.

“He answered, and my hand wrote it down on the pad. You see, I knew already that I must warn you. Of what, I couldn’t guess. But those eyes had me and I knew they wouldn't let me go.

"So I scrawled it off, but he only grinned, and I know the child was grinning too. And then his eyes seemed to get larger, like two burning moons. They rocketed up towards my face and I know my order book dropped out of my hands and then he ran his long fingers across my arm.

"I felt something pinch me. There was a tingling sensation near my elbow and then—I fell into those two burning moons. They rushed up and became one solid lake of orange fire, and I—I drowned.

"When I came to, I was here—on the tree."

CLYDE stared at that tiny, incredible body. It couldn't be true, and yet it was. The girl was Gwen. Cellophane-wrapped, yet nude save for the blue ribbon fastened about her hips. She looked exactly the way Clyde had always teased her about—like a doll. A human, living doll!

How had it happened? And why?

No time to consider that now. For Gwen's diminutive face puckered in utter panic.

"What can we do?" she whispered.

Clyde straightened up. The scowl seemed a permanent part of his features now.

"The first thing to do is get you out of here," he declared. "Quickly, before Simon Mallot comes back."

He stretched out his left hand cautiously and unfastened the cord of blue ribbon from the tree-branch. He lifted down the cellophane pouch containing the tiny living girl.

Gently, he; eased it into his coat pocket.

"Plenty of air for you," he murmured. "Just be still and don't worry. I'll get you out of here and then—we'll see."

Clyde turned on tiptoe and headed for the open door. He moved swiftly, silently.

Something swifter and more silent slithered through the doorway and ran across his path.

A black cat melted into the room. Clyde glanced down at it, startled: glanced into the cat’s great, green, glowing eyes.

Then Clyde looked up—and stared into the great, glowing eyes of Simon Mallot!

The giant towered in the doorway. He stood there quietly and smiled.

Clyde returned no answering smile as he surveyed the gigantic figure of the tall man. Simon Mallot was wearing a long white lounging robe, blending uncannily with his pale skin. But his lips shone redly and his eyes glared blackly as he stooped and clasped his elongated fingers about the body of the cat.

He lifted the black cat to a perch on his shoulders, but all the while he riveted his glance on Clyde. The cat added its baleful stare. Both cat and man wore a smirk of feline malice.

“Were you leaving?” asked the giant. The deep voice droned mockingly.

“Yes—I must get back to the shop.” Clyde essayed a smile.

“Not so hastily, I hope,” said Simon Mallot. “Won’t you stay and share our holiday hospitality?”

“Sorry, but I haven’t time,” Clyde muttered. “I must do my own celebrating later.”

“Very well—if you insist.”

To his surprise, Clyde saw the giant step aside from the doorway. A huge arm swooped outward in a gesture of polite dismissal.

Clyde walked from the room.

He’d made it!

“One moment.”

THE voice was even, but there was a sardonic undertone.

Clyde turned.

"Before you leave," said Mallot, smoothly, "you might return my property to me."

"Property?"

"Exactly." Mallot smiled.

"What might that be?"

"Just a little thing—a mere toy—an ornament from my Christmas tree."

Clyde couldn't control his voice, any more than he could control the goose-flesh on his neck.

"I don't know what you're talking about," he gasped.

"Ah. Then perhaps—this—will stimulate your memory."

"This" proved to be a gun. Mallot pulled it from the pocket of his white robe. It was a big Luger, but it looked like a child's cap-pistol in the great hand of the giant. Still, it was large enough for Clyde. And it did impress him—particularly when Mallot pointed the muzzle at his heart. Mallot's grin was as cold as the steel of the gun-barrel.

"You know I'll kill you instantly if you don't obey," said Mallot.

Clyde knew.

There was nothing else to do. Hand trembling, he groped in his overcoat pocket and drew out the cellophane package—the little package that (grotesque thought!) contained all that he loved in the world.

Gwen's fear-filled face starred up at him in a perfect miniature of horror.

Then the great hand extended and swept the cellophane from Clyde's palm. Fingers thick as dynamite sticks squeezed the tiny body of the girl. She squirmed helplessly in the giant's grasp.

Mallot grinned, baring tusk-like teeth in a smile that held only gloating mirth.

"My little boy would be so disappointed if he found his new toy missing. He had his heart set on Miss Thomas for a pi ay tiling."

"Plaything?" Clyde choked out the word.

"Yes." Casually, the Luger moved forward, forcing Clyde back into the great room. Mallot closed the door and then turned to the Christmas tree. Three enormous strides took him over to the window. Carefully, gently, he hung Gwen’s cellophane pouch back on the branches. Then he turned to the young man once more.

“Roger is a most unusual child, as you will discover. He has quite eccentric tastes—and it is my pleasure to encourage them.”

Clyde couldn’t hold it back any longer. Forgetting the Luger, forgetting all caution or diplomacy, he burst out in frantic rage.

“You monster! I don’t know how you did this, or what you intend, but you can’t get away with it!”

Mallot laughed. The windows rattled.

“A rather melodramatic speech,” he observed. “It might sound more convincing if you had this to emphasize your sentiments.” He glanced at his Luger significantly. He began to come closer, and Clyde saw the outthrust muzzle of the weapon level at his heart once more.

“Naturally, now that you have been so—frank—I would be foolish to allow you to depart,” said the giant, suavely. “So perhaps I had better——”

The great eyes flickered. Mallot halted. “No,” he purred. “Perhaps I’m just a sentimental fool. The season, you know—holiday spirit and all that sort of thing. But I won’t kill you. Besides, it might spoil Roger’s Christmas if he knew.”

He stared at Clyde. Again, the gloating smile.

“You have red hair,” he commented. “Roger should find you amusing.”

The giant stalked closer. “Yes,” he said. “It would be a surprise, too.” Clyde watched and waited. He tried to look at the black cat perched on Mallot’s shoulder. But out of the corner of his eye, he watched the approaching muzzle of the gun. It was so small, compared to the vast bulk of the giant. But there was a chance. If he could leap forward, grab the gun, turn it on Mallot, now Clyde waited. He stared at the cat’s glaring eyes. The gun came close. The giant smiled. Clyde stood poised, ready. Pie tensed to spring.

More quickly than the eye could follow, Mallot’s free hand darted forward. Clyde went for the gun, but as he moved he felt the giant’s great paw brush his elbow. There was a faint prickling sensation in his arm.

The sensation rose, magnified with incredible acceleration. For an instant Clyde felt his sweaty palms close about the Luger's muzzle. For a fraction of a second he knew he was struggling forward. Then everything whirled and there was nothing but the eyes of the cat on Mallot's shoulder—eyes looming up larger and larger. Great, green liquid eyes.

Clyde fell forward, fell into the eyes, drowned deep in an emerald lake.

CHAPTER IV
The Enormous Room

IT'S hard to awaken from a nightmare.

The darkness has tentacles, and the inky strands are imbedded deep in your brain, trying to pull you back—trying to pull you down once more into the screaming depths.

Clyde fought the tentacles, fought the clutching filaments of fear, struggled into consciousness.

He blinked, opened his eyes fully.

It was morning.

He couldn't see clearly, but he recognized daylight around him. He turned his head, shook away the confusion. Now his body tingled with awareness once more. He could feel a constriction under his armpits, a tension.

Clyde looked down. A great bolt of yellow cloth swathed his body. The ends of the bolt were drawn under his arms, passed up somewhere behind his head. He was hanging suspended by the bolt of cloth. No wonder there was pressure!

Yes, he was hanging—but from what?

Clyde glanced down. And then he knew.

He was hanging from the Christmas tree—hanging from the tree as Gwen had hung there the night before!

With a thrill of horrified recognition he stared down—down past a million swirling constellations—down past the glacial splinters of a thousand icicles—down through a forest of bristling spears—down at the far-away floor of the enormous room.

Miles away he discerned the gleaming tracks of a railroad line and the huge cluster of yards and terminals. Columns of soldiers marched across the great plateau in the center of the open area, marched towards the rearing towers of a mighty city.

Of course! The city was made of building blocks. The soldiers were lead and tin. The railroad was a toy train and the tracks against the wall were not miles away, but a mere fifty feet.

The sky so far above was just the domed ceiling. But if that was so—why did the sun hurt his eyes?

It blazed with fiendish intensity as he squinted off into the distance.

Then Clyde realized that the brilliance came from the lights on the Christmas tree from which he hung. The swirling constellations were glittering ornaments. The glacial icicles were merely tinfoil decorations. The forest of bristling spears was made up of pine needles on the branches of the tree.

He had suffered Gwen's fate. He was a mannikin, two inches high. A doll, hanging by a yellow ribbon, on a Christmas tree. The way Gwen had hung. . . .

Gwen!

He turned. The ribbon swayed gently as he moved his neck.

Gwen hung there, almost at his side. She was sleeping—her head hung in litter exhaustion as he gazed at her through her protective wrapper of cellophane.

"Gwen!" he whispered. She did not stir.

Then he realized that the volume of his tiny voice no longer mattered.

"Gwen!" he shouted.

Her blue eyes opened. She stared, recognized him.

“Clyde, darling! I saw him do it to you—he had a needle in his hand. A very tiny needle. He jabbed it into your elbow—you fell, and then——”

“Yes?”

Her faint voice trembled and she turned away. He could hear her murmuring faintly.

“Oh, it was horrible! It happened so suddenly, so quickly! You just seemed to shrivel up inside your clothes. One minute you were standing there, and the next—you were gone. Your clothes just fell to the floor. Stockings still in the shoes, shirtsleeves still tucked into your trousers, and the overcoat still covering your suit.

“Mallot reached down and plucked you out of your own trouser-cuff! You lay there like a tiny doll, and he wrapped you in the yellow ribbon and hung you on the tree here.

“He must have used the needle on me, too—after hypnotizing me in the shop. It just takes an instant. No wonder nobody noticed, and he could walk out so easily—with me in his pocket! And now he’s done it to you. Oh, darling, what can we do? What can we do?”

CLYDE would gladly have given his life for the answer, but it was not forthcoming. And as he groped for words, for consolation and reassurance, there was an interruption.

A wind swept through the tree. And then, ponderously from below, the tremor of an earthquake rocked and vibrated.

It took Clyde a moment to realize that the wind came from the opening of the door, and the earthquake tremor was the thud of footsteps.

A giant thundered into the room.

A giant? Clyde recognized the boy, Roger.

Last night he had been a little child. This morning he was a huge creature, massive as a mountain.

He ran into the room, uttering a boyish whoop that smote Clyde’s tiny eardrums like the drums of death.

“Where is it?” he yelled. “Where’s the surprise?”

A face like a billboard illustration loomed before the figures on the tree.

Clyde stared at the great ridged nose, the flaming open-hearth furnace of the mouth, and the great bloated globes of Roger’s rolling eyes. They were huge white balloons with dark centers. A network of red veins crawled like serpents across the milky white portions.

Clyde stared into the pupils as though viewing the reflecting mirrors on a gigantic telescope. Stared at his own image.

“Look! They’re alive!” yelled Roger.

His gigantic paws reached out. His hand almost brushed Clyde’s body, but reached past it as the boy took Gwen from the tree. His clumsy fingers tore away the cellophane. Clyde writhed in fury as her body wriggled in the pudgy palm of the boy.

Then the world reeled as Clyde felt himself lifted from the tree by his yellow ribbon. He heard booming laughter from above, then sickened as his body took a roller-coaster dip through space. He had been deposited on the floor.

His bare feet sank into the carpet. Fringes rose like grass about his ankles.

A few feet away—inches, really—Gwen was tottering along. Circulation was slowly being restored to her numbed limbs. Clyde moved towards her, thankful as he felt the blood surge painfully to the soles of his feet.

“Gwen. Are you all right?”

Suddenly something red blocked his path. Clyde turned and a heavy weight struck him behind the knees. He fell.

The boy had tripped him with his finger.

Booming laughter came from blocks above them in empty air.

“I’ll build you a house,” roared Roger’s voice.

The hand scooped down, grasped them both, and took them for a dizzying elevator ride. Up and down again on another portion of the carpet. They tumbled out, gasping.

The hand came down once more, depositing a six-foot wooden wall at their backs. Clyde turned. Wall? It was merely a 2-inch building block with the letter B raised on its surface.

"A house," echoed the voice.

Another block appeared before them. And another. In a few seconds, a score of blocks were solidly piled on all four sides of the tiny figures. The light was blotted out and they crouched in the gloom. The second and third tiers of blocks trembled.

So did Clyde.

If that crazy kid made a mistake and one of the blocks wasn't properly balanced—it would slip down and kill them both!

What a fate . . . to be crushed to death by an alphabet block!

A VOICE boomed from above them—a voice with echoes that reverberated more deeply than Roger's tones.

"Breakfast, Master Roger."

It was the voice of the butler. Clyde recognized it, distorted as it was, and magnified a hundred-fold.

He heard Roger grumble from outside the block-house.

"All right," he said. "I'm coming. Just as soon as I put a roof on this house."

A block appeared in the opening above their heads and wedged itself down tightly, balancing on three sides of the walls. A faint crevice of light remained on the fourth side which the roof block didn't touch.

The roof-block trembled as Roger's footsteps thudded across the room. Then, silence.

"He's gone," whispered Gwen. "Now what?"

"Watch me." Clyde almost grinned. This was his chance and he was ready.

"You can't possible push these heavy blocks aside," Gwen sighed, anticipating a move on his part.

“I don’t intend to,” Clyde answered. “But the letters on these blocks are raised. I can climb up on the lettering. If I get to the top, I can topple that roof-block off. It’s resting pretty loosely.”

“But it’s twenty feet to the top—you’ll fall!” Gwen objected.

“Worth trying,” Clyde grunted.

The redheaded young man glanced around in the gloom. The letter B loomed at his left.

“Here goes,” he announced.

Hands found a lodging, toes a foothold, and Clyde wriggled his way up the side of the block.

L was the next step, and Clyde managed to literally “shinny” his way up the angular six-foot letter. The 0 above it was much easier to follow. Clyde hung to the upper rim and slowly forced his head and shoulders through the crevice open at the roof.

“Gwen!” he called. “Stand back against the wall. I’m going to rock this block off by its own momentum—but it may fall inside. Look out!”

Bracing his legs against the upper loop of O, Clyde grasped the rough, splintered edges of the roof-block and tugged. It gave perceptibly. He swayed back and forth. Soon the block teetered on a widening arc. He felt it tremble, sway outwards.

“Here goes!” he shouted.

With a thunderous crash, the block hurtled down to the carpet below.

Clyde trembled. That noise!

Then he realized that the noise was proportionately inaudible to normal human ears. He grinned.

“Now we’re dear, darling,” he called. “Climb up the letters. I’ll reach down and pull you up.”

GWEN joined him, gasping for breath. Her lovely black curls hung in bewitching disarray across her bared shoulders. Clyde pulled her up to the top of the block-heap and took her in his arms.

There was a single blissful moment—but that was all.

“Now, down the sides,” Clyde commanded. “Hurry!” He slid down C, clambered down an H, and finally stood on the topmost loop of an R as he assisted Gwen in her descent. At last they stood safely outside the block-house once again.

“Now where?” asked the girl.

Clyde bit his lip. Her words merely echoed his own confusion. They were free of the wooden prison—but how to attain greater freedom?

The vast green expanse of the carpet stretched endlessly before them. The white door was a mile away. And as they walked, their tiny feet sank deeply into the nap of the carpet. Sharp ends bit into their heels.

“Clyde—I can’t go any further——”

Panic and desperation made the girl blurt out the words.

Panic and desperation gave Clyde his inspiration.

His eye had caught the gleam of metal against the wall, where the carpet ended. A huge contrivance rested there—a great metal cart on gleaming wheels, ponderous as a juggernaut.

“A roller-skate!” Clyde murmured. “Come on.”

Grabbing Gwen’s hand, he dashed toward the edge of the carpet.

“Climb aboard,” he directed. “You see how the floor slants here a bit down to the door? I’ll just give this skate a shove, climb on behind, and we’ll coast down to the door in a jiffy.”

It was a struggle for Gwen to mount the skate, and her blue ribbon was shredded before she reached the top. By that time Clyde was bracing his shoulder against the left rear wheel of the skate, wisely gauging it as the one most likely to be set in motion.

Straining, his muscles bulging with effort, Clyde pushed. The skate moved slowly . . . then gathered speed. It began to roll down the incline.

Clyde clambered aboard at a trot, swinging up just as the skate gathered momentum. They whirled down toward the open door.

“We’ll go right through,” Clyde exulted. “Right down the hall outside! And then——”

The black shape loomed before them even as he spoke. The black sabretooth, twenty feet tall—eyes glaring green fire, jowls slavering for the kill, yellow fangs gaping, claws raised to rend and destroy . . . It was the cat!

A single bound carried it through the doorway. It paused, hissed, and then bore down upon the two figures crouching on the flat top of the moving roller-skate.

“Quick!” yelled Clyde. “Jump off!”

Gwen obeyed. Clyde didn’t move. The skate rolled directly towards the oncoming cat. Clyde saw it raise a paw, ready to rake him off as the skate passed. He crouched low as the paw swooped down.

He felt the shaggy blanket of fur brush his back and twisted to one side.

The cat had missed!

And now the skate had carried him beyond. He had almost reached the door. The black cat whirled. A single bound brought it forward. Another leap and it would be upon him.

CLYDE slipped from the moving skate, eyes roving frantically around the enormous room.

Then he spied it, scarcely three inches away—a long green blade with a sharp point.

A fallen needle from the Christmas tree!

But it was a weapon. Clyde grasped it and rose to face the charging cat. The gigantic head rose above him, and the huge jaws yawned. A paw swept out.

Clyde thrust the sharp point of the pine-needle upwards. It pricked the cat’s paw. The feline yowled and withdrew its claws. Then it leaped.

Clyde felt, rather than saw it soar over his head. The wind grazed his hair. And now, in a single instant, the great cat was behind him. The black bulk of its body moved down on him. A ranking claw thrust out. Clyde jabbed with his weapon.

Quick as lightning, the other paw came down. The pine-needle was brushed from his hand, and a numbing shock traveled up his arm.

Clyde stooped to pick up the needle. It was broken—he was weaponless! Now he was ready prey, and so was Gwen.

And the cat charged.

There was no escape this time. Clyde darted to one side, dodged. The cat landed on its forepaws a good foot away. But as it landed, its long black tail coiled out in a lashing blow.

Clyde felt it strike his knees from behind, felt it coil around his waist as he fell. Trapped, he waited as the cat turned, with out-flexed paws, and launched itself at his throat——

The blackness bore down upon him and he felt the hot breath of the gaping mouth as the fangs ripped towards his head.

CHAPTER V

The Wreck of the Number Nine

THE fangs never reached their goal.

As Clyde prepared himself for that final stab of blinding pain, the darkness seemed to lift from before him.

It did lift—for a hand came out of the air and grasped the black cat by the scruff of the neck.

"Scat!" thundered a voice.

Clyde lay there looking up as Roger picked up the feline and carried it from the room. Roger closed the door and returned.

"Tried to hurt my playthings," mumbled the boy. He stared down at Clyde.

"But how did you two get out of the block-house?" he asked.

Clyde shrugged his tiny shoulders in reply.

"You were trying to get away, weren't you," Roger accused. "You tried to hide from me! Maybe I'd better hang you up for safe-keeping while I finish breakfast.”

Roger suited his actions to the words. He stooped down and Clyde rose on his palm. A stride carried the boy over to where Gwen lay. She tumbled into the moist, slippery surface of Roger’s hand and clung to Clyde as they swayed towards the tree.

Roger adjusted the ends of the blue ribbon and the yellow ribbon. Once more the two mannikins dangled like ornaments on the great Christmas tree.

Clyde groaned inwardly as he found himself right back where he had started. Once more the door—escape—freedom—all were miles away.

Rogers smiled down on the two hanging figures.

“Be quiet, now,” he said. “I’ll come back as soon as I finish eating.”

His footsteps thundered from the room. Once again there was silence.

Clyde turned his head. Gwen smiled at him bravely. His heart wrenched as he realized the effort she was making to appear cheerful.

But suddenly her assumed optimism faded. “Oh, darling,” she sighed. “I guess it’s hopeless. We’ll be here forever. And——”

Her dainty little body shook in a sudden spasm of sobbing.

“What’s the matter, honey?” Clyde whispered.

“Oh—it’s so terrible! And I’m all scratched and bruised, and I’m practically starving.”

Clyde forced a smile. “Good for you to go without food,” he told her. “You always said you wanted to reduce.”

“Reduce!” A fresh burst of tears coursed down her doll-like cheeks.

Clyde frowned as he realized the ironic cruelty of his remark. She was reduced indeed!

Then his eyes lighted on a vast object hanging directly before him.

“Cheer up, small fry,” he called. “I think I can get you a bite to eat, anyway.”

HE BEGAN to pump his legs outward, swinging his body forward and back. The movement caused the ribbon by which he was suspended to swing in a slow arc. Clyde, at the bottom of this pendulum, swung forward with increasing speed. Soon he was approaching the great white object with every swing.

It hung there, like a ten-foot snowball, right in his path. His tiny fingers clawed at its rough, corrugated surface.

Nothing happened. On the next swing he dug into it deeply. There was a crackling sound, and a huge lump of the white substance broke off in his hands. He swung back and ceased his movements.

Slowly, he broke the white lump and extended a section of it to Gwen. She could just reach out and grab it.

"Go ahead and eat," Clyde told her. "Lucky for us there's a popcorn ball on the tree."

The popcorn was nourishing. Clyde had never thought two people could make a satisfying meal out of a single kernel from a popcorn ball, but this was ample to still his hunger. It didn't take much to fill a tiny stomach. A little condensed milk, now—

As Gwen nibbled her popcorn, Clyde abandoned his fancies and concentrated on another train of thought.

He had swung outward and back to reach the popcorn ball. Then he had stopped. Suppose he kept it up? Suppose he swung in wider arcs until the ribbon on the branch above him loosened?

He might fall, plunge to his death on the jagged pine-splinters below. Still, it was a chance. And it was his only chance.

Thankful that Gwen was occupied only with her food, he began to rock cautiously once more. Soon he swung out to the popcorn ball again; then beyond it. He swooped forward and back. His head reeled, he grew dizzy, but he could feel a movement on the ribbon over his head.

He plummeted up and down, up and down. Now Gwen saw him, and she screamed as he rocketed past. Clyde was giddy, breathless. The world spun around him—the glittering constellation of tree ornaments whirled.

And then—the ribbon came free!

With a gasp, Clyde took the fall. He plunged down, down—shooting through interstices between the bristling branches. Far below him he saw the huge, shining bulk of a crystal globe.

An ornament—he was heading straight towards it! In an instant he would crash, the ornament would shatter, its jagged splinter pierce his body and hurl his bleeding carcass to the floor below.

Clyde's arms flailed wildly. The deadly polished surface rushed up to meet him, and then his right hand found a hold.

With an arm-wrenching lurch, his descent halted. Clyde clung desperately to the strand of tinsel that sustained his weight. For a long moment he could only pant and wheeze. Slowly he drew himself up to a perch on the tinsel.

"Clyde, are you all right?"

Gwen's voice came from above. She hung about forty feet higher—in reality, about fifteen inches over his head.

"Of course I am," Clyde answered. "Hold on and I'll climb up and get you loose."

NOW it was easy to mount the branches, picking footholds and hanging on to tinsel strands and candy-cane lengths. In a very few minutes Clyde had crawled to a niche above Gwen's head and slowly loosened the strand of blue ribbon.

"Grab that branch tip," he directed. "I'll get you free in a moment."

The operation was swiftly accomplished.

"Now what?" Gwen voiced the question as Clyde joined her on the branch. "You aren't going to make me climb down to the floor, are you? I get dizzy just looking at it."

Clyde shook his head.

"No sense in trying the floor again," he said. "Too dangerous, and it's too far to the door. Besides, once in the hall, we'd need to get the outer door open as well.”

“Could we get to a telephone?”

“Not likely,” Clyde decided. “Besides, how’d we ever get the receiver off the hook? It would be an engineering problem to dial a number, and I doubt if our voices would carry. Too much danger of detection, anyway. No—that’s out.”

“Then what can we do?”

“Just keep calm. Look, we have French windows right in back of us. And I’ve a hunch the one on our left is open a bit. I’ve felt a breeze for some time. If that window is ajar, we can slip directly outside. All we need do is climb around the side of the tree here and slide down to the window ledge. Can you crawl?”

“I can do anything if it means getting out of here,” Gwen declared. Her eyes flashed. Clyde gave her a grin. The girl had spirit and courage.

“All right. Better not waste time, then. The brat is likely to show up at any minute. Suppose we swing down this light-cord?”

Clyde pointed at one of the green strands linking a string of tree lights.

“Just swing across it and move down,” he said. “But watch out for the lights. They’re hot.”

The tiny figures began their journey. Time and time again they clambered across branches to avoid the burning incandescence of a Christmas tree bulb.

“Swing across that tinsel,” Clyde grunted. “We’re making progress.”

Gwen, despite cruelly-smarting hands—giggled.

“What is it?” Clyde turned his head.

“I can’t help it! You look so cute in your blue ribbon, swinging along the branches. Just like Tarzan of the Apes.”

“He does, does he?”

The voice came from behind them.

Both Gwen and Clyde turned their heads quickly back towards the room.

Standing before the tree, still on tiptoe from his stealthy entrance, was Roger. The boy wore a frown of displeasure.

“At it again?” he said. “Trying to get away!”

There was no hiding-place, no escape.

Advancing quickly, Roger reached forward and plucked Gwen from the tree.

“Let her alone!” Clyde yelled.

“Huh!” grunted the child. “I ought to throw her away.” He made a gesture as if to hurl Gwen’s body to the ground, and Clyde groaned.

But the gesture was not completed. A smile appeared on the vast bulk of Roger’s face.

“I’ve got a better idea,” he said. “I’ll really punish you both.”

HE TURNED his back and swiftly carried Gwen across the room. Clyde clambered up a branch and strained his eyes, trying to follow the boy’s movements.

Roger stooped down on the far side of the room. His hands groped and fumbled before him, but his back hid Gwen from view.

What was he doing to her?

Abruptly, Roger rose. His body still blocking the view on the far side, he approached Clyde with empty hands. Clyde couldn’t dodge the searching fingers.

His ribs were crushed between thumb and forefinger as Roger carried him down to the floor.

“In you go,” said Roger.

Clyde felt himself being lifted to an iron stand. He glanced down.

Roger had placed him on the cab of his toy train’s locomotive!

The locomotive rested on the wide track that ran the full square bordering the room against the walls.

Clyde stood in the iron cab of the engine. It was a Lionel special model —the “New York Central to be exact, with a Hudson-type locomotive. Clyde knew. He had sold them in the toyshop.

He gazed at the shining track stretching ahead, and at the curve near the wall.

Why had Roger put him here?

“I’m going to punish you,” said the boy. “The way they did it in the old movies.”

“What do you mean?” Clyde shouted.

“Look and see.”

Far above, the child’s arm extended across the room.

Clyde stared.

Half-way around the circle, on the track directly opposite, lay Gwen’s writhing body.

Roger had tied her to the track.

“Notice how I did it?” asked the precocious little monster. “I’ve tied her to only one of the rails. Only her head extends between. If I laid her directly across she’d be electrocuted when I switch on the transformer.

“As it is, we’ll do it like the movies. I’ll start the train and you’ll run over her.”

Roger laughed. It was a cruel laugh, not at all boyish. Clyde shook his head. How could he appeal to this heartless, inhuman creature?

“But you don’t want to kill her,” he stammered. “A helpless girl——”

“You’re my toys,” Roger snapped. “I can play with you any way I want.”

Abruptly the boy turned. He squatted in the corner, next to the black bulk of the transformer.

There was a whirring hum. And suddenly, Clyde felt the train-wheels turn. The engine was moving beneath his feet!

Slowly, the locomotive gathered speed. Clyde stared out of the cab. He was rushing down the rails, heading for the bend. In miniature time-scale, he was plunging forward at about sixty miles an hour. The engine would take this curve, take the next, go down the straightaway, and in the middle—decapitate Gwen!

The locomotive lurched as it whizzed around the first curve. Clyde braced himself. He couldn’t jump. The second curve loomed ahead. The Hudson type was speedy. A few seconds more, now—

Roger was at the transformer, generating power. Power!

Clyde saw Gwen's body far down the tracks. The locomotive rushed with deadly swiftness.

Clyde gulped. He had the clue, if there was still time. He turned to the cab. Yes, this was the Hudson type. A miniature poker stood in the tender, and next to it was the fire-box door. If that door was opened—

He tore a strand from the blue ribbon about his waist and yanked the tiny poker free. He wrapped the handle of the poker with the ribbon and jerked at the fire-box door.

Peering out the window of the cab he saw Gwen only a little way ahead. The train rumbled on.

Gasping, Clyde jammed the poker through the open door. The end caught. It had to catch, make contact.

It did.

Clyde knew his locomotives. The poker would short on one of the motor terminals against the frame.

The result was spectacular.

The locomotive halted with a lurch, just a few inches from Gwen's tiny form.

At the same moment came a puff of smoke from the transformer, and Roger fell backwards in a cloud of acrid fumes.

CHAPTER VI

Out of the Mouths of Babes

IT WAS the work of an instant to jump down and release Gwen. Clyde yanked the twine free and helped her to her feet.

"Come on," he whispered.

Over in the corner, Roger's coughing spasm had subsided, and now tears came in a surprising cascade. The boy was crying. The sheer, unexpected shock of the short-circuit had frightened him. Gwen turned and stared at him across the room.

“Gwen—let’s go!” Clyde tugged at her shoulder.

Gwen tossed her black curls. “No,” she said. “I’m going to talk to Roger.”

“Are you crazy?” stormed the redheaded young man.

For answer, Gwen began to stride towards the looming bulk of the boy in the corner.

“Gwen—come back!”

She neither turned nor paused. In sheer amazement, Clyde watched her as she reached the crying child and deliberately tugged at his sleeve. In a moment she was crawling up his arm.

Clyde shuddered.

She sat there, perched on the boy’s shoulder!

Roger looked up. Abruptly, his tears ceased falling. Gwen sat on her strange perch and gently patted his neck with one tiny hand.

Roger stared at her. He smiled.

“Blow your nose,” said Gwen. “You’re a sight!”

Roger blushed, fumbled in his pocket.

“Use your other hand,” the girl commanded. “You’re likely to shake me off.”

Roger obeyed without hesitation.

“There, that’s better,” she commented. “Now, young man, I’d like to have a talk with you. First of all, you’d better apologize for what you just did.”

Roger stared down at her. His brush. deepened. Then he looked away at the wall.

“All right,” he mumbled. “I’m sorry I tried to kill you. I guess I didn’t understand that you are human, too.”

Gwen shook her head.

“Don’t you know any better?” she chided. “You’re a pretty bright-looking boy, it seems to me. Hasn’t your mother ever told you not to do such things?"

Roger stared at the wall more intently than ever.

"I—I have no mother."

"Well, what about your father, then?"

"My father's dead, too. I'm an orphan."

Gwen frowned. "But that man who brought you to the toyshop—Simon Mallot. Isn't he your father?"

"No. He adopted me when I was a baby."

"When you were a baby?"

"Yes. After he killed my mother and father."

Roger's voice did not tremble or alter as he spoke the words. His tone was unemotional.

"Simon Mallot killed your parents?" There was horror enough in Gwen's voice.

"Yes. He was in love with my mother many years ago. She wouldn't marry him, because of his size. So after I was born, he killed her."

GWEN was silent, but only for a moment. To Clyde he seemed to be driving at something. She had taken psychological advantage of the boy, and now she was cleverly pressing that advantage. She sat there maternally, possessively—the eternal woman engaged in her eternal problem of mastering man.

"How did Mallot kill her?" asked Gwen.

Roger did not hesitate over an answer. The words came quickly.

"He did it with the dolls. He made dolls and baptized them and then drove pins into their hearts. He's promised to show me how, soon. He's a wizard, you know."

"I didn't know." Gwen was striving to keep calm.

"That's why he adopted me. He's going to make me his apprentice. He'll teach me all he has learned about sorcery. He says that since my appearance is normal, I can be a greater wizard than he is, if I'm properly trained."

The boy spoke as though becoming a sorcerer's apprentice was the most natural course in the world. Gwen tried to match his nonchalance.

"Do you like that idea?" he asked.

Roger frowned. "No—not exactly," he confessed. "There are some things he wants me to do that give me nightmares, and I won't do them.

"I like to play with my toys here, but he is always making me take lessons in his laboratory. And when he finally lets me play, he gives me toys I don't like. I won't keep them here."

"No?"

"There's a book he has . . . and the pictures in it move. They move like people, and they do strange things. It makes your head ache to watch them, but he wants me to study it.

"Then we play games, sometimes. Not with marbles or anything like that, but with little houses and boats and things made out of wax. And he makes me recite pieces in Latin. I get all crawly inside sometimes at the way they sound. When I say them right, the shadows change on the wall, and once I saw the wall's move.

"Next year he's going to take me to a meeting. They call it a coven, and I must meet someone there and sign a book in blood. Does it hurt when they prick your finger and take blood?

"I hope it doesn't. Because I don't want to go anyway. I wish he wouldn't make me do those things."

Gwen was white-faced, shaken. The picture she had formed from these childish revelations was ghastly in its implications.

"He won't let me play with other kids," said the boy. "He keeps me locked up here all the time. Once in a while, for a special treat, he lets me play with my regular really-and-truly toys in this room.

"I studied hard last month, so he promised to give me a present. Anything I wanted. And last night, in the toyshop, I asked for you. That's how I got you."

Clyde had approached Roger's feet. Now he spoke.

"How did you know that Simon Mallot could—give—us to you?" he asked.

"He can do anything," said the boy, gravely. "Much more than this. He's a sorceror. And I'll be one too." The boy sighed. "But I don't want to be, really. Besides, I'm afraid when I grow up I might get too big like he is, too."

"How did he get to be so big?" asked Gwenn.

"Just glandular abnormality, he says," the boys answered.

IT WAS fantastic to hear such words from the lips of a seven-year-old child. But then, the whole affair was unearthly.

"He's working on hormone extracts now," Roger confided. "That's how I knew he would be able to shrink you. When I asked to have Gwen for a doll, he knew what I meant. And he did it. Because that hormone formula is wonderful."

"Yes," said Clyde, eagerly. "Can you explain it a little more than that, Roger?"

"Well, I don't know. He started years ago, trying to experiment on something to use on himself—somethings that might bring him down to a normal size. Then he must have hit on something off the trail with his reduction formula. Because the drug he perfected overdoes the job. Things get very tiny if you aren't careful."

The boy spoke gravely, but Clyde hung on to every word.

"There are lots of specimens upstairs in his laboratory," Roger volunteered. "But I guess he's never used it on human beings until last night. I just begged him to give me Gwen for a toy, and he'd promised me, so he had to do it. But I'm sorry I tried to kill you," he concluded.

Clyde took over. "You should be," he scolded. "And what do you think it feels like to be two inches tall? How would you like it?"

Roger hung his head.

"We don't want to be this way all our lives," Gwen sighed. "How can we get out of this?"

"You two are in love with each other?" Roger's eyes sparkled. "Gee, it's like a story, isn't it? And you're trapped here and everything?"

"You needn't be so enthusiastic about it," observed Clyde, bitterly.

"But it's exciting. And maybe I can help you."

That was the opening Gwen was waiting for. "Yes," she said, quickly. "By all means. You could phone for the police——"

"No good!" Clyde interrupted. "If Simon Mallot found the boy phoning, he'd know. He'd hide us away and punish Roger. Besides, we've got to do something about our size."

"Yes," said the child, eagerly. "That's what I mean. I can find the antidote for you, perhaps."

"Antidote?" Clyde seized upon the word. "There is an antidote?"

"Yes. A sort of by-product or antitoxin you get when you distill the formula. He keeps a bottle of it in the laboratory."

"Could—could you get it for us, do you think?"

Roger's face clouded. "Maybe. I don't know."

"What do you mean? It's a matter of life or death."

"I know. But—honest, I'm afraid to go up there, though. It's a horrible place."

Gwen patted his shoulder.

"There, now. Don't be afraid. I'll come along with you."

Surprisingly enough, the suggestion did the trick. Roger beamed.

"Well, if you two will come along."

"Sure we will. It's safe, isn't it?" Clyde answered.

"Yes. He's asleep now, in the left wing. I can get the bottle. Just a few drops on the end of a pin will work, I think. But you'll come with me?"

"Right." Clyde took command. "Just slip us into your jacket now. Then head for those stairs. We're going to the laboratory."

CHAPTER VII
The Devil’s Toyshop

UP THE dark stairs, down the long hall, and through the outer chambers—Roger tiptoed cautiously into the weird world beyond the laboratory doors.

Gwen and Clyde clung to the edge of his jacket pocket and peered out into the realms of nightmare.

Here in the vast, sky-lighted room, science and sorcery had met and mated—to produce a hellish amalgam.

Gleaming white laboratory tables, modern as tomorrow, bore a host of ghastly objects straight from medieval myths.

Bell-jars filled with the root of fabled mandrake; trays of herbs and powdered distillates ground from the bones of animals and corpses; all the paraphernalia of mantic mummery was here.

Oh the shelves the black books mouldered, iron-hasped tomes with crumbling yellow pages illumined with Gothic lettering of another day. Clyde read exotic titles in Latin—De Vermis Mysteriis, and the unspeakable Necronomicon of Abdul Alhazred.

Glass cabinets guarded instruments and laboratory machines; a switchboard towered incongruously beside a mummy-case; a zodiacal chart lettered in Greek stood next to the latest model of an X-ray unit.

Bunsen burners and powdered bat’s blood, test tubes and the hearts of toads, hypodermic needles and corpse-fat candles—all in a gargantuan jumble before the eyes of Gwen and Clyde.

The room was filled with evidences of thaumaturgy. A blue chalk tracing of a pentagon still covered a part of the floor. A pile of smouldering incense fumed sullenly in a covered brazier near the further wall.

But all this was as nothing to the sights Roger pointed out.

The child, with his terrifying mixture of normal boyishness and hideous familiarity with forbidden things, wasted no time in directing the attention of his tiny guests to a strange spectacle.

A tier of glass cubicles stood along one of the big tables. At first glance they appeared to be a row of rectangular aquariums—but there was no water inside, and no fish.

Still, the glass prisons contained living forms.

“Look!” prompted Roger, moving closer. The two little humans gazed down at an incredible spectacle.

In one glass compartment, a rat padded ceaselessly to and fro, red eyes glaring through the transparent walls of its prison.

“Why, it’s the right size!” Gwen exclaimed. Suddenly a hand went to her mouth in a gesture of horrified realization.

For the rat was the right size in proportion to her present state. But in reality, the rat was a shrunken creature—a living rat the size of an ant!

In the next compartment a guinea pig squatted; a common laboratory guinea pig, no bigger than a human finger!

Beside it, on the left, was a tiny black object that mewed piteously and clawed at the glass as they approached.

“A black cat,” whispered Clyde. “A black cat the size of a baby mouse.”

“He injected them with the reduction formula,” Roger told the two. “These were his first successes. That cat is the mother of the black cat downstairs. At first, when it was just a kitten, it seemed to know what he had done and clawed and spit at him. Now the cat is grown and doesn’t remember. He calls it his ‘familiar’. He says all wizards have familiars.”

Gwen shuddered. “I don’t like it here,” she murmured. “Let’s get out.”

Clyde nudged the boy’s chest with a diminutive fist. “Yes,” he urged. “Where’s the antidote? Let’s get it and leave before he wakes up.”

“All right.” Roger moved quickly. The shrunken humans tumbled back into his pocket.

“Here,” he said, reaching into a cabinet set next to a microscope. “Here’s where he keeps the bottle.”

IS hand emerged grasping a vial of colorless fluid, stoppered by a cork.

H “The needles are on a tray,” he said. “I’ll take one and we’ll sneak back downstairs.”

“Good,” Clyde muttered. “Quickly, now!”

Roger moved quickly—then halted.

A sound rumbled from below.

A sound crashed through the corridor, to shatter the tiny eardrums of the imprisoned humans with the knell of death.

“He’s coming!” gasped the boy.

“Hide us!” Clyde commanded.

“But where?”

“Set us down on the table.”

Roger lifted them free. They landed on one of the big laboratory tables.

“Where shall we go?” Gwen panted.

Clyde gazed around, quickly calculating. He grasped her arm.

“Over here,” he beckoned. “Climb inside that skull.”

To their left the grisly object loomed—a yellowed skull, big as a house contrasted to their present size.

The great hollow eye-sockets stared their eternal eyeless stare. The grinning, fanged jaws leered their eternal mirthless leer.

“Through the jaw,” Clyde panted. “Hurry!”

Crawling inside a human skull—the journey was a nightmare. But it meant escape from a more hideous reality outside.

For Simon Mallot entered the room.

The giant wore black, and black was his frown, black the glitter in his piercing eyes as he recognized Roger’s presence in the room.

“What are you doing up here?” he demanded, scowling at the boy.

“Just playing,” Roger answered slowly, mastering with an effort the urge to tremble.

Clyde and Gwen, peering through the eye-sockets of the skull trembled freely.

“Playing, eh?” The tall man stared down at the little boy with a kindly smile.

“I thought you didn’t like it here in the laboratory,” he observed.

“I—I guess I’ve changed my mind.”

“That is gratifying news.” The wizard shook his gray-maned head. His unlined face was bland. “But tell me, Roger—how did you leave your little playmates downstairs?”

“Why, all right, I guess. I hung them back on the tree.”

“Are you sure?”

“Yes.”

“That’s odd.” Simon Mallot grinned. “You see, I’ve just been inspecting the Christmas tree. And they seem to have disappeared.”

“Really?” The boy’s self-possession was remarkable. He’d learned a lot from his monstrous teacher—but not enough.

For Simon Mallot’s grin broadened unpleasantly.

“You don’t seem to be very upset about their absence,” he purred. “Perhaps you don’t like them any more. Perhaps you’re tired of them.”

“No—no, I think they’re wonderful gifts. I want to keep them always.”

“And yet when I tell you they’ve disappeared, you show no surprise. Can it be, Roger, that you are not surprised? Can it be that you know where they are? Can it be that they are here—right now—in this room?”

SIMON MALLOT towered above the child, his great hands clenched.

“Of course not,” gasped the boy. “No——”

His hands fumbled nervously at his jacket. A bulge in the pocket caught the wizard’s eye.

One great paw darted forward convulsively. There was a ripping sound as the huge fingers tore away part of the jacket, pocket and all.

Simon Mallot held up the vial of reduction-antidote.

“This is not a plaything,” he murmured. “Why did you take it?”

Roger was silent.

The giant nodded. “Shall I tell you why?” he whispered. “I think I know. You have been talking to your toys. They have given you bad advice. They have corrupted you, Roger—corrupted you with stupid, human chatter. Isn't that true?"

The child did not answer.

"They asked you to steal this and restore them to normal size, didn't they?"

Still Roger kept silence.

"I'm disappointed in yon," observed Simon Mallot. "Haven't I trained you? Haven't I taught you to be calm, unemotional scientifically detached? They're stupid little pawns, filled with petty human desires, Roger. Not worth noticing. Fit only to be toys. That's what people are, Roger. Toys. Puppets.

"I've given you tiny ones to play with now. But as you grow older, I'll show you, how to play with humans without the necessity of reducing their size. I can turn the whole earth into a plaything for you, Roger.

"You have failed me, and I must teach you once again. But I'm willing to start over anew. I will put this vial away, you will tell me where your toys are hidden, and we'll just forget this little incident. Is it a bargain?"

The giant beamed benevolently.

And for the first time, the boy spoke.

"No!" said Roger. "No—I won't tell you! You'll kill them, that's what you'll do. I won't listen to you—you're a monster, an ogre——"

Simon Mallot laughed, but his eyes blazed.

"I see," he muttered. "Yes, I see. They have corrupted you, indeed. Already their stupid viewpoints have changed your childish outlook. Now I'm an ogre, am I? You're talking like a character in a fairy tale.

"Very well, Roger. You're not going to be of any use to me in the future. I can see that. My work has been wasted. And so—if your fairy tale imagery is to be carried out, I'm willing.

"From now on, I'm what you called me. An ogre. And you're just a little boy. A little boy in an ogre's castle. Remember your fairy tales, Roger. Do you know what ogres do to little boys?"

THE last words ended suddenly as the massive arms encircled the child's body. Roger screamed once, then subsided as Simon Mallot bore him to the table and began to strap him down efficiently with strips of gauze.

"I'm going to let you join your new friends," he whispered, bending close to the child's face. "You can go back into the miniature universe where petty humans belong, since you're not fit to be a titan, either physically or mentally. Maybe you'll learn something. At least," he chuckled, "at least, I can keep you under my thumb this way."

The giant turned from the bound boy. "Where's the needle?" he grumbled. "It should be next to the formula powder here, in the tray."

Clyde could have answered that question easily.

For midway in the conversation between the tall man and the child, Clyde slipped carefully through the left eye-socket of his hiding place and tiptoed cautiously along the table. He moved from beaker to retort unobserved, until at least he reached the spot where the jar of yellowish powder lay—the jar Roger had pointed out as containing the reduction formula.

"Only a few grains of the powder on the end of a needle," Clyde remembered.

And there, in the glass tray, was a needle.

As the wizard bound the boy, Clyde tugged the needle free. In his arms it was a heavy four-foot spear. But he raised it, drove the point into the yellowish powder until a few granules clung to the end.

Then he was ready. He staggered under the burden of the heavy needle as he made his way from behind one object to another. Gwen watched his progress with fascinated horror, but Simon Mallot did not see him.

Closer and closer he came—stealing along to the edge of the table.

Now Mallot turned and groped in the tray for his tiny needle.

"Where is the cursed thing?" he growled.

Clyde, poised behind a retort on the edge of the table, stared up, up to the incalculable height where the wizard's pale white face loomed and leered.

The great globed eyes burned down. The red lips writhed. And a groping finger swept along the table.

Clyde braced himself, held the needle pointed out, and then he ran. His running plunge carried him toward the wizard's white, spatulate finger.

Clyde charged with his spear—and then Simon Mallot saw, stared down at the incredibly tiny figure racing towards his hand with outthrust needle.

"So!" he roared.

His hand swept forward, a wall of flesh to sweep Clyde's puny body into oblivion.

But Clyde didn't falter. He held the needle up, felt it strike home as the hand came down. Then the white and bony horror of the hand closed over him, to smother and crush, and Clyde's world fell away. . . .

CHAPTER VIII

Reductio Ad Absurdum

"CLYDE! Wake up, darling!"

Gwen's voice came somewhere through the mists. Clyde tried to locate it. He succeeded, with an effort, and blinked his way to consciousness. Clyde looked up at Gwen, who pillowed his head in her lap as she bent over him on the table's edge.

"Are you all right?" the girl murmured.

"Guess so." Clyde sat up and rubbed his aching shoulder. Abruptly he stiffened, pushed her away.

"Mallot!" he snapped. "Where is he?"

"Down there."

Gwen's tiny finger indicated the floor far below.

"You jabbed him with the needle," she said. "He tried to knock you off the table, but the drug took hold. He begin to shrink immediately."

Clyde peered over the table edge. On the floor, far below, lay a tangled heap of clothing. Mallot's garments. Lying across the bottom of Mallot's robe lay a tiny white figure, scarcely three inches long. It represented all that remained of the giant’s seven-foot bulk.

“He’s still unconscious,” Gwen said.

“Good. Now, our first job is to get Roger free.”

Clyde rose and began walking across the table. Gwen followed. Roger lay strapped to another table a few feet away—but a shelf stretched in a natural bridge between.

“Roger, are you all right?” called the redheaded man.

“Yes—but get me loose,” said the boy, through trembling lips. “Quick, before he wakes up.”

“He can’t harm you,” Gwen reminded the child. “After all, he’s only three inches tall. Just a little bigger than we are.”

The crossed along the shelf and soon descended to the table beside Roger’s bound body. Clyde had lugged a needle with him.

“You—you aren’t going to inject anything into me?” the boy asked.

“Certainly not; But this may help to pry away the knots. He’s got the gauze around you pretty tightly.”

Indeed, Roger’s body was swathed in cloth ropes, and the knots would tax the ingenuity of any number of two-inch high Boy Scouts.

Nevertheless, Clyde and Gwen set to work, tugging away at the recalcitrant cloth, shredding bit by bit with the needle. It was a laborious task. They had scarcely managed to sever a single strand in a full fifteen minutes of effort.

“Maybe we’d better get the growth formula first,” Clyde sighed. “He left the bottle of antitoxin on the table over there, I think. If we could use that and regain our normal size once more, the rest would be easy.”

It was a good idea—but Clyde wasn’t the only one who thought so. For at that moment, Gwen tugged frantically at his arm.

“Look!” she gasped. “He’s come to!”

SIMON MALLOT had indeed recovered consciousness. Clyde turned to stare at the tiny figure—a little whiteskinned mouse, cautiously clambering up the rungs of a chair. Mallot was climbing to the table top where the antidote rested. Even as they stared, he gained the seat of the chair, ran swiftly across it, and started to crawl up the wicker back, hand over hand. In just a minute or so he would reach the vial of the precious fluid, and then——

“No you don’t!” Clyde shouted.

Turning, he headed back-across the shelf-bridge to the other table. He bore the heavy needle as a weapon. Gwen followed more cautiously.

Clyde clattered down the shelf, overturning a jar that stood in the path of his flying feet.

He reached the table-top—and so did the wizard.

Simon Mallot’s shrunken visage had lost none of its malignancy. The powerful body of the sorcerer still towered—comparatively—over Clyde’s frame.

With swift strides, the miniature giant made for the vital vial.

Levelling his needle as a spear, Clyde bore down upon him.

Mallot looked up and scowled his dismay. He backed away from the small bottle.

Clyde pursued him. If he could pin that tiny monster to the table, destroy the evil that animated him——

Mallot scurried away. Clyde gained on him, poised for the throat.

And then Mallot spun to his left, caromed against a small glass beaker.

The beaker swayed, tipped, and suddenly fell forward. Directly in Clyde’s path a stream of bubbling acid poured forth, smoking and hissing as it churned towards his ankles.

Clyde swerved to one side as the deadly stream sizzled its way across the table-top.

Mallot had stopped ahead of him—stopped and stooped. He had picked up a needle of his own from a tray, and now he brandished it above his head.

A needle in Clyde's hands was a spear. Mallot, a larger figure, could use it as a sword.

And use it he did. With a roar he charged down upon the young man.

It was Clyde's turn to back away—back and parry the deadly thrusts of the glittering blade. The giant was a fencer, and he flourished the needle with fatal precision.

Clyde retreated, bringing his needle up and down to take the blows of Mallot's weapon. But Mallot stabbed and struck. The needle whistled past Clyde's left ear, then whizzed under his armpit.

And as he went back, Clyde's feet struck a solid base. Something hot and hissing roared behind him. Parrying desperately, he turned.

Mallot was forcing him—forcing him back against the glowing blue flame of a Bunsen burner!

The wizard laughed and his sword-blade swirled down. Clyde ducked. He tried to dodge around the flame, but Mallot pressed his advantage. The needle flitked out, inexorable, relentless.

Suddenly Mallot raised his weapon and brought it down. Clyde felt the impact of the blow shiver against his own needle. And then it fell from his grasp, and rolled to one side.

He was weaponless!

MALLOT bounded in for the kill.

Clyde crouched against the base of the Bunsen burner, felt the searing flame just above his neck. He dodged, ran around to the further edge of the table. A portable sink unit was beyond. He hurtled across a chasm fully five inches in extent and landed on the sink.

But the wizard was at his heels. He jumped, brandishing his needle.

Clyde turned, ran along the moist sink, and then slipped.

Too late, he realized his error when he saw what loomed before him in the sink. Too late to move, he heard the roar of mighty waters.

A waterfall cascaded across his path.

Mallot thundered behind him. His blade swept out in an arc of shining death.

Clyde jumped, jumped straight at the waterfall.

And went down under the thundering avalanche, down to the bottom of the sink, gasping and drowning—drowning in the flow from a turned-on water faucet!

Mallet's laugh rose in his ears, and then Clyde went under. The white wall of water enveloped him. He gulped, choked, felt his lungs burn and fill. He rose, fighting for breath. The water churned around him. His hands gasped at a non-existent hold.

Clyde went down again. The water at the bottom of the sink swirled fiercely, carrying him in its circling eddy until he felt himself battered and scraped against the bottom of the porcelain.

He rose to his knees, groping his way from under the direct impact of the faucet flow above. For a moment he stood there, then fell again.

Once more he gained his feet, and this time he managed to blunder blindly to one side.

He stood in water up to his waist, but he was dear of the main stream. He looked up, expecting to see Mallot waiting with poised blade.

The wizard was gone!

Clyde wasted no time. His arms went up, clawing for a hold against the top of the shallow sink. He found it, lifted himself, hung for a straining instant, and pulled himself over the rounded rim.

He lay panting on top of the sink for a moment, utterly exhausted.

When he looked up once more, he was revivified with a thrill of horror.

SIMON Mallot stood on the adjacent table top. Gwen crouched at his feet. The wizard's sword's sword was menacing, forcing her back—back into the gaping mouth of an empty test-tube that lay on its side!

Even as Clyde watched, the girl was lowering her body and wriggling backwards into the tube. Mallot was forcing her with the sword, grinning in hellish anticipation.

Gwen's body, oddly elongated through the glass walls of the test tube, now lay inside the round glass. Mallot turned, stooped.

Clyde realized what he was doing. He was going to roll the test-tube over the edge of the table!

Gwen, dropped to the floor below—the glass prison shattering about her ——

The tube rolled. And Clyde darted forward. Again he hurtled the chasm between sink and table, tie paused only long enough to retrieve his needle weapon.

Then, with a shout, he bore down upon the wizard from the rear.

Mallot looked up, wheeled. Abruptly he halted. The tube rocked on the table edge, rested there.

Mallot looked at his own needle, resting at his feet. There was no time to pick it up. Clyde was almost upon him. And now the pursuer became the pursued as Mallot ran back along the table towards the vial of antidote.

What did he intend to do—make a last stand beside the bottle? Clyde followed, puzzled by the action.

But Mallot halted only for an instant. He stooped and grasped something in his hand, then ran forward once more to the edge of the table and clambered down the back of the chair towards the floor below.

Clyde didn't hesitate. He meant to follow—but what about his needle? It was too heavy to carry. For an instant he pondered. Then he dropped it over the edge to the floor below.

Perhaps Mallot would reach it first—but he had to take that chance.

Clyde reached the chair, crawled down the back. Mallot was below him. Clyde almost slid part-way, in a desperate attempt to narrow the distance between himself and the wizard.

But Clyde was still on the lower rungs as Mallot reached the floor. And then, from his perch, Clyde saw what it was the tiny giant had stooped to pick up.

It was a thread—a simple length of white thread. Simon Mallot held it in in his hand, and Clyde saw that the skein rose above his head. The other end was attached to something on top of the table.

What was it?

The answer came. Mallot tugged on the end of the white thread. And from above, with a hurtling crash, dropped—the bottle containing the growth reduction antidote!

It dropped past Clyde's head and fell with a shattering thump.

But it did not break.

Mallot looked up at his enemy as Clyde clung to the rung of the chair. Then he grinned. Carefully he stooped and untied the thread from around the vial.

Clyde panted as he turned to continue his descent. He had to reach the floor and find the needle before Simon Mallot realized one was there.

He knew Mallot had another scheme, but he didn't dare stop to gaze. A few more movements and he'd reach the floor. He climbed on——

Then it happened.

The white noose coiled out, sailed in an arc around Clyde's shining head, and dropped in a hangman's knot around his neck.

CLYDE'S hands rose to tear at the rope—for that was what the thread amounted to.

As he released his hold, he fell. And the rope tightened, the wizard tugged, Clyde felt the red haze rise around him as he gasped for breath.

Floundering helplessly, Clyde saw Simon Mallot run towards him with a grin of evil triumphant. In one brawny hand he held the glittering needle. The wizard had found it, then!

This was the end. Bruised, battered, a strangling victim of the sorcerer's cunning, Clyde stared up at the descending point of the needle.

Simon Mallot's white face loomed. The eyes flamed, the red lips parted. And the silver death slashed towards Clyde's breast.

The growl rose with startling swiftness. The deep, purring moan of menace caused both wizard and victim to turn their heads.

It was the black cat. It had slipped into the room quite stealthily—but stealth turned to lightning speed.

All in an instant Mallot turned, stared at the great black body before him, then shrieked and tried to dodge.

But the razored claw raked out, the sleek head bent forward.

One dreadful, gurgling scream—one indescribable gulping sound—and then the black beast was slinking from the room.

Clyde stared, then looked away. A tiny leg dangled limply from the black cat's jaws . . . like the paw of a white mouse . . .

CHAPTER IX

A Sizeable Problem

THE noose was gone from Clyde's neck. Gwen, shaken but smiling, had joined him on the floor. Now, together again, they tugged at the end of the needle. Its point was imbedded in the cork stopper of the vial.

"Once more," Clyde urged. "We'll yank it out."

They did. The cork gave, and the precious fluid flowed across the floor. Swiftly Clyde loosened the needle.

"Wonderful thing," he commented grimly. "A weapon, then a corkscrew, and now a hypodermic needle."

"Clyde." Gwen's eyes clouded.

"Yes, darting?"

"Aren't you afraid to use that stuff? After all, you don't know if it will work—and the needle is so big——"

Clyde smiled and shrugged.

"What else can I do?" he said. "It's a chance I must take." He dipped the needle point in the pool of fluid on the floor.

"Oh, Clyde!"

She ran to him then, and they clung together—two grotesque tiny little figures, ragged and bruised and infinitesimal.

But there was reality in their embrace—perhaps the last reality in a fantastic world.

"All right, darling," Clyde whispered. He stepped back. One hand held the needle forward, tipped the point in. He placed his arm against the point, forced it down. The point was wet.

A trickle of crimson—a groan——

Clyde fell. But even as he fell, he felt himself shoot upwards.

This time there was no drowning sensation; only a surprising feeling of expansion. It was as though he flew upwards instead of dropping—as though he soared to meet the room about him.

And then he was standing on his feet once more, standing and leaning against the laboratory table.

But he was alive again—alive, and fully-grown to his natural size!

The rest was easy.

The requirements of modesty were easily fulfilled with the aid of the wizard's discarded garments. And then Clyde was cradling the tiny figure of Gwen between his fingers, pressing the needle gently home.

Within a few moments a normal girl lay in his arms.

There was another embrace. An embrace, this time, of joyous reunion in a properly proportioned world.

"Hey—what about me?"

Clyde whirled.

"It's Roger!" he grinned. "We almost forgot about him."

Stepping to the table, Clyde untied the child. The gauze knots were no problem to his fingers now.

"Thanks," said the boy.

"Save it," Clyde advised. "Let's get our things and get out of here. Gwen, slip on Mallot's robe. My own clothes must be downstairs."

"What about the butler?" Gwen asked.

“Mallot sent him out for the day,” Roger informed her. “After all, it’s Christmas.”

“So it is,” Clyde grinned. “Though I’d hardly say we’ve had much of a holiday.”

HE TURNED and guided Gwen out of the laboratory. Roger lingered behind the doors for a moment, then joined them on the stairway.

In the hall, Clyde dressed once more. Gwen wrapped the robe around her, a smile on her doll-like cheeks. Suddenly her pert nose wrinkled.

“Don’t I smell smoke?” she asked.

Roger nodded. “Yes,” he whispered. “I—I started a fire in the laboratory upstairs. Such things should be destroyed.”

Clyde looked at the boy, but there was wisdom beyond youth in his eyes.

He nodded. “Yes,” he agreed. “Perhaps it’s for the best.”

He bent his red head down as Gwen whispered in his ear. The girl pointed at Roger and smiled.

“What are you whispering about?” the boy demanded.

Clyde smiled. “Nothing much,” he declared. “It’s just that we’re going to be married, and Gwen suggested that she’d like to adopt you as our boy.”

Roger glowed and shuffled his feet. “Good enough,” he agreed, as they left the house.

Gwen sighed. “Of course it’s going to be an awful job to change some of those weird ideas Mallot has given you. But we’ll bring you up properly.”

“Bet we will,” said Clyde grimly. He grasped Roger’s arm grimly. “The first step in your education starts now,” he told the boy. He glanced at the smoke pouring from the roof of the house behind them.

“I’ll have to teach you not to play with matches,” he muttered.

“What are you going to do?” Gwen cried.

Clyde grinned as he slowly bent the boy forward in an ageless gesture. “Nothing at all,” he said. “Nothing at all. I’m just going to give the kid a good, old fashioned spanking!”

Lefty Feep Does TIme

The wrong answer sent Lefty into the future. The right questions got him out . . .

"WHAT do you want to take me here for?" asked Bill. "I thought you were my friend. But when I come to town you immediately try to steer me into the most awful-looking restaurant I've ever seen. I'll bet the food is terrible!"

I smiled at Bill. "I'm not taking you to Jack's Shack for the food," I told him, as we entered the place.

"Then what?" Bill persisted.

"There's a party here I'd like to have you meet," I explained. "I think you'll be interested."

"Who is he?"

"His name is Lefty Feep. And he tells some of the damndest yarns you've ever heard in your life. He's just an innocent bystander at life's little accidents—but to hear him talk, he has more adventures than Baron Munchausen."

"You mean he's a professional liar?" Bill asked me.

I shrugged. "I wouldn't call him that. In fact, I wouldn't know exactly how to describe him. Lefty Feep is—well, I'll introduce you now and you can judge for yourself."

I took Bill by the arm and steered him over to a table. Lefty Feep sat there, nonchalantly trimming his fingernails with a butter-knife. As he saw us approach, Mr. Feep waved and beckoned. There was a genial smile on his usually melancholy face.

"Hello," he called. "Accept my greeting at this meeting and what are you eating?"

I introduced Bill, we sat down, and gave our orders to the waiter. Bill shielded his eyes, and I didn't blame him.

Lefty Feep, in addition to his dazzling smile, was wearing a blinding costume. A sort of super-zoot suit with bolder shoulders, and trousers that were wowsers. The whole garment was done in a sort of subdued scarlet with yellow stripes. A purple shirt and orange-and-green necktie added to the general effect—which was nauseating.

I sympathized with Bill. His eyes hurt him now, and I knew that in a few minutes his ears would hurt him as Lefty Feep pulled another one of his stories.

Sure enough, the tall teller of taller tales cleared his throat for action.

"Lucky you contrive to arrive," he told us. "It so happens I have a terrific adventure yesterday about which I have things to say."

I nudged Bill. "But Lefty," I objected. "Are you sure it was yesterday this adventure took place? I saw you, yesterday, all day."

Feep never blinked. "Yesterday," he insisted. "And I am away all day."

"But I saw you!" I insisted.

"What you see is me to a degree," said Feep. "But while I am here I am also somewhere else. Only that is another time."

I perked up my ears and poked Bill. "Bill," I said. "This ought to be a problem for you. After all, you're a writer of science-fiction."

That did it. Feep crouched over the table, eyes bulging.

"You write science-fiction?" he gasped. "Then indeed I must ask you to heed as I proceed. Because I got a truth that's stranger than science-fiction. Listen——"

"Make it short," I interrupted. "Bill and I haven't got much time."

“That’s what happens to me,” declared Lefty Feep. “Boy, what a time I don’t have yesterday!”

Feep opened his mouth. We opened our ears . . .

WHENEVER I am on the beach I go to see Skeetch and Meetch. Sylvester Skeetch and Mordecai Meetch are two giants of science who run the HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE—a laboratory where they conduct experiments on the stuff in various things. You see, when I am broke I often go up there and they give me a chance to put dough in my pants by helping them with their experiments.

That’s the way it is yesterday. I am very broke because my ex-wives are pulling some phoney baloney about alimony, so I feel moany and groany and being definitely broke but stoney, I root and toot over to the HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE.

Sylvester Skeetch and Mordecai Meetch are sitting in the gloom of a big room. But their two fat little faces go through the paces when I march in. They smile and exchange looks—which is no bargain for either of them.

“Lefty Feep!” exclaims Skeetch. “Just the personality we wish to see!”

“What brings you here at this propitious moment?” asks Meetch. “Hunger,” I explain.

Fat little Skeetch and Meetch shake hands with me and lead me to a chair. I sit and stare at the blank walls of the laboratory with a look to match.

“Why are you glad to see me?” I ask. “And where is all your scientific apparatus?”

“Come with me,” says Mordecai Meetch. “I will explain.”

Skeetch and Meetch lead me down a hallway into a large white-tiled room which looks as though it should have a GENTS sign on the door.

This room is also bare, but there is a large object, very big for its massive size, right smack in the middle of the floor. It is covered by a black curtain, and also by my curious glance.

Suddenly, from around in back of the covered object steps a new personality.

He is wearing a white coat like Skeetch and Meetch, and he sports the same kind of thick goggles. He could pass as a double of theirs, or a triple.

"Lefty," says Skeetch, waving a fat finger at the stranger, "I would like to introduce our new scientific associate. Meet Cosmo Creetch."

Cosmo Creetch puts out his hand and makes with the shakes.

"Pleased to meet you," he mumbles. "Any colleague is always welcome. You have scientific standing?"

"I take mine sitting down," I answer.

"But," he persists, "are you interested in physics?"

"No," I tell him. "I just drink a glass of warm water every morning."

"You don't understand," Creetch murmurs. "I don't mean that kind of physics. This deals with higher figures."

"Speaking of higher figures, I meet a tall blonde once——"

"No!" sighs Creetch. "Not that. We are discussing mathematics."

"Well, I might be interested in mathematics," I confess. "You see, I owe a lot of dough."

"Then you're just the man I'm looking for. Perhaps you can earn some money by helping me do this."

I cheer up. "Watch me holler for a dollar," I tell him. "What can I do for you?"

"First let me ask you a question," says Cosmo Creetch. "Do you know what a Time Machine is?"

"Yeah. An alarm clock."

"No!" Creetch scowls. "Here, I'll show you." He walks over and pulls the cloth off the big object in the center of the room.

I STARE at a big steel cylinder, covered with metal bumps and shaped like an overgrown cucumber. There is a door at one end and Creetch pushes me over to the entrance.

"Step inside," he invites. I look in at a bare room inside the cylinder. It resembles a cell for solitary confinement.

"Looks like a jail," I comment. "You mean a guy should be put in here when he does time?"

"You don't do time, you pass through it," Creetch explains.

"Pass through it?"

"Of course. This is a vehicle. It can be steered ultrasiderally," he tells me. "Observe the panel board."

He points to one wall, covered with switches and dials. The dials are numbered, and there are little slide inserts under them. "Months" and "Days" and "Years" and Centuries" and even one that says "Eons". There is also a calendar built right into the steel wall. Under each slide is a dial and a switch.

"It's very simple," Creetch insists. "You turn the dial to any year, month or day you desire and you can travel backwards in time."

I shake my head. "Travel backwards in time? I don't see any future in it."

"Why it's got a great future! You can travel into the future any time you want and to any time you want," Creetch tells me. "Here is the future feature fixture."

He indicates another blob of knobs. "Understand," he confides. "This machine operates on a very logical basis—a mere process of molecular acceleration, synchronized so as not to disturb the normal metabolic process of the human body inside, which is protected by the insulation of the machine itself. This molecular acceleration will carry you forward through the spacetime continuum and you will emerge undamaged at the precise point indicated by rhomboidicality as governed by the process."

"Sure, sure," I answer. "Why bother with such childish details? I figure it out the minute I see it. Why don't you buy yourself a zoot straitjacket and forget it?"

Creetch gets mad. "I'm not deceiving you, Mr. Feep!" he snaps. "This machine will take a human being forward in time. All we need to prove it is to get the services of a human being. And if that's impossible—well, maybe we can use you."

"Yes," adds Skeetch. "We want you to try out this Time Machine."

"Nobody is taking me for a ride!"

I yell.

"Of course not," says Skeetch. "You'll go alone."

"I refuse to be two-timed!"

"For $100?" purrs Cosmo Creetch. That changes my mind. The way I am sitting financially, I will take a climb into time for a dime.

"How about right now?" Creetch urges. "Just take a blast into the past. I'll set the sight for about a hundred years back."

I FOLLOW him into the hollow of the machine. He shows me the two types of dials—foresight and hindsight—and explains what I am to do. Merely turn on the machine, which will transport me through time in a juicy jiffy. Then get out and grab something to bring back—proving I make the trip. That is all there is to it. He tells me how to operate the crate so there will be no slip on a return trip.

"Set the dial for a trial," he advises me.

I study the switches to avoid hitches.

"You know, the past does not appeal to me," I confess. "How about peering into the future?"

"You're steering, so do your own peering," Creetch agrees. "Just set a course to suit yourself."

I fiddle with the dials and turn the "Years" and "Months" and "Days" knobs.

"There!" I exclaim. "Exactly five hundred years! February 29th, 2544. Leap year—it works out."

"Give it a workout, then," Creetch tells me. "Here's your $100. Let me get out of here, turn that master-switch, and bon voyage!"

He leaves. I shut the big silver door.

I am all alone in the steer cylinder. I go up to the panel and reach for the master-switch.

I pull it. There is a hell of a howl and five hundred years blast past my ears. I fall to the floor as I feel the machine churning and turning. My stomach matches it.

Then, all at once, the machine seems to land with a bump, and my stomach settles back into place with a thump.

Everything is a riot of quiet.

I make a score with the steel door. I open it slowly and stick my noggin outside. And I do mean outside!

Because I am not in the HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE any more.

MY TIME Machine lands me in a deserted street. All around me are huge skyscrapers and a lot of planes cutting capers. But the buildings are taller and the planes are smaller. I nearly break my neck trying to see the top of these edifices, and I shiver as I watch a lot of wingless little planes dart in and out of the buildings above.

Then I realize that the street is deserted because everybody is flying. Most people’s affairs seem to be conducted on a very high level these days.

Sure as I’m alive, this is 2544, or I miss my score!

I take a few steps away from the Time Machine and gander at the building nearest at hand. There are a couple of stores on this ground floor and I notice a sign—“DAN DRUFF’S BARBER SHOP.”

As I stare, the door of the barber shop opens and out steps the shape of an ape!

I blink as this big furry gorilla strolls out and down the street. What kind of monkey business goes on here?

The ape shape approaches me and I try to hide in the shadow of the Time Machine. But it spots me and comes closer. I see its slavering jaws, its great brawny arms. I shudder and cringe. The ape seems to growl. I retreat. The ape lowers its head. Its hideous mouth opens. In a moment it will charge and——

"Pardon me, buddy," lisps the gorilla. "You got a match?"

I nearly elapse into a collapse.

"A talking ape?" I yell. "What goes on here?"

The ape shrugs. "Sure, why not?" asks this simple-minded simian.

"But apes can't talk!" I object.

"Who says they can't talk?" snaps the ape. "Don't you ever read THE HOWLING BABOON COMES BACK? Apes talk in that story. So do I!"

He reaches for a match I hold out and pulls a cigarette from behind one furry ear.

"You smoke?" I gasp.

"Of course. Nothing like a smoke when you climb out of a barber chair. I just step in there to get my fur singed."

I shake my head. "How can it be possible?" I mutter. "A talking ape. Why?"

"Why?" echoes the ape. "I talk because I have a human brain in an ape's body. My name is Andy the Anthropoid."

"Human brain in an ape's body?" This begins to sound like a vaudeville routine, but I am really curious now. "Who would do such a trick?"

"Why the Mad Scientist, of course! He makes me—he makes everybody these days, in his laboratory. He just looks into one of the books of wisdom and then experiments."

I look at Andy the Anthropoid in some astonishment. "What books of wisdom?" I inquire.

"Don't tell me you never hear of books of wisdom," sighs the talking ape. "You must be a stranger."

"I am a stranger and I feel stranger and stranger," I tell my furry friend. "But what are the books of wisdom?"

"I never see any, understand," says Andy the Anthropoid, lowering his voice and looking over his shoulder to be sure we are alone. "Nobody ever does, except the Mad Scientist. He locks them up in his laboratory and it is forbidden to discuss them. But I hear rumors, of course.

"In the old days the books of wisdom are called 'mackascenes,' or something."

"You mean 'magazines' ?" I suggest.

"That's it. Magazines. Science-fiction magazines, in the ancient past. I remember I even hear some of the titles of the forbidden volumes. There is Superdooper Science. And Gory Stories. And Flabbergasting Tales And Staggering Imagination, and Impossible Adventures."

I shake my head. "Never hear of them," I confess.

"Can it be possible that there is anyone alive in 2544 who never knows of the books of wisdom?" he demands.

"Can be," I admit. "If this is really 2544."

"Are you crazy?" asks the ape.

"No. Just a stranger. I'd like some kind of proof of where I am and when this is."

"Well, it's 2544, all right," Andy the Anthropoid insists. "Wait—I'll get a paper and show you the date to prove it."

HE STEPS over to a lamp post. I wonder what he is going to do, because there is no paper-box attached to it.

But he merely presses a button set in the post and comes back.

"Where's the paper?" I ask.

"Be patient," he tells me. "We want the latest edition, don't we?"

He squints up at the sky. "Here it comes," he yells. "Stand back."

Out of the air whizzes a little silver cone. It looks like a miniature rocket, landing at our feet. Andy the Anthropoid picks it up and opens one end. Out drops a folded newspaper.

"See the date?" he says. "2544, all right."

So it is. But I pay no attention. My eye happens to light on the advertising columns—the want ads.

I read a few items at random.

"Space Suits For Sale—With two pairs of pants."

"Ray Guns and Atomic Blasters from private collection of an ex-rocketeer."

"Used Space Ship, late 2543 model, in good condition. Only 5,000,000,000,000,ooo miles on it. With two spare fliers."

"Sale—Green Cheese, direct from the moon."

I gasp for air, also for information. "Is it all true?" I ask the garrulous gorilla. "Are all these things really existing? These inventions?"

"Of course," sniffs Andy the Anthropoid. "They all come from hints in the books of wisdom. But here's a fellow now who can tell you all about it," he says, pointing down the street.

I look for the fellow, but I don't see anyone.

Until I spot it—gleaming in the sun. Then I nearly fall down. The hinge slips on my jaw, I am so astonished.

Walking towards me is a hunk of animated junk. A piece of live metal in fine fettle, with a tin grin and a shining body. A living mechanical man, so help me!

Andy the Anthropoid introduces us. "I want you to meet Adam Clink, the robot," he tells me. "What is your name, sir?"

"Mud!" I reply. "No—my name is Lefty Feep."

"Lefty Feep? A pleasure I treasure," squeaks the robot in a tinny voice. He grabs my hand and it makes a perfect fit in his steel mitt. I look at his skinny steel frame and shudder.

"I suppose the Mad Scientist dreams you up, too?" I ask.

"Of course," says Adam Clink. "Straight from Impossible Adventures. A direct steal in steel."

"I am trying to explain such matters to Mr. Feep," chimes in Andy the Anthropoid. "Perhaps you can give him a short history. He seems to be a stranger and he doesn't even know what happens here on earth."

"Yes, what on earth happens?" I ask.

ADAM Clink turns his shining face and gleaming smile towards me. Then he begins to deliver a lecture on history.

To condense it for the dense, here is the way things happen in the past couple hundred of years.

It seems that war is the original score. A big war that wipes out almost everything—buildings and people both. When. the shooting stops it is for a simple enough reason—there is nothing left to shoot at and darn few people left to pull the triggers, anyway.

So many buildings are gone that there are no longer any laboratories or factories or stores or offices or libraries. Nearly all the knowledge and science in the world is blown away.

After peace gets under way, the survivors take a look around and try to rebuild the world. But there is very little left to go by, and the war continues so long that no one is left who remembers how things are run in the old days.

In a word, the world starts from scratch all over again.

Or almost from scratch. Because, digging around in the ruins, somebody runs across a stack of the books of wisdom.

A screwy coincidence, that's all it is—but the science-fiction magazine library of a fan name of Orville Fuzz is all they find left in the matter of printed matter.

Of course there are doctors and engineers and professors left who can remember various facts and figures, but when they get to talking, they decide something like this:

"The world is always on the wrong track, somehow. Maybe we better listen to some of the prophecies and forecasts of the future in this science-fiction stuff. Let us rebuild the world according to such ideas and see what happens. At least, it is worth trying."

Which is just what they do. Using science-fiction stories for models, they set to work. At first they do not get very far. And then the Mad Scientist comes on the scene, just a few years ago, and he changes everything.

That's what Adam Clink tells me, anyhow.

"Ever since the Mad Scientist takes control we do all right," he tells me confidentially.

"How come he is put in charge?" I ask.

"Why don't you know what the books of wisdom say?" Adam Clink comes back. "The stories about the future almost always have a Mad Scientist in them. So it is only natural that we allow such a personality to rule. He does all right, too.

"Of course, the first thing he does is hide all the books of wisdom in his laboratory. No one else ever sees or reads those science-fiction tales any more. They are his property. He reads them and then invents things they suggest. Like me, for example."

"He invents you?"

"Yes, and a whole race of robots. We do the work in the new world."

"And in his spare time he turns out rocket ships and space suits and skyscrapers and planes and little things like Andy the Anthropoid, here?" I persist.

"Right." Adam Clink stares at me. "Say, you are pretty uninformed," he tells me. "Who are you and where do you come from?"

"But I tell you, I'm Lefty Feep," I stall.

"But where do you come from?" insists the robot. "And what is that contraption over there?"

I give up trying to conceal the deal. "I come from 1944," I announce. "And I arrive in a Time Machine."

ADAM Clink rattles all over in excitement.

"A visitor from the past!" he squeaks. "In a real Time Machine?"

This surprises me. "I always figure those science-fiction stories are full of Time Machines," I say. "Don't tell me you haven't got any."

"We have, once," Andy the Anthropoid growls. "But the Mad Scientist won't let us use them. He doesn't want anyone to escape into the past or future because he is afraid they will get their tenses mixed. So he gets rid of all of them."

"How does he do that?"

"Oh, he seals them up in a time capsule," the ape explains. "But say—you'll have to come and meet the Mad Scientist," he tells me. "He will want to talk to such an unusual visitor."

This does not appeal to me. Visiting a crazy guy who hates Time Machines 500 years in the future is not exactly my idea of a way to spend the day.

But Adam Clink's iron hand grabs my shoulder, and Andy the Anthropoid drapes his ape shape across my back, so off we go.

We walk down the street and turn the corner.

"Better take a cab," suggests the ape. Adam Clink nods his metal head. He pulls a little gadget from a belt around his waist and paints it up in the air. A streak of flame shoots out.

From above darts a gleaming, wingless plane. It swoops straight for our heads, but makes a perfect landing only a few feet away.

"Atomic generation," whispers Adam Clink.

We walk over and the driver sticks his head out. "Where to, gents?" he pipes. "Venus—Mercury—the Bronx?"

I roll my retinas at him—because when I say the driver sticks his head out, I mean he really sticks it out. About five feet.

He has a neck like a rubber band, and I rubber at it. On top of the neck is a face I don't want to face. Something like a balloon with teeth. I goggle at this gargoyle.

Adam Clink and the ape notice it as we get in the cab.

"What's the matter, does the sight of a stratotaxicab upset you?" asks Clink.

"No, it's the sight driving it that upsets me," I answer.

"Him?" growls Andy the Anthropoid. "Why, that's just a man from Mars."

"Mars?"

“Sure. A man from Mars—like the ones in the books of wisdom.”

The driver hears us and turns his long neck around.

“The books of wisdom are foolish!” he declares.

I expect my companions will object to such a statement, but they don’t.

“These Martians are always criticizing,” explains Adam Clink. “They do it in all the stories. Pay no attention.”

The driver hears this. “What do you mean, pay no attention?” he yells. “Just like you robots. Got no emotion, no feeling. Oo-yay are an ump-chay.”

“Must be speaking in his strange Martian tongue,” mumbles the ape.

“I can speak better English than you can, you simian simpleton!” yaps our driver. “My name is Martin the Martian.”

“Pleased to meet you,” I reply politely.

“I don’t blame you,” answers Martin the Martian. “Now, where do you want to go?”

“Take us to the Great Laboratory,” directs Adam Clink.

“Aw, what do you want to go there for?” objects Martin the Martian. “Why don’t you go where you can have some fun?”

“Always criticizing,” grumbles Adam Clink to me. Then he raises his voice to the Martian driver. “Pull in your neck and take us to the Great Laboratory at once,” he orders.

OFF we go in a cloud—or into a cloud. Because the stratotaxicab suddenly soars straight up into the air. I cling to the strap in the back seat and look down at the map at the back street.

And in a split second we are down and out again. This time we land on the roof of a skyscraper. Martin the Martian opens the door for us. A rubbery tentacle helps us alight.

“Here you are,” he grumbles. “You earthlings are certainly crazy. As we say on Mars, just an unchbay of erksjay.”

Leaving the driver gibbering in his weird Martian dialect, Adam Clink, Andy the Anthropoid and I take an elevator from the roof down to the 400th floor.

After a lot of preliminaries with white-robed attendants and bearded elders—“All the books of wisdom have bearded elders attending the scientists,” explains Adam Clink—we are walking into the great white-domed laboratory of the Mad Scientist.

There, under the glow of carbon arcs, calmly splitting an atom with a simple electro-divisory-atomic-bisector-oscope, stands the Mad Scientist himself!

He doesn’t notice us, being so busy trying to split this atom into equal parts. So I get quite a chance to stare at the baldheaded man with the red face and angry frown as he bends over his work.

“He doesn’t look so crazy to me,” I whisper to the ape.

“Crazy? Who says he’s crazy?” answers Andy the Anthropoid.

“But you call him the Mad Scientist, don’t you?”

“Of. course. And that’s why we choose him. The books speak of a mad Scientist and he is mad.”

“Then he must be crazy.”

“Not crazy,” the ape repeats. “Just mad. You know—angry!”

I get it, then. When they read the science-fiction magazines they misunderstand. They think a Mad Scientist is a guy with a bad temper. The idea makes me laugh.

My laugh makes the Mad Scientist notice us.

He stares and glares.

“What the devil are you doing in my laboratory?” he shrieks. “Get out of here—I hate you!”

“But, sir——”

“Shut up before I lose my temper!” screams the Mad Scientist, throwing a test-tube at Adam Clink.

“Please sir, we have a visitor—Lefty Feep—”

"Get out of here before I disintegrate the lot of you!" howls the irate investigator. "I suppose he's another hero type, come to marry my daughter. I am sick and tired of heroes running around making love to my daughter. Just because her father is a Mad Scientist, they seem to think it's expected of them. I've got a good mind to melt your molecules, Adam Clink! And as for you, ape man, I'll sic some fleas onto your fur in a hurry if you don't remove that below-zero hero type!"

"But he's not a hero—he's got a Time Machine!" explains Adam Clink.

THE Mad Scientist opens his mouth and stops at mid-froth.

"A Time Machine!" he groans. "Why don't you tell me this before? Of course I want to talk to him. Clear out, you two. Leave me alone with Mr.—Gleep, isn't it?"

"Lefty Feep," I tell him, as the robot and the ape leave the laboratory.

"Well, well," purrs the Mad Scientist, wiping his bald head. "Won't you sit down? Try that table over there. Just move that jar with the human head in it, will you?"

I move the jar. "Take it easy!" yaps the human head. "You're jolting my solution out of balance."

I drop the jar with the head in a hurry.

"What a thump!" the head complains. "Now I've got a headache. Would you mind slipping an aspirin into my mouth?"

"Yes, I would mind very much," I gulp.

The Mad Scientist fixed up the head with a bromo seltzer as I sit down and try to relax. Then he turns to me.

"Now what's all this about a Time Machine?" he asks.

So I tell him my story, sketching in my past but fast.

"Very interesting," he remarks when I finish my recitation of explanation.

He paces the floor. "You know, sometimes I think I make a mistake when I seal up all the Time Machines and plans for making them in a time capsule where nobody can discover them," he tells me. "A device like that can be valuable."

That is where I see a chance to do myself some good.

"Bet your life!" I grin. "For instance, I am doing a lot of thinking just now and I get a very neat idea."

"What is your idea?"

"How about you and I going into business?" I suggest.

"What business?"

"Well, you might call it the travel business. Time travel!"

He frowns. It is a new idea to him. "Sure," I assure him. "You are the big shot in these parts and I have the Machine. What say we rent it out to various parties who want to take trips into the past and future? Why, in a scientific age it will be all the rage! We can make millions!"

I am very hep with pep over this notion, and so I do not notice at first when the Mad Scientist starts turning lavender around the jowls. But in a second he is positively deep purple in the puss and I cannot help but notice it. Besides, he is yelling very softly, like a moose caught in a moose-trap.

"Thunderation!" he howls. "By Einstein, quit talking about that infernal machine of yours. I almost forgot who might hear us."

"Hear us?" I ask. "Why do you care who hears us?"

"Well, Adam Clink and Andy the Anthropoid know already," mutters the Mad Scientist. "That's bad enough."

"Why is it bad?"

"Because they are jealous of me, that's why," he tells me.

"Almost all of my creations want to rule earth, you know. Adam Clink is only one of thousands of robots. The robots feel they should run things instead of just working in factories. And my other creations, like the ape men, are also restless. Then there's those ungodly carping critics, the Martians."

"I meet one," I admit.

"Blue blazes!" curses the Mad Scientist, hopping up and down in a rage. "Then they know about it, too! Almost any of them will be trying to get hold of your Time Machine and use it as a means of getting control of the others—and the earth.”

“I have the key safe in my pocket,” I reassure him. “Nobody can operate it.”

“But they know,” grumbles the Mad Scientist, “They know. And you mustn’t talk so loud or they will hear you.”

“They?”

“Yes,” whispers my eccentric experimenter. “They will hear you, and then——”

“I hear you!”

IT IS not a voice that tells me this.

It is a thought. Yes, inside my skull I can feel the words. “I hear you!” comes the message.

“Too late!” groans the Mad Scientist, tearing the place where he once has hair. “The jig is up!”

“What is that?” I inquire. “What is that message I just get?”

“It comes from the Great Brains,” the Mad Scientist sobs.

“Great Brains?”

“By telepathy,” he tells me. “You see, when I rebuild the world according to the books of wisdom, I try to get everything right. According to Hoyle, or Binder, or Hamilton, or Cummings, or Burroughs, or O’Brien and McGivern—all those authorities, who write in ancient times.

“So I invent rocket ships and super-skyscrapers and atomic blasters and all that stuff. And I conceive of a society composed of layers.

“First I invent robots, like Adam Clink, to work in factories and build buildings. That’s all they do—work.

“Then I make a few apes like Andy the Anthropoid, just to keep animal life going with more intelligence. Pets, sort of, you might say.

“On top of that, I permit the Martians to land here to take over a few jobs and stand around and criticize everything. I hate criticism, but that’s all Martians ever do when they come to earth—except, of course, when they invade it. But that's another story, or a couple hundred other stories in the books of wisdom. Anyway, the Martian criticisms sometimes give me ideas for improvements.

"So there we are. Robots for work, apes for local color, and Martians for criticism."

"What about people?" I ask. "People? What people?" sneers the Mad Scientist. "Don't you notice that yet? There are no people, except for my daughter—and she's always getting herself kidnaped to other planets or some place. I am the only living person on earth that I know of. We don't need people any more."

I blink. "Then what about that telepathy we just hear?" I ask.

"Oh, yes—I am coming to that. After inventing all these types, I decide to complete the world with my masterpiece—straight from the books of wisdom. So I invent the Great Brains."

"What are they and why?"

"They are the ones who help me with my thinking," the Mad Scientist declares. "That's all they do—sit around and think. Just like Great Brains always think in the science-fiction stories. They can use telepathy. They have remarkable powers of concentration and perception. They know everything. And now it seems they sense your presence and the presence of the Time Machine. So we might as well visit them at once and see what they have to say."

He opens a door at the far end of his laboratory.

"Come," he suggests.

I FLING myself down a long hallway, following at his heels. We stop before another door and he opens it.

"Lefty Feep," says the Mad Scientist, "meet the Great Brains."

I enter a dark velvet-draped room. And there I am, face to face with the Great Brains.

Only I am not face to face—because the Great Brains have no faces!

There are three of them in this room—perched on three separate pedestals Three enormous blobs of wrinkled gray. There are no arms, legs, bodies, or faces attached to the giant jelly-heads. All I can see are brains—three brains, the size of barrage balloons.

Looking closer, I notice that they are not mounted on pedestals but on five-foot bookshelves.

"You are in the presence of intelligence," whispers the Mad Scientist. "Be very humble. They have their pride—a very overweening pride."

"Swelled heads, eh?" I whisper. "Well, in a matter of gray matter I myself am dumb in the cerebrum. But perhaps I can teach the Great Brains a new wrinkle."

"You are Lefty Feep?" comes a telepathic thought from my left.

I turn to the enormous gray mass and nod.

"You have a time machine?"

I nod again.

"We want it."

"But wait a minute——" I object.

"Do we get it peacefully or must we hypnotize you? We can destroy you with the power of our thought. Do not try to trick us, Mr. Feep—we know all, see all, hear all, and are superior to everything. We cannot be bailed."

"So this is what happens to Quiz Kids when they grow up," I mutter.

"We are waiting" the thought comes. The gray masses bend forward on their bookshelves and I get queazy but uneasy. I am hot on the spot. I must answer——

The door opens behinds us. The Mad Scientist wheels and reels.

Adam Clink stands there, waving a monkey-wrench.

"I just come from a mass-meeting of robots down at Automaton Hall," he announces. "Robot Workers Union Number Nine votes that you must turn over the Time Machine to us immediately or we will throw this"—and he points to the monkey-wrench—"into your machinery."

"They mean it!" rasps the Mad Scientist. "I always know they will stage a revolt eventually.

"We also demand more oiling," continues Adam Clink, waving a steel finger in the air. He points his rigid digit at the Mad Scientist's nose. "We always want more oil—it lubricates us and we work faster. So remember, give us oil and the Time Machine or there'll be trouble."

"We get the time machine now," telepaths the thought from the Great Brains.

I am now on a double spot.

AND the door opens again. This time only a head sticks through the opening—sticks through about five feet. It is Martin the Martian.

"Mars calling Earth," yells Martin. "We Martians just confer and wish to report that we feel ourselves—as superior beings from another planet—to be entitled to the use of the Time Machine Lefty Feep brings here. In the words of our Martian proverb, unless we get that Time Machine at once, our-yay oose-gay is ooked-kay."

A triple spot!

"Nobody gets to use that machine but me!" thunders the Mad Scientist. "I'll blast everybody if you cross me—I'm getting very angry, I warn you! Feep—give me that key to the Time Machine!"

A quadruple spot!

I am jumping around from one spot to another in a hurry. What do I do now?

I clear my throat and turn to the whole crew.

"Men, metal, Martian, and mental!" I address them. "You all demand the Time Machine. There is only one solution. You must give me time! Time to decide—time to choose which one of you deserves to have this wonderful device. Give me six hours to think."

"Very well," comes the thought from the Great Brains. "But meanwhile we will be thinking too—thinking up a pretty nasty fate for you unless you give us the machine.”

“Six hours,” squeaks Adam Clink. “Then we get our oil and the Time Machine or you get this,” and he brandishes the monkey-wrench near my noggin.

“I’ll wait,” promises Martin the Martian. “But if we don’t get satisfaction, Mars invades earth! You and your Time Machine will be up-ay the eek-cray, as we Martians say.”

“Give me that Time Machine in six hours or I’ll get so mad I’ll tear down the Empire State Building and hit you over the head with it,” snarls the Mad Scientist. “That’s the way they do it in the books of wisdom.”

“Quiet!” I yell. “Let me think! Clear out of here, all of you!”

They leave me and this does not grieve me, believe me!

I stand in the room with the Great Brains, trying to figure out where to start.

Running back to the Time Machine and using my key and getting the blazes out of here is a good idea—but I am sure Adam Clink’s robots are watching it and will not permit me to escape.

So I am racing and pacing from facing this situation filled with aggravation.

If I cannot get out of here, I must get out of my problem. I must use my brain.

Better still, why not use their brains? The thought strikes me. Here are the Great Brains. Perhaps I can trick them into helping me somehow without their knowing it.

But how?

Maybe they can answer questions for me. Questions about the other groups, for example.

That’s it! They will not hesitate to tell me the weaknesses of their rivals—the Martians, the robots, and the Mad Scientist, for example.

TURN to the Brains and smile. “Who is the head man around here?” I ask.

I

“You mean which one of us is the wisest?” telepaths a thought.

“Yep. Which skull is the least numb?” I inquire.

“We are all wise,” they telepath. “No thought eludes us and no problem deludes us. We can answer all questions on any subject.”

“Good.” I flash a face that is smiling and beguiling. I turn to the nearest of the three Great Brains and aim my words right at the center of the massive mass of this terrible but cerebral creature.

“How can I get rid of the Martian menace?” I ask.

The Great Brain seems to sense my purpose and naturally this seems like a good way to dispose of a rival group. So the Brain telepaths.

“A simple matter. What do the Martians do on earth?”

“Why, I hear all they do is criticize.”

“Precisely. Therefore, in order to rid the earth of the Martians, first rid it of everything they criticize. If there is nothing left to criticize they will get bored and go away. Simple solution for a superiority complex.”

Maybe it is, but it is no solution for me. How can I get rid of everything? Ridiculous answer!

So I turn to the second Great Brain and ask, “How can I destroy Adam Clink and his robot race?”

“The robots are making demands. Satisfy their unwise demands and they will destroy themselves.”

This doesn’t sound like a hot plan from the brainpan either. In fact I can’t figure it out.

So I yammer, stammer, and clamor at the third Great Brain.

“How can I get rid of the Mad Scientist?” I inquire.

“Simplicity itself! Merely see to it that there is nothing for him to get angry about. Then he will no longer be a mad scientist

Another screwy answer! By this time I begin to think my own thoughts about how wonderful the Great Brains are.

“Assorted almonds, pecans, cashews and other nuts to you guys!” I yell. “You’re just a bunch of overstuffed fakes! You claim to have all the wisdom in the world, and I’ll bet you can’t even answer a simple question,” I jeer.

"We answer anything," the first Brain telepaths.

I am so mad I don't know what I'm saying. "Oh yeah?" I yell. "I bet you can't even tell me why firemen wear red suspenders."

"Firemen wear red suspenders?" the first Brain flashes. "Wait a minute now . . . is it because fire engines are red?"

"Wrong!" I snicker.

"Wait . . . why do firemen wear red suspenders? . . . There must be a reason . . ."

The first Great Brain swells up and I can see it folding and unfolding as it attempts to think that one out. I grin and turn to the second Brain.

"As for you," I chuckle, "perhaps you can answer this question—why does a chicken cross the road?"

"Chicken? Road? Why does a member of the genus gallus traverse a public thoroughfare? Wait a minute . . . there must be a mathematical or ornithological catch to this . . . why does a chicken cross the road? I—I ——"

"Ha!" I shout. I turn to the third Great Brain. "As for you, answer me this —how high is up?"

"How high is up? How HIGH is up? How High IS up? HOW high is up? How high is UP?" telepaths the baffled Brain.

BY THIS time all three Great Brains are racking themselves all over the shelves. They swell and puff and contract and expand and I can see their cells revolving.

"Oh what a headache I have!" telepaths one Brain. "What's the answer?" telepaths another. "My migrane is killing me!"

I get a tremendous hunch about this bunch. They are being confronted with problems they cannot answer and it hurts. I think of a super question.

"Listen, all of you!" I yell. "Here's one that will really bother you. What's the difference between a duck?"

"What's the difference between a duck?" the Great Brains telepath.

"Yes, what's the difference between a duck?" I repeat.

"Difference—Duck?—Oh, I can't think straight! It hurts to consider it! My poor aching head!" the great Brains telepath me.

They swell and jell, and as I watch, the Brain on my left suddenly flows off the shelf.

"I'm afraid," it telepaths, "that I have a splitting headache!"

It is all too true. In a second the Great Brain splits right in half!

The second Brain wobbles a moment and then it also falls and splits. The riddle is too much for its mentality.

"What's the difference between a duck?" telepaths the last Great Brain, writhing in agony. "There must be an answer."

"Guess," I insist. "Guess, if you're so smart."

The Brain turns positively black with effort. Then, "I've got it!" comes the message. "What's the difference between a duck? Answer—One leg is both the same!"

Of course, this is the right answer. But the effort is too much for the Great Brain. As the telepath comes, the last Brain gives one leap into the air and explodes all over the room.

The Great Brains are through.

By using my brain, I destroy their brains.

Now for the Mad Scientist, the Martians, and Adam Clink's robots.

How to cope with them in a few hours?

I keep remembering the advice the Brains give me—the screwy advice. About the robots now—don't they tell me to satisfy their unreasonable demands?

What unreasonable demands? Asking for the Time Machine is reasonable, if they want power. But do they ask for something else, too?

Then I remember. They want oil. They ask to be oiled more in order to work faster.

Robots always want more oil.

Suppose I give it to them?

It's a wild hunch, but I can try it.

In ten minutes I go to the Mad Scientist back down the hall in his laboratory. In ten more minutes he listens to my scheme and agrees with me. Ten minutes later I have the key to the oil storage tanks. Ten minutes after that I am confronting Adam Clink with the key, as he sits in the Robot Workers Union headquarters at Automaton Hall.

"Oil," I tell him. "I bring you the keys for the oil you want. Am I your pal or am I not? Eh, Adam?"

Adam Clink grins his grin of metallic mirth.

"Great work, Feep!" he squeaks. "Now we can have all the oil we want. We can speed up production in the factories and build our buildings faster. We robots will really go to town. I'll release the grease to all the robots."

He issues orders over a televisocastor and I accompany him on his oil distribution.

IT IS a thrilling sight to see five hundred robots drain the big oil tanks into huge containers and then drive the containers to the gates of the skyscraper factories. Here the robots line up in queues, each with its oil-can extended, to be filled from the spigots of the tanks.

In about an hour all the robots are are well-oiled.

"It's great to lubricate!" yells Adam Clink, in triumph, as the last robot gets his share. "Now let's really work full speed ahead."

The robots wave their dripping oilcans in a salute and their cheers hurt my ears.

Then they move back into their jobs.

"Robots are happy when they work," says Adam Clink, oiling up his joints liberally. "And the more they can work the happier they are. The Mad Scientist won't give much oil—claims if he does the robots speed up too much and wreck everything they touch. How foolish! We like to work fast!"

I peer through the window of the nearest factory and see things are really humming. Robots, just dripping oil at every joint, are hammering and clanging and banging away. But there is something peculiar-sounding about their pounding. A discordant note. A frantic rhythm. They are off the beam. They sound as if they are well-oiled.

That's it! They are well-oiled. Oil to robots is like liquor to humans. It takes the rust out of their frames, they think. But it also loosens them up, makes them careless and wild.

And even as I watch, the robots start to show the symptoms. They reel. They wield hammers and drop crowbars all over the place. They don't throw the switches on their machinery. They do everything at such top speed that in a few minutes machines are exploding and factories are shaking.

But they are too oiled up to stop or even notice. From far away comes a clang and a thundering roar as a building topples over. Robots working on it misplace some girders, I suppose.

And now the whole superskyscraper city is shaking as the thundering factories go haywire.

"Satisfy their unwise demands and they will destroy themselves," the Great Brains tell me. And it's true!

Adam Clink reels off drunkenly down the street. Buildings fall before him. He pays no attention. He looks to me as though he has a couple of screws loose.

It is all too true. A few screws do come off his well-oiled neck and in a minute Adam Clink is falling to pieces. His arms drop off as he flounders around.

Now the robots are fleeing the factories in droves as explosions drive them out. They lurch around, and I see that the oil loosens their nuts and bolts until the poor nuts are bolting all over the place.

The robots are being destroyed.

I get out of that section of the city, but fast. The Great Brains and robots are done for now. But I still have the Martians and the Mad Scientist to reckon with.

And time is short.

I head for the building where the Mad Scientist has his laboratory. I head for it fast, dodging falling masonry as I go.

But I am too late. Out of the sky swoops a gleaming plane.

MARTIN the Martian sticks his head out a few feet and spots me. Then he sticks his tongue out a few feet.

“Nyaaah!” he says. “We Martians won’t wait. We are coming to invade this stupid earth.”

I shrug. I lose after all. Martin the Martian points up at the sky.

“They are here, just clear of the stratosphere,” he tells me. “When I give the signal, they will swoop down with their greater disintegrators, and wipe everything off the map.”

“Why?” I ask. “Why do you want to do that? What is earth worth?”

“Nothing,” the Martian admits. “But we superior beings don’t like to see it run so stupidly. All these Brains and robots now—they’re silly. They offend us.”

I fake a laugh. “Well go away,” I suggest. “Your troubles are over. I destroy the robots and the Great Brains.” And I tell him how.

His face falls about five feet on his long neck when he hears this. His Adam’s apple wobbles on its long stem.

“You mean they no longer exist?” he mourns. “We cannot have the fun of destroying them and all their civilization?”

“That’s right. There’s nothing left for you to invade or criticize,” I tell him. “Nothing on earth. You are welcome to come down and rebuild it to suit yourselves, though,” I add. “You criticize so much, I figure maybe you want a chance to run things of your own way.”

Martin the Martian scowls. “No!” he sighs. “We are destructive critics only. If there is nothing we can destroy or feel superior to, we aren’t happy.

Just for that, we won't invade earth after all. I'll go back and tell the gang. I think we'll leave earth and invade some place else."

"Why not try Mars?" I call after him, as his plane soars aloft again.

"Good idea!" he yells.

And that is the last I see of the Martian menace.

I run upstairs to the laboratory where the Mad Scientist waits. And he is waiting for me, definitely.

As I come through the doorway he stands up. His bald head gleams. So do his teeth. So does the horrible ray-gun he holds in his hand.

He points the ray-gun at me. I stop dead in my tracks, wondering how soon it will be.

"So," he snarls. "You destroy my Great Brains. You ruin my robots. You drive away the Martians. The whole city is crashing to ruins. I am furious!"

"Calm down," I advise him. "Be very calm."

I sit down next to a bookshelf and pretend to smile.

In a minute I do smile, because I remember what the Great Brains tell me. They advise me correctly about getting rid of the robots. And they tell me that the Martians will leave when there is nothing to criticize—which they do.

And now I recall what they say about the Mad Scientist. He will be all right when he has nothing to get mad about, they prophesy.

So I open my mouth and tell the Mad Scientist what happens.

"You see?" I conclude. "You are always mad about the robots and the Martians rivaling you—and they are gone, now. You are mad about having to run the city—and it is almost in ruins. You are angry with the Great Brains. They will never trouble you again. So what is there to be mad about? Be happy and forget it!"

BUT the Mad Scientist doesn't look happy. From what I can see of his face behind the foam on his mouth, he is frothing with rage.

"You—you——!" he shrieks. His hand whips out. The ray-gun blazes.

I duck, just in time.

The ray-gun passes over my head and blasts into the bookshelves behind me. There is a searing, sizzling sound, a single flash, and then the bookshelves disappear!

“Yeeeooooow!” screams the Mad Scientist. “Now look what happens!”

“What?” I ask.

“Those bookshelves I blast—you know what they contain?” he yells.

“No.”

“The books of wisdom, that’s all!” he yammers. “I just blast the precious books of wisdom in that bookshelf!”

I grin. “So what?” I shrug. “Doesn’t that solve everything? Stop and think a moment—what makes you so irate of late? Just having to invent all of those things you read about in the science-fiction magazines.

“Now there are no magazines. No more rules and regulations for you to live up to. You can sit back, relax, be yourself. Why don’t you leave this stuffy laboratory and get out in the open and live?”

The Mad Scientist smiles.

“You can get a little farm,” I continue. “Plant a few acres and putter around. That’s the way for a man to live. All this super-stuff is super-silly.” He beams at me. He puts the ray-gun down.

“You aren’t mad any more?” I ask. “No,” he chuckles. “I feel great.”

“Then you’ll let me take the Time-Machine back to my own day and age?” I ask.

“Go ahead, and bless you,” he tells me.

He sits there humming as I go out the door.

I prowl through the twisted streets until I find the Time Machine, still shining and spotless, on the pavement where I leave it early in the day.

I open it up with the key, press the dials on the panel, and then I’m off.

Off into unconsciousness. Off into oblivion. Off into the past. Off——

And on again. I wake up sitting on the floor in the laboratory of Skeetch and Meetch. Funny thing is, the Time Machine I sit in has no panel in it.

I open the door and rush out. “Hey, boys!” I yell. “I don’t do it! Honestly——I don’t remove the panel from the Time Machine.”

Skeetch and Meetch stare at me in the other room, and Cosmo Creetch looks up.

“There is no panel on the Time Machine,” he tells me. “I will not finish it until tomorrow.”

“Won’t finish it?” I ask.

“And how do you know about the Time Machine?” snaps Cosmo Creetch. “Who are you, anyway?”

“How do I know? Who am I? Why I’m the guy you hire to take a trip into the future in the Time Machine.”

“When do I do that?”

“Earlier today.”

“But how can I?” Creetch insists. “I never see you before in my life. And the Machine is not completed yet so how can you take a trip?”

“Are you kidding?” I inquire. But Skeetch and Meetch nod their heads. They agree with Creetch. As far as they are concerned, I never come up to their laboratory at all.

So I tell my story and they all shake their heads.

“Don’t understand it,” Creetch murmurs. “Unless you make a mistake when you come back in such a hurry. Maybe you set the panels for one day before the time you are supposed to.”

“What do you mean?”

“When you are in the future, do you set the return switch for the same date five hundred years earlier—for February 28th, 1944?”

“Yes,” I insist.

“Well—then I don’t understand it.

Unless, of course——”

I interrupt him. “No,” I gasp. “I set it for the 29th of February. Because I leave here on the 29th.”

“But that’s tomorrow!” objects Creetch.

“I’ve got it!” yells Skeetch. “You leave here on the 29th, of course. But 500 years from now—in 2544—they must abolish the extra day in February for Leap Year. So 500 years from now is falling on February 28th. When you come back you arrive on the 28th, one day earlier than you start.

“Consequently you never start at all!”

I sigh. “I give up, boys,” I tell them. “But it certainly is an exhausting trip I don’t take.”

* * *

LEFTY FEEP finished his story and sat back. His beady eyes darted from my face to Bill’s.

“So you see,” he concluded, “Truth is stranger than science-fiction, after all. And you see me yesterday even if I am not here. Understand?”

“No, I don’t,” I confessed. “Anyway, there’s one consolation. If you never went into 2544, then the civilization won’t be so bad, because it doesn’t exist and never will.”

“Please,” said Lefty Feep, raising a hand. “Do not confuse me any further. I do not wish to think about science-fiction any longer.”

“I don’t blame you,” murmured my friend, Bill. “But say, it’s been a pleasure to meet you, Mr. Feep. You certainly have the most remarkable adventures.”

“Yes,” grinned Lefty Feep. “And I think this is one of the most remarkable adventures I ever had in all my life.”

Iron Mask

From the spires of an ancient haunted castle to the subterranean caverns of the Underground winds the sinister trail of a myth-turned-monster!

"WHERE is she?" demanded Eric Drake, hoarsely. "What have you done with Roselle?" The tall, bald-headed man shrugged. "Sit down, Eric," he murmured. "There is no need to become excited."

"Tell me where she is," the young man insisted, gray eyes flaring in accusation.

Pierre Charmand met his stare directly. "I have sent Roselle to the Chateau D'Ivers," he answered.

"To the chateau? But you couldn't. Don't you know what they're saying? The Chateau D'Ivers is—"

Pierre Charmand interrupted with a bitter laugh. "I know," he said. "They say the Chateau. D'Ivers is haunted. Do you believe it? And do you believe I would send Roselle—my own daughter—to such a place if I believed it?"

Eric Drake stared at Pierre Charmand through a veil of candle-light. They were a strange pair, here in the secret quarters of the Underground.

Tall, elderly Pierre Charmand, former Mayor of Dubonne, met the gaze of young Eric Drake, former AP correspondent. A strange pair indeed, and in a strange alliance.

For Pierre Charmand, since the coming of the Nazis to Dubonne, was mayor no longer. He was local head of the Underground movement.

Drake, too, had left his former post with the arrival of the Germans. Now he served the Underground for the sake of two loves—love of Charmand's daughter, Roselle, and love of freedom.

They had been partners together in this movement to free France, but now—"Why did you send Roselle to the Chateau?" Eric Drake demanded.

Again Pierre Charmand was evasive. "Are you afraid of the ghosts, too?" he mocked.

"Nonsense," Drake snapped. "It's not ghosts she's likely to run into there. It's Germans!"

Charmand chuckled.

"I know," he replied. "And that is precisely why I sent her. The news has come to me that gauleiter Hassman plans to visit the Chateau tonight. It is necessary for one of us to arrive before he does."

Both men were silent for a moment, thinking of Hassman. Hassman, the new gauleiter, was instituting a reign of terror in the little town of Dubonne. He took French machinery, and French gold, and now he was planning to take French manhood to ship to Germany. His troops, his Gestapo squads, his spies were everywhere. Charmand and his Underground movement had been sadly subdued under the iron rule of Hassman.

"What does Hassman want at the chateau?" Drake asked, breaking the silence. "Can't you guess?" Charmand replied. "There's nothing of value there," Drake mused. "The old castle has been deserted since the family was killed in the French Revolution. The peasants say their ghosts still haunt the spot—but I'd guess it's probably filled with dust, cobwebs, and bats. Nobody would care to visit it."

"Exactly." Charmand shrugged "And that is why I thought of it as an ideal hiding-place."

"Hiding-place?"

"Yes. When the Germans came here to Dubonne, my last official act as mayor was to dispose of the state papers. Not the ordinary documents, you understand, but the secret files—just a few sheets of value buried away in the archives at the City Hall.

"These I determined to preserve at any cost, for their historical significance. So I cast about for a suitable hiding-place. While you were so busily sending dispatches on Nazi troop movements to your newspaper, I was scurrying up the hill to conceal those papers at the Chateau D'Ivers."

"You hid them there?"

"Yes, there. I placed them in an iron casket and concealed them in a spot I alone knew—a secret drawer in the mantel over the old fireplace.

"I thought they would be safe. But somehow Hassman must have learned, because I received word today that he is sending a squad to the chateau this evening "Naturally, they must not be allowed to find those papers. That is why I sent Roselle this afternoon."

Drake scowled.

"But why did you send your own daughter—a girl—on such a risky mission?"

"Because of the risk," Charmand explained. He rose and went to the window. Drawing aside the blinds he pointed at the streets outside. "Look, my friend," he said. "Look at the streets of Dubonne. Every block patroled by Nazi swine. What one of our people could walk unchallenged through those streets and up to the Chateau in broad daylight? Certainly not you or I, nor Marcel, Antoine, Phillipe, Jean—none of our men. No, only a woman could go forth on such an errand; a woman we can trust. So I sent Roselle."

"But it's twilight now," Drake objected. "She should be back, shouldn't she? And the Nazis will be going up there—"

Pierre Charmand bit his upper lip and turned away.

"You're worried now, aren't you?" Drake accused. "You know it was a foolhardy scheme. That's why you didn't let me in on it. Why, she might be —"

"Don't say it," Charmand whispered.

"Fool!" Drake strode toward the door, fists swinging angrily.

"Where are you going?" muttered the old man.

"I'm going up to the chateau after her," Drake answered.

"But the patrols—"

"Damn the patrols! It's dark, I can slip through them. And I'm going to slip through them. Roselle's up there in that deserted ruin, alone. I'm going to her, now."

DRAKE'S pace never slackened when he reached the cobbled street outside. He thrust his hand deeply into the pocket of his battered trench-coat and gripped the metal of a gun-butt. Scowling, he tramped down a deserted street in grim haste, his eyes intent on the vistas of the deepening twilight.

A telltale clank of metal warned him to draw back into the shadows beside the trees. A Gestapo man passed in gaunt silhouette.

Drake waited until the German had turned the corner, then hastened on.

The upturned collar of his coat served to hide his face—a face already too well known by the German invaders. For Drake, like all the others in the Underground, was marked for death by the Nazis. It was a dangerous game he played here—a game of hide-and-seek in nighted streets; the stakes, his life itself.

The game went on, quietly; silent as death. And Drake worked his way up the street toward the hill beyond. Every stop, each delay, each moment spent in hiding or eluding a patrolman, was torture to the man. For Roselle was up there on the hilltop. He must get to her at once.

But a rising moon peered with bloating face over the ruined walls by the time Drake hastened up the pathway that led to the Chateau D'Ivers. The mouldering walls masked a mystery—a mystery shrouded in silence. Drake's ears heard no sound from within. His eyes saw no light save that of the cold and grinning moon above.

Drake pressed through the tangled weeds overrunning an ancient pathway.

He moved warily now, keeping well under the shadows of the gnarled trees.

If the Germans were here—

But there were no Germans.

There was only silence and decay. A fetid stench seemed to emanate palpably from the great, moss-grown stones of the chateau’s walls. The ruined spires leered at the moon, and broken windows, like the eyeless sockets of skulls, stared blindly at the night.

Drake neared the doorway, observed with a start that the great carved door swung open on creaking hinges. He caught a glimpse of yawning vistas beyond.

Roselle must be in there, now. Unless—

Drake stifled an oath as he caught the flutter of movement from behind the door.

Something was emerging!

Eric Drake’s hand went to his gun. He jerked the muzzle upwards, held it ready, and then—

A cloud of black horror spiraled from the doorway and streamed upwards to the sky.

“Bats!” he muttered.

As the squeaking and chittering column soared aloft, Drake repressed a shudder. He thought of ancient legends, of the monstrous rumors that clustered thicker than the moss about the walls of the chateau.

And Roselle, all alone there in the darkness—

But what if she were not done?

The thought was a lash. Drake half-ran up the stone steps, dashed through the open doorway.

“Roselle!” he whispered.

THERE was no answer—no answer save for a sibilant echo that slithered from the cold walls of the hallway in which he stood.

Here, in the lair of darkness, Drake pondered which way to turn. Where was the room with the fireplace? Where was Roselle? Should he risk calling her?

He hesitated for a moment—and then his doubts were resolved.

For silence shattered in a single scream. Drake knew the voice. Roselle!

A shot rang out from the left. Its echo boomed through the corridors, and Drake went into action.

He darted toward the doorway to his left, entered the room, and reeled back a step.

Yes, the fireplace was there, and the mantel above it. Faint moonlight revealed the scene—but Drake had eyes only for the slim, alluring body of the girl on the floor. It was Roselle.

And above her a shape hovered in the semi-darkness; such a shape as is born only in the depths of nightmare. Black, cloaked, hooded, it bent over the girl in an attitude of gloating menace. A black paw clutched something to the cloaked breast, and then—the figure was gone.

Even as Drake dashed forward, the shape seemed to melt into the shadows against the farther wall and disappear.

Then Drake was kneeling beside the girl, raising her head, whispering to her.

Roselle opened her eyes. She was unhurt; Drake saw that. The girl was conscious, too—but not wholly so, for she screamed again. “Eric!” she cried. “Eric, you’re here!”

“Yes,” he whispered. “Everything’s all right.”

“But where is he?” sobbed the girl. “Where is the thing I saw—the thing in the Iron Mask?”

2. The Man without a Face

MOONLIGHT streamed through the ruined windows.

Drake stared deep into the girl's eyes and read her fear. He shook his head. The fear was plain to see, but there was no hysteria.

"He wore an iron mask over his face," Roselle repeated, softly. "I saw him as plainly as I see you. He wasn't a ghost."

Eric Drake nodded thoughtfully.

"That's plain to see," he murmured. "Ghosts don't steal valuable papers. And ghosts don't leave footprints."

He pointed to the floor, where moonbeams glittered upon the silver carpet of the dust. The mouldering motes had been disturbed by footprints—the prints of Roselle's high-heeled slippers and the flat, broader prints of a man's shoes.

Drake saw the incoming tracks, and his gray eyes swerved to observe the prints retreating once more along the castle halls beyond the chamber.

"He went that way," Drake snapped, rising to his feet.

"Eric—you're going to follow?"

"I must." Drake drew Roselle to her feet, placed his hands on her shoulders in a gesture of reassurance.

"You've got to get out of here before Hassman's men show up," he told her. "Go back and report to your father. Tell him what happened—and tell him I'm on the track of those papers. I'll see him at the meeting later tonight."

"But Eric—you're not going to follow him alone?"

"He has the papers. We must get them back. And he can't have gone far in the past five minutes. If I hurry—"

"But you can't go!" There was more than fear in Roselle's dark eyes. Eric laughed.

"He's only a man, no matter what kind of a disguise he's wearing. And I've got a gun."

"Guns won't help you," she whispered.

"What do you mean?"

"I didn't want to tell you this—but I shot at him. And hit him."

"There's no blood," Drake observed.

"Yes, that's right. There's no blood. I shot him in the head—and there was no blood. He didn't stop. He's a monster, I tell you—"

"Stop it, Roselle!" Drake shook her shoulders. "You hit the iron mask, of course. I tell you, nothing supernatural leaves footprints like these. And as long as I see footprints, I'll follow. Now—get out of here, fast."

A long kiss belied the harshness of his command. Then Drake stepped back, wheeled, and plunged into the dark passage beyond the castle chamber. His eyes followed the blurred tracks in the dust.

Ahead was only darkness and silence—deep darkness, deeper silence. Drake never wavered. As he entered the musty corridor the moonlight faded. He snapped on a pencil-flash and groped his way around a turn in the corridor.

The way led down, but the tracks were still plainly visible in the beam of the flash. Drake plodded along.

A winding passageway turned the castle ruins into a veritable maze—a black, forbidding maze that reeked of ancient decay, lurking death. But Drake followed the footprints; footprints that lured him ever deeper into the nighted depths where dwelt the strange silence and the sable shrouds woven by shadows.

Crumbling walls loomed and leered in the heart of the dank inner chambers. The pencil-flash disclosed tunnel mouths and openings on every side, but Drake's eyes were fastened on the plain trail of the fugitive's footprints.

They led him on, they led him down—they might lead him to the gates of hell—but where they went, he could follow. And he must follow.

He increased his pace. Was the attacker hurrying to some chosen spot? Was there a grim purpose in this plainly marked trail?

Would Drake round a bend and be confronted with a waiting presence? Did something lurk in the shadows, crouching to spring?

He strained his ears against silence, but could not read the secret prisoned by the night.

And then—

Abruptly Drake turned the corner at the end of the winding passageway. The footprints led him to a wall and halted; halted against a blank expanse of gray stone.

Drake's pencil-flash swept the flagstones at his feet. Drake's eyes swept the expanse of wall.

Then he fathomed the secret.

"Subterranean exit," he muttered. "Probably another concealed opening."

His surmise proved to be correct. His groping fingers, running swiftly over the surface of the wall above the spot where footprints ended, soon encountered the press-pivot.

A section of wall opened silently—surprisingly, for a mechanism undoubtedly worn by age and rusty with disuse.

Drake stood on the threshold of the tunnel only long enough to play his pencil-flash on the flooring ahead. He saw the footprints, and followed.

Damper, deeper darkness . . . secret, sepulchral silence . . . and ever the footprints beckoning him on to the brink of unguessable gulfs beyond.

And then, quite suddenly, he emerged. A bend in the tunnel brought him abruptly to a slanting fissure of rock—a fissure through which moonlight streamed. The secret passageway led out of the castle to the lower hillside beyond!

Now there were no footsteps to follow. But Drake saw something better—a figure!

THERE in the bright moon's rays wound the road down the hillside; and on the road Drake discerned the black, grotesquely bobbing shape of the fugitive.

Although, the moon was bright, Drake saw no glitter of steel from the head of the fleeing man; at this distance it seemed as though his head, like his entire body, was shrouded in black. Black, crawling like a spiderous shape, the figure moved through moonlight down the road ahead.

Drake reached for his automatic, at the same time pocketing his pocket-flash once more. The action was symbolic. All in a moment the man was transformed from a searcher to a hunter.

He started down the hillside road at a steady trot. The figure didn't turn back. Perhaps the fugitive hadn't heard him. Exulting in his luck, Drake pressed forward, closing the gap between them. His eyes, ever alert for sudden movement, came to abrupt and unexpected focus—not on the fugitive, but on the road far below him.

Other figures were crawling up the hillside from below!

Other figures were swarming purposefully along the hill. Drake, even at this distance, recognized the ugly outlines of military helmets.

Gauleiter Hassman's men—the Gestapo squad was coming to ransack the chateau!

Drake stepped back momentarily.

This was a situation he was not prepared for. The Gestapo would reach the stranger before he could. And perhaps the fugitive was in their employ. He hesitated.

But the black-clad fugitive did not hesitate.

He must have seen the Gestapo squad at the same time Drake glimpsed them. Now he crouched in the center of the road, against a pile of rocks. The road slanted steeply down before him, and the Germans were toiling upwards just below. The fugitive tugged at the jumble of rocks, pried a boulder free—

Drake gasped.

With a single gesture, the fugitive lifted the gigantic boulder over his head and sent it crashing down upon the helmets of the Nazis below!

The missile struck with crushing accuracy. A Nazi dropped, pinned and writhing under the gigantic stone.

The rest of the squad glanced up, perceived the solitary figure standing with black silhouette against the sky. The Gestapo men scattered, seeking cover behind crags and between crevices in the path below.

Swiftly, unhesitatingly, the fugitive tore another rock free from the face of the cliff beside the path. Once again he raised it, hurled it crashing toward the head of the nearest Nazi.

It missed, and hurtled down the hillside, striking with a force that sent echoes of doom reverberating through the night.

Now the Nazis had produced revolvers. Flame spat toward the black figure in five angry jets. But the fugitive sought no shelter. He stooped again, deliberately, and lifted another huge chunk of granite.

He dropped it squarely on an iron helmet below. There was a scream. And the shots rang out in redoubled tempo. The fugitive, standing amidst a hail of lead, calmly groped for another rock.

There was something magnificent about his lone fight against these odds—something magnificent and not wholly sane.

But that didn't move Drake to subsequent action. His calculations were shrewd.

The fugitive was one man: the Nazis numbered four. The Nazis had guns, while the fugitive had only the rocks. The fugitive still had the casket—Drake could see it hanging in a knapsack strapped to his black back.

If the Nazis won and took the casket, Drake would be fighting against greater odds. If he sided with the fugitive and helped beat the attackers off, he'd have one man to deal with—if he were an enemy and not a friend.

Besides, enemy or friend, the fugitive was killing Germans. And Drake approved of the idea.

He sent the stamp of his approval crashing through the night as his gun spoke.

Bounding forth from cover, Drake joined the solitary stranger in the road, and as the stranger hurled his rocks, Drake aimed and fired each time an iron helmet was exposed from cover on the roadside below.

The stranger turned. For a moment Drake stared into a black hole where a face should be—then realized that his information was correct. The stranger did wear a mask, but not of iron. His features were covered with a black velvet cloth, with two slits for the eyes. From head to foot the fugitive wore black, and he towered like a gaunt ghost in the moonlight.

Drake was conscious of intent scrutiny, but the mysterious one did not speak. He merely grunted, then turned and pried another rock from the hillside. Again he hurled it down with an incredible display of strength. And Drake aimed at a helmet as a Nazi rose from below and fired at them.

Drake could almost swear he saw the stranger flinch as a bullet struck home, but it could not be. For the fugitive stooped stolidly like an automatom, grasped another boulder, and sent it spinning on its deadly mission. Another Nazi screamed, then fell along the hillside as the boulder bounded over his body.

Drake aimed once more. And his aim was true. Another Nazi fell. And his remaining companion suddenly turned and scuttled back down the road. The stranger rolled another boulder down—Drake fired at the running target—but the solitary surviving Gestapo man vanished far below.

Then, and only then, the fugitive turned his fantastically masked visage toward Drake and extended a black-gloved hand.

"Merci beaucoup," he whispered.

THE voice was curiously soft, the French phrasing curiously stilted.

"My thanks, Monsieur," whispered the stranger in the mask. "How can I ever repay you?"

In an instant Drake was at his side, the muzzle of his gun pressing into the stranger's back.

"That's simple," Drake grinned. "You can repay me by handing over the casket in your knapsack—the casket you stole from the chateau."

For a moment the stranger stood silent. Then, abruptly, a whispering chuckle rose from the depths behind the black velvet mask.

"What's so amusing?" Drake snapped. "But this is too incredible!" chuckled the stranger. "Can it be that you also wish to secure this casket?"

"Can be," said Drake, laconically. "Hand it over."

The stranger didn't move.

"It is all right," he whispered. "I know about the papers it contains. I was merely set on rescuing it from the Nazis." Drake's gun dug deeper, emphasizing his impatience.

"Never mind that," he insisted. "Hand it over. I happen to know that you stole this casket from a girl in the chateau."

"Was she one of our people?" whispered the stranger. "I did not know, or else I should not have interfered. I thought I was the only one who suspected the Nazis were coming."

Drake hesitated only a moment.

"Who are you?" he snapped.

"You know we don't ask for names," parried the stranger. "But I can give you the password."

"Give it to me, then."

"Silence."

Drake heard the whispered word and lowered his weapon.

He could not doubt the watchword of the Underground.

This stranger was one of the organization, working for the freedom of France. And in accordance to the code of the Underground he need not reveal any compromising information as to his identity.

Still, Drake could not free himself from misgivings. He stared again at the masked features, the gloved hands of the mysterious man in black.

The stranger turned, shrugged.

"Why do I wear a mask? Why do I conceal my hands with gloves?" His whisper came faintly.

"The explanation is simple, if unpleasant. I was a soldier, Monsieur. A soldier of France—yes. It happened during the retreat from the Maginot line. The tanks came over and the men with the flammenwerfers—the flame-throwers. They burned my face and body.

"When I was found, I was given up for dead. But at the hospital in Paris they worked to save my life. In this they succeeded, but they could not save my face. You understand? That is why I conceal my hands and body, because of the scars. And I must conceal what they gave me in place of a face."

The whispering voice was bitter, harsh, intense.

"They wanted to keep me there, an invalid. But I have work to do. I have a debt to repay to the Nazi horde. I left the hospital, made contact with the Underground. They could not use me in Paris, because of my—deformity. So I have been fighting alone, in my own way.

"I came here. By chance I learned the local gauleiter had ordered a raid on the chateau. I did not know his purpose, but I came, thinking to anticipate his search. I found the girl taking this casket. I could not stop to make inquiries. I took the casket, fled—and you know the rest." Drake nodded. "Ours is a fortunate meeting," he said. "You are mistaken if you think the Underground has no place for you. You have great strength and greater courage. I shall be happy to accompany you to our headquarters tonight—we are holding an important meeting. Let me introduce you to Charmand, our leader. He'll find a place for you."

"But I can't," the stranger whispered. "If they should see me—"

"Perhaps your features are repulsive," Drake answered, cautiously. "But it does not matter, I assure you. No matter what they did to your face—"

"You don't understand," groaned the stranger. "I have no face. They gave me something else. You fool, don't you realize what they did to me? Look, then!" A black-gloved hand rose to the stranger's swathed throat. A single convulsive gesture ripped the black velvet covering from his head.

Drake stared at what leered forth in the gleaming moonlight; stared at the glaring horror that rose from the stranger's shoulders, stared at the dreadful reality of what Roselle Charmand had hinted.

For the stranger had no face. Set in an iron grin, brazen as doom, was a grimacing iron mask!

3. The Gauleiter Strikes

"WHAT is the word?" demanded Pierre Charmand. The tall, bald-headed old Frenchman stared at the masked stranger, a glitter of proud challenge flashing from his stern blue eyes.

"Silence," whispered the voice from behind the black velvet covering.

Dubonne's Underground leader nodded slowly. Then Pierre Charmand turned to Eric Drake, standing at the masked man's side.

"Who is this man and where did you encounter him?" he asked.

Drake told the story, simply and without hesitation. "I think that he can help us," he said. "And he has brought the casket."

Pierre Charmand's eyes sparkled.

"That is well!" he said. "It is very important that we of the Underground retain possession of those documents in the casket. All of the ancient official papers of Dubonne are contained here—some of them were rescued from the days of the Revolution. Gauleiter Hassman would give his right arm to possess them."

He rose and extended his hand. It was grasped by the black-gloved hand of the burned soldier in the iron mask.

Drake stood watching the weird tableau—and weird it was.

For the three of them were in the headquarters of Dubonne's Underground—the warehouse of the local brewery.

Surrounded by mountains of barrels, they crouched in a vast chamber; the light of a single candle rising to cast eerie shadows over casks and tuns. It was as though they were met in the great wine-cellar of some fabled ogre—these three incongruous figures; old Frenchman, young American, and creature garbed in the black nightmare of his cloak and hood.

Appreciation of the grotesque scene sounded in a sudden scream.

All three wheeled and faced the doorway.

Roselle Charmand stood there, one hand covering her red lips as she cut short the sound that might betray them to the world outside.

But her blue eyes were wide with horror as she saw her father shaking hands with the creature that had attacked her.

"Mon pere," she gasped. "He is here!"

Pierre Charmand nodded and stroked his mustache as he gave her a reassuring smile.

“Do not be alarmed, my daughter,” he said. “Drake can explain everything.”

“Drake—oh, Eric, you’re safe! And you’ve captured the attacker!”

“Well, not exactly,” Drake grinned. “Let me tell you what’s happened.”

He did so, sitting on an overturned cask at the girl’s side. She listened, and gradually the fear left her face.

Meanwhile Pierre Charmand conferred with the man wearing the mask. Drake concluded his story just in time to catch the purport of the Underground leader’s remarks.

“And so you see,” he was concluding, “I have called a meeting for tonight—here. Within the hour all members of the Underground in Dubonne and the surrounding countryside will be assembled.

“We have word that gauleiter Hassman is about to issue an order summoning all able-bodied males to forced labor in Germany. Naturally, we must act at once. We must plan an effort to sabotage that campaign.”

The iron mask bobbed up and down in agreement.

Pierre Charmand sighed. “There is but one disappointment,” he admitted. “I had hoped tonight to have a full report on just when Hassman would strike, and where; how many men he was going to conscript and what method he would use. Two or three of our people have attempted to intercept such a report. But I must confess failure. Now, with the meeting set for midnight—and only an hour to go—I have no report on which to base our plan of campaign.”

“Midnight,” whispered the man in the mask. “One hour to go.”

He rose, suddenly, purposefully.

“Where are you going?” asked Pierre Charmand.

“You say there is an hour,” came the whisper. “Perhaps I can do something.”

“You mean you can get the report?” breathed Pierre Charmand. “But how?”

The iron-masked man shrugged, heaving his shoulders clumsily. “Do not inquire as to methods,” he whispered. “I have developed a certain—technique—in such matters. Rest assured, I shall return with the information you desire.”

There was a flurry of black, and the man disappeared from the brewery vault.

Charmand stared at his daughter and Drake and slowly duplicated the departed man’s shrug.

“Who knows?” he said. “Perhaps it can be done.”

Roselle trembled in Drake’s embrace. “He frightens me,” she whispered. “Somehow, I have the feeling that he’s holding something back—something he hasn’t told us.”

“We must have faith,” Drake reassured her. “But now, there’s work to be done.”

THE three of them put their heads together in the candlelight; Pierre Charmand’s grizzled bald dome, Drake’s straight-haired sandy head, and Roselle’s cascaded cloud of dark curls all bent forward over the table, and Pierre Charmand began to issue instructions in a low murmur.

As he spoke, the door at the end of the room began to open and close swiftly as Underground members suddenly filtered singly into the room.

They came and came, but always they walked alone. Pious housewives, staid old business men, grinning laborers and gnarled, sunburned farmers appeared and silently took seats on upturned casks in a semi-circle about the table.

Soon a score of them were assembled, waiting for the moment of meeting. Drake lifted his gaze from the papers on the table, glanced at his wristwatch.

Midnight.

“It’s time,” he told Charmand. “And our friend has not returned.”

But even as he spoke the words, the door at the end of the room swung open, and the black cloak of the masked man swirled into the room.

Ignoring the stares of the assemblage, he strode to the table with thundering tread.

A gloved hand swept out, and a white paper fluttered down.

“Here is a report of Hassman’s proposed operations,” he muttered, in his peculiarly husky voice.

Pierre Charmand raised his eyebrows. “Good work,” he said. “Was it—safe?”

“Do you mean, have I been discovered? The answer’s no. And I don’t think I’ve been followed, either. The sentry posted outside of the entrance upstairs says that we’re all here. You can call the meeting, then. We’re safe.”

The masked figure sat down awkwardly upon an upturned cask near the table. Drake and Roselle found seats, and Pierre Charmand rose and confronted the meeting of the Underground.

“Comrades,” he began. “You all know for what purpose we are met tonight. Ordinarily I’d call for your reports and and then take up the matter at hand.

“But I have just received information of vital importance concerning our next plan of operations. A new comrade has succeeded where others have failed—you saw him come in just now.

“Therefore I beg leave of you to examine the information he has just brought in. I should like to be able to pass it on to you immediately, for it concerns our future.”

There were nods of assent and murmurs of approval from the audience.

Slowly, Pierre Charmand unfolded the paper the cloaked man had brought to him.

And then—

Hell broke loose.

Without warning came the thundering on the stairs outside the door. Without warning, the rattle of machine-gun fire resounded through the hollow brewery vault.

The door guarding the warehouse crashed in splinters and into the room poured a swarm of gray-clad figures.

“Hassman!” screamed Roselle Charmand.

A DOZEN pairs of eyes had recognized the burly figure in the doorway.

The squat, bullet-headed gauleiter was a familiar figure in Dubonne—a figure of terror. Terror stood in that doorway now, and his pudgy hands held two spitting Lugers.

A woman’s wail of fear died in a spatter of bullets. And then the Underground acted. With a flick of the wrist, Pierre Charmand struck the candle from the table, plunging the vault chamber into total darkness. Men and women ran like rats.

But the darkness was not complete. Red bursts of machine-gun fire spat deadly lightning into the room. The surprised Underground members crouched behind tuns and vats. A few were armed, and they returned the fire of the Nazis as the soldiers swept into the room, raking the walls with their portable machine-gun units.

Over and above the chatter of death rose the screams of the trapped Frenchmen and the guttural commands and curses of gauleiter Hassman.

The Nazis advanced, groping their way as the Underground defenders rolled beer barrels in their path and toppled casks. Vats pierced by bullets gushed forth amber streams. Soon the Nazis waded ankle-deep on their errand of death.

But they came on. Several fell, crushed by barrels or riddled by the answering bullets of the Underground. Yet they advanced, and it was a ghastly game of hide and seek played there in the darkness as the machine-guns barked, and their tongues of flame lapped out to lick the bodies of the French in a caress of death.

Drake grasped Roselle by the shoulders, drawing her behind the nearest sheltering pile of barrels. “Stay here,” he yelled above the din.

Then he stole forth to the center of the room, groping his way toward the table.

The casket from the chateau rested there; he had seen the masked man place it next to the candle before he sat down.

His hand went out, encountered its cold outlines. He grasped it. An iron grasp encircled his wrist.

Drake lashed out. His fist struck velvet—then iron beneath the velvet.

“Oh, it’s you!” he exclaimed. “Had the same idea, eh?”

The hand relaxed its grip on his wrist but did not let go.

“It’s me—Drake!” yelled the American.

“Oh.” The whisper came and the hand fell away as Drake grasped the casket.

“Come on,” Drake said. “Follow me. I think there’s another exit. We’d better get out of here fast—there’s no hope of resisting.”

It was grim truth he spoke.

THE tide of battle was flowing unmistakably in favor of the Nazis. Through the darkness they advanced squad on squad, wading through the spilled liquor in a relentless search for the few remaining Underground members yet alive.

Drake groped his way back to Roselle’s side. “Follow me,” he commanded. The three of them stole cautiously along a row of tuns against the wall.

“There’s an emergency loading chute set somewhere in the wall, as I remember,” Drake shouted, above the din of battle. “Wait—I think I’ve got it.”

His outstretched hand rested on an iron handle. He would tug it open and then—“What about Father,” gasped Roselle. “Where is he?”

The answer came grimly.

A sudden hail rattled above their heads. Bullets thudded into the wall. Running feet rounded the corridor of tuns to their left.

Pierre Charmand, panting and exhausted, stumbled blindly into his daughter’s arms.

“Mon pere—we’re safe! Follow us to escape,” the girl shouted.

Drake raised the door by the iron handle set in the wall. “We’ll have to crawl through,” he warned them.

His admonition was drowned out by the thunder of booted feet thudding down the corridor toward them. Another burst of machine-gun fire swept the air above their crouching figures.

“Now!” whispered Drake.

Quickly, he pushed Roselle Charmand through the doorway. She crawled ahead on hands and knees. Drake bent to follow. Then came the ghastly horror of the light.

Gauleiter Hassman had found a flashlight—and its cold beams swept over the bent bodies of Drake, Charmand, and the iron-masked man.

And with the beam, came bullets. The Nazis behind Hassman opened fire.

“Quick!” Drake warned. He rose and kicked out at the nearest pile of barrels. They fell to barricade the corridor. Pierre Charmand straightened up. His great arms encircled another column of stacked barrels, sent it crashing.

THE iron-masked man also rose. Together he and Charmand heaved against a row of kegs. They began to topple. If they fell, the Nazis would be crushed beneath the kegs. If they fell—

But the bullets fell first.

A red knife cut through Pierre Charmand’s waist. A score of slugs tore the grizzled Frenchman almost in two. Sick with horror, Drake saw him fall.

The bullets swerved, and now the iron-masked man was raked by the missiles of death.

But he did not fall!

Drake saw the red line cross his body as the bullets struck—but the man stood like a statue, straining at the row of kegs and casks.

And even as Drake watched, the stranger in the iron mask gave a single massive wrench of his shoulders and sent the entire column of kegs crashing down upon the heads and shoulders of the Nazi gunners.

Then, “Come on,” he whispered, and dived through the open loading entrance. Drake followed, before the booming echoes of the fallen barrels had ceased resounding through the vault behind them.

The door clanged shut and they crawled forward in utter darkness. Soon they had overtaken Roselle.

“What happened?” she whispered. “Where is Father?”

“Don’t talk,” muttered Drake, fiercely. “Keep moving. They may follow.”

Through the stifling confines of the loading chute they moved on hands and knees. Drake clutched the casket to his breast. He heard Roselle’s strident breathing, heard his own gasps. But the iron-masked stranger was silent.

And then, at last, their bursting lungs knew relief as Drake reached the other end of the chute and cautiously pushed up the hatchway leading to the alley behind the brewery.

He stared out at a moon-drenched, deserted expanse of streets. The Nazi trucks were around the corner in front of the brewery.

“Come on,” he urged. “We can get away now.”

“Where are we going?” Roselle muttered.

“Follow me—no time to explain,” Drake flung over his shoulder as he started down the alley at a steady trot. Girl and stranger joined him.

Wordlessly, Drake led them on; led them surely and unerringly. They toiled up a steep hillside, Drake in the lead.

Suddenly the girl put a hand across her mouth to stifle a gasp of fear. She pointed to the pathway ahead.

“Look there!” she whispered. “A Nazi!”

“A dead Nazi,” said Drake, grimly.

"We killed him earlier this evening."

"We?"

The masked stranger nodded at the girl. "We're climbing the path where Drake and I fought off the Gestapo squad," he explained.

"There's a cave leading out of the chateau at the top," Drake told her. "I think we'll be safe there for a while."

Only when they reached die cavern did he permit the girl and the masked stranger to halt. It was several minutes more before they were able to speak.

SLOWLY, gently, Drake went about the unpleasant task of explaining Pierre Charmand's absence.

"He died for France," Drake said. "And so did the others. We alone are left to carry on the fight. And we should not be here now if our friend had not acted." Drake turned to the masked stranger. "That was a heroic stunt of yours," he commented. "Standing there in the direct line of machine-gun fire to pull down those kegs on Hassman's men."

An awkward shrug was his only answer. But this did not satisfy Drake. His eyes rested on the masked man intently.

"There is just one detail you might explain," Drake drawled.

"And what is that, Monsieur?" came the whispering response.

"Just how you pulled that little trick and still managed to remain alive," Drake challenged. "Because—I saw at least fifty bullets strike your body!"

There was a moment of tense silence. Again, an awkward shrug from the stranger. He raised his arms, slowly. Drake and the girl followed his movements. Once again, the masked man removed-the black velvet covering from his face. Once again, in the light of the moon streaming through the mouth of the cavern, they gazed on the iron horror of the mask he wore.

Drake noted the silvery surface of the metal, and his keen gaze encompassed many details he hadn't remembered. The mask was not covering the face alone, but extended like a brazen helmet over his entire head, terminating tightly at the neck where the cloak reached up to cover its edges.

And the iron mask bore—bullet scars. Fully a dozen indentations were visible on the battered surface of the grisly monstrosity.

Drake's gaze never wavered. A deep sigh came from behind the mask.

"Very well," whispered the stranger. "I can no longer conceal the truth from you. I am not human—but immortal."

"Immortal?"

The iron visage bobbed in assent.

"Then—who are you, really?"

"I? the whisper came. "I am—The Man in the Iron Mask!"

4. Masque de Fer

"YOU are the Man in the Iron Mask?" gasped Drake.

Incredulity shone in his eyes. Roselle's piquant features contorted in puzzled disbelief.

But the stranger shook his iron visage slowly in assent.

"I am," he whispered.

"But the Iron Mask legend is hundreds of years old," Drake objected.

"So am I," whispered the stranger. "And I can assure you that the story is no legend. While the truth is known to me alone, it is still a matter of historically accepted fact that I lived. All that remains unknown is the fact that I am still alive. Yes, alive—and here to save France in her hour of need!"

Drake and the girl were silent. The Man in the Iron Mask hunched forward oddly until he squatted directly before them on the floor of the cavern.

"Naturally I couldn't tell you this before, Drake. I told you that I was a soldier with a burned face—because it was more believable. But now that you've guessed part of my secret by seeing bullets strike me without injuring my body, you may as well know the rest. Know that I am immortal—and why."

"Yes—why?" Drake persisted.

"This is my story," whispered the stranger. "But first, I shall help you to recall the accepted historical version.

"In 1679, a man wearing an iron mask—a masque de fer—was sent to the fortress of the Isle Ste. Marguerite, off the coast of Provence.

"He arrived in a closely-guarded coach, escorted by the king's men all the way from Paris—and he was imprisoned on royal order.

"The soldiers caught furtive glimpses of his masked face, and marveled at the curiously-wrought ironwork that screened it. Slits for eyes and nostrils and a hinged jaw for a mouth were all that broke the hideous metal prison that held a human head. Naturally they whispered and wondered.

"At the fortress, the Man in the Iron Mask was received by the Governor, Benigne D'Auvergne de Saint-Mars. Saint-Mars had furnished a special room where the Man in the Iron Mask was to be held captive—a room sumptuously appointed with fine furnishings and luxurious hangings.

"He and he alone had charge of the prisoner's welfare, but rumors leaked out—about the fine food provided for this unusual captive, and the plates of silver and pewter that adorned his table.

"It was also rumored that King Louis XIV's minister, Louvois, was a regular visitor; although no one else was allowed to see this prisoner. Saint-Mars guarded his charge well.

"In 1681 the prisoner, accompanied by Saint-Mars, went to Exiles, near Pignerol, traveling in a closed litter. From 1687 to 1698 he was incarcerated at Pignerol. By this time wild stories were whispered, but although many sought to fathom the identity of the captive, little was learned. He was said to pass his time playing the guitar, or pacing in his cell—always wearing this curious mask of iron over his face and head.

"In 1698 he went to the Bastille with Saint-Mars. Here, in 1703, he died. Keepers scraped and whitewashed his prison walls. The doors and window frames were burned. All of the vessels used in his service were melted down. There was nothing left as evidence to show that for 24 years a prisoner had actually been a captive of Saint-Mars.

“Since that date, the strange story of the Man in the Iron Mask has become a fascinating plaything for historians and theorists; a great mystery, indeed.

“Was the Man in the Iron Mask really Fouquet, the disgraced minister of finance under Louis XIV? Was he an obscure Armenian patriarch who preached heresy against the throne? Could he have been Comte de Vermandois, the son of Louis XIV and Mademoiselle de la Valliere?

“Was he the Due de Beaufort? The English Duke of Monmouth? An Italian adventurer named Count Ercolo Matthioli? Or as Dumas would have it, was the Iron Mask really Louis’s twin brother?

“In 1789, with the fall of the Bourbons, the records of the Bastille were opened to the public.

“Every prisoner’s name and history was inscribed on a register at the time he entered the prison. Surely the secret of Iron Mask would be revealed here!

“But the page bearing the date of his admittance had been carefully torn out of the register!

“The identity of the Man in the Iron Mask has remained a great mystery.

“And well it might be. For I am the Man in the Iron Mask—and I am immortal.”

The whispering voice paused momentarily.

Drake glanced at the brazen horror of that head, but he couldn’t read a trace of human emotion in the iron, immovable face.

“But you say that the Iron Mask died, was buried in 1703,” he objected.

A low chuckle came from under the mask.

“That was all part of the plot,” came the answer. “But now, my friends, you shall learn the truth. Who I am—and what I am.”

ROSELLE nestled closer to Eric Drake as the Iron Mask again took up his tale.

"My name I shall not reveal, for it was a great one in the annals of France.

"Sufficient to say that I am the son of an alchemist—an alchemist both famous and infamous.

My grandfather was none other than Michel de Notre-Dame."

"Nostradamus!" whispered Eric Drake. "Nostradamus, the prophet!"

"I see you too know history," came the whisper. "Yes, he was indeed the prophet. And my father knew the arts of prophecy which he had learned from Nostradamus. Those arts of divination he taught to me, for I was destined for a brilliant career.

"That was how my father planned it. He was a true seeker of forbidden secrets, a lurker in darkness. But I was to profit from his learning. Young, handsome, equipped with all of his own knowledge and skill, he visioned a great future for me at the court of the Grand Monarch of France.

"Alchemists and prophets were popular, and with my looks I could surely go far.

"I left his home after drinking a toast to the future in mantic brew. And in a short time I arrived in Paris, armed with letters of introduction to those in high places.

"Within a year I was famous. Working only behind the scenes, I gained the confidence and grateful friendship of all the king's ministers. I advised Colbert, the minister of home affairs. Lionne the diplomat sought me out to predict a course of future state policy for France. I knew Louvois, minister of war, and Fouquet the minister of finance.

"In a quiet way, I was really ruling France! It was only a short time until both de la Valliere and later Madame de Maintenon were coming to me for advice on how to rule King Louis himself!

"But the Grand Monarch learned of this somehow. Through the trickery of a rival, a charlatan, he was told that I had exercised my good looks, youthfulness, and wizard's knowledge to fascinate Madame de Maintenon.

"And Louis, maddened by jealousy, devised this hideous jest of his. I was to be imprisoned, suddenly and quietly—and forced to hide my face behind a mask of iron!

"So it came to pass. I had no trial, no hearing. Although Louvois pleaded for me, the furious Grand Monarch would not heed.

"I was seized, made a captive of Saint-Mars, and condemned to wear the Iron Mask for the rest of my days.

"It was a gruesome sentence indeed—but even Louis didn't realize its true meaning. For the rest of my days would constitute a great span indeed—because I was immortal!

"Yes, immortal. The letter from my father reached me secretly; by some tragic irony it arrived only a few hours before I was imprisoned.

"In it my father, who was at the point of death, recalled to me the toast we had drunk together on the day I left for Paris.

"He had given me an alchemic solution—the fabulous goal of his research—an elixir that meant eternal life.

"It sounds fantastic. It did, then. Yet as time went on in that ghastly prison, I realized that I had lost none of my youthful energy. The iron mask was soldered to my face, and I could not remove it to see if my features were aging, but I felt no older after twenty long years than I had on the day I was made a prisoner.

"I shall not dwell on those years—on the frantic, futile efforts I made to escape. Louvois still visited me for advice, and I gave it to him. But King Louis would not hear of my release. He was fanatically determined to keep me under this unnatural punishment until I died.

"Therefore, I determined to die. Saint-Mars, my jailer, had been specially selected by Louis XIV for his unswerving loyalty. He was my only, and constant companion.

"It took me 24 years to wear down his loyalty to the crown. It took me 24 years to persuade him to end this hideous imprisonment of mine, and permit me to escape.

“At last, in the Bastille, he consented. And the opportunity arose. A disgraced Italian secret agent was brought to his care. No one knew that this Matthioli had been made a captive and there was no record. The outside world thought he had disappeared. So I persuaded Saint-Mars not to enter his name on the register. And when Matthioli died, Saint-Mars took word to the king that the Man in the Iron Mask was dead.

“His face was unknown. Louis himself could not be expected to recognize the features of a man shut away for 24 years, his head covered by a mask of iron. The body was accepted, and buried secretly. Then the jailers tore down the room I had occupied and destroyed all evidence of my existence.

“As for me, I was far away.

“I shall never forget that first day of freedom. I bribed a blacksmith with gold, made him remove the hateful mask that hid my features. And then I stared into a mirror—stared and saw the ghastly caricatured lineaments of an old man’s face. The face of an ancient madman staring back at me. An old man’s face on a young man’s body!

“That I was youthful could not be denied. The mysterious elixir was potent in my veins. But my face, concealed by the iron mask, had aged atrociously.

“Then and there I swore to resume the iron mask that had been my badge of secret shame—resume it and wear it until I could bring glory to France; and in bringing that glory, make the Iron Mask a symbol for the ages.

“Again, I shall omit the greater part of my adventures. I left France and bitter memories and traveled far. I became a sort of Wandering Jew. I shall not speak of the long years, for it is not pleasant to remember them. Living for centuries is not a boon—it is a nightmare.

“Money I found, and my art of prophecy had not deserted me. And always I kept to my vow. Always when France was in peril I appeared.

“Secretly I sought out Louis XVI to disclose Marie Antoinette’s intrigue with Count Fersen. As an Egyptian priest I talked with Napoleon in the shadow of the Sphinx; helped him plan his conquests.

"Again, I visited Napoleon III when he languished in a foreign prison as a middle-aged failure. I gave him the plans whereby he later triumphed and became master of the Empire.

"Secretly, I have made history. And now—in this hour of need—I am in France again. I am here to help the Underground and make France free. I must help in my own way. There are certain things I can do.

"One asset is the fact that I cannot die. On the other hand, I cannot remove this iron mask—for centuries have turned the horror of my face into a mummy's death-grin. I must work silently, and from below. That is why I am in the Underground."

The furtive whisper ceased, and there was a moment of profound silence in the cavern.

Then Roselle sighed.

"But the Underground is dead here in Dubonne," she said. "We are the only ones who escaped. It is true, we are awaiting word from headquarters in Paris—"

"Word from headquarters?" whispered Iron Mask.

"Yes," Drake assented. "Charmand told me we could expect an important message shortly. There is to be a general plan of revolt to aid the invasion of the Continent. All Underground units in France and Belgium, Holland, Denmark—everywhere—will be given instructions on a course of procedure."

Drake shrugged. "Of course, that means little now, as Roselle says. Hassman has virtually wiped out our unit. We have no headquarters any more, no means of reorganizing and waiting for this message." The Iron Mask nodded.

"I think I can solve our problem," he whispered. "I have taken steps to arrange matters in anticipation of an emergency like this."

Roselle turned to the immortal one, bewilderment in her eyes.

"But where can we go?" she murmured. "Hassman's men are searching for us now. They'll come here soon to find us—and they'll cover any possible future meeting place we might select. Where can we establish the Underground now?"

"Underground," said Iron Mask. "Underground? Where?"

"Underground," repeated Iron Mask. "From now on we will establish our headquarters—under the offices of gauleiter Hassman!"

5. Under the Nazi Heel

DAWN came, and daylight, brilliant noon, and then twilight once again —but Drake and Roselle slept. Iron Mask stolidly declined to rest, but stood guard at the entrance-way until darkness fell.

Only once did he slip away during the day, returning shortly with food.

A meal of sorts awaited man and girl when they awoke. "Help yourselves," came the whisper from behind the mask. "I've already eaten."

"Where did you get the food?" Roselle inquired. Iron Mask shrugged.

"I'm an old hand at this sort of life," he replied. "But come—finish your meal. We've got to move to our new headquarters tonight."

"About that matter," said Drake, "I still don't see what you mean by saying we can go under the gauleiter's offices."

Iron Mask rose awkwardly and waved an arm, stiffly. "Surely you know that Hassman and his men are quartered in the old city hall?"

"Yes," said Roselle. "When my father was mayor, he—" The girl stopped, her voice choking as she remembered the death of Pierre Charmand.

Iron Mask compassionately ignored her distress. "Very well. Beneath the city hall is the cellar regulating the sewerage system installed here back in the 1870 era of the Republic. You must remember? They built the city hall over it; some idea of municipal building with the controls all emanating from a central point.

"Of course, since the Nazis have come, the municipal sewerage system has been abandoned. I doubt very much if they are even aware that there is a sub-cellar under the city hall. Certainly no one ever goes down there.

"I investigated today, and it is quite safe. Of course, the tunnels and pipes aren't very safe any more, but we shall be in the cellar itself."

Drake turned, eyebrows raised in objection.

"Just how do you propose we get to the cellar?" he. asked. "Are we to march through the city hall under Hassman's nose and ask to be directed to the cellar stairs?"

"We'll get there in the same manner that I did this afternoon," Iron Mask explained. "We'll crawl through the empty pipes. There's an outlet right below this hill. The damned-up sewage still in the pipes is trapped in a second parallel pipe. Our pipe is dry and free—it's fully seven feet in diameter, and we can walk through it."

"Just like Jean Valjean in Les Miserables!" exclaimed Roselle.

Iron Mask nodded gravely. "We must be careful, though. The pipe is brittle with age and rust. A sudden shock might cause it to burst and the parallel pipe would discharge its flow and flood us out. I'm afraid, on second thought, that it's no place for a young lady."

"Nonsense! exclaimed Roselle. "I'm going with you and Drake. There's work to be done. At least we'll have a safe place to wait until we get word from Paris tomorrow. Then we can make other plans."

"Come, then," said Iron Mask.

They left the cavern and descended the hillside cautiously. The moon was bright again, and they clung to the shadowed surface of the rocks lest a passing patrol note their moving figures.

Black-cloaked Iron Mask led them to the forbidding mouth of the pipe, jutting out of the base of the hill above the bank of the river that wound below Dubonne. Once again his great strength came into play as he lifted a huge iron cylinder covering the opening.

"I don't know why they didn't drain the parallel pipe when they shut off the sewerage system," he whispered. "It was probably abandoned very hastily. But this pipe is free. Come on—Drake, use that pencil-flash of yours to guide us. It's dark in here."

It was dark. It was also hot, and unbearably fetid. But somehow, the trio managed to flounder through the long passageway, walking inside a pipe bored in the earth.

Now they were truly "Underground" in every sense of the word!

Relief came at last as they reached the end of the straight span of pipe, rounded a curve that sloped upwards. The going was slow, but they made it. Eventually Iron Mask lifted the huge disk overhead and they clambered up the iron rungs of a ladder.

"The head of the pipe is connected directly with the drainage pool under the streets," Iron Mask explained. "But this exit leads to the floor of the cellar in the city hall."

And so it did. They climbed the iron rungs of the ladder to emerge in the musty cellar.

"Oh!" Roselle exclaimed, "you've prepared for our coming!"

It was true. From somewhere, Iron Mask had unearthed several cots, some blankets, and a few cartons containing a stack of provisions. There was even an old, battered oil lamp which he proceeded to light, his gloved fingers moving clumsily as he struck a match and held it to the wick.

"What's that?" muttered Drake, as an ominous creaking sounded overhead.

IRON MASK uttered a rasping chuckle.

"Probably Hassman pacing the floor and worrying over our escape," he whispered. "Don't forget, we're in the cellar directly beneath him."

"Then those stairs must lead to a door in the city hall," Drake decided, pointing to a dusty flight across the cellar.

"True, but the door is barred. They have never come down here and never will," muttered Iron Mask. "We're safe here. And now—"

"And now it's time for me to keep my appointment," Drake snapped, glancing at his watch and re-winding it.

"Drake—do you know where to go?" Roselle asked, anxiously.

“Yes. I have my instructions.” From the folds of his trench jacket Drake produced the casket of official papers.

“I am to turn this over to the Paris Underground agent and receive my instructions,” he said.

“But Drake, how will you recognize him? Where will you meet?”

“Your father gave me full details,” Drake assured her.

“But they must have men out watching for us,” Roselle objected. “They know we escaped them the other night. It’s broad daylight outside, Eric. They’ll hunt you down.”

Drake smiled and patted her shoulder.

“Tell you what we’ll do,” he said. “We’ll beat them at their own game and try a bit of spying ourselves.

“My man will be waiting to make contact with me at Antoine’s bistro down the street. Roselle, you go through the pipe and come into town from the south. Keep your face down and be sure to step inside the nearest house if you see a Nazi patrol on the streets. But if you can get to Antoine’s, just look in and see if you can notice a cure carrying a yellow valise. That’s my man.

“And you, my friend, can come into town from the north.” Drake nodded at Iron Mask. “Naturally, with your cloak and mask you’ll be conspicuous. But I’m relying on that. I want the Nazi patrols to spot you—because you can draw them away.

“Owing to your rather peculiar gift of immortality, I don’t suppose you fear their bullets. And after witnessing your cleverness and resourcefulness these past hours, I am sure you can elude your pursuers without great danger.

“At any rate, the Nazis will continue to hunt you. If you and Roselle return and Roselle tells me my man is waiting—then I can go up myself to keep the appointment. The Nazis will be off on a wild goose chase in the hills north of town, looking for a man in a mask and a cloak. Right?”

They nodded.

“Then off you go,” Drake urged. “Back through the pipe.”

They left.

Drake pulled out one of his few remaining cigarettes from a precious package and lit it slowly. Then, quite deliberately, he took out a pack-knife and pried the lid of the metal casket cradled in his lap.

He rummaged through the papers inside until he found a folded yellow sheet. This he read, frowning and muttering to himself as his eyes squinted in the murky lamplight.

Carefully he stuffed the documents back in the casket and lowered the lid.

He doused his cigarette, looked at his watch, frowned again. His head cocked forward as he listened intently for sounds in the city hall above. All was silent. Drake smiled, nodded.

Suddenly he snapped his fingers, sent one hand diving into the pocket of his trench coat and produced a gun.

It cocked with a click.

Drake rose and walked deliberately toward the dusty stairway that led to the city hall above. He climbed the stairs, set his shoulder to the door at the head of the stairway, and stepped into the lair of gauieiter Hassman.

6. The Sewer

PURE chance had it that Roselle and Iron Mask should meet at the moment both returned to crawl through the sewer pipe.

“Is he waiting?” Iron Mask whispered.

“Yes,” said the girl. “I saw him. But the patrols are everywhere. Only a few minutes after I entered town, I saw them swarming down the steps of the city hall. Even Hassman himself came out. I wonder who informed him something was stirring?”

“I did probably,” whispered the man in the cloak.

“I let myself be seen very plainly. I’ve been leading at least three patrols a merry chase across the hills. I managed to dodge down here, but I urge that we hasten out of sight before we’re seen.”

Again he clumsily lifted the great lid and the two retraced their footsteps through the sewer pipe, moving delicately lest the brittle metal shatter under the impact of their tread.

It was Iron Mask who was the first to emerge in the cellar once again—but it was Roselle who uttered the first gasp of astonishment.

“Eric!” she cried. “Eric’s gone!”

Iron Mask whirled in astonishment.

“The fool—he must have left while we were away!”

He strode awkwardly toward the room’s end where the lamp glowed fitfully, throwing his grotesque shadow across the wall.

“The casket’s gone, too,” he announced. “There’s something queer going on here.”

As though stifled by its confining folds, Iron Mask suddenly ripped the black velvet covering from his metal visage and revealed the brazen shield covering his face. His gloved hands went to his iron temples in perplexity.

Roselle, despite her familiarity with the grim mask, couldn’t repress a slight tremor of distaste. There was something unnatural about this immortal adventurer. His husky voice, his clumsiness, and his penchant for cloaking his body and features in black—this, coupled with the brazen, leering mask that served to hide his face, caused her to feel a chill of repulsion.

Suddenly, Iron Mask lumbered toward her.

“Where is he?” came the whisper. “It’s a conspiracy, isn’t it? You and he have something planned. He took the casket and deserted me, didn’t he? Admit it.”

“No,” muttered the girl. “He wouldn’t do such a thing! Erie is—”

The reply was cut short by an ominous thudding from overhead. Muffled but audible, a revolver shot echoed through the cellar. And then—

The door at the head of the cellar stairs burst open. Eric raced down the steps, panting.

“Come on,” he shouted. “Through the sewer pipe. Hurry! Roselle.

"Tell you later," Drake grunted. "Hassman's back. Get into the pipe, quick!"

One hand grasping the metal casket, the other flourishing a revolver, Drake prodded Roselle and Iron Mask toward the floor opening. The clambered down the iron rungs of the ladder until they stood in the dark tunnel of brittle pipe.

Drake followed, and just in time.

Thunder shook the stairs. Hassman was leading his pack into the cellar!

The fat gauleiter caught sight of Eric's head as he descended, and before Drake could pull the iron lid into place, the Nazis were upon him.

No time to descend the ladder—Eric leaped to the bottom of the pipe and began to run forward. Iron Mask and Roselle clambered ahead in the utter darkness.

And behind them came the Nazi horde.

There was a scene ripped from nightmare's darkest depths—the three fugitives groping their way through the black, twisted interior of the slippery iron pipe. They ran lightly, lest their tread shatter the brittle surface. Iron Mask had warned them about the danger of break-throughs from the parallel pipe over their heads.

Panting, gasping, sobbing for breath, the trio floundered on. And behind them, the Nazis charged.

Hassman at the head, the entire column clambered down the ladder into the pipe.

And then began the race through darkness . . . the mad, incredible race, punctuated by bursts of flame from Nazi Lugers.

"Hurry!" panted Drake. Roselle clutched his arm as he half-dragged her forward. "They're gaining!" he muttered, as they rounded the bend leading to the end of the pipe.

Iron Mask suddenly stumbled and fell. Drake bit his lip. "Get up!" he hissed. "You're blocking our path—"

He tugged at the fallen figure. Iron Mask rose. But too late.

FOR the great figure of Hassman loomed out of the murky twilight as he rounded the bend in the pipe. Behind him came the gray-clad hunters, and their Lugers spoke—

“Down!” shouted Drake, tugging at the shoulders of his companions. Flame jetted over their heads and an ear-splitting echo resounded throughout the brittle interior of the pipa. Resounded and magnified.

There was a roar and a rumble; a shuddering convulsion that shook the metal under their feet.

“Earthquake!” screamed Roselle.

“No,” Drake muttered. “The pipe’s broken!”

His words were hardly spoken before dreadful confirmation came.

Whether caused by weight of their running bodies or by the force of concussion reverberations, the pipe had shattered—and now the parallel pipe poured forth its hideous burden.

With a rush and a roar, a torrent of acrid liquid gushed down upon the heads of the Nazis.

They turned, screaming, but there was no escape. In a moment the entire length of pipe behind them filled with a raging flood of boiling, churning debris.

“Run!” yelled Drake.

There was no need to command. The trio took to their heels and not a moment too soon. They clambered along the pipe as the roaring waters engulfed the Nazis behind them.

And then they were clambering out of the pipe mouth on the hillside, racing up the road toward the cave.

But Hassman and his men did not follow. As they ran up the road, Drake glanced over his shoulder. He saw the torrent surge out of the pipe mouth and spout down in a stream to the river. Gray bodies whirled in its crest—and he knew that Hassman and his men would no longer patrol the streets of Dubonne. They had drowned in the sewer, like the rats they were.

Panting with exhaustion, Drake and Roselle entered the safety of the cavern. Iron Mask strode stolidly beside them.

Roselle forced a smile to her lips.

"It's wonderful, Eric," she murmured. "We seem to be spending our entire life just running from one underground hole to another. And all because of this silly casket—"

"I can solve that."

Iron Mask stood in the doorway, blotting out the exit. The whisper came from between metal-shrouded lips.

"What's that?" Drake said.

"I can promise you that this is the last refuge you need ever seek," he whispered. "Just give the casket to me."

"But I'm to turn it over to the Paris representative—"

"Give it to me, now."

Iron Mask's voice was still a whisper, but it was hard—hard as iron.

"Wait a minute, now."

"I wait no longer." The whisper was cold—cold as steel.

The man in the cloak moved down upon the two. The metal mask leered its frozen grin, and there was neither human mirth nor human emotion in its set and steely features.

"Give me that casket."

Drake reached for his revolver.

"Stand back," he warned. "I don't know what you mean by all this, but if you come a step further I'll blast a hole through you."

A chuckle burbled from beneath the immovable iron lips.

"You forget I am immortal."

"Stand back!"

But Iron Mask came on. His great arms reached forward—and Drake fired. Drake saw the bullet strike the black cloak and rip through the cloth covering the shoulder. But Iron Mask was immortal, and he loomed closer —

DRAKE fired again. This time the bullet tore through the cloth above the chest, and Drake saw the shreds part to reveal a patch of skin—of silver skin!

A dry, rattling laugh came from the throat of Iron Mask. “You see?” he whispered. “Yes, you see, but don’t understand, do you? Then—look, you fool!” Gloved hands raked out awkwardly, sweeping the top of the cloak from Iron Mask’s head and revealing his entire skull. It was bare now, rising in a great, silvery dome. And Drake saw that this creature had no iron mask—its entire head was iron!

Drake was stunned into immobility. Chuckling, the creature drew the concealing gloves from gleaming. metal hands—hands that now ripped off the black cloak and the garments beneath it.

Iron Mask stood stripped and revealed for what he was; an entity whose head and body were constructed entirely of burnished, deathless metal!

“Robot!” Drake gasped.

Roselle’s shriek and Iron Mask’s rattling chuckle mingled in mocking reply.

Drake watched the metal monster as it lunged toward him. He fired blindly, wildly; saw the bullets ricochet from the body of the iron robot. He knew then that there was no hope, no solution.

Then the robot was upon him, and its great shaft-like metal arms embraced him. He felt the cold chill of its iron embrace, it crushed him close and squeezed. The world was turning red, spinning madly—

Drake lifted his revolver, brought it down on the robot’s shoulders. The chuckling horror bent him back. Agony lanced up Drake’s spine. The creature bent its iron head—

Drake struck, then. His eyes focussed on the gleaming expanse of exposed iron skull. And he brought the butt of his revolver down with crushing force on the back of the robot’s head.

The blow could not shatter iron—but there was a sudden splintering crash, and the revolver-butt bit deeply into a gaping hole in the ruined cranium.

A whistling scream rose from iron lips and the robot tottered back on its heels. Arms fell, releasing Drake.

He stepped back just in time. With a crash, the robot dropped to the cavern floor. Iron limbs writhed in a last, delirious spasm. Carefully-fashioned jointures were strained and wrenched as though in death-agony as arms and legs twisted convulsively.

And then the ruined head rolled back, and from the opening poured a thin, yellowish ichor.

Drake stooped and peered into the depths of the shattered metal skull. He poked the muzzle of his revolver inside, then stepped back just in time.

A shower of tiny cogs and wires emerged in a writhing tangle, accompanied by the acrid smoke of a miniature explosion.

There was no further movement from the metal body on the floor after that.

Drake stooped and picked up the casket, then joined the sobbing girl.

“Dry your eyes,” he said, brusquely. “It’s all over now.”

“Yes—but—”

“The Nazis are wiped out, the casket is safe, and now the Underground’s greatest menace has been removed.” Drake’s gray eyes stared sombrely at the figure on the cavern floor, but his lips held a tight grin.

“So it’s the end,” he half-whispered. “The real end of a living legend—the Man in the Iron Mask is no more.”

7. The Final Irony

FOR a long moment, Drake stood staring down at the gleaming silver body of the robot; then Roselle was in his arms and he was comforting her, whispering.

The girl’s eyes never left the twisted, inhuman frame of metal that had walked the earth in the guise of man. The cleverly articulated limbs of the metal monster looked oddly grotesque now—Roselle could recall the Iron Mask's clumsy movements.

Here was the explanation, together with the reason for his imperviousness to bullets, and great strength.

But there were many other matters not explained. Roselle turned to Drake, and her lips framed questions.

"When did I first suspect?" Drake answered. "Probably at the very start. You fired at his head and the bullet struck. Even a wounded soldier with a steel faceplate would be injured by a bullet. Besides—did you notice he never slept or ate?

"Then, too, the matter of the casket bothered me. Why was he so anxious to find it and keep it on his person? Obviously because it contained something of vital importance—perhaps a clue as to his real identity.

"Even when we heard the story of the Man in the Iron Mask, my suspicions were not allayed. Granting that his story was true, and he was immortal—I still couldn't swallow this business about his being a savior of France.

"It didn't ring true. A savior of France would not counsel Napoleon to conquer. A savior of France would not restore the Empire. A savior of France would certainly be active during World War I.

"Right then and there I reasoned that, immortal or not, he was an enemy. An enemy to watch. And he betrayed us—you see that now, don't you?"

"Yes," said Roselle, slowly. "I think I do."

"He was after the casket from the start," Drake told her. "That's why he attacked you. He wanted to get the casket and the information it contained, before either the Underground or the Nazis would lay hands on it.

"So he took it from you and made off with it. He ran into the Gestapo squad on the road, and there was nothing to do but fight. Although he was working for the Nazis, he didn't want them to discover his secret, either. So he fought them. And I helped him.

"Then, when we came to headquarters, he left to secure information before the meeting. Obviously, he had an easy way of securing that information—he merely went to Hassman and asked for it. At the same time he led Hassman back to attack the Underground meeting.

“He meant to wipe us out, but when I got the casket in the darkness he followed me when we escaped. Then we told him there was news coming from Paris regarding future Underground activities.

“That’s when he fed us the story about his immortality. He wanted us to believe him. And he wanted us to keep alive until we got the news from Paris. Then we could die, when the information was in his hands.

“Naturally, he selected our new headquarters under the gauleiter’s offices. Not alone because it was a clever idea from our point of view, but also because he could lead Hassman to us at any time.

“He almost succeeded, but not quite. What he didn’t know is that I took advantage of our headquarters to do a little spying on my own.

“When I went out to meet the Underground emissary from Paris, he tipped off Hassman. The whole force went out to wait for me and the Paris Underground agent. They planned to seize us as we met.

“But I didn’t go to the rendezvous. Instead, I went upstairs, to Hassman’s office. I searched through his papers and found—the truth about the Man in the Iron Mask! Who he was and what he was doing!

“I learned then and there that he was a spy of Germany, and an important one.

“Then I opened the casket and read the papers within. One of them was what he was looking for.

“You remember him telling us that the Bastille record of the Man in the Iron Mask was missing? Well, that paper is in the casket. No wonder he wanted it—and didn’t want either the French or Germans to find it! For it told the rest of his story, and in it I read the secret of how to destroy him.”

ROSELLE shook her head. “I still don’t understand,” she said. “Just who and what was he? Who created him and what was he doing?”

Drake grinned.

"I'll be brief. After putting two and two together—piecing together his story, the papers in Hassman's office, and the Bastille registry, I can tell you this:

"He was a robot, created by Roger Bacon, in the 13th century. The Bastille record says 1287, but we can't be sure."

"Roger Bacon? The English monk?"

"Exactly. He was an alchemist who dabbled in science and what was then called sorcery—though if he created this marvelous mechanism, he was no sorceror but a genuine savant. There is an old legend about a 'Brazen Head' Bacon made, which could prophecy the future. I never gave the story credit for having any significance—but now I can see. Roger Bacon didn't create a 'Brazen Head' at all; he made this robot. By alchemic means he endowed it with perpetual life, and human intelligence.

"He fashioned it during the years he was imprisoned for heresy—in France. Yes, the French put him in prison, and he languished there nourishing a hatred. A hatred for France.

"So he made the robot, as an instrument of vengeance. The robot was animated by a single purpose—not to save France, but to destroy it.

"That much we know, for the Bastille entry tells us so. What the robot's activities were after Bacon's death we can only surmise. It turned up almost four hundred years later at the court of Louis XIV.

"From that point on, the story roughly corresponds to what he told us when he claimed to be the Man in the Iron Mask, He did appear in court as a prophet and soothsayer, and the king's ministers did seek his advice. Louis XIV did order his imprisonment; but he didn't order that his prisoner wear an iron mask.

"He had always worn the iron mask—for it was his head! No wonder they hid him away in secret. He must have been clever even then, to keep them from finding out that he was an automaton, instead of a man wearing a mask. No one suspected, however.

"And even as a prisoner, no one suspected his advice. He did give advice, but not advice to save France. He plotted her downfall. Historians agree that the actions of Louis XIV were directly responsible for the policies leading to the French Revolution 200 years later. And the robot dictated those policies!

"He escaped just as he said he did, and disappeared again. If he indeed betrayed Marie Antoinette he did so to further the disruption of the king. And if he advised Napoleon he did it maliciously, to injure France.

"When the Bastille fell he came there to find the place in the register where his secret was revealed. Someone—we will never know who it was—got there ahead of him and took the register leaf. He must have searched for it high and low; all we know is that it finally ended up here at Dubonne, buried away in an obscure file of old official papers.

"Now we come to the part of the story pieced together from Hassman's reports.

"The robot had not destroyed France by revolution, or by Napoleonic domination. And yet the deathless urge persisted. Friar Bacon's magic was strong, and although we will never understand why it worked, we can see how it worked.

"The robot was in Germany between 1860 and 1870. We do not know what story he used to account for his disguise—always the robot posed as a man in a mask. But we can guess that he wormed his way into high places. Probably he consulted and advised Bismarck himself. It is not too much to suppose that the robot's advice and cunning led to the Franco-Prussian war!

"Now there comes another gap in history. There is no record of the robot's activities in the following years. France was humbled but not destroyed. Perhaps cunning old Bismarck had imprisoned the robot, just as Louis XI did in the old days. Whatever happened, we know the robot had no connection with World War I that we know of—though it seems highly probable that he was at work, fighting against France. And he almost succeeded, then.

"But Hassman's papers do tell us one important thing—they record the meeting of the robot and Adolf Hitler."

Roselle drew back, startled.

He met Hitler?” she gasped.

DRAKE smiled.

“Of course. That is obvious. Think for a moment. Haven’t you heard all stories about Hitler consulting with fortune-tellers and soothsayers? Don’t you realize all those are blind rumors to disguise the presence of a master plotter? Who but the robot would exercise the cunning and savage hatred necessary to plan the downfall of France?

“And when France fell, who but the robot would exact such a monstrous price? The robot hated France, animated by Roger Bacon’s will. And now France had fallen, hence the price.”

“What price?” asked the girl.

Drake leaned forward.

“The robot came here to rule France,” he whispered.

“Rule?”

“Yes. Hassman’s papers reveal that he was taking orders from the robot. That all gauleiters took their orders from him. The real gauleiter of France was our robot. That was its price for helping Hitler!”

Again the two humans stared at the twisted metal figure on the floor.

Drake shook his head. “Who knows where it might have ended?” he mused. “Luckily, the robot blundered. Discovering a clue as to the whereabouts of the papers explaining his true origin, the robot came here from Paris. Getting Gestapo information, including Underground passwords, was simple. Then he set out, double-crossing both the Germans and French, in an effort to secure that tell-tale Bastille entry. He fell in with us, and the rest is—history.”

Roselle snuggled closer to Drake as they moved past the grisly, gleaming shape on the ground and sought the outer entrance on the hillside.

“I still don’t see how you destroyed the robot,” the girl murmured. “I saw you strike the iron head, but it wasn’t a severe blow.”

“The Bastille register entry gave me the secret,” said Drake. “It transcribed Roger Bacon’s own words—probably discovered by some researcher who had suspected the truth and delved back into ancient chronicles of Bacon’s time.

“Bacon hated France, but he was a great scientist and a just man at heart. He never realized what a horror he was unleashing on the world—but he must have suspected that some day the horror would have to be checked. So he wrote down a due.

“Achilles had, a heel—and the iron chain of Tyranny hath always a weak link. That’s what Bacon wrote, and what I saw in the register.

“I never guessed the weakness in the Iron Mask until the robot confronted me with bared head. Then I knew that Bacon must have built it with a flaw. My eye caught a subtle difference in the jointures on top of its skull. Bacon had built it so that if need be it could be destroyed.

“When I struck that vital spot on the skull, the head was smashed. For although the Man in the Iron Mask really had an iron head—a narrow strip across the top of the skull was just plain, ordinary tin!”

Together, man and girl strode forward into the light streaming across the earth above.

The Beasts of Barsac

Old Barsac was too fat to be a vampire, too indolent to become a werewolf —but there are other things!

IT WAS twilight when Doctor Jerome readied the ogre's castle. He moved through the fairy-tale land of a child's picture book; a realm of towering mountain crags, steeply slanting roads ascending to forbidden heights, and clouds that hovered like bearded wraiths watching his progress from on high.

The castle itself was built of dream-stuff. Nightmare qualities predominated in the great grey bulk, rearing its crumbling battlements against a sullen, blood-streaked sky. A chill wind sang its weird welcome as Doctor Jerome advanced towards the castle on the hilltop, and an autumn moon rose above the topmost tower.

As the moon stared down on man and castle alike, a black cloud burst from the ruined battlements and soared squeaking to the sky. Bats, of course. The final touch of fantasy.

Doctor Jerome shrugged and trudged across weed-choked flagstones in the castle courtyard until he reached the great oaken door.

Now to raise the iron knocker . . . the door would swing open slowly, on creaking hinges . . . the tall, gaunt figure would emerge. . . . "Greetings, stranger. I am Count Dracula!"

Doctor Jerome grinned. "Like hell," he muttered.

For the whole fantasy collapsed when he thought of Sebastian Bar sac. This might be an ogre's castle, but Barsac was no ogre.

Nine years ago, at the Sorbonne, he'd made friends with shy, fat little Barsac. Since then they had taken different paths—but it was impossible for Doctor Jerome to imagine his old companion as the ideal tenant of a haunted castle.

Not that Barsac didn't have some queer ideas. He'd always been a little eccentric, and his theories on biological research were far from orthodox—but Jerome could bank on one thing. Barsac was too fat to be a vampire, and too indolent to become a werewolf.

Still, there was something strange about this invitation, coming after a three years' lapse in correspondence. Merely a scribbled note, suggesting that Doctor Jerome come down for a month or so to look over experimental data—but that was Barsac's usual way of doing things.

Ordinarily, Doctor Jerome would ignore such a casual offer, but right now it came as a life-saver. For Doctor Jerome was strapped. He'd been let out of the Foundation, he owed three installments on his rent, and he had—literally—no place to lay his head. By pawning the remnants of his precious equipment he'd managed to cross the Channel and reach Castle Barsac. A month in a real castle with his old friend—it might lead to something.

So Jerome had seized Opportunity before the echo of its knocking had died away. And now he banged the iron knocker, watched the castle door swing open. It did squeak, a bit.

Footsteps. A shadow. And then—

"Delighted to see you!" Sebastian Barsac embraced his friend in the French fashion and began to make Gallic noises of enthusiasm.

"Welcome to Castle Barsac," said the little man. "You are tired after your long march from the railroad station, no? I will show you to your room—servants I do not retain. And after a shower we shall talk. Yes?"

UP THE winding stairs, pursued by a babble of incoherent conversation, Doctor Jerome toiled, bags in hand. He found his oak-panelled chambers, was instructed in the mysteries of the antique mechanical shower arrangement; then was left to bathe and dress.

He had no time to marshal his impressions. It was not until later—after a surprisingly good dinner in a small apartment downstairs—that Jerome was able to sit back and appraise his host.

They retired to a pallor, lit cigars, and sat back before the grateful warmth emanating from the stone fireplace, where a blaze rose to push back the shadows in the room. Doctor Jerome's fatigue had lifted, and he felt stimulated, alert.

As Sebastian Barsac began to discuss his recent work, Jerome took the opportunity to scrutinize his friend.

LITTLE BARSAC had aged, definitely.

He was fat, but flabby rather than roly-poly. The dark hair had receded on his domed forehead, and his myopic eyes peered from spectacles of increased thickness. Despite verbal enthusiasm, the little lord of Castle Barsac seemed oddly languid in his physical movements. But from his talk, Doctor Jerome recognized that Barsac's spirit was unchanged.

The words began to form a pattern in Jerome's mind—a pattern holding a meaning he did not understand.

"So you can see what I have been doing these nine years past. All of my life since I left the Sorbonne has been devoted to one end—discovering the linkage between man and animal through the alteration of cell-structure in the brain. It is an evolutionary process, this thing I seek—an evolutionary process wherein the cycle occurs in the lifespan of the individual animal. And my key? My key is simple. It lies in the recognition of one fact—that the human soul is divisible."

"What is all this?" Doctor Jerome interrupted. "I don't see what you're driving at, Barsac Where's the connection between biology, alteration of cell-structure in the brain, and evolution? And what part does a divisible human soul play in all this?”

“I will be blunt, my friend. I believe that human characteristics can be transferred to animals by means of mechanical hypnosis. I believe that portions of the human soul essence or psyche can be transmitted from man to animal—and that the animal will then begin to ascend the evolutionary scale. In a word, the animal will show human characteristics.”

Doctor Jerome scowled.

“In the nine years that you’ve been dabbling in tin’s unscientific romanticism here in your castle retreat, a new word has come into being to describe your kind, Barsac,” he said. “The word is ’screwball.’ And that’s what I think of you, and that’s what I think of your theory.”

“Theory?” Barsac smiled. “It is more than a theory.”

“It’s preposterous!” Jerome interrupted. “To begin with, your statement about the human soul being divisible. I defy you to show me a human soul, let alone prove that you can cut it in half.”

“I cannot show you one, I grant,” said Barsac.

“Then what about your mechanical hypnosis? I’ve never heard it explained.”

“I cannot explain it.”

“And what, in an animal, are human characteristics? What is your basis of measurement?”

“I do not know.”

“Then how do you expect me to understand your ideas?”

Sebastian Barsac rose. His face was pale, despite the fire’s ruddy glow.

“I cannot show you a human soul,” he murmured, “but I can show you what happens to animals when they possess part of one.

“I cannot explain mechanical hypnosis, but I can show you the machine I use to hypnotize myself and the animals in order to transfer a portion of my soul.

“I cannot measure the human characteristics of the animals undergoing my treatment, but I can show you what they look like and let you judge.

"Even then you may not understand my ideas—but you will see that I am actually carrying them out!"

By this time, Doctor Jerome had also risen to his feet. "You mean you've been transferring your soul to an animal body?"

Sebastian Barsac shrugged. "I have been transferring part of what I call my soul to the bodies of many animals," he amended.

"But you can't—it's biologically impossible. It defies the laws of Reality!"

BEHIND the bulging spectacles, Barsac's eyes gleamed oddly.

"What is Reality and who makes its laws?" he mocked. "Come, and see for yourself the success of my experiments."

He led the way across the chamber, down the hall, and up the great circular staircase. They readied the second floor on which Jerome's room lay, but did not pause. Selecting a panel switch from the open box on the wall, Barsac threw it and illumined the upper stairs. They began to climb again.

And all the while Barsac was talking, talking. "You have seen the gods of ancient Egypt?" he said. "The anthropomorphic stone figures with the bodies of men and the heads of animals? You have heard the legend of the werewolf, of lycanthropic changes whereby man. becomes beast and beast becomes man?

"Fables, all fables. And yet behind the fables lurked a truth. The truth lurks no longer, for I have found it. The seat of evolution lies in the soul, and in the soul's human instrument of expression, the brain. We have grafted cellular structures of one body onto another—why not graft portions of one soul to another? Hypnosis is the key to transference, as I have said.

"All this I have learned by much thought, much experimentation. I have worked for nine years, perfecting techniques and methodology. Many times I failed. To my laboratory I have brought animals, thousands of animals. Many of them died. And I procured others, working endlessly towards one goal. I have paid the price, myself, dying a thousand mental deaths with the failure of each mistaken attempt. Even a physical price I have paid. A monkey—sale cochon!—took from me my finger. So."

Barsac paused and held up his left hand in a dramatic gesture to reveal the stump where his left thumb was missing.

Then he smiled. "But it is not my wounds of battle I wish to display to you—it is the fruits of victory. "Come."

They had reached the topmost tower at last. Doctor Jerome gazed down the dizzying spiral of the stairs they had ascended, then turned his head forward as Barsac unlocked the panelled door of his laboratory and gestured him inside.

The click of a wall switch heralded the coming of light. Doctor Jerome entered and stood dazzled in the doorway.

Set in the mouldering tower of the old castle was a spacious, white-tiled, completely modern laboratory unit. A great outer room, filled with electrical equipment, was displayed before him. All of the appurtenances necessary to micro-biology were ranged on shelves and cabinets.

"Does it please you, Jerome?" asked Barsac. "It was not easy to assemble tills, no. The very tiles were transported up the steep mountain passways to the castle, and the shipping of each bit of equipment was costly. But behold—is it not a perfect spot in which to work?"

DOCTOR JEROME nodded, absently.

His inward thoughts were tinged with definite envy. Barsac here was squandering his genius and his wealth on this crazy dabbling, and he had every scientific luxury at his command, While he, Jerome, a capable scientist with a sound outlook, had nothing; no job, no future, nothing to work with. It wasn't right, it wasn't just. And yet—"Even an electrical plant," Barsac was exclaiming. "We manufacture our own power here, you see. Look around. All is of the finest! Or perhaps you ate eager to see what I promised to show you?"

Doctor Jerome nodded again. He couldn't stand the sight of this spotless laboratory because of the jealousy it aroused. He wanted to get it over with, get out of here.

Now Barsac opened the door of a second room, beyond. It was nearly as large as the first, but the walls were untiled. The original castle stones lent startling contrast to the great gleaming metal cabinet which dominated the center of the chamber.

"This room I had not the heart to change," Barsac explained. "It is here, according to family tradition, that my great-great grandfather conducted his experiments in alchemy. He was a sorceror."

"So is his great-great grandson," Doctor Jerome murmured.

"You refer to the machine?" Barsac stepped over and opened the metal door in the side of the cabinet. Within the large exposed area was a chair, fastened with clamps from which led a number of convoluted tubes and metal valves which in turn were fastened to a switchboard bearing an imposing number of dials and levers.

THE chair faced a glass prism—a window in the metal that had the general appearance of a gigantic lense. Before this prism was a wheel of radiating wires, so fine as to be almost transparent. Various tubes from the chair led to the tips of the wires at different points of the wheel-rim.

"This is not magic but science," Barsac said. "You see before you the mechanical hypnotic device I have perfected. The human subject is seated in the chair, so. The attachments are made, the adjustments calculated. The cabinet is closed. The power is turned on—to be automatically generated for a time-span set beforehand. The subject gazes into the prism. The wires before the prism revolve and various arcs are actuated across its surface. Mechanical hypnosis results—and then, by means of electrical impulse, something of the life-essence, the soul itself, is released. It flows through the glass prism, a vital force, and impinges upon the animal subjects set before the cabinet in the focal range of the glass. The animals receive the essence and—change. The transference is complete. Something of the human goes into the animals. By graduating the focal range I can work with a dozen animals at once. Naturally, each experiment drains my strength and taxes my vitality.”

“It taxes my credulity,” Doctor Jerome interjected.

Barsac shrugged dolefully. “Very well. I could explain minutely the workings of my machine, but I see you demand visual proof of. its work. Come with me.”

The third door was opened and Doctor Jerome stood in the last chamber.

It was hot in here, and a sharp scent smote his nostrils. An animal reek permeated the bare room. Lining the walls were cages—dozens of cages. Some held rats, some white mice, and there was tier upon tier of glass containers housing guinea pigs. Rais squealed, mice squeaked, and guinea pigs chittered.

“Experimental subjects,” Barsac commented. “Alas, the supply is continuously being exhausted. I work on batches of twenty or more at once. You see, not all animals are—responsive—to the treatment.

Out of one batch I could hope for two or three—reactions. That is, until recently. Then I began to find that almost all of my subjects showed changes.”

Barsac moved towards the fourth wall, where no cages loomed. Here w-ere shelves filled with jars. Preserving jars. Doctor Jerome decided.

He moved closer for another look, but Barsac turned. He halted him, left hand on Jerome’s shoulder, so that Doctor Jerome looked down upon the trembling stump where the thumb had been.

“Before I show you this,” he whispered, “are you sure that you will not be shocked? I do not wish to startle you unduly.”

“Let me see,” muttered Doctor Jerome.

“I shall only permit you to gaze upon the last experiments,” Barsac whispered. “I could show you dogs with human legs, mice with human skulls and no tails, monkeys that are hairless and possessed of human faces.

But you would mock at me and say they were freaks, hybrids—or tell me I could produce monstrosities by using infra-red or gamma rays.

“So I shall show you my last experimental results only. The ones that prove not only that human characteristics can be transferred to animals—but that my characteristics have been transferred. The transference of my mental powers cannot be measured. I shall let you judge the physical results only.

“Perhaps they will not excite you very much, these creatures of mine. They are not as grotesque as the earlier ones, but the reproduction of an exact characteristic excites me more than the semi-anthropomorphic structures in the earlier bodies. It shows me that I am on the right track at last. My next step will produce not creatures that are changed and dead, but creatures changed and living I—”

“Show me!” Doctor Jerome commanded.

“You will not be impressed.” Barsac insisted. “They are only rats and you may not even notice—”

“Show me!”

“Then, look.”

Barsac stepped aside and Doctor Jerome gazed down at the jars. The bodies of twenty rats floated in the preserving fluid. Jerome stared. They were rats and only rats—their dead grey bodies were unchanged. Barsac was mad, quite mad.

And then Doctor Jerome saw it. He stared at one rat and saw the left forepaw that was not a forepaw—but a tiny dessicated hand!

He stared at the other rats in the other jars and saw that each left forepaw was alike. Each forepaw was like a human hand—like the left, hand of Sebastian Barsac on which the thumb was missing!

2.

SOMETHING was climbing the ivy outside the castle walls. Something was peering through the castle window—peering with little red-rimmed eyes that held a light of gleeful and atrocious gloating. Something chuckled as it scrambled through the open window and dropped to the floor of the castle bedroom on tiny paws; paws that scraped and padded as they advanced towards the great bed.

Suddenly Jerome felt it crawling up the counterpane. He writhed and twisted, striking out with his hands to dislodge it; but the creature crawled upwards, and now he could hear it chuckling in a voice that was a shrill mockery of human laughter.

Then its head rose on a level with Jerome's eyes, and he saw it—saw the furry figure, the monkeylike body and the mannikin head of a witch's familiar—saw and recognized the hideous little monster for what it was . . . an animal, but with Barsac's face!

He screamed, then, and knew without any further indication that the creature was not alone.

The room was full of them. They were crawling out of the shadows in the corners, they were creeping along die panelling of the walls; they crowded through the door and slithered through rat-holes in the worm-riddled flooring.

They were all about him now, chattering and squealing as they climbed towards him.

Then through the door came the man-sized figures; the man-sized figures with the shaggy bodies and flaming eyes and the acrid scent of the werewolf seeping forth from between their carrion fangs. And beneath their shaggy bodies was the flesh and form of Barsac, and within their flaming eyes was the laughing gaze of Barsac, and Jerome recognized them for what they were and screamed again.

But screaming did not stop them. Nothing stopped them as the mannikin-horde and the wolf-horde flowed in a furry flood towards his writhing body on the bed. He Felt the touch of their horrid paws everywhere, tensed himself for the moment when he would feel their claws, their jaws—

A shriek wrenched from his throat as Jerome sat bolt upright in the bed.

Moonlight streamed tranquilly through the castle window, and its bright pattern was etched upon a bare floor and unshadowed walls.

The creatures were gone. They had never existed, save in his own disordered dreams.

Doctor Jerome sighed and dropped back as the hot perspiration trickled down into his eyes. He drifted off to sleep again.

It seemed to him as though the oaken door opened as he slept, and Barsac crept into the room. The little fat man was smiling a secret smile as lie advanced on the bed. In his arms he held a rabbit—a white rabbit. He stroked the furry head until the ears lay flat and the pink-rimmed eyes were open and alert. Then Barsac's eyes opened and he gazed on Jerome and he fixed Jerome's gaze with unshakable intensity. Barsac's bulging eyes held a command and a ghastly promise, and Jerome could not turn away. Barsac's very being seemed concentrated in his eyes, and as he stared, Jerome felt his own being rise to meet that ghastly gaze.

He felt himself flowing out . . . out . . . and somehow he knew that he was no longer staring at Barsac but at the white rabbit. The white rabbit was absorbing his personality through the hypnotic stare.

Jerome felt weak, giddy. His head reeled, and through a blurred mist he saw the figure of the white rabbit. The white rabbit was growing. The furry body was larger. It slipped out of Barsac's hands and crouched on the floor, looming upwards as it swelled and grew.

Its long white ears were melting into a skull that in itself was changing. The pink muzzle blended back into the face. The rabbit's eyes were moving farther apart and a mouth sprang into prominence above a suddenly protruding chin. The rabbit had a face.

There was something terribly familiar about the rabbit's face. Jerome strove to cleanse his mind of loathing and concentrate upon recognition. He had seen that face before and he knew that he must remember whose it was.

Then, in. a wave of supreme terror, he recognized the face upon the rabbit.

It was his own—

3.

DOCTOR JEROME didn't tell Barsac about his dreams. But Barsac must have noted his pallor and the dark pouches under his eyes, and drawn his own conclusions.

"I fear my accommodations are not of the best," he said, over the breakfast table. "It is my hope that you will soon become accustomed to the simple life. After we begin working together, things will probably adjust themselves, no?"

"No," said Doctor Jerome. "And what makes you think I'm going to work with you?"

"But of course you arc going to work with me, my friend," Barsac declared. "It was for this reason I asked you to come here. I appreciate your brilliance, my friend, and I need your talents badly here.

"I have waited for you before resuming my experiments so that we could complete the final steps together. I realize that you were shocked by what I showed you last night, but I trust your reason has prevailed over your emotions.

"Together we can carry this experiment to its ultimate conclusion. Up to-now I have produced monstrosities—and then managed to reproduce my own physical characteristics in a group of animals. I can go further than that, I think. I have evolved a refinement of my technique. Using other animals than rats, I hope to make the changes and keep them alive.

"Then I can determine whether I have transmitted a portion of my mind as well as a force that changes the bodies to resemble me. You perceive the significance?"

Doctor Jerome did not look as though he perceived anything except a most unpleasant prospect. He shook his head slowly. "I—I can't," he murmured.

“Wait, you misunderstand! I shall not ask you to submit to hypnosis if you do not wish to. I shall take that risk myself. All I desire is that you remain here and help to supervise the work, take notes, and act as a scientific witness to corroborate my findings.”

“It’s no use, Barsac.” Doctor Jerome did not attempt to disguise the disgust that worked in his features. “I can’t stand it—I won’t set foot in that laboratory again.” Barsac clucked sympathetically. “You will get over your aversion,” he predicted. “And, I hope, soon. For I shall now proceed with the last experiment. If it succeeds—and I know it will—you must be convinced. And if you are convinced, you can carry on alone.”

“Carry on? Alone?”

Barsac lowered his head. The little fat man addressed the wall rather than his breakfast companion.

“Yes. I am not long for this earth, my friend. The doctors, they tell me of my heart. The strain of long experimentation has taken its toll. And this last one may well prove to be the end of further work, if not of my life itself. My vital energy is drained by the hypnosis. No, Jerome, a man cannot give of his soul and retain life for long.” Doctor Jerome stared at Barsac’s earnest face. Barsac avoided his gaze and continued.

“That is why I invited you and asked you to consider working with me. When I die, I wish that you will carry on my work. For the sake of our friendship, and because of my respect for your abilities and brilliance. Have no fear, whether you choose to enter the laboratory or not, I have compiled all of die notes and data necessary for you to take over.

“And one thing more.” Barsac’s voice was quite faint. “I have made the other arrangements. I have seen my advocate and prepared my will. You will be left everything when I die; my entire estate goes to you to continue in this work.”

Jerome rose. “It’s no use,” he said. “I won’t go into that laboratory with you.”

“Very well. I understand. But this I ask of you—please stay here with me during the next two days. I shall proceed at once with the operations I have in mind. I hope to be able to give you complete proof of success—living animals that will not only bear a physical resemblance to me, but inherit my mental processes as well."

Doctor Jerome shuddered slightly.

"Please," said Barsac. "Do not leave me during these next two days. I shall stay in the laboratory and work if you will prepare the meals. You understand, I cannot keep servants here. They are ignorant, superstitious fools—easily frightened. And I must have some one here to rely on. You will stay?"

Jerome was silent for a long moment. Then he nodded. "Yes," he whispered. "I will stay."

Barsac clasped his hand. Doctor Jerome felt the cold, flabby fingers and drew back involuntarily. To him, the light of gratitude in Barsac's bulging eyes was too reminiscent of the look he had glimpsed there in his dreams.

"I shall not wait," Barsac promised. "I go now to prepare. I will be in the laboratory—you need only to bring meals to the outer door. Within forty-eight hours I hope to announce success. Meanwhile, you are at liberty to amuse yourself as you will."

He turned. "I will leave you now. My gratitude, Jerome."

Barsac left the room.

Doctor Jerome smiled grimly as he gazed up at the forbidding stone ceiling.

"Amuse myself as I will," he muttered.

HE FINISHED his cigar, then rose and walked aimlessly clown the hall. His footsteps rang eerily through the empty corridors. At a turn in the hail Jerome saw the figure standing against the wail in the shadows and started back.

Then he recognized the outlines of a suit of armor. Of course—Castle Barsac would have suits of armors. And all the trimmings, too. Perhaps he could amuse himself for a few hours, exploring the castle.

Doctor Jerome set about his explorations with scientific precision. He covered the ground floor thoroughly, entering a score of dusty chambers and apartments—being careful in each instance to turn on the lights before venturing into a strange room.

He found much to interest and delight him. Massive Regency furniture, elaborate tapestries, a full gallery of oils. The family portraits of the Barsac line gazed down austerely from a long chamber at the rear of the castle, and Jerome speculated as to the identity of that great-great grandfather with the sorcerous proclivities.

Everything hinted of great age and great wealth. If the castle was haunted, it was haunted by the past alone. Again Jerome was reminded of the story-book atmosphere. All that was needed was a family vault in the cellar.

A vault? Why not?

Jerome explored. He discovered the stairs that descended to the lower levels and here he found the catacombs.

Catacombs they were in truth. On marble slabs lay the stone sarcophagi of the Barsacs. Row on row they rested in eternal slumber here below. Now only Sebastian Barsac remained, the last of his line, and soon he too would join these ranks of the dead.

The last of the Barsacs, and he was mad. Mad and soon to die.

How soon?

There in the dank and silent catacombs, the thought came to Jerome.

He could die quite soon.

Why not? Let him die soon, and quietly.

Then there would, no longer be a Castle Barsac. Jerome would have the castle, have the laboratory, have the money. And why not? Barsac was mad. And he was all alone. The doctors had said he would die, and it need hardly be called murder. Perhaps a strong shock would do it.

Yes, a shock. Barsac would weaken himself in these crazy experiments. And then it would be so easy to precipitate a stroke, a seizure. He could be frightened.

The will was made, and all that remained was the deed. Mad Barsac would lie here on the last empty slab, and it would be ended.

Doctor Jerome ascended the stairs slowly. He went out and walked through the hills, returning only at dusk. He had wrestled with temptation and put it aside. There was no thought of putting poison in the food he took upstairs at dinner. He left the tray outside the laboratory door and knocked. He descended quickly before Barsac opened the door, and ate a solitary supper in the great castle kitchen below.

He was resigned to waiting, now. After all, in a few weeks Barsac might die a natural death. Meanwhile, let his work go on. Perhaps he might succeed.

Jerome listened to the reveberation from the laboratory above his head. A steady humming sounded, accompanied by a rhythmic pulsing. Barsac must be in his cabinet now, working the focal prism and hypnotizing himself and his animals. Doctor Jerome wondered what sort of animals he was using in these "improved" experiments.

On second thought he didn't care to know. The vibrations were beginning to affect his nerves. He decided to turn in early. One more day and it would be over. If he could get a good night's sleep, now, his morbid fancies would vanish.

Accordingly, Jerome ascended to bed, switching off the lights as he proceeded down the hall. He undressed, donned pajamas, plunged the castle bedroom into darkness, and sought sleep.

Sleep came.

AND then Barsac came. He wheeled in the cabinet, the great metal cabinet, and once again his bright eyes caught and captured Jerome's astonished stare. Jerome's will slipped away and he entered the cabinet. He was clamped into the seat as a prisoner is clamped in the electric chair. Like a prisoner, Jerome knew he was facing the execution of a death-sentence.

Yet his will was a prisoner—and now, as Barsac turned the dials, his soul was imprisoned too.

Jerome stared through the great glass prism that loomed before his eyes. He could not look away, for the gigantic lense was in itself a hypnotic agent, pulling at his retina, impelling him to gaze ahead into the hugely magnified world of the focal field. He waited for the animals to appear in the field—but there were no animals.

There was only Barsac. For suddenly a great face loomed through the glass—a monstrous face with the bulging eyes of Barsac, and the great domed forehead.

Barsac was smiling and his yellow teeth were exposed, but Jerome could only see the eyes. The eyes that glared and pulled at his own eyes, at his brain behind them.

Pulled his being into the glass, for as the humming rose insanely about him, Doctor Jerome felt himself plunging forward. His body was clamped to the seat, but his soul soared through the weird prism and lost itself in Barsac's mad eyes—

Doctor Jerome awoke. It was daylight at last, but he did not sit up to greet its coming. He felt weak, drained.

Drained.

A dreadful suspicion was forming in Jerome's mind. He knew that he had dreamed—but he did not know what he hadn't dreamed. Could it be that there was a distorted truth in his symbolic nightmare?

Was Barsac lying to him? Perhaps his machine could drain some of the vital essence from a man's soul. Perhaps Barsac wanted him to assist in the experiments so that a part of his soul would be removed—not to be incorporated into animals, but into Barsac! Hypnotic, scientific vampirism!

Had Barsac been in this room last night while he slept and dreamed? Had Barsac hypnotized him in his sleep, seeking to snare his soul?

Something had happened. Jerome felt weak.

And then he was strong—strong with sudden purpose. The thoughts of yesterday came back, but they came now as a resolution.

He would kill Barsac, today.

Fie would kill him before he died himself. He would kill Barsac because he was a madman, because his experiments were blasphemous, because he deserved to die.

Doctor Jerome would kill Barsac for the sake of Science.

That was it. For the sake of Science.

Doctor Jerome rose, dressed, prepared breakfast, took Barsac’s tray upstairs, returned to the castle chambers below, and began to plan anew.

Madman or genius, Barsac would die. He had to die. Suppose he were really doing what he claimed? Suppose he actually managed to create animals with human physical attributes and with human minds? Minds like Barsac’s mind?

Wouldn’t that be the ultimate horror? And shouldn’t that horror be avoided, stamped out?

Of course. He, Jerome, would save humanity from this monstrous affront to the laws of life. He would do the deed as he had planned, by shock. Tonight.

Yes, tonight. He’d short the electrical current in the castle, go up to the laboratory in the dark, and shock Barsac to death. Never lay a hand on him. A simple plan, and it would succeed. It must succeed.

Jerome knew it must succeed by late afternoon—for when the vibrations sounded from above he realized he couldn’t wait much longer. He couldn’t stand the sound or the visions it conjured up. Barsac, draining his soul into the bodies of a horde of animals—it was impossible to bear the thought.

What were the animals? Not rats, he had said. Jerome remembered the rats. Barsac had refused to show him the other monstrosities. He only showed the rats with the deformed paws. The paws with the missing finger or missing claw.

Jerome prepared dinner and laughed. His apprehensions faded away with the memory of his dream.

THE paws. Of course! How foolish he was, letting Barsac's crazy talk and the morbid atmosphere of the castle affect him. Because of that and a few bad dreams he'd tricked himself into swallowing the grotesque claims of an obvious lunatic.

There was a machine—but any lunatic, given the funds and a scientific training, can build an imposing machine. That didn't prove that it actually worked as Barsac claimed it did.

There had been no other monstrosities for Jerome to see—for they didn't exist. Barsac's talk about previous experiments was merely talk.

There were the rats, but what of it? Barsac had been cunning. He had taken twenty rats, killed them, and removed their individual claws on the left forepaws.

That was all there was to it.

Barsac was crazy, and there was nothing to fear.

Doctor Jerome laughed again. That made it easier. He would kill the madman and take over. No more nightmares, no more fears.

His laughter blended with the thunder. A storm was breaking. It shattered in fury over the castle, and the rumbling swallowed the noise of the vibrations from the laboratory upstairs.

Jerome peered out of the window as jagged lightning slithered between the mountain crags.

The thunder grew louder.

Doctor Jerome turned back to get Barsac's tray ready. Then he paused.

"Why bother?" he whispered. Yes, why bother? Why wait any longer. He'd go upstairs now, shut off all the lights, knock on the laboratory door. Barsac would appear, expecting his dinner-tray. Instead, he'd find death.

Yes. He'd do it now, while the resolution held.

As the thunder mounted, Doctor Jerome walked up the stairs on his grim errand.

Lighting flickered as he reached the second landing. Jerome moved towards the switch panel on the wall. Then came the blinding bolt, and as thunder followed, the lights went out.

The storm had struck. It was an omen. Jerome exulted.

Now he moved up the spiral staircase leading to the laboratory landing at the top of the great castle tower. He groped his way slowly, in utter darkness, tensing himself for the moment when he would reach the oaken door and knock.

Then he listened, above the howling of the storm, for the vibrations from behind the door.

They had ceased, abruptly, when the lightning struck.

Jerome reached the top of the stairway. He edged towards the door. He was ready, now—

The door opened, swiftly.

Doctor Jerome heard Barsac's labored breathing.

"Jerome!" called Barsac. The voice was faint, but filled with overtones of triumph. "Jerome—where are you? I've succeeded, Jerome, I've succeeded beyond my wildest dreams!"

Jerome was very glad Barsac had called out. It enabled him to locate Barsac's body in the darkness.

Now he glided forward and brought his cold hands up to Barsac's neck. Sudden shock, a fright—

But Barsac did not scream with fear. He screamed with anger.

"Jerome, it's you!" he shouted.

So he knew. Knew Jerome meant to kill him. Therefore he must die. Jerome's hands, which had risen merely to frighten, now remained to strangle.

He tightened his grip about Barsac's throat. Barsac tried to claw him off, but he could not see, and his gestures were pitifully weak.

Now Barsac did not cry out. He merely gurgled as Doctor Jerome pressed his windpipe and then dragged him back along the corridor. He dragged him swiftly, purposefully, and with his own feet he felt for the edge of the great staircase.

Then he thrust Barsac forward. There was a single shriek as Sebastian Barsac reeled in darkness, and then only a dreadful series of rubbery thumps as he plunged down the black well of the spiral staircase.

Doctor Jerome stood there as the thunder came again. When its muttering reverberation died away, the thumping had ended.

Barsac was at the bottom of the stairs.

Cautiously, Doctor Jerome descended the staircase. His feet groped for the next stair, and groped for the feel of Barsac's body. But it was not until he reached the bottom that his shoes met the resistant flesh of Barsac.

Jerome knelt and passed his hands over that flesh, finding it quite cold. As cold as death.

So it was done. Barsac was dead. Long live the new ruler of Castle Barsac!

Doctor Jerome straightened up with a grin. It was easy, after all. "Gentlemen, it was an unavoidable accident. Sebastian Barsac was at work in his laboratory when the lights went out. He came out into the hall, evidently with the purpose of descending the stairs. In the dark he must have made a misstep and fallen down the staircase."

He whispered the words aloud, just the way he meant to repeat them at the inquest. He heard their echoes rustle and die away.

And then he heard the other rustling.

It came from far overhead, from a room at the top of the stairs. A room at the top of the stairs—a rustling from the laboratory!

Jerome bounded up the stairs.

The animals were loose. He'd better lock the laboratory door, at once.

He heard the shrill squeaking as he made the second landing and turned to climb the last flight to the tower level.

Then he paused. For there was a drumming from the floor above—a padding and a scraping as small bodies moved down the hall. They had already left the laboratory.

For the first time he detected the ominous note in the squeaking sounds. Shrill little cries of anger resounded from the head of the stairs. They were angry, as Barsac had been angry when he had died. Barsac, who had come out, crowing in triumph that his experiments were successful beyond his wildest dreams.

His experiments were successful!

"I will transfer the physical attributes of myself, and also the mental attributes."

Jerome knew the meaning of fear, then.

THE creatures of Barsac's experiments were loose. The creatures whose bodies he had changed. Whose minds were a part of Barsac's mind.

They knew and they were loose. Loose and coming after him to seek revenge!

Jerome heard them creeping down the stairway. They were after him. They knew he was there—they could see in the dark! he turned in blind panic down the hallway. He'd hide in his room. That was it, his room. He stumbled through the pitch-black corridor, and heard them at his heels.

The beasts were swift. He reached the door, groped for his key. He fumbled in his pockets, cursing. The key wasn't on his ring. And the door was locked.

Perhaps he'd dropped it now, dropped it on the floor. He stooped to feel around.

And his hand encountered the warmth of flesh. Flesh that was furry, but not furry enough. Flesh that wriggled through his fingers.

The creatures had come!

Fangs nipped at his thumb. He stood up, hastily, and kicked out at the furry beast. But another body brushed his other ankle, and then they were all around him. Their squealing rose. One of the tiny monstrosities was crawling up his leg, and he felt the touch of minute fingers dinging to his body.

Jerome screamed, and knew Barsac had spoken the truth. The monsters he had created with his mind were going to kill him in revenge for Barsac's death. And there was no escape.

Their squealing filled the corridor and their bodies blocked it completely. They swarmed around Doctor Jerome like ravening rats, but. they were not rats. Jerome knew that if he should see them he would go mad. And if he did not see them they would crawl up his body and sink their horrible little mouths in his throat, stroke his face with their ghastly fingers.

Jerome wheeled and charged down the corridor again. The nightmare ranks broke for a moment and he sped down the black corridor of the haunted castle with the beasts of Barsac at his heels. He was playing tag with death in a nighted lair,-and death ran behind him on purposeful paws. Death squealed and chattered, and Jerome fled.

He had to get out before they reached him, touched him, took him. He had to.

Gasping in agony he reached the corridor's end, knowing that the horde was keeping pace. He turned again, ran forward. He never gave a thought to the stairs.

And then, as the squealing rose.?nd echoed in his ears, Doctor Jerome tumbled down the castle staircase and landed with a sickening little crunch that he never heard. His head lolled grotesquely on the broken stem of a neck. He lay next to the body of Sebastian Barsac, and like Barsac, he was quite dead.

It was casual irony that chose this moment for the castle lights to flicker on again.

They revealed nothing but the two bodies lying at the foot of the stairs. Mad Barsac jay dead, and so did mad Jerome.

On the landing above, the twenty escaped guinea pigs blinked down with stupid, uncomprehending eyes.

Death Is a Vampire

KILLERS ON A RAMPAGE BRING A REIGN OF EERIE MYSTERY TO A SECLUDED ESTATE!

CHAPTER I

Won't you Walk into My Partial?

THE gate handle was rusty. I didn't want to touch it. But that was the only way of getting in, unless I wanted to climb the high walls and leave part of my trousers on the iron spikes studding the top.

I grabbed the handle, pushed the gate open and walked down the flagstone path to the house.

If I were a botanist, I'd have been interested in the weeds growing along that path. As it was, they were only something to stumble over. I ignored them and stared at the mansion ahead.

The Petroff house was not quite as big as a castle and not quite as old as Noah's Ark. It looked like the kind of a place the Phantom of the Opera would pick for a summer home.

As far as I was concerned, it was something to donate to the next scrap drive.

But that was none of my business. My business was to sneak inside and wangle old Petroff into giving me an interview about his art treasures. The Sunday supplement needed a feature yarn.

I walked up to the big porch, climbed the stairs, and jangled the old-fashioned door pull. Nothing happened, so I did it again. Same result. It looked as though the Butler's Union had pulled its man off this job.

Just for fun I edged over and turned the door-knob. As I did, I noticed a garland hanging down from the metal projection. It was a wreath of smelly leaves. Not a funeral wreath—just leaves.

That was none of my business, either. I was interested in whether or not the door was unlocked.

It was. So I walked in.

Why not? When Lenehan gave me the assignment, he told me it was a tough one. He had talked to old Petroff over the phone, and Petroff had refused to meet the press or drool over his art treasures.

I expected to be met at the door by a bouncer with a shotgun. But this was easy, and I took advantage of it. It wasn't polite, but newspaper reporting isn't a polite occupation.

THE door swung shut behind me, and I stood in a long hallway. It was hard to see anything specific in the afternoon twilight, but I got a musty whiff of stale air, mothballs, and just plain age and decay.

It made me cough. I coughed louder, hoping to rouse my host.

No results. I started down the hallway, still coughing from time to time. An open door led into a deserted library. I ignored it, passed a staircase, walked on.

Behind the stairs was another door. I halted there, for a faint light gleamed from underneath it. I groped for the handle and coughed again. Once more the cough was genuine—for hanging on the door-knob was another garland of those leaves.

Inside here the smell was terrific. Like a Bohemian picnic. Suddenly I recognized the odor. Garlic.

According to the stories going around, old Petroff was a bit of a screwball. But it couldn't be that he had turned the house into a delicatessen.

There was only one way to find out. I opened the door and walked into the parlor where the lamp burned.

It was quiet inside—quiet enough to hear a pin drop. In fact, you could tell which end hit the floor first: the head or the point.

But a pin had not hit the floor in this room. Petroff had.

He looked like his photo, all right. He was tall, thin, with black hair, curled and gray at the temples. A beaked nose and thick lips dominated his face.

He lay there on the floor, his nose pointing up at the ceiling. I got to his side in a hurry, and the floor creaked as I bent over him.

It didn't matter. The noise wouldn't bother him. Nothing would ever bother Igor Petroff again.

His hand was icy. His face was paper-white. I looked around for a mirror but didn't spot any. I pulled my cigarette case out and put it against his lips. The shiny metal clouded slightly. He was still breathing, at any rate.

Probably he'd had a stroke. I lifted his head and stared into his bloodless face. His collar was open. I felt for a pulse in his neck, then took my hand away, quick.

I stared down at his throat, stared down and saw the two tiny punctures in his neck, shook my head and stared again.

They looked like the marks of human teeth!

There was no use asking if there was a doctor in the house. I got up and dashed out into the hall to get to the phone. I got to it. I jiggled the receiver for nearly a minute before I noticed the dangling cord trailing on the floor. Whoever had bitten Petroff had also bitten through the cord.

That was enough for me. I made the two miles back to town in about ten minutes and five hundred gasps. I still had a gasp left in me when I ran into Sheriff Luther Shea's office at Centerville and knocked his feet off the desk. "Accident out at the Petroff place!" I wheezed. "Get a doctor, quick!" Sheriff Luther Shea was a fat little bald-headed man who seemed to enjoy keeping his feet on the desk. He put them right back up and scowled at me over his Number Elevens.

"What'sa big idea of bustin' in here? Who are you, anyhow?"

I faced my genial quiz-master without a thought of winning the sixty-four-dollar question.

"Can't you hear?" I yelled. "Call a doctor! Mr. Petroff has been injured."

"Ain't no doctor in this town," he told me. "Now state your business, fella." I stated it, but loud. He perked up his ears a little when I told him about Petroff, but he didn't take his feet off the desk until I flashed my press badge. That did it.

"No sense trying to find a doctor—nearest one's back in L.A.," he decided. "I'm pretty handy at first-aid. I'll get the car and we'll go out and pick him up."

Sheriff Shea banged the office door behind him, and I grabbed a phone. I got hold of Calloway right away and he promised to send the ambulance out to Centerville. Somehow, after having had a good look at Petroff, I didn't have much confidence in Sheriff Shea's "first-aid."

THEN I put through a call to the paper.

Lenehan growled at me, and I barked right back.

"Somebody bit his throat? Say, Kirby—you drunk?"

I breathed into the phone. "Smell that," I said. "I'm cold sober. I found him lying on the floor with two holes in his neck. I'm still not sure he wasn't dead."

"Well, find out. Keep on this story and give me all you've got. We can hold three hours for the morning edition. Looks like murder, you say?"

"I didn't say a blamed thing about murder!" I yelled.

"Come on, quit stalling!" Lenehan yelled back. "What's your angle on this?"

I lowered my voice to a whisper. "Confidentially," I said, "my theory is that old Petroff bit himself in the throat just for the publicity."

Lenehan apparently didn’t believe me, because he launched off into a discussion of my ancestry that was cut short when Sheriff Shea appeared in the doorway. He wore a rancher’s black Stetson and a shoulder holster. On him it didn’t look good.

“Come on, fella,” he said, and I hung up.

His rattletrap Chewy didn’t deserve a C card, but we made time down Centerville’s single street and chugged out along the highway.

“From the L.A. papers, huh?” he grunted. “Whatcha doing up at Petroff’s?”

“My editor gave me an assignment to write a feature story about the art treasures of the Irene Colby Petroff estate. Do you know anything about them?”

“Don’t know nothing, fella. When old man Colby was alive, he and the missus would come into town and do a little trading once in a while. Then he died and she married this foreign gigolo, Petroff, and that’s the last we seen of them in town. Then she died, and since then the place has gone to pot. This business don’t surprise me none. Hear some mighty funny gossip about what goes on out at Petroff’s place. All fenced off and locked up tighter’n a drum. Ask me, he’s hiding something.”

“I got in without any trouble.”

“What about the guards? What about the dogs? What about the locks on the gate?” I sat up. “No guards, no dogs, no locks,” I told him. “Just Petroff. Petroff lying there on the floor with the holes in his throat.”

We rounded a bend in the highway and approached the walls of the Petroff estate. The setting sun gleamed on the jagged spikes surmounting the walls. And it gleamed on something else.

“Who’s that?” I yelled, grabbing Sheriff Shea’s arm.

“Don’t do that!” he grunted. “Nearly made me go off the road.”

“Look!” I shouted. “There’s a man climbing up the wall.”

Sheriff Shea glanced across the road and saw the figure at the top of the wall. The car ground to a halt and we went into action. Shea tugged at his shoulder holster.

“Stop or I’ll shoot!” he bawled.

The man on the wall considered the proposition and rejected it. He turned and jumped. It was a ten-foot drop but he landed catlike and was scuttling across the road by the time we reached the base of the wall.

“After him!” Shea grunted.

The man ran along the other side of the road, making for a clump of trees ahead. I dashed along behind. The fugitive reached the grove a few steps ahead of me and I decided on a little football practice.

It was a rather ragged flying tackle, but it brought him down. We rolled over and over, and on the second roll he got on top. He didn’t waste time. I felt powerful fingers dig into my throat. I tore at his wrists. He growled and twisted his neck. I felt his mouth graze my cheek. He was trying to bite me.

I got his hands loose and aimed a punch at his chin, but he ducked and pressed his thumbs in my eyes. That hurt. I aimed another punch, but that wasn’t good either. By this time he had those hands around my neck again, and things began to turn red. The red turned black. I heard him growling and snarling deep in his throat, and his fingers squeezed and squeezed.

This was no time for Queensbury rules. I kicked him in the tummy. With a grunt of appreciation he slumped back, clutching his solar plexus.

CHAPTER II

They Fly By Night

SHERIFF SHEA arrived, wheezing, and together we collared our prisoner and dragged him to his feet.

He was not pretty. He wore one of those one-piece overall outfits, and between the spikes on the wall and the tussle, he’d managed to destroy its integrity. Patches of his skin showed through, advertising the need of a bath.

His yellow hair was matted and hung down over his eyes, which was just as well. They were as blue as a baby-doll's—and just as vacant. His lips hung slackly, and he was drooling. A prominent goitre completed the ensemble.

"Why, it's Tommy!" said the Sheriff. "He's a little touched," he whispered, "but harmless."

He didn't have to tell me the kid was touched. That I could easily believe. But the "harmless" part I doubted. I rubbed my aching eyes and neck while Shea patted Tommy on the back.

"What were you doing on the wall, Tommy?" he asked.

Tommy lifted a sullen face. "I was looking at the bats."

"What bats?"

"The bats that fly at twilight. They fly out of the windows and you can hear them squeaking at each other."

I glanced at Sheriff Shea. He shrugged.

"Ain't no bats around here except the ones in Tommy's belfry."

I took over. "What else were you looking at, Tommy?" I inquired.

He turned away. "I don't like you. You tried to hurt me. Maybe you're one of them! One of the bad people."

"Bad people?"

"Yes. They come here at night. Sometimes they come as men, wearing black cloaks. Sometimes they fly—that's when they're bats. They only come at night, because they sleep in the daytime."

Tommy was in full cry, now. I didn't try to stop him.

"I know all about it," he whispered. "They don't suspect me, and they'd kill me if they thought I knew. Well, I do know. I know why Petroff doesn't have any mirrors on the walls. I heard Charlie Owens, the butcher, tell about the liver he sends out every day—the raw liver, pounds of it. I know what flies by night."

"That's enough," said Sheriff Shea. "Whatever you know, you can tell us inside."

"Inside? You aren't going in there, are you? You can't take me in there! I won't let you! You want to give me to him. You'll let him kill me!"

Again, Shea cut him off. Grasping his arm, he guided the half-wit across the road. I followed. We made straight for the gate.

Shea halted. “Push it open,” I said.

“It’s locked.”

I looked. A shiny new padlock hung from the rusty handle.

“It was open half an hour ago,” I said.

“He always keeps it locked,” Shea told me. “Usually has a man out here, too—a guard. And dogs in the kennels back of the house.” He eyed me suspiciously. “You sure you were up here, Mr. Kirby?”

“Listen,” I advised him. “I was up here a little over half an hour ago. The gate was open. I went in and found Petroff on the floor. He had two holes in his throat and I’m not sure whether he was still breathing or not. I’ll give you every explanation you want later, but let’s go inside, quick. He may be dead.”

Shea shrugged. He stood back and drew his revolver. The shot resounded, the lock shattered. I held Tommy tightly and pushed him through the gateway.

After that I took the lead. Up the steps, through the door, down the hall. It was slow going in the gathering twilight. We stumbled along toward the room behind the staircase.

“Here,” I said. “Here’s where I found him.” I opened the door. The light was still on. I pointed to the floor. “Here,” I said.

“Yeah?” grunted Shea. “Where is he?”

The room was empty. The rug was on the floor, but Petroff was not. I stared, and the room began to whirl. I took a deep breath and inhaled fresh air.

It was coming from the open French windows at the end of the room.

Of course! The windows were open. I had made some kind of a mistake. Petroff had been breathing. He had fainted, or something. After I left he recovered, went for a stroll on the porch beyond the open windows, and locked his gate. The holes in his throat. Maybe he’d cut himself while shaving.

I WAS a fool. A glance at Sheriff Shea confirmed the suspicion. He grinned at me.

But Tommy was not grinning.

“You were here before,” he murmured. “You saw him lying here with holes in his throat.”

“I—I made a mistake,” I mumbled.

“No. When you were here it was still daylight. Now it’s dusk. When you were here he was still asleep. But he comes alive at night.”

“What do you mean? Who comes alive at night?”

“The vampire,” he whispered. “He comes alive. And at night he flies. Look!”

Tommy screamed. His finger stabbed at the dusk beyond the opened windows.

We stared out into the night and saw the black shadow of a bat skimming off into the darkness, a mocking squeak rising from its throat.

In just a little while there was the devil of a lot of activity. The ambulance I had sent for finally arrived, and Shea had to stall them off with a trumped-up excuse about a fainting fit. Then Shea wanted to play detective and go over the place. Personally, I think he was dying to case the joint merely to collect some gossip.

I won’t bother remembering the bawling-out he handed me. I had to take it, too. After all, my story sounded pretty phony now.

Tommy was the only one who believed me. And his support was not much help. A half-wit’s comments on vampires doesn’t make good testimony.

While Shea handled the ambulance men, Tommy kept talking.

“Look at the garlic wreaths on the doors,” he said. “He must have been trying to keep them out. They can’t bear garlic.”

“Neither can I,” I answered. “And I’m no vampire.”

“Look at the books,” Tommy exclaimed. “Magic.”

I stepped over to the built-in bookshelves. This time Tommy really had something. There were rows of blackbound volumes, musty, crumbling treatises in Latin and German. I read the titles. It was indeed a library of demonology. Where there's smoke there's fire.

But what did that prove? Occultism isn't a rare hobby on the Coast. I knew half a hundred crackpots who belonged to "secret cults," and down Laguna way there was a whole colony of them.

Still, I ran my eyes and fingers along the rows. One of the books on the lower shelf protruded a bit more than was necessary. It offended my sense of neatness. As I reached in to push it back, a card slipped out from between yellowed pages. I palmed it, turned around just as Sheriff Shea reentered the room.

"Come on," he sighed. "Let's get out of here."

Driving back to town, with Tommy wedged between us on the front seat, Shea gave me another going over.

"I don't understand all this monkey business," he declared. "I don't know what you were doing in that house in the first place. Least I can do is hold you on suspicion of illegal entry. As for Tommy here, he's liable to get booked on the same charges. I'm gonna see his folks about this. But what I want to know is—where's Petroff?"

"I shot him." I grinned. "But the bats flew off with his body."

"Never mind that," Shea snapped. "You smart-aleck reporters aren't tampering with the law down here. I'd like to get the D.A. in on this, but there's nothing to go on, yet. Maybe after I hold you on suspicion a few days you'll be ready to talk. I want to know how you cut those telephone wires, too."

"Now listen," I said. "I've got work to do. I'm willing to play ball on this thing and help straighten matters out. If Igor Petroff has disappeared and I'm the last man who saw him alive—or dead—that's important to me, too. The paper'll want the story. But I'm down here on an assignment. I've got to move around."

"No, you don't. Case I didn't mention it, you're under arrest right now, Mr. Kirby."

"That," I sighed, "is all I want to know."

I eased the car door open gently and swiftly. We were going thirty, but I took my chances. I jumped and hit the road.

Shea swore. He brought the rattling Chewy to a halt, but by that time I was running along the ditch on the other side of the road. It was good and dark.

SHEA bawled and waved his revolver, but he couldn't spot me. Then he turned the car around and zoomed back up the road. I went into the field, kept going. In a few minutes the road was far behind me, and I headed across to the other side of the field and another dirt road running parallel.

Here I found the truck that took me back to L.A. I hopped off downtown, found a drug store, and called Lenehan at the office.

"Where in thunder are you?" he greeted me. "Just had this hick sheriff on the wire. He's bawling you're a fugitive from justice. And what's all this business about a disappearing body? Give."

I gave. "Hold the yarn," I pleaded. "I've got a new angle."

"Hold it?" yelled Lenehan. "I'm tearing it up! You and your disappearing Dracula! Petroff was drunk on the floor when you found him and you were drunk on your feet. He had the decency to wander off and sober up, but you're still drunk!"

I hung up.

Then I fished around in my pocket and pulled out the card I had snatched from the book in Petroff's library.

It was nicely engraved:

HAMMOND KING
Attorney at Law

I turned it over. A man's heavy scrawl spidered across the back read:

You may be interested in this volume on vampirism.

H.K.

The plot was thickening. Hammond King? I knew the name. A downtown boy. Wealthy attorney. What was the connection?

I called Maizie at the office.

“Hammond King,” I said. “Check the morgue.”

She got me the dope. I listened until she came to an item announcing that Hammond King was attorney for the Irene Colby Petroff estate. I stopped her and hung up.

It was eight o’clock. Not likely that Hammond King would still be at his office, but it was a chance worth taking. The phone book got me the number and I deposited my third nickel.

The phone rang for a long time. Perhaps he was going over a tort or something. Then a deep voice came over the wire.

“Hammond King speaking.”

“Mr. King—this is Dave Kirby, of the Leader. I’d like to come over there and talk to you.”

“Sorry young man. If you’ll phone my office tomorrow for a more definite appointment—”

“I thought we might have a little chat about vampires.”

“Oh.”

That stopped him.

“I’ll be right over,” I said. “So long.”

He didn’t answer. I whistled my way out of the phone booth, ordered a ham sandwich and a malted milk, disposed of same, and took a cab downtown. .

The night elevator brought me to Hammond King’s office. The door was open and I walked into one of those lavish layouts so typical of wealthy attorneys and impecunious booking agents.

I ignored the outer office and made for the big door marked “Private.”

King was examining a bottle of Scotch with phony nonchalance.

My nonchalance was just as phony as I examined him.

He was a short, stocky man of about fifty-five. Gray hair and mustache to match. His eyes slanted behind unusually thick bifocals. He wore an expensive gray suit, and I admired his taste in ties. He looked like a hundred other guys, but he sent books on vampirism to his friends. You never know these days.

"Mr. Kirby?" he inquired, getting up and extending his hand. "To what do I owe this pleasure?"

"I told you over the phone," I said. "I'd like to have a little chat with you about vampires."

"Oh."

The phony nonchalance faded away and the hand dropped to his side.

"I'd rather have talked to Mr. Petroff about it," I continued. "Matter of fact, I dropped in on him this afternoon. But he wasn't there. That is, he was there, and then he wasn't. You know how vampires get restless about twilight."

"What do you mean?"

"You know what I mean, King," I said. "I just thought I'd warn you. In case anybody tries to bite you in the throat, it's your old client, Igor Petroff."

"How'd you know he was my client?"

"I know a lot of things," I told him, wishing it were true. "And what I don't know you'd better tell me, but fast. Unless, of course, you want it splashed all over the front page of the Leader."

"Let's be reasonable," Hammond King pleaded. "I'll be glad to help you all I can. Anything involving my client—"

The phone rang. King reached for the receiver, then drew his hand back.

"Pardon me, please," he said.

He got up and went into the outer office and shut the door.

CHAPTER III

The Bat's Kiss

I WOULD have given my left arm to know who King was talking to. But I didn't have to give my left arm. All I needed to do was reach out with it and gently pick up the receiver. Call it eavesdropping, if you wish. You do a lot of things in this business.

"Mr. King?" a girl's voice came over the wire. "This is Lorna Colby. I'm at the Eastmore Hotel, Room Nine-nineteen. . . . No, Igor sent for me. He wanted to talk about a settlement on the will."

"Have you seen Petroff?" Hammond King barked into the phone at this end.

"No, not yet."

"Well, I'll be around in the morning, at ten. We've got to work fast, you understand? Something's happening that I don't like."

"What is it?" asked Lorna Colby.

"I can't talk now. See you tomorrow. Good night."

He hung up. I hung up. It was my turn to look at the Scotch bottle as he came in.

"Where were we?" he asked.

"You were just going to spill the beans," I said.

Hammond King smiled. "Was I? Lucky for me I got called away. I'm afraid I can't talk this matter over with you just at present. That call was from a client in Pasadena. I've got to take the train tonight."

I rose. One of his desk drawers was half opened. I reached in and scooped up a handful of garlic leaves.

"You had these left over from decorating the Petroff house, I presume," I told him. "Too bad you didn't think to put these on the French windows."

I slipped the garlic wreath into his hand and left the room. He stood there with his mouth open, giving a poor imitation of a stuffed moose.

I rode downstairs and walked around the corner and across the block to the Eastmore Hotel. I didn't bother to send my name up, but rode in person to the ninth floor. Nine-nineteen was down the hall to my left. I found the room and knocked on Lorna Colby's door.

There was no answer—except a sudden, ear-shattering scream.

I jerked the door-knob. The door opened on a tableau of frozen horror. A blond girl lay slumped on the bed. Crouching above her was a shadowy figure out of a nightmare. Its head was bending toward her neck. I saw lean, outstretched fingers claw down, saw the mouth descend—then the shadow straightened, turned, swooped across the room and out through the open window.

Lorna Colby lay there, clutching her throat and staring in wide-eyed terror. I stared, too. For the intruder had been Igor Petroff.

When I reached the window, the fire-escape outside was empty. Perhaps it had never held a figure. Perhaps I'd have done better to look for something flying in the sky.

I turned back to the bed. Lorna Colby was sitting up. There was still fear in her hazel eyes as she looked at me.

"Who are you?" she demanded.

I introduced myself. "Dave Kirby, of the Leader. You're Lorna Colby, of course?"

She nodded. "Yes. But how did you know? And what made you come here?"

"Hammond King sent me," I lied.

It was the right hunch.

"Then maybe you can tell me," she said, "what's wrong with my uncle? He sent me a wire to come down and talk about the estate. I waited to hear from him tonight. I was getting sleepy and lay down on the bed. When I opened my eyes again, he was in the room."

"Petroff?"

"Yes. You recognized him, too?"

I nodded.

"He must have come through the window some way. He just crouched over me, staring, and there was something wrong with his face. It was so white, but his eyes glared, and I couldn't look away. Then I felt his hands come down toward my neck, and I screamed, and then—"

I shook her, not gently. It was fun, but this was no time for amusement.

"Stop it!" I snapped. "Relax."

She cried a little. Then she sat up and fished around for her make-up. I took the opportunity to study her more closely.

LORNA COLBY was tall, blond, and about twenty-two. She had a good face and a better figure. All in all, the kind of a girl worth whistling after.

That noise like a ton of bricks was me, falling. She didn't notice it. After a while she patted her hair back and smiled.

"Your uncle is—ill," I said. "That's what Hammond King asked me to tell you. We're trying to keep things quiet until we can take him away for a rest."

"You mean he's crazy?"

I shrugged.

"I've always thought so," Lorna declared. "Even when Aunt Irene was alive, I knew there was something wrong with him. He led her an awful life."

She halted, bit her lower lip, and continued.

"After she died, he got worse. He kept dogs at the house, guarding it. He wanted to guard her tomb, he said. I haven't seen him now for almost a year. Nobody has seen him since the day she died. She had a heart attack, you know. He buried her in the private vaults on the estate. He wouldn't even let me see her or come to the funeral.

"I knew he hated me, and it came as a surprise when I got his wire yesterday, asking me to come down from Frisco to talk about the will. That didn't make sense, either. After all, Aunt Irene left him the whole estate, even though he can't touch the money for a year."

Something clicked into place. I decided to follow it up.

“By the way, who was your aunt’s physician?” I asked.

“Dr. Kelring.”

“I’d like to talk to him,” I told her. “It’s important.”

“You think he might know what’s wrong with Uncle Igor?”

“That’s right.” I nodded. “He must know.”

I looked him up in the book. Dr. Roger Kelring. I called his downtown office, not hoping for much of anything. Still, this gang seemed to work late. Hammond King was on the job, and Igor Petroff was a regular night-owl. Or was he? “They fly by night.”

The phone gave off that irritating sound known as a busy signal. That was enough for me.

“Come on, Miss Colby,” I said. “We’re going over to Dr. Kelring’s office.”

“But you didn’t talk to him,” she objected.

“Busy signal,” I explained. “On second thought, I’d just as soon not say anything to him in advance.”

“What do you mean? Do you think he’s mixed up in all this?”

“Definitely,” I assured her. “I wouldn’t be a bit surprised if your uncle was up there with him now.”

Lorna put on her coat and we went downstairs. In the lobby, she halted indecisively.

“Wait a minute, Mr. Kirby. Aren’t we going to report seeing Uncle Igor in my room? After all, if he’s sick somebody should be looking after him. He may be—”

“Dangerous? Perhaps. But let’s not start something we can’t finish. It’s my hunch that he’s over at Dr. Kelring’s office. Don’t ask me why, but I’ve got reasons. Besides, you don’t want to get mixed up in a lot of cross-questioning, do you?”

She agreed. I was relieved. What could I do if we called some Law? Tell them that a suspected vampire was running around attacking girls in hotel rooms?

Besides, I didn't think Igor Petroff was "running around." He might be flying around. Or he might be working according to a plan. Dr. Kelring would know the plan.

We took a cab to Kelring's office, in a building off Pershing Square.

"What's the doctor like?" I asked Lorna.

"He's a rich woman's doctor," she told me. "You know—smooth, quiet, genial. He's about fifty, I guess. Bald-headed, with a little goatee. I only saw him once, at Aunt Irene's, a few months before she died. He was pleasant, but I didn't like him."

Lorna's voice betrayed her inner tension. I understood. It's not every night that a girl is attacked by a vampire, even if he's a member of the family.

Partly for that reason and partly for personal pleasure, I held her arm as we took the elevator up to Kelring's office. A light burned behind the outer door. I opened it and stepped in. I had no gun, but if there was anything doing, I counted on the surprise element.

There was one.

SEATED at the desk in the reception room was a man of about fifty, baldheaded, and wearing a small goatee. His hand rested on the telephone as though he were going to pick it up and make another call.

But Dr. Kelring would never make another call. He sat there staring off into space, and when I touched his shoulder his neck wobbled off at an angle so that his goatee almost touched the spot between his shoulder-blades. Roger Kelring was quite, was definitely, was unmistakably dead.

I was patting Lorna's shoulder and making with the reassurement when the phone rang. Its sharp note cut the air, and I jumped. For a moment I stared at Dr. Kelring, wondering why his dead hand didn't lift the receiver and hold it to his ear.

Then I got around the desk, fast, and pried his cold fingers from the receiver.

"Lorna," I said, "how did—he—talk?"

"You mean Dr. Kelring?" She shuddered.

"Yes."

"Oh, I don't remember. . . . Yes, I think I do. He had a soft voice. Very soft."

"Good."

I whipped out my handkerchief and covered the mouthpiece. Just a hunch.

"Hello," I said lifting the receiver.

"Hello. That you, Kelring?"

I jumped as I recognized the voice. Hammond King!

"What is it?" I said, softly.

"Kelring, I must talk to you." He sounded frightened. Too frightened to analyze my voice.

"Go ahead. What's on your mind?"

"Did you ever read 'The Fall of the House of Usher' ?"

"What?"

"You know what I'm talking about, Kelring. She's alive out there. I know it!"

"Who's alive?"

"Mrs. Petroff. Don't stall me, Kelring. I'm desperate."

"What makes you think so, man?"

"It happened two months ago. I was out there at the house with Petroff, arguing about the will. You know he's been trying to get me to turn over the estate before the time stipulated. I won't bother with details, but I heard a noise. A woman's voice, coming from behind the wall. It came from the private staircase behind the bookshelves—the one leading down to the family burial vaults in the hillside."

"Get to the point, King," I said.

"He tried to hold me off, but I made him take me down there. I don't know how to tell you this—but beyond the iron grille entrance, in the vaults, I caught a glimpse of Irene Colby Petroff. Alive."

"But I pronounced her dead of heart failure," I said, remembering what I'd been told.

"She was alive, I tell you! She ran into one of the passages, but I recognized her face. I tried to get Petroff to open the grille and go in, but he dragged me back upstairs. Then he told me the story."

"What story?"

"You know, all right, Kelring. That's why I didn't call before. I wanted to investigate on my own. Now I need your help."

"Better tell me all you know, then."

"I know that she's a—vampire."

I held my breath. King didn't wait for any comment.

"Petroff broke down and confessed. Said he knew it and you knew it. She'd been mixed up in some kind of Black Magic cult in Europe when he met her. And when she died, she didn't really die. She lived on, after sundown, as a vampire."

"Preposterous!"

"I wasn't sure myself, then. I wanted to call in the police. But Petroff pleaded with me. Said he had the guard and the dogs and kept people away.

He had her locked up down there, fed her raw liver. Because you were trying to work on a cure. He asked for a little more time. And he explained it all. Gave me books on demonology to read. I didn't know what to believe, but I promised to wait. Then, three nights ago, he called and told me that she had tried to attack him. He asked me to come out this afternoon and talk things over.

"I went out there about four today. Maybe I was a fool, but I took some garlic with me. The books say garlic wards them off. When I arrived, I found Petroff lying on the floor. There were two holes in his throat—the marks of a vampire's teeth. So he has become a vampire now!

"I got frightened and ran. I knew he had sent for his niece, Lorna Colby. I wanted to talk to her before I did anything. Then, tonight, a young man called on me. Said he was from the newspapers. He knows something, too.

"Kelring, I've made up my mind to act. I won't call the police. I—I can't. They'd laugh at me. But there's a monster loose tonight, and I can't stand waiting any longer. I'm going out to the Petroff place now."

"Wait!" I said.

His voice was shrill as he replied. "Do you know what I've been doing, Kelring? I've been sitting here molding silver bullets. Silver bullets for my gun. And I'm leaving now. I'm going out there to get him!"

"Don't be a fool!" I yelled, in my natural voice.

But he had hung up.

"Come on," I snapped at Lorna. "I'll call the police and report on Kelring now. But we're getting out before they come."

"Where are we going?"

"To Petroff's house," I answered.

She nodded. I moved around the table. As I did, I saw something on the floor. It was a spectacle-case. I picked it up, turned it over. It was an expensive case, with an engraved name. The silver signature read:

Hammond King

CHAPTER IV

Vampire's Teeth

AS THE cab driver grumbled about the long haul, I told Lorna what I thought was wise.

I was too groggy to think clearly. Lenehan thought I was drunk, I'd jumped arrest, I'd eavesdropped, and impersonated, and messed up a murder. And it looked like an even busier day tomorrow unless I could straighten this tangle out tonight.

That’s my only excuse, I guess. I was a punch-drunk fool to take Lorna to that house, with only a crazy hunch to guide us, and armed with nothing but my suspicions.

But I did it. We rolled up to the black, forbidding portals of the Petroff place. We walked up the porch of the Petroff mansion and the cab waited in the driveway. I didn’t see Hammond King’s car, and I was glad we had arrived first.

He was wrong, I thought. Petroff was not here. And if he wasn’t, we could find that staircase, take a look into the vault, and see for ourselves whether Irene Colby Petroff walked or slept forever.

Never mind the details. The garlic odor choked us in the creaky hall. It flooded the parlor as I lit the lamp, tapped bookcases, and found the button that opened a section of the wall. Lorna shivered at my side. The setup looked like something out of “The Cat and the Canary.”

I kept listening for sounds. All quiet on the Western Front. With the light streaming from the parlor behind us, we took the secret staircase in stride. Down below was another panel in the wall. I switched on the light and walked down a long corridor. It was damp. King had said the private vaults of the family were out under the hillside.

We rounded a turn and came to the iron grille barring the hall. A perpetual light burned behind it. I tried the door. It was open. It squeaked as I pushed.

The squeak was drowned in a scream.

I turned.

Something black scuttled around the corner of the passageway. Something swooped down on Lorna, engulfed her in a sable cloud. I saw glaring eyes, red lips—Igor Petroff was here!

I made a dive for him. Petroff didn’t dodge. He stood there, and as I came on, his arm lashed out. The blow caught me off balance and as I wavered, his hand moved out. Something flashed down, and then I fell.

There was a blurred impression of movement, screaming, and scuffling. Petroff had dragged Lorna through the grille, down into the vaults.

I lurched to my feet as another figure raced around the bend. More blamed traffic down here, I thought, dazedly.

It was Hammond King.

He didn't see me. He stared, glassy-eyed, as he ran past into the gloom of the corridor beyond. He was carrying a gun. Silver bullets!

I dashed after him. As we took another flight of stairs, I gazed over his shoulder at the family vaults beyond.

Lorna stood in a corner, crouching against a wall. The cloaked figure of Igor Petroff glided towards her, and I thought of Dracula, and of childhood terrors, and of nightmares men still whisper about.

Hammond King didn't think. He began pumping shots from his gun, firing in maniac fury.

Petroff turned, across the room. And then, he smiled. He didn't fall down. He smiled. He smiled, and started to run toward Hammond King with his arms extended, and Hammond King gave a little choking gurgle and fell down.

I didn't fall. As Petroff advanced, I ran to meet him. This time I was not off-balance. I let him have one right on the point of his white chin. He grunted, but his arms swept up and then I felt the cold embrace as he clawed at me. I hammered into his ribs, but he was hard, rigid. Rigor mortis is like that, I thought madly.

He smelled of dampness and mold and ancient earth. His arms were strong and he was squeezing me. I dropped to the floor and he began to reach for my throat. He chuckled, then, deep in his throat; an animal growl. A growl of hunger, the growl of a carnivore that scents blood.

He had me by the neck, and I reached out with one hand and scrabbled frantically against the floor until I felt the cold steel of the gun Hammond King had dropped.

PETROFF wrenched my arm back, trying to tear the gun from my fingers. I wanted to fight him off, but his other hand was at my neck, squeezing. I felt myself falling back, and I pulled my arm free and brought the gun-butt up against his head, once, twice, three times.

Igor Petroff wobbled like a rundown mechanical doll and dropped with a dull thud.

I got up and slapped Lorna's face. She came out of her trance, crying. Then I went over to Hammond King and slapped him around. Just a one-man rescue squad.

"Go upstairs, you two," I said. "The cab-driver's waiting outside. Tell him to go into Centerville and bring back Sheriff Shea. I'll meet you in a moment."

They left.

I went through the vault until I came to what I wanted to find. When I was quite finished with my inspection I went back upstairs.

Lorna and Hammond King were waiting in the parlor. She had fixed her hair again, and he looked well enough to smoke a cigarette.

"The police should be here in five minutes," King said.

"Good."

"Perhaps I'd better look outside," he suggested. "I'm expecting Dr. Kelring."

"Kelring isn't coming," I said, gently. "He's dead."

"But I talked to him over the phone."

I told him who he'd talked to. And then I decided to tell him a few other things.

"You should have gone to the police the night you saw Mrs. Petroff here," I said. "Then all this wouldn't have happened."

"But I saw her. She was alive."

"Right. But she wasn't a vampire. Too bad you believed that crazy story Petroff concocted. When you stumbled onto her existence, he had to think of something and the vampire story just popped out. After you half-swallowed it, he planned the rest. He had to convince you completely, and he was good at planning."

"What do you mean?"

"It all started, I think, when Petroff and Dr. Kelring decided to fake Mrs. Petroff's death. They were in on it together, to split the inheritance. They didn't have the nerve to kill her outright but drugged her, held a private funeral, and faked the death certificate. Then Petroff kept her a prisoner down here in the vaults. That's why he had dogs and a guard. She was alive until about three days ago."

"How do you know?"

"I just found her body in the vault," I explained. "And I've seen her living quarters—a room beyond. She's dead now, all right, and I'd say she died of starvation."

"I don't understand," Lorna sighed.

"Simple. When her fake death was accepted, Petroff and Dr. Kelring were all set to divide the spoils. But there were no spoils—not for a year, according to the terms of her will. They hadn't counted on that. So Petroff was trying to get King, here, to advance money against the inheritance.

"King, being a smart attorney, would do no such thing. But after he saw Mrs. Petroff alive and heard this vampire line, he began to weaken. Petroff took advantage of it, showing him books on demonology, and telling wild stories about secret cults."

Hammond King nodded miserably. "He was wearing me down," he admitted. "But I wouldn't release any money. I couldn't, legally."

I took over again. "Then, three days ago, Mrs. Petroff actually died. Perhaps he deliberately starved her, perhaps not. In any event, she was dead, and his extortion plot and fake death was now actually murder. He wanted that money at once, needed it desperately.

"So he phoned you, King, and asked you to come out today, planning to show himself lying on the floor as the victim of a vampire attack. He had it figured that you'd be too shocked to call the police at once. Then, after dark, he would call upon you as a supposed vampire, threaten you with his bite, and get you to advance personal funds against the estate."

KING was looking bewildered.

"But I'd never do that," he protested. "He must have been mad!"

"He was—and desperate, too." I grinned. "Here's where I come into the story. Dave Kirby, the Boy Reporter. I got here today just after you left in the afternoon. I blundered in before Petroff could escape, so he lay there on the floor, hoping to fool me. When I left for the sheriff, he took a powder.

"Now the jig was up, but Petroff decided to carry the plan through. If he worked fast, he might still succeed. He'd called Lorna, asked her to come to town. He had only one idea—to appear before her as a supposed vampire and thus further bolster his story when he saw King arid demanded money. This he was doing as I arrived at Lorna's room. He fled, and undertook his next step in the plan—the murder of Dr. Kelring."

"But why would he murder Kelring?" King asked.

I shrugged. "There were several reasons. The first is the one that led me to the scene. You remember, I came out to the house for an interview on the Petroff estate art treasures, an interview Petroff had already refused to grant."

"Yes?"

"There was a reason for my coming and a reason for his refusal. You see, my editor had a tip that several valuable vases recognized as part of the Petroff collection had been offered for sale at private auction. Get it?

"Petroff was already raising money by illegally disposing of art treasures belonging to the estate. Kelring must have just discovered this and demanded his cut. Otherwise, he would squeal about the fake death certificate. So Petroff had to kill him. Just as an added touch, he left a little souvenir after strangling him in his office."

I handed King his spectacle case.

"You nearly had credit for that piece of work," I said. "I'm sure he would have threatened to turn you in had you refused him money when he demanded it this evening. So it's lucky I had you on the phone and can support an alibi."

King blinked.

"After killing Dr. Kelring he scooted out here to wait for you. He knew you'd be out to check up. He hadn't counted on Lorna and me arriving, but when we showed up first, he was ready. After that you dashed in, made your bang-bang with the silver bullets, and passed out. You aren't a good shot, King. Those bullets are in the walls, not in his body. But it wouldn't have mattered much. He wore a bullet-proof vest under the cloak. Felt it when I tackled him."

Lorna looked at me.

"You tackled him," she whispered. "That was wonderful. Even if he might be a vampire, you took the chance."

"But he wasn't a vampire. I knew that."

"Didn't you find him with holes in his throat?"

"Right. But he made them himself. Shallow cuts with a paper-knife, no doubt. You see, a vampire's bite will drain all blood. And there was no blood. I know something about superstitions myself, Lorna."

Sirens punctuated my sentence. The law was arriving in full force.

Suddenly I was very tired and very contented. Lenehan would get a story after all. And I'd get some sleep.

Lorna kissed me.

"What's that for?" I asked.

"For being brave. I don't care what you say, he might have been a vampire."

"Not a chance." I grinned. "I knew that from the beginning. When I looked at him on the floor this afternoon, his mouth was open. That was the tip-off."

"What do you mean?"

"He couldn't be a vampire because he couldn't bite anyone. After all, darling, who ever heard of a big, bad vampire with false teeth?"

The Devil's Ticket

An innocent person must not be delivered into the hands of that black being masquerading as a pawnshop proprietor

HECTOR VANE'S cape flapped forlornly as he trudged along toward the pawnshop. It was a familiar route; Vane had followed it many times before on the same errand. At the beginning, his burdens had been light—his rings, a watch, a gold-headed cane, silver candlesticks. Then, bit by bit, everything had gone. Everything but his pictures. The paintings he would not pawn. Not his portraits. It would never come to that.

But it had come to just that. Hector Vane was carrying a portrait under his bedraggled black cape. Marie had found some old newspaper and a bit of string, and she had tied it up for him. Vane sat staring at the package for almost an hour before he summoned the resolution necessary to pick it up and leave the garret.

There was simply no choice in the matter. Neither he nor Marie had eaten anything for twenty-four hours, and it was cold in the attic studio.

So he took the picture. He had to. It was one of his early favorites—a portrait of an old friend, as a matter of fact—and it was easily worth $10,000, despite the opinions of stupid critics and money-grubbing art dealers.

He thought that perhaps the pawnbroker would give him $10 for it.

Old Spengler didn’t know art, but he knew desperation when he saw it. Yes, he might give $10 for it—and Vane would gladly take the money.

Vane’s eyes did not measure the artistic qualities of the slum setting through which he walked. Instead he peered anxiously at the dull basement windows of Spengler’s pawnshop. The junk-cluttered windows mirrored the myriad misfortunes of those who entered here. Spengler’s place was a repository for the souvenirs of human woe; mementoes of miseries.

Hector Vane sighed, held the paper-wrapped picture tightly against his cloak, and descended the dirty stairs. As he opened the pawnshop door, the bell jangled a note of complaint and warning.

Vane blinked through semi-darkness as he approached the counter. The darkness held a musty smell, and released it now to his nostrils as he waited for Spengler to appear from the back of the shop. Spengler was an old man. He liked to doze on a gloomy afternoon. Perhaps he was still asleep—

No, footsteps heralded his approach. A shuffling figure emerged from the rear of the establishment and moved along behind the counter in the shadows.

“Yes?”

It was a soft voice; not Spengler’s habitual croak.

Hector Vane tried to get a clear view of the stranger, but shadows obscured. “Where’s Spengler?” he asked.

“He’s finished. I’ve taken over.”

NOW Vane could see the speaker. He was an old man; a very old man, at first glance. His hair was the color of yellowed ivory, and his skin had the parchment texture of incunabula. Flaring from the sides of his skull were curiously pointed ears, which lent the sole distinguishing touch to his aged visage. That touch, and the brightness of his eyes, impressed Vane. There was something beyond incongruity here, and Vane felt that if he stared long enough, searched long enough, he might discover the key to a peculiarly complicated enigma.

But enough of that. He wasn't here to analyze. He was here to sell a painting.

"I would like a loan," he said. "On this." His voice faltered slightly as he spoke, and in order to conceal his confusion, Vane quickly and clumsily tore the newspaper wrappings from the portrait.

His hands trembled slightly as he held it up toward the counter.

"Perhaps if we had more light—" he muttered.

The old man shook his head.

"I do not need the light," he said. He stared at the portrait with an enigmatic smile—or was it merely the fixed expression of senility?

"You have great talent," said the old man, softly. "Genius, perhaps."

Vane smiled. He had an artist's love of praise, and he was thinking that the $10 would soon be his.

"What will you offer me for it on a loan?" he asked.

"Nothing."

"Nothing?"

The old man shrugged. "I cannot pay you what it is worth," he murmured. "Besides, I do not want paintings. I deal in other things."

"But it's all I have to pawn," Vane pleaded.

"I'm not so sure. Put the picture down. Let me look at you."

VANE laid the picture on the counter, and then the old man's stare seized him. It seized, held, drained. Vane tried to stare back, but all he could see was the eyes. The very bright eyes, knives in darkness that stabbed into his being. It was silly imagery—but it was real. And the old man was whispering, softly.

"Hector Vane, you are a great artist. You do not belong in a garret, yoked to a plain woman. You were not shaped for suffering. You should be rich, famous. I think . . . yes . . . I am certain . . . I can give you the things you desire. Riches . . . and fame. . . ."

"What do you want of me?"

"Your soul."

It didn't sound fanciful—not with those eyes; staring, reading, searching and finding. The eyes were real. They were reality and all else was illusion. Vane knew it, felt it. "I must sell you my soul?"

"No. You may pawn it. The usual ticket, for ninety days. In return, fame and riches, all that you have desired. And at the end of that time, you can redeem your pledge."

"How?"

"By painting a picture for me. That's all I want . . . a picture. For my—private collection." The old man smiled, and Vane could see his face again. "But we will not talk about that now. I can see that you're wondering if I might be a little—eccentric, shall we say? So I'd best proceed to prove my claim to you. Is it agreed?"

Hector Vane nodded, slowly.

From that point on, things moved swiftly; too swiftly for memory to follow. The old man gave him a blue pawn-ticket, the necessary form was filled out, Vane signed something, the old man wrapped the picture for him, and in a twinkling he was out on the street again. The wrapped portrait was under his arm and the blue ticket was in the inside pocket of his cloak. Vane was trudging home.

He was almost at the doorway before he realized his situation. He was coming home without the money, without anything except a blue pawn-ticket made out to him by a crazy old man. What could he tell Marie? She'd nag him for not bringing the money, and if he told her the truth she'd do more than nag—she'd cry. And Vane couldn't stand the sight of her weeping; weeping quietly, with her face contorted in an ugly grimace of despair.

Vane paused on the curb before the squat frame tenement in which he lived. It was late, but perhaps he could try another pawnshop. Perhaps he could—

"Hector!"

Vane whirled. Marie came running through the doorway, her brown hair tumbled on her neck. Her eyes were wide.

"Hector! He just called—on the landlady's phone—he wants to see you right away—tonight—"

"Who?"

"Eppert! Lanson wants to give you a one-man show at the Gallery. Eppert says he's prepared to buy six of the big oils now, and he knows that after the showing he can dispose of a dozen more, at least."

So this was it. This was the way it happened. Hector Vane blinked and clutched the blue pawn-ticket in his pocket. It couldn't be real. But the ticket was real.

II

IT HAPPENED like that. Things began to flow like a movie montage as thirty days sped by. The triumphal showing. The reviews. The 14 sales. And then Lanson's market tip. Aircraft stocks, and a rise of 30 points in a few weeks.

Came the new bank account, came the dinners and parties, came the big studio near Washington Heights.

Came Nadja.

Nadja was the model for the new portrait. She was a tall, shapely blonde. She had a face that was all slanted eyes, protruding cheekbones, and pouting lips. There was a sensual quality in Nadja that Vane meant to capture for the picture—and for himself.

Of course he knew better. Artists and models—that sort of thing just didn't work out. But Nadja was different. She was necessary to complete his position. The money, the fame, the success; nothing mattered unless Nadja rounded out the picture.

Marie just didn't fit. That was the cold truth, and Vane discovered it immediately. The faithful wife, the patient nagger, the plain woman with the heart of gold—that was a garret role she could fulfil perfectly. But she couldn’t stand up to the part in the galleries, or at the parties, or in the gay Bohemian atmosphere that is maintained by moneyed intelligentsia who are neither gay nor Bohemian.

It wasn’t just a question of looks. Beauty parlors and couterieres accomplished miracles. But nothing could alter Marie’s temperament, and she remained a mocking reminder of former failure in this atmosphere of newfound success. A ghost-wife.

Vane talked to her, reasoned with her, argued with her. And then, when Nadja came, he forgot her.

Nadja’s body was a golden flame burning before secret altars, Nadja’s lips were shaped for strange kisses, and her eyes mirrored fugitive visions from the dark side of the moon.

Nadja was a vulgar floosie, too, but Vane ignored that. It didn’t matter, as long as she completed the picture.

So he made her pose for him. During that second month he tried to capture her spirit on canvas and strove valiantly to capture her flesh.

In neither venture was he wholly successful. As an artist, Vane sensed difficulties at every turn. Whether he reproduced her features with photographic fidelity or allowed his brush to express the abstract feeling inherent in her face and body, the results were unsatisfactory. This was strange, for Vane could paint portraits. Yet whatever he did, he ended with a sketch or a half-finished portrait of a vulgar floosie. It wasn’t right, it couldn’t be right. But there it was.

As a man, his difficulties multiplied. Nadja was not responsive to his endearments. She wanted a star sapphire she’d admired, and she thought it would be nice to have a place of her own—you know, with that blond finish on the furniture to match her hair. And she wished Hector would stop pawing her during the sittings. She didn’t think much of artists anyway, they were a bunch of spoiled brats. And did he have to wear that corny cloak?

After such a tongue-lashing from lips that were shaped for strange kisses, Vane would turn in despair to the relief of alcohol.

His love was not blind, merely myopic; and it took liquor to blot Nadja's imperfections from his view.

Weeks blended into months; flying by in a bewildering blur of intoxication.

Then, one afternoon, Vane sat blinking in his studio apartment. The north light was clear, but the room reeled before his gaze. Vane pressed slim fingers to his aching temples and stared.

Something rose before his eyes; something black and crawling; something that writhed and wriggled with thick coils holding a cryptic shape and meaning.

Vane gazed again, and then realized what it was he saw—it was the heavy black-numeral date on his calendar pad.

Without knowing it, his lips moved and made vocal his secret thought.

"Two and a half months gone," he whispered. "That means . . . yes . . . only two weeks more to go. Two more weeks, and then . . ."

Then what?

Vane sat bolt upright. Yes, then what?

INTOXICATION of fame, intoxication of flesh, intoxication of alcohol; all had blotted out that which he now remembered.

Somewhere an old man was waiting, waiting for him to appear and redeem a blue pawn ticket. A ticket for a human soul. He must paint a portrait, quickly, for he had but two weeks left in which to carry out the bargain.

Vane groaned aloud.

Perhaps he was a fool. Perhaps the old man was mad, and coincidence had brought him that for which he had bargained.

And yet, Vane was afraid. He remembered the shop now, and the shadows, and the way the old man's eyes had gloated. He remembered the secret smile, and the pact he had sealed. He knew then that he must take no chances. He must make the painting.

Unless—

There was a wild hope in Vane's heart. Perhaps, if he were to seek out the old man, talk to him reasonably, he might find another solution. It could all be a joke, really. His dissipation had warped his thinking, cost him his nerve. Better to go down there now and bargain.

Vane put on his tattered black cape, incongruous though it was in contrast to his new, expensive suit.

Once again he trudged through mean streets, searching for the shop in the shadows.

Once again the bell tinkled into musty darkness as Vane entered the pawnshop.

He groped his way toward the counters, alone in the gloom save for the host of shadows the bell had summoned. They clustered deeply behind the empty counters and Vane stared into a well of blackness.

Something emerged from the well—something white, grubby, incredibly old. The face of the aged stranger loomed. His eyes slitted curiously as he recognized Vane.

"Back again," he whispered. "Well, Mr. Vane, you're a bit early. Perhaps the punctual arrival of your good fortune urges you to be equally prompt in keeping your end of our agreement."

Vane nodded absently. He noted, with sudden, inexplicable horror, the way the old man's hands had begun to twitch and dart forward over the counter. His fingers were like long yellow talons, and they rasped across the wood outstretched as though avid to grasp, to clutch, to possess.

BEHIND the withered yellow mask of a smile Vane could sense a dreadful hunger that was more than mortal hunger—a yearning, a consuming desire to take that which must not be taken, to receive that which should not be given.

Then the voice came, holding the same hunger, throbbing with the same black thirst.

“The picture, Mr. Vane—where is my picture?”

Choking back his revulsion, Vane shook his head.

“—I haven’t finished it yet. That’s why I came here. I wanted to talk to you about the picture.”

The claws on the counter curled. The slitted eyes blazed upwards. Vane recoiled from the gaze.

“There is nothing to talk about. We made a bargain. I have kept my part of it. You must keep yours. Where is the picture?” Van forced a smile. “Well, it’s a fair question,” he said. “You mentioned that you would like to own one of my paintings, and that’s why I stopped by just now. I’d like to know if you have any choice. Now I was thinking that you might prefer some of my earlier works—a nice landscape, perhaps?” The old man cackled suddenly. It was as though a shriek had ululated up from the Pit.

“Landscape? That’s very clever of you, my dear sir. Very clever, indeed. Landscape!”

“But—”

“Our agreement, Mr. Vane, was for a portrait. A portrait of a human being. One of those portraits you alone can paint; one that captures the soul.”

There was no mirth in the voice now. And there was no hope in Vane’s heart.

“The soul,” he whispered. “Why do you keep insisting on the soul?”

“For a very good reason.” The old man was whispering now, but the words thundered in Vane’s ears. “Because I hold your soul in pawn. Unless it is redeemed in two weeks by another soul, I shall claim possession. Full possession.”

“But that means somebody else will be—”

“Mine, eternally,” nodded the creature behind the counter. “Yet a bargain was made. It’s your soul against another’s. Whose portrait you give me does not matter in the least. I will take anything, but you cannot cheat. You must paint faithfully, so that your genius will mirror the essence of the sitter.

"As a matter of fact, Mr. Vane, it's a good bargain for you. Perhaps there is someone you would like to get rid of. Paint me that person's portrait and we'll both be satisfied. Bring me the picture and the ticket and everything will be legally acceptable."

Vane reeled.

"There is no other way?" he murmured, "No other way. I shall expect you in two weeks, then. Good day."

Vane turned and stumbled blindly toward the door.

A cough sounded behind him.

"Oh, by the way. I've been observing your progress, and I'm well satisfied. Just a friendly suggestion, though—don't entangle yourself too deeply with women. They have long been allies of mine."

Another chuckle rasped in Vane's ears as he groped his way out of the shop.

He wandered back through twilit streets.

Now there was nothing more to do. Nothing to do but paint the portrait in which the soul of the sitter must shine. He must give the portrait to the old man, give him the soul that he thirsted for with a thirst older than earth.

Who would sit for the portrait?

He couldn't sacrifice any of his completed paintings. They were all in the hands of the dealers, and meant money. Besides, an innocent person must not be delivered into the hands of that black being masquerading as a pawnshop proprietor.

No, there must be a new subject. As the old man had hinted, it would be best if the subject's removal benefited Vane.

Yes, that was it. He had no doubts as to what would happen if he delivered the picture—the person it represented would vanish from earth.

Who would it be?

For a wild moment, Vane toyed with the notion of taking Nadja's portrait. He remembered the latest oil he'd attempted—remembered the sensual mouth, the greedy eyes, the feral brow. It was a mirror held to Nadja's selfish soul, no doubt of that.

But he couldn't give her up. No matter what she was, he wanted her. If only his wife weren't in the way, he'd have her forever.

If only his wife—

Vane blinked, shook his head.

He hastened up the stairs to the apartment door, flung it open. His wife was resting in the bedroom. He stalked across the floor, coughed.

"Marie!" he called. "Would you come here for just a moment? I think I have a marvelous idea."

III

MARIE was thrilled to think that Hector Vane had chosen to paint her portrait Her humble love and gratitude shone from her face as she sat; it would have taken a much more clumsy artist to avoid reflecting her soul as it poured forth in her adoring smile.

Hector Vane was not clumsy. His strokes were swift and sure. A few sittings and he had completed preliminary sketching; then he fell to painting. A week sped by. Vane realized that he was creating his masterpiece. The work flowed forward. Marie was never tired; her cooperation was endless.

On the ninth day the sittings ended, and Vane stood back and gazed upon Marie; his Marie, faithful to life.

He had done it.

The next two days he spent in finishing the background. Then and only then did he pause to rest, sleeping the clock around for the first time in twelve days.

Marie, after one look at the finished portrait, burst into tears of happiness.

Vane couldn't meet her eyes. He turned away, and remorse burned within him. Still, it had to be.

During that week he'd neglected Nadja. Now he wanted to see her. She'd called several times.

He turned to his wife, handed her a roll of bills.

"Darling, this has been a great strain. You'll never know how much I appreciate what you've done for me. Now I want you to run downtown and buy yourself something—hats, dresses, whatever you like."

"But Hector—"

"Run along now. Please. I want you to."

Vane turned away. He couldn't stand seeing her, seeing the light of love in her eyes.

Marie dressed, left the apartment. And Vane called Nadja.

Her voice, over the telephone, was querulous.

"Where have you been? I've waited for over a week and you haven't called. I know you'll have some miserable excuse to make, but I don't want to hear it."

"Come over and I'll show you my excuse," Vane exulted.

An hour later she arrived. Vane ushered her in with a grin of exultation.

"I have been busy," he said. "But I won't tell you why. I'll let you see for yourself, instead."

He led her to the portrait on the easel near the window, then pulled the drapes aside.

Nadja stared.

"What do you think? Isn't it the best thing I've done? Look at the life, the coloring."

Nadja turned. On her face was written a loathing Vane was never to forget.

"So that's it," she gasped. "You painted her. You've never been able to paint me decently, but you painted her. You painted her because you love her, and always have loved her."

"Nadja, I—"

She was gone. The slam of the door cut Vane's protest off in midair.

Vane stared at the portrait. She had said he loved his wife. And he didn't. Still, she had gone away believing it, and now he was alone. It wasn't working out.

So Vane did what he had learned to do when things weren't working out. He left the apartment and got drunk.

IT WAS late when he returned.

Marie met him on the outer stairs. There was an odor in the air, and a look on her face. He sensed the truth as he gazed into her tear-filled eyes.

"That woman—the clerk downstairs says she came here this afternoon after you left. He let her in, she said it was all right. And then she set fire to—oh, Hector!"

Vane rushed into the apartment, stared at ruined walls, charred furnishings. And he stared at the blackened heap of ashes that had once been his precious paintings.

Nadja had taken her revenge.

Marie's portrait was gone. And so were all the rest, all the oils he still had on hand in the studio. Burned to ashes. His last work was gone, and with it, his last hope.

Grimly he recalled a similar incident in a book. "Of Human Bondage," wasn't it?

In this case, the deed was condemning him to bondage that wasn't human.

Tomorrow was the thirteenth day. And the old man had whispered, "Bring me my portrait."

Well, there was no portrait for the old man. There was nothing. On the fourteenth day he would go to the shop and the old man would say, "Where is my portrait?" and—

Wait a minute!

The thought that crossed Vane's mind was diabolical. Yes, it might well be so described—for it was diabolically inspired.

He turned to Marie.

"Go and get me some fresh canvas," he commanded.

"Now? But your work—it's ruined!" she protested.

"Exactly," Vane whispered. "That's why I must start over again immediately. Get me the canvas—I'm going to paint."

"But what would you paint at this hour?"

Vane shrugged, turned his eyes away.

"I cannot tell you," he declared.

"But you have no one to pose for you. Where is your model?"

Vane tapped his forehead.

"Here," he murmured. "My model is here. Now hurry. I've only twenty-four hours. Twenty-four hours for a masterpiece!"

TWENTY-FOUR hours for a master piece. . . .

Vane worked all alone in the studio worked as night faded into dawn, dawn burst into daylight, daylight blended into twilight, and twilight fled before the blackness of another night.

Marie did not disturb him, nor did she seek to discover what shaped itself on the canvas before him. Twice during the day she tiptoed in to bring sandwiches and coffee. He dismissed her with the food untouched.

She did not attempt to restore the ravaged room, but crept silently through the house while Vane painted furiously. He stared raptly at the canvas on the easel, and though his eyes were trance-like in their fixity, his cunning fingers moved in bold, sure strokes.

It was dawn of the fourteenth day, the fatal day. Vane stepped back, gazed at the completed portrait; shuddered, and drew a cloth over the undried picture.

Then he moaned and collapsed.

Marie half-supported, half-dragged him in to the bed. She sat there watching throughout the morning as he slept. In the afternoon he stirred long enough to take hot soup, then collapsed once more. But his eyes were sane again, and Marie did not fear.

She smiled at his sleeping face, smiled to see that it no longer bore the ravages of hidden care or dread.

Yes, it was safe. She could leave now. It was dark when she returned, carrying a package under her arm. She put it down in the parlor and then heard Vane stirring on the bed.

"Marie!" he called. "Where are you?"

"Here, darling."

She entered the bedroom. Vane was sitting bolt upright. His face was carefree no longer.

"Where were you? Why didn't you wake me?"

"I went out. You needed rest."

"But my appointment—"

"What appointment?"

"I must deliver this new painting today."

"Deliver it? To whom?"

"Never mind."

Vane was fumbling for his clothes, dressing in frantic haste.

"I'll be too late," he muttered.

Marie laid a hand on his shoulder. "What is it, dear? What's troubling you? Is it—is it that—woman?"

Vane turned, smiled.

"No, Marie. That woman is out of my life, out of our lives, forever. Thank God she did what she did. Re told me that women were his allies. Now I believe it. When I think of what I planned to do—"

He kissed her, swiftly, unexpectedly.

"You've stood by me, at any rate. Even when you didn't understand, you were faithful and kind. Now, when I've dealt with him, we shall be happy."

Marie didn't understand what he was saying. But she understood his kiss, and was grateful. She smiled up at him, and then—The bell rang, sharply.

Marie went to the door.

"There's a visitor for you, dear," she called.

"Visitor? Who is it?"

Marie came into the bedroom immediately.

"I don't know," she breathed. "He won't give me his name. Says he has business with you. An old man—"

Vane stalked out into the parlor.

There was a shadow in the hallway. The shadow moved, emerged into the parlor.

It was the ivory-skulled ancient from the pawnshop.

"Good evening, Mr. Vane," he murmured. "If the mountain will not come to—ah—Mahomet, then—ah—Mahomet must come to the mountain."

"I was detained."

"I accept your apology. But now, to business. I have come for my portrait. Is it ready?"

Vane was thankful for the dim light. Marie couldn't read the avid lust that flickered in those ageless, evil eyes.

He turned toward the window. "Yes, it's ready," he muttered.

"Excellent. And may I—see it?"

"You may. I'll snap on a light. Lift the covering on that easel if you will."

The light snapped on. A bony finger stabbed convulsively toward the cloth, tore it aside. The portrait leaped into view.

The old man stared into the bony-painted countenance of himself.

PAINTED from an image seared on memory, line for line . . . it was a living death's head. And yet it captured the foulness, the charnel horror that might be called a soul.

"You fool! What trickery is this?"

The words welled forth and Marie shuddered. But Vane laughed.

“You asked for a portrait of any living person. Any living person. And you said to me, ‘Give me my portrait.’ The words inspired me. Here, then, is your portrait. Of you. Don’t deny that I’ve painted your soul. It’s leering right out of the canvas at you. Take your hideous soul and be gone, then. I’ve given the devil his due.” The old man stared, then shrugged.

“I didn’t believe it possible,” he said. “That a mortal should trick me thus—”

“You admit you’re outwitted, then?” Vane shouted in triumph. “You admit it?”

“Yes.”

“Thank you for the tribute. I’m sure it was wrung from your lips. Next time you’ll be a little more cautious. You thought you had me, didn’t you? Thought I’d sell my own soul or that of my wife, eh? You warned me against women—well a woman saved me at the end. She burned the other portraits and I did this. You’ve done me a great service.”

Vane took Marie in his arms and stared at the convulsed mouth of the ancient one.

“Yes, a great service,” he repeated. “Not only have I outwitted you and gained fame and power—you have served to bring me and my wife together again. At last I know the true values. Ironic as it may be, you have been the cause of my spiritual regeneration. Makes you wince, doesn’t it?”

Vane chuckled again. “All right, what are you waiting for? There’s your portrait. Take it.”

The fiendish countenance glaring out of the canvas was matched by its living counterpart.

The old man grasped the easel, then he turned.

“By the way,” he said, “one little detail remains. In order to legalize this transaction, I should like you to return to me that little blue pawn-ticket I gave you.”

“All right. And then, off with you.”

Vane re-entered the bedroom.

"Marie!" he called. "Where did you hang my cloak? There's a ticket in the pocket, inside—"

Marie went to the doorway.

"I've a surprise for you," she said. "While you slept I went out and bought you something."

She opened the package she had carried in.

"A new cloak," she smiled. "That old one was so shabby, and I thought you deserved—

"Marie! What did you do with my old cloak?"

"I—I—burned it—"

"Burned it?"

The old man appeared in the doorway. "Yes," he whispered. "Women, as I have said before, are often my allies. And your cloak is gone. The ticket is gone, too. And only the ticket redeems you from me."

"But—"

The room had grown very still. The old man glided forward. He pushed Marie aside and closed the door.

"You have done your part," he croaked. "You burned it. And now—"

Vane retreated to the wall. As the old man advanced, his claws began to work convulsively. His eyes flamed. Vane tried to scream as the claws came up and the eyes came down.

There wasn't a scream left in him.

He knew now that the cloak wasn't the only thing destined to burn.

The Bat Is My Brother

Have you ever wondered why there are not more vampires—for every victim of a vampire becomes one in turn!

IT BEGAN in twilight—a twilight I could not see.

My eyes opened on darkness, and for a moment I wondered if I were still asleep and dreaming. Then I slid my hands down and felt the cheap lining of the casket, and I knew that this nightmare was real.

I wanted to scream, but who can hear screams through six feet of earth above a grave?

Better to save my breath and try to save my sanity. I fell back, and the darkness rose all around me. The darkness, the cold, clammy darkness of death.

I could not remember how I had come here, or what hideous error had brought about my premature interment. All I knew was that I lived—but unless I managed to escape, I would soon be in a condition horribly appropriate to my surroundings.

Then began that which I dare not remember in detail. The splintering of wood, the burrowing struggle through loosely-packed grave earth; the gasping hysteria accompanying my clawing, suffocated progress to the sane surface of the world above.

It is enough that I finally emerged. I can only thank poverty for my deliverance—the poverty which had placed me in a flimsy, unsealed coffin and a pauper's shallow grave.

Clotted with sticky clay, drenched with cold perspiration, racked by utter revulsion, I crawled forth from betwixt the gaping jaws of death.

Dusk crept between the tombstones, and somewhere to my left the moon leered down to watch the shadowy legions that conquered in the name of Night.

The moon saw me, and a wind whispered furtively to brooding trees, and the trees bent low to mumble a message to all those sleeping below their shade.

I grew restless beneath the moon's glaring eye, and I wanted to leave this spot before the trees had told my secret to the nameless, numberless dead.

Despite my desire, several minutes passed before I summoned strength to stand erect, without trembling.

Then I breathed deeply of fog and faint putridity; breathed, and turned away along the path.

It was at that moment the figure appeared.

It glided like a shadow from the deeper shadows haunting the trees, and as the moonlight fell upon a human face I felt my heart surge in exultation.

I raced towards the waiting figure, words choking in my throat as they fought for prior utterance.

"You'll help me, won't you?" I babbled. "You can see . . . they buried me down there . . . I was trapped . . . alive in the grave . . . out now . . . you'll understand . . .

I can't remember how it began, but . . . you'll help me?"

A head moved in silent assent.

I halted, regaining composure, striving for coherency.

"This is awkward," I said, more quietly. "I've really no right to ask you for assistance. I don't even know who you are."

